He led us first through the town of Nablous into the Samaritan quarter, where we saw the Samaritan synagogue. An ancient worn copy of the Pentateuch was taken out of its recess in the wall and shown us, but probably it was not the precious copy which the Samaritans of Nablous so jealously guard. This ancient Samaritan colony is, however, a commentary on New and Old Testament history, more interesting to unlearned eyes than any manuscript.

From this we were guided to the Keimakan's house, from the flat roof of which we were to have a good view of the valley. There, unfortunately for our walk to the top of Gerizim, the Keimakan's nephew met us, and invited me to pay a visit to the harem. It would have been a discourtesy to decline, and, accordingly, I had to leave our party and descend a flight of steps from the roof to the women's apartments.

These steps led to an open court with a reservoir of pure water in the centre. Three ladies were sitting and standing in the court when the Keimakan's nephew took me there. One, who seemed to be the principal, invited me to sit down on some cushions which lay in the corner of a room opening on this court. Then they brought a Persian rug and spread it for me, and offered me a glass of sherbet. My large brown hat, with its folds of muslin coiled into a turban round it, amused them apparently as much as it would have our friends in England. They took it off, and stroked my hair, as one would a cat one wished to make friends with, and felt my dress. I showed them my eye-glass, which entertained them greatly. Then I took a little child on my knee, which made a means of communication. So, with my few Arabic words we became very friendly. They offered me a chibouque, but I could not pretend to undertake an unmitigated long pipe; and not to offend them by declining their hospitality, I said, "Nargilleh." They then brought me a pipe twined like a snake round a glass jar full of rose-water, in which the bowl is placed, and I managed to create a few bubbles.

While this was preparing, another lady appeared who seemed the chief, as immediately all the others retired into the back ground and left me to my new hostess. She was quite caressing and affectionate, showed me into several bedrooms, unfastened the lattices which opened into the garden for me to look out, although she would not approach them herself, and finally placed me beside her on a divan in a room more furnished than any of the others, and had a nargilleh and a cup of coffee brought for me.

The rooms were very scantily furnished. Chairs and tables, of course, you would not expect; but there were no luxuries—no signs of women's work or taste, no flowers, sewing materials, or books, or traces of any kind of occupation or amusement—only four dreary white-washed walls, with a few cushions, and a recess in the wall closed with carved doors, for a wardrobe. The cushions were covered with chintz. Only in the room where I had coffee was a small Turkish table of ebony, inlaid with mother-of-pearl. The dress of the ladies was not as rich as I had expected, with the exception of rows of gold coins and pearls strung and festooned round their heads, as also around their children's. The loose veil and mantle which forms the out-door costume of the women, and enfolds them into a shapeless bundle of clothes, were, of course, laid aside. The whole visit made me very sad. The position of those women, with their handsome expressive faces, and kindly lively caressing ways, weighed most painfully on my heart. And they were fellow-townswomen of the woman of Samaria! It was difficult to get away from them. At length, however, I made them understand that I must not keep my party waiting, and succeeded in rejoining them on the roof of the house. There the Keimakan joined us, and was most polite. He was a grand-looking old man with a long white beard. His arrival involved a second edition of sherbet, pipes, and coffee, so that our walk up Gerizim was much abridged.

We climbed some way up, however, after taking leave of the hospitable governor, and were attended by a kawassa, whom he insisted on our having, as a guide and escort. It was a pleasant path beside streams, occasionally crossing them, and always accompanied by their refreshing music, and among the luxuriant gardens and orchards which they water. The opposite hill, Ebal, looked comparatively bare and stony, only sprinkled with a little vegetation of a dull green. They told us the springs all rose on Gerizim,—the hill of blessing. If so it is a remarkably vivid type, the hill of cursing, barren, brown, and voiceless,—whilst the hill of blessing is clothed with evergreen herbage, luxuriant trees, and vines nourished by the living waters in its heart.

The remainder of the day we rested in or near our tents, and had time to think what those two days must have been which our Lord once actually spent in this very place, listened to, welcomed, understood.

From this valley had gone up, eighteen hundred years ago, the first recognition of the Son of God, as not only the Jewish Messiah, the Christ, but the Desire of all nations, the Saviour of the world. One could fancy that the powers of life in nature had been unfettered here ever since, in virtue of that acknowledgment; and that the valley of Sychar was ever after to be a fragment and foretaste of paradise,—a place of streams and rest, full of all manner of trees pleasant to the eyes, and good for food, a little spot of earth visibly subject to the life-giving sceptre of the "second Man," the Lord from heaven. No place to be compared with this in fertility and beauty exists, they say, in Palestine. We had, certainly, seen none.

It was pleasant, too, to think that this town and valley may also have been the one alluded to in the eighth of Acts,—the words translated in John iv., "a city of Samaria," and in Acts viii., "the city of Samaria," being the same. If so, this place was the first scene of a Samaritan Church, admitted by Peter and John, on the same level as the Church at Jerusalem. In this city there was then "great joy." And here again, no doubt (Acts xv.), as in the other Churches of Samaria, the tidings of the conversion of the Gentiles in Asia Minor "caused great joy to the brethren," rejoicing that the Saviour of the world had at length been welcomed by the heathen world as once and for the first time in their own Samaritan city.

Thus the valley was full of happy and living associations, varied and refreshing as the sound of its own many waters.

On Monday morning some of our party walked again through the town, and saw a potter sitting at his wheel moulding the red clay into the simple, but picturesque bowls and pitchers used by the peasantry.

I longed to be able to speak to a few poor peasant women and children who came and sat by me under the shade of a mulberry-tree after our tents were struck. Fellow-townswomen of the woman in Samaria, surely the void and thirst in her heart existed also in theirs. If they could only have learned about the living water!

At three o'clock in the afternoon (Monday, June 30) we set off again, under the guard of two Bashi Bazouks sent by the Keimakan. Reluctantly we ascended the hill out of that lovely valley, with its cool dewy atmosphere, its abundant streams, its fig-trees and mulberries, covered with vines, and its holy and happy memories.

After a pleasant ride of three hours over breezy hills we reached the place where our tents were pitched by a spring in a green valley just under the hill of Samaria.

Our route had now broken off, for an interval, from all definite incidents in the narratives of the Gospels, and in the history of the apostles. From Sychar to Nain, on the northern side of the Plain of Esdraelon, we are met by no name which recalls any especial deed or word of our Lord. Yet the impress of his footsteps was with us everywhere. Again and again He had mounted these hills, and descended into these valleys, and crossed these hot and weary plains. There was one association which could never leave us, and on which it was almost a relief at times to fall back, after having our attention fixed intensely on some especial scene. The mere distances we traversed enabled us to realize in a way I had never done before, what the activity and fatigue of those three years of His ministry must have been.

He had traversed these paths on foot. It is evident that his journeys were not made in silence. The apostles were with him, and as they walked he taught them. Parable and proverb, and immortal sayings, and words of tender warning and sympathy, were always falling from his lips, as they went through vineyard, corn-field, or solitary path among the flickering shadows of copse wood, or under the olive groves. And therefore, perhaps, it was only Jesus who was weary when they reached the well at Sychar.

It would be interesting to trace how many of our Lord's parables or instructions were given as they went in the way. "As they went in the way a certain man said unto him, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. And Jesus said unto him, Foxes have holes," the jackals which hunt among these hills by night have holes to hide themselves in by day, "and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head."

Again, "Jesus going up to Jerusalem, took the disciples apart in the way, and said unto them, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and the Son of man shall be betrayed unto the chief priests and scribes; and they shall condemn him to death."

Again, "As he went through the corn-fields on the Sabbath-day," the Pharisees found fault with the disciples for plucking the ears of corn; and he said unto them, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath."

Instances might be multiplied of this wayside teaching. Indeed, the number of the lessons of eternal truth called out by casual words or acts, or by the scenes he was passing through at the time, would probably far exceed our Saviour's more deliberate and formal instructions. It is this which gives the variety and vividness to his teachings. They were conversations, not "discourses." They were not put together as human words and works are; they grew as divine works do, and they live.

Of two incidents in the Gospels we do, however, know that they happened among these Samaritan hills.

To one village in the country through which we were journeying, the Saviour of the world sent forward messengers to secure him a night's lodging. The name of that village is not given, any more than the name of the woman "who was a sinner." Sectarian bigotry prevailed over the common hospitality of the East. "They would not receive" One who was going up to the rival altar at Jerusalem. They did not know what that passover was to prove, nor who was to be its paschal lamb.

The fervent natures of the sons of thunder flashed into revengeful indignation. There must have been more fire in the eye of the beloved disciple, even in his chastened old age, than the mediæval painters have given him in youth. But the Lord turned and rebuked, not the inhospitable villagers, but the disciple whom he loved. He said to the brothers, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." And quietly, uncomplainingly, without another word of comment, He for whom and by whom all things were created "passed on to another village."

This is the only incident recorded in the New Testament to the dishonour of the despised Samaritans. Perhaps the simple and touching story which we usually call the parable of the good Samaritan was actually a true narrative of a deed of kindness, marked by Him who observed the widow put her mite into the treasury, and saw Nathanael under the fig-tree. But however that may be, its scene was not in this immediate neighbourhood.

The second incident of gospel narrative which may probably have occurred in Samaria, "as our Lord passed through Samaria and Galilee, on his way to Jerusalem," is the healing of the ten lepers. If this was so, somewhere on the rocky paths among those Samaritan hills our Lord's heart was gladdened by the sight of one grateful human being; and he, like the grateful woman of Sychar, was a Samaritan. One would like to identify, as much as any spot in Palestine, the place where the healed Samaritan leper, no more constrained, as an unclean person, to keep "afar off," fell down at the feet of Jesus, giving him thanks.

The more definite associations of the district around Samaria, interesting as they are, are scarcely sacred at all; and yet the situation of the city of Samaria is beautiful, and its ruins are more extensive than those of any other place in Palestine.

When we reached the stream at the foot of the hill of Samaria, beside which our tents were pitched, it was nearly sunset.

Flocks of sheep and goats were collected around the abundant, clear spring, to be watered from its large, rocky basin; and the women of the village of Samaria (Sebastiyeh) were filling their large earthen pitchers, to carry them up the winding road to their homes. As we rode up the hill, to see the ruins before the light was gone, we passed other women toiling under the weight of their heavy water-jars.

Samaria, like Nablous, and unlike most of the remaining cities in Palestine, retains the Greek name Herod gave it (Sebaste, Sebastiyeh), instead of its earlier Hebrew appellation. Its situation is indeed royal and beautiful, on the levelled summit of a rounded, isolated hill, separated by broad, fertile valleys from the higher hills around, through the openings of which it commands a very extensive range of distance. Its aspect must have been most queenly when the temples and palaces of the kings of Israel, and afterwards of Herod, crowned the platform at its summit, rearing their white columns and gilded roofs on the height to which the whole terraced hill must have seemed a magnificent flight of steps, tier above tier of terraces, green with vines, silvery with olives, or golden with corn, leading the eye to the royal city at the summit.

Sixty or seventy columns are standing on the top of the hill, winding round in a double colonnade from near the remains of a massive, ancient gate, flanked with ruined towers. These columns were, we thought, monoliths, and some of them of granite.

On the site of the city is an Arab village and many cultivated fields. The peasants were not very civil; but perhaps they were afraid we might prove tax-gatherers, deservedly their greatest terror next to the Bedouins.

A mosque, formerly a church, rises among these cabins. It is called the Church of John the Baptist; and this tradition (naturally connecting the memory of the murdered prophet and the murderous king) points out as the scene of John the Baptist's death. Into the wall of this church is built a Corinthian column, probably from Herod's temple.

In the crypt underneath the church, shown to us as the prison and the tomb of John the son of Zachariah, is an ancient stone door, like some of those in the tombs of the kings at Jerusalem.

Before descending the hill we lingered to look at the magnificent panoramic view of mountains, rich plains, and wooded valleys, embracing a range east and west from the Mediterranean to the hills beyond Jordan which were burning that evening with all the glory of sunset. This was the view which was seen from the flat roofs of the palaces of Ahab and Herod. Some of our party saw jackals and a wolf within a hundred yards of them, on the site of Herod's city.

Such was the beauty of the place, and such its desolation. But what were its memories? They are almost entirely of the things that perish, not only disconnected with what is sacred, but with what is noblest in profane history. Samaria was the metropolis, not of a nation dimly feeling its way to the light, but of one deliberately turning its back on a light not dimly revealed, and therefore the best human as well as all divine elements are absent from its records. Not only has it no David or Daniel or Hannah, but no Leonidas or Socrates.

No deed of true heroism or generous humanity consecrates its site any more than any life of true godliness. Its two conspicuous names are Ahab and Herod, the murderer of the blameless Naboth and the murderer of John the Baptist, the slaves of Jezebel and of Herodias. Its two most remarkable buildings were Ahab's temple of Baal, which Jehu destroyed, and Herod's temple to Augustus, whose columns are probably those among which we rode.

The connection of Elijah and Elisha with Samaria is scarcely an exception. They came to it, not as residents, but as prophetic visitants from the wilderness or the schools of the prophets, and usually with messages of doom. One signal deliverance, indeed, characterizes Samaria—the panic which seized the besieging army of Benhadad, and laid open the richly furnished and provisioned tents of the Syrians to the four famishing lepers. A massive ancient gateway was, as has been said, the only ruin of importance which we remarked besides the colonnade, and we naturally fixed on it as the scene of that adventure, one of the most romantic (if the expression may be used) in the sacred narrative. We could imagine the hungry and so lately hopeless citizens passing through that rocky portal, at first in small groups, with slow and watchful movements, looking around on every side in fear of an ambush, and then, as party after party reached the camp, and not an enemy appeared, the sudden rise of confidence and the rush of the famished multitude through the narrow gateway, trampling down in their eager haste the sceptical official who tried to keep order among them. A feast ready spread for the famished, free range over their deserted hills for those who had been so long cooped up in hopeless inaction; yesterday a mother who had murdered her own child for hunger, and came to complain about it to the king, not as of a crime, but as of a bargain unfulfilled, all womanly feeling and all moral sense absorbed in the mad craving of hunger—and to-day, rescue, freedom, and plenty of every kind! History presents us with few more sudden and joyous contrasts, and yet we hear of no thank-offering, no song of praise. The godless spirit which displayed itself in scepticism in the nobleman, when Elisha prophesied deliverance, was manifested after the deliverance in the selfish, reckless haste of the people who trod him to death. Hopelessness in danger, selfish thanklessness in deliverance, the whole incident is a striking illustration how the alienation of men from God involves their alienation from one another.

The memories of Samaria are memories of crime, and idolatry, and of a splendour, all of "the earth, earthy," illumined by no true light of divine truth or of human love. We descended the beautiful terraced hill without regret, and were very glad to find shelter in our little encampment in the valley, where a clear, abundant stream gurgled through the brushwood close to our tent-doors, tinkling over its pebbles, and eddying round its little shingly beaches, and giving us an unlimited supply of good water for all domestic purposes.

Through the night at times we heard the jackals wailing and screaming from the neighbouring hills, and early in the morning the goats from a village near came to drink at the rocky basin which had just formed the bath for some of our party.

On the next morning (Tuesday, June 24th) we started at four o'clock. It was a beautiful ride. In many places the hills were cultivated; in almost all they might be clothed with luxuriant vegetation. We skirted the Valley of Sebastiyeh, and as we climbed the opposite hills, and were winding through a pass leading into the Plain of Jezreel, we caught a last and most impressive view of the royal hill of Samaria. How often the city must have burst from this point on the sight of the kings of Israel as they were returning from Jezreel!

For beauty few sites can equal it, and we could not help lingering to gaze and imagine how the royal city must have looked through this ravine, on its symmetrical isolated hill, with its crown of temples and palaces, and its queenly robe of terraced vineyards, corn fields, and olive gardens, sweeping majestically into the valley. But its temples were to Baal or to Caesar, and its palaces were scenes of riot and crime. There was nothing to regret.

Soon afterwards we descended on the Plain of Jezreel, the great battle-field of Palestine, the inheritance of Asher. It was beautiful then, although the corn had been reaped. But in spring, after the rainy season, it must be delightful when the fields of young corn, their delicate green shot here and there with the tints of countless wild-flowers, especially of the scarlet anemones, undulates like a sea as far as the eye can reach on each side, running up among the hills and headlands in long creeks and spreading bays of living verdure.

Unfortunately for the inhabitants, this rich plain has many an outlet through the Jordan valley into the Desert, and the Bedouins, with their camels and black tents, make inroads on it now as easily as their ancestors, the Midianites of old. There are few places on this side of the Jordan so perilous to travellers as Esdraelon. About mid-day we reached Jenin (Engannim, the well of gardens), a place of springs and gardens still. Our thirsty horses soon scented the water, and quickened their steps to reach the extensive troughs, where large flocks of pretty, long-eared goats and sheep, with herds of cattle such as we had not seen for a long time, were being watered. From these abundant and well-kept wells, we were directed to a garden, where they spread mats for us, under the shade of a magnificent mulberry-tree, the fruit of which dropped around us. We were regaled on mulberries, figs, cucumbers, and tomatoes. Soon after this an American and a Dutchman came, with mules and horses, and pitched their tent under the same mulberry. Then we discovered that Jezreel, where we had intended spending the night, was not a safe place of encampment, on account of the Bedouins, and as no other halting-place was within reach, provided with springs, and uninfested with these desert marauders, we had to find another garden, and encamp for the day and night at Jenin.

Although we regretted at the time the "annexation" of our mulberry by the strangers, we afterwards much preferred our second resting-place, because it was under the shade of a garden at the edge of the plain, and gave us a fine uninterrupted view over the whole broad level, with its occasional islands of hill, and its reaches of fertile land stretching past headland after headland of its mountain coasts.

Hither, from the height of Tabor, unseen on the north, Deborah and Barak's patriotic band had swept down on the hosts of Sisera, encamped with chariots and horsemen on the western reaches of Esdraelon, and routed them in the battle of Megiddo.

Hither, from their deserts in the East, the Midianites and the Amalekites, and the children of the East, had come up and pitched in this valley or plain of Jezreel, with their cattle and their tents. This broad level, where now we only saw the waving of thin vegetation springing up after the harvest, was alive with their camels and their cattle, and the movements of their horsemen scouring the plains for plunder, "like the sand by the sea-side for multitude." The whole land was astir with them, as the fields at evening with the hum of countless cicadas or "grasshoppers." And through those passes on the east their chieftains and all the scattered host fled after Gideon's victory.

On the "high places" of Gilboa, on the north-east, Saul and Jonathan fell by the hands of the Philistines, and were lamented by David in the pathetic dirge we know so well.

From the range of Carmel on the west, Ahab drove into Jezreel, the girded prophet Elijah running with supernatural swiftness before him. And before they reached the city, the little cloud rising from the Mediterranean not larger than a man's hand, had covered the whole sky with blackness, and was pouring down its torrents of blessing on these mountains and this plain. What a miraculous change the few days after that rain must have made in the scenery around us! Long-buried and forgotten seeds of life, flowers, and corn, and grasses, springing up on hill-side, valley, and level, till all the land was one tide of exuberant life.

We were in the region of chariots. Here the Syrian hosts of Benhadad, with chariots and cavalry, had filled the country, and across this level sweep they had fled before the Israelites, who had been pitched before them "like two little flocks of kids," because the blaspheming of the Syrians might not pass unanswered, that the God of Israel was a local deity, such as they believed their own to be, "a god of the hills, but not of the plains." Across this plain, not long afterwards, Jehu was seen driving his chariot furiously from the border land of Gilead, to execute vengeance on the doomed house of Ahab.

And from that time to this, the corn fields of Esdraelon have been trampled down by Bedouin tribes and invading armies, "children of the East," and children of the West. The villages and towns which lie (like the villages on the coasts of Genoa) on the sides of the headlands which bound the plain, or crown the little hills which rise here and there like islands from it, have looked down from age to age on scene after scene of war and slaughter. The records of its battles range from the book of Judges to the Revelation; from the rout of the armies of Sisera at Megiddo, the western branch of this plain, to the battle of the great day of God Almighty, when the kings of the earth and the whole world are gathered together into a place "called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon." Whatever may be the meaning of that last announcement in the Apocalyptic vision, this final allusion cannot but give a deep and mysterious interest to the great battle-field, beneath whose sod such countless numbers of warriors already lie, and which furnishes the title for the last great conflict, which, we are promised, shall be a victory for the Prince of peace.

BRIEF NOTES ON SCRIPTURE.

I.

"For I was alive without the law once: but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died."—ROMANS vii. 9.

By the "law," Paul meant the Ten Commandments which he had, in all likelihood, learned when he was a boy, dwelling with his father and mother at Tarsus, and had had them at his fingers' ends ever since. Yet Paul says he had been "without the law." How was this? Plainly, that he had understood nothing at all of its import; had never seen and felt that it brought him under a hopeless condemnation, as a sinner deserving hell; had never found out, and did not believe, that he was not able to keep all its requirements. Thus he was "alive" in his own estimation, that is to say, in a religious sense, or in relation to God. In the goodness which he possessed already, and his power of adding to it at will, he had, as he believed, a religious character which was, on the whole, sound and healthy, a good and sufficient foundation for his heavenly hope.

By-and-by the Spirit of God opened the eyes of his understanding, and showed him what the "law" was; and he saw at once that he had never known anything about it before,—had been, to all intents and purposes, "without the law;" and this discovery was as if the "commandment came" to him then for the first time. The effect was, that "sin revived;" all the sinfulness of his life and character, that is, rose up to his astonished view in its fearful proportions, and he saw that he was a dead man,—guilty, helpless, condemned,—with not one good thing to plead before God in abatement of the sentence of condemnation that had already gone forth. Then Paul embraced Christ by faith, as he never would have done without that "law-work," and thenceforth he was "alive unto God."

Blessed is the man, and only he, to whom the commandment thus comes by the power of the Holy Ghost, disposing him joyfully to accept Christ as his righteousness, so that, "now being made free from sin, and become servant to God," he has his "fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life."

"Lord, how secure my conscience was,
And felt no inward dread!
I was alive without the law,
And thought my sins were dead.

My hopes of heaven were firm and bright;
But since the precept came,
With a convincing power and light,
I find how vile I am.

My God, I cry with every breath
For some kind power to save,
To break the yoke of sin and death,
And thus redeem the slave."

II.

"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor," &c.—ISA. LXI. 1; LUKE IV. 18, 19.

WHAT a doctrinal, practical, and fervent sermon our Saviour must have preached from this text on his visit to his native town, Nazareth!

As he showed who were meant by "the captives," "the blind," "the bruised," and brought out clearly the state of the "broken-hearted," the means of "deliverance" and healing, and specially as he pressed now as "the acceptable" time, what mind could have remained uninstructed, and what heart unmoved? "And all bare him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth." It was a solemn sermon, and one to try the heart. And yet the poor, blind, captive souls were not savingly benefited. Such is the "deceitful and desperately wicked" condition of man's heart. They began to say, "Is not this Joseph's son?" And to show them to themselves, Jesus brought out the doctrine of divine sovereignty; whereupon they were filled with murderous wrath; and they could not have remained ignorant of their guilty and lost state. What food for serious reflection and deep feeling is here both for ministers and hearers!

III.

"Not my will, but thine be done."—LUKE XXII. 42.

EVERY Christian has his Gethsemane, his place for the prayer of agony. And he cannot avoid the times when he must enter it with a soul "exceeding sorrowful." Perhaps the cherished project of years is melting away, and he is coming with inevitable step to stand where Job did when he said: "My purposes are broken off." Or his riches are taking to themselves wings. A blot is maliciously thrown on the fair picture of his life, and he cannot touch it for removal without making it worse. It may be that the premonition is given in language not to be mistaken, that his life is suddenly on its close. Perhaps the companion of youth and of riper years, of all joys and sorrows, is dipping the departing feet at the crossings of Jordan. Perhaps the first-born, in all the blush of her beauty and loveliness, or in all the rich prophecy of his coming usefulness and honour, is beckoned by an unseen hand, and prepares to go. Such are the hours when we foresee our crucifixion.

In such trial and agony, even to the full measure of his sorrow, it was right for the Saviour to pray, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." And so, blessed thought! it is right for us so to pray. We may, when "exceeding sorrowful, even unto death," go to our Gethsemane. We may weep and groan under the grief, being in an agony. It is not wrong, for the Lord Jesus did so. We may kneel where he did, use his words, and tell all our anguish. Place and privilege sacred to sorrow by his usage! But we may not divide his words. We also must add that hardest word for human lips to articulate—"nevertheless." Oh, what a blank for God to fill out, having our signature in advance. The loved, the known, the hoped for, all cheerfully and sweetly yielded up in that one word, "nevertheless," and the unknown will of God patiently and submissively awaited! And then the angels come ministering, as they did to "the Captain of our salvation," who was made perfect through suffering.

What a place is Gethsemane to learn and own the doctrine of the divine sovereignty! Where in the wide world can one learn to pronounce with so much filial confidence and tenderness and sweet submission, the words, "Thy will be done?" He kneels where Jesus knelt. The cup is full to him, as it was to the Master. The waiting angel is there, as of old,—the identical one it may be. And after that prayer he can take up the cross. Yes, every Christian has his Gethsemane; and it makes him Christ-like to go there.

IV.

"With whom is no variableness."—JAMES I. 17.

THE word rendered variableness, is in the Greek μεταβολή, from which comes the striking astronomical term parallax. The stars that are so inconceivably distant that they appear precisely in the same position from the opposite sides of the earth's orbit, are said to have no parallax, no angle of difference, and so nothing can be told of their size, place, or orbit.

Here is a striking presentation of the immutability of God. No distances of time or place cause him to vary in the least possible angle or degree. To the eye of man on the earth and of Gabriel in glory God is, and will ever be, the same; and it is but natural and right that both should fall on their faces and adore and worship. He dwells in light unapproachable and full of glory. "Praise ye the Lord; praise ye the name of the Lord; praise him, O ye servants of the Lord."

WAITING.

A LITTLE longer yet, a little longer,
Shall violets bloom for thee and sweet birds sing,
And the lime branches, where soft winds are blowing,
Shall murmur the sweet promise of the spring.

A little longer yet, a little longer,
The tenderness of twilight shall be thine,
The rosy clouds that float o'er dying daylight,
Nor fade till trembling stars begin to shine.

A little longer yet, a little longer,
Shall starry night be beautiful to thee.
And the cold morn shall look through the blue silence,
Flooding her silver path upon the sea.

A little longer yet, a little longer,
Life shall be thine—life with its power to will,
Life with its strength to bear, to love, to conquer,
Bringing its thousand joys thy heart to fill.

A little longer still—patience, beloved!
A little longer still, ere heaven unroll
The glory, and the brightness, and the wonder,
Eternal and divine, that wait thy soul.

A little longer, ere life, true, immortal
(Not this our shadowy life), will be thine own,
And thou shalt stand where winged archangels worship,
And reverent bow before the great white throne.

A little longer still, and heaven awaits thee,
And fills thy spirit with a great delight,
Then our pale joys will seem a dream forgotten,
Our sun a darkness, and our day a night.

A little longer, and thy heart, beloved,
Shall beat for ever with a love divine,

And joy so pure, so mighty, so eternal,
No mortal knows and lives, shall then be thine.

A little longer yet, and angel voices
Shall sing in heavenly chant upon thine ear;
Angels and saints await thee, and God calls thee;
Beloved, can we bid thee linger here?

"THE WILD HUNTSMAN."

THE Germans have an ancient mythical legend which, with its fearful imagery, teaches an impressive lesson. A nobleman, with horse and hounds, sets forth on the Sabbath for a hunting excursion. The church bells, sounding out on the air their invitations to worship, call him in vain, as he passes. On his right, a shadowy rider, on a white horse, attending him, pleads with him to desist from his madness; while on the left, a black visaged companion, bestriding a black steed, urges on the chase. So on he dashes, over highway and field, trampling down harvests and flocks, scoffing at the cries of the husbandman, till invading the sacred seclusion of a holy man, he is doomed to continue the hunt for ever. Then suddenly the glare of an unearthly light flashes on field and grove. The heavens darken with storm-clouds overhead, and the earth opens beneath. Demon fingers reach up from below toward the terrified rider; while howling hell-hounds spring from yawning abysses to pursue him. So, with ghastly face, ever turned backward in horror, amidst curses resounding through all the air, he rides, from age to age, the race of death.

It is but a feeble and shadowy image of the meaning of those words of Biblical forewarning: "His own iniquity shall take the wicked himself, and he shall be holden in the cords of his sins." How often an infatuated worldling is startled for a moment, half resolved to break from the bondage of sin; then, yielding to the old fascination again, he rushes on, and "the last state of that man is worse than the first."

Depravity germinates in two directions at once, outward and inward—with a flower and a root. And, to the guilty soul, the most fearful feature of it is, this reflex tendency into one's being. For the outgrowing effects of sin—baneful as they are, directly as they tend to utter anarchy and ruin throughout the universe of God—are yet subject to a Sovereign Providence. The wrath of man can be made to praise him, and the remainder of wrath be restrained. But for the recoil of this wrath on the soul—for the corrupting and blasting effect of it there—no restraint is provided. The ever-gathering momentum with which the sinner advances against his Creator, comes, in time, to take him, as it were, from his feet—to possess and control him, and hurry him headlong to death.

And who will estimate this fearful power as felt in the world of woe? If here, in the very midst of Christendom, with the light from open Bibles streaming athwart his pathway, and voices of heavenly invitation ever sounding about him, the deluded soul, while confessing his own folly and madness, moves on to his doom—is it to be hoped that the companionship, the influences of the spirits below, will avail to turn him heavenward? The laws of his own being, from whose working he can never through eternity escape, become his relentless tormentors. The imagination crowds the soul's inner chambers with foul and loathsome imagery. The desires rush lawlessly after their own pleasures. The will sets itself with malignant obstinacy against all thought of contrition. The passions chafe and rage in conscious impotence, only fiercer in hate, because confronted by Omnipotence. And so, the victim of his own deliberately chosen guilt is borne on madly from the sphere of light and love—a wandering star, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever.

GRACE BEFORE MEAT.

A correspondent sends us several inquiries in regard to the authority for this practice, the best mode of observing it, and the benefits resulting.

As to the authority for this usage, such sentences of inspiration as “In everything give thanks,” “Whatsoever ye do, whether ye eat or drink, do all to the glory of God,” seem amply sufficient. And to precept is added example. In nearly every instance of taking food we find the record of the giving of thanks. Thus our Lord, when feeding the four thousand (Matt. xv. 36), and the five thousand (Mark vi. 41), and when with the two disciples at Emmaus (Luke xxiv. 30). The example of Paul on the convict ship (Acts xxvii. 35) is equally explicit.

Here certainly is Biblical authority enough to dispense with any necessity for exploring ecclesiastical history—a task from which, therefore, our correspondent must excuse us.

The Christian propriety and profitableness of the practice are, moreover, so obvious, that like the household altar and the Sabbath school, which are nowhere in terms enjoined by the Scriptures, it commends itself to every sympathy of a renewed heart.

Our correspondent inquires if a prayer that the food may be “blessed to the nourishment of the body” does not “savour of the Popish superstition which baptizes bells and blesses dumb beasts.” Certainly not. The essential mischief of those practices is the notion of prelatial sanctity involved in them—a sort of consecrated magic distributed by the touch of priestly fingers. There is, on the other hand, the same inherent propriety in a prayer that food may nourish and strengthen, as in prayer that medicine may restore us from disease.

As to the spirit and method of giving thanks at the table, there is room for great improvement; and we thank our correspondent for the occasion here afforded for some further remark.

One father of a household, among our acquaintance—a Christian brother, too, whom we highly esteem—mumbles his “grace” as if fearful some one at the table might overhear him. Another dashes into his petition in the midst of the bustle of taking seats. Another puts down his head, and has finished his thanks before you are fairly aware what he is at. The number who really edify in performing this service, is lamentably small.

If we might be allowed to offer counsel touching the matter, we should say, Come to this devotional service, as to any other devotional service, in a reverent spirit, and with the desire for religiously profiting all concerned. Do not be hasty in the thanksgiving and prayer. Wait till all are seated, and the silence has become perfect. Then speak quietly, but audibly, seriously, and earnestly. Do not fall into the same unvarying round of words. Having a formula at the tongue's end is apt to deliver the tongue from all dependence on the heart. Do not ask only that the food may be “blessed to the nourishment of the body,” but that, with gratitude and devotion, it may be likewise a means of grace to the soul. Do not offer an irrelevant prayer, as if forgetful of the place and occasion. Do not, the moment the last word falls from your lips, seize the knife and fork, or turn with some trifling remark to your next neighbour at the table. Let there be a pause; be as deliberate in closing as in commencing the service. Let the impression be enstamped on all listening that you seriously mean to commune with God in this service, not to recite a dry formula. Lastly, have that meaning. Be sincere. Be fervent. Many a soul has been even led to the cross by the manifest earnestness seen and felt in a good man's “giving of thanks.”

APHORISMS FOR PREACHERS.

THE same truths uttered from the pulpit by different men, or by the same man in different states of feeling, will produce very different effects. Some of these are far beyond what the bare conviction of the truth, so uttered, would ordinarily produce. The whole mass of truth, by the sudden passion of the speaker, is made red hot, and burns its way.

It is impossible to close a sermon well, that is warmly, unless the train of thought has been so conducted as to bring the heart into a glow, which increases to the end.

Having chosen a subject, it is well to think it over deeply, day and night, and to read on it carefully before putting pen to paper. Take few notes, but as far as may be, let the matter digest itself in the mind.

To be worth much, a sermon must begin like a river, and flow, and widen, and roughen, and deepen, until the end; and when it reaches this end, it is hurt by every syllable that is added.—Dr. J. W. Alexander.

THE THREE KINGS.

SERMON ADDRESSED TO THE YOUNG.

BY REV. WILLIAM ARNOT.

"So Manasseh slept with his fathers, and they buried him in his own house: and Amon his son reigned in his stead. Amon was two and twenty years old when he began to reign, and reigned two years in Jerusalem. But he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, as did Manasseh his father: for Amon sacrificed unto all the carved images which Manasseh his father had made, and served them; and humbled not himself before the Lord, as Manasseh his father had humbled himself; but Amon trespassed more and more. And his servants conspired against him, and slew him in his own house. But the people of the land slew all them that had conspired against king Amon: and the people of the land made Josiah his son king in his stead."—2 CHRON. xxxiii. 20-23.

IN this history, within the short space of six verses, three kings succeed each other by right of birth on the throne of Judah at Jerusalem. Through these three links the kingdom descends in a direct line from father to son—from Manasseh to Amon, and from Amon to Josiah. These three kings, although closely related to each other in nature, differed widely in character and history. Much instruction may be obtained from the story of each taken by itself, and still more from the story of all three in one view. In some places a single light burning aloft on the shore is sufficient to direct the course of seafarers in the darkness; but in some, two lights are required, and in others three, of different colours and at different heights, and arranged in a particular order. These names, with the histories attached to them, are set in the Bible like beacon lights burning on the shore. As we sail along life's dangerous sea we should take our bearings by these marks, that we may steer clear of sunken rocks and keep the safe channel. At this point of the voyage three lights are set up in a row, to make the warning clear and print it deep. The characters are widely different, and, on that account, the instruction is all the more precious. Lights all of one size and one colour would not have much meaning. The white light of safety, the green light of caution, and the red light of danger are all equally useful, equally necessary, each in its own place. So, the early wickedness and late repentance of Manasseh the grandfather—the reckless life and sudden death of Amon the father—and the childhood-conversion, and lengthened usefulness of Josiah the son, are a chain of lights set up along the line of our life-path to warn us away from dangerous pits, and guide us safely home.

Let us consider the history of these three kings, with a view to the practical lessons which it is fitted to teach.

I. Manasseh. Although he was the son of the best of David's descendants, he was himself, for a long period, one of the worst. Hezekiah was a pattern of godliness in his day. Manasseh, his son and successor, was a profane and cruel idolater. He built altars to the sun and moon within the courts of God's temple at Jerusalem. He made his own children pass through the fire in honour of his idols. He sinned with a high hand himself, and led his subjects in his own steps. Instead of being an example to others, Jerusalem, under Manasseh's reign, was more wicked than the surrounding heathen.

In the course of time this wicked king fell into deep affliction; the king of Assyria sent an army against him. Manasseh gathered his men, and marched boldly forth to meet his foe. The battle was decided by what is commonly called an accident. In some turn of the conflict the king of Judah and his men were trying to march through a field overgrown with thickets of thorns. The soldiers were entangled, and could neither go backward nor forward. In this condition the Assyrians attacked them, and gained the victory. Manasseh himself was taken prisoner, and carried in chains to Babylon. He thought, no doubt, and said, that if the thorns had not happened to be on the field, he would have gained the battle. The conquered king would lay the blame on the thorns; but it was God who used both the thorns that grew on the battle-field, and the Assyrian soldiers, as his instruments to bring affliction on Manasseh for his good. His trouble was blessed. "When he was in affliction he besought the Lord his God, and humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers." The hard heart of this chief sinner was broken. He grieved over his own sin; he sought mercy from God in his appointed way; he sought and found. God heard that sinner's prayer, and pardoned him. After that, he lived and reigned a while. Then he was a good king, because he was a new creature. The history will be found in the earlier part of this chapter. It is a grand example of a sinful man repenting late in life, and finding mercy. It stands in the Old Testament as the case of the penitent thief on Calvary stands in the New, a monument of God's wonderful mercy, and a sign that the worst need not despair of pardon.

The latter portion of Manasseh's life was devoted to the service of God and the wellbeing of his country. When the tree was made good, it bore good fruit. When his heart was made new, his life became holy.

II. "Amon, his son, reigned in his stead." This poor monarch's life and reign occupy only four verses. The story is very short, but very clear; the words are few, but the meaning is great. When he ascended the throne at his father's death, he was twenty-two years of age. His conduct was bad, his reign short, and his death violent.

Having seen both sides of his father's character, he rejected the good and chose the bad as his own example. He served the idols which Manasseh had made in the days of his sin, and forsook the true God whom Manasseh had found in the time of his repentance. He "humbled not himself before the Lord as Manasseh, his father, had humbled himself; but Amon trespassed more and more."

Such was his life; and from our knowledge of human nature, we may discover, without much danger of mistake, what were the secret workings of his heart. The young man could not have been an unconcerned spectator of the change that passed upon his father's character. He saw the repentance that came in the time of trouble, and the reformation that followed repentance. Perhaps he thought his father did rightly, and intended one day to follow his example. It is natural for a youth to think that old people should be godly, and yet continue ungodly himself. He might silently reason within himself, "My father enjoyed the world in his own way when he was young, and turned over a new leaf when he was growing old; in this way he made the most of it. He enjoyed the pleasures of sin while he was able to enjoy them, and yet made himself safe at last, by repenting before he died." Amon having in his breast a heart deceitful above all things and desperately wicked, might secretly purpose to do as his father did—to live in sin as long as he could enjoy it, and escape hell by a sudden repentance, before he should leave the world.

It is likely that he would not have repented although his life had been prolonged to fourscore years; it is likely that he would have grown more and more hardened till the last; but he never got the opportunity of trying to repent. "His servants conspired against him, and slew him in his own house." Ah, what horrors lie hid under the folds of that short sentence! At the age of twenty-four, with a heart abandoned to its own evil inclinations, and all the resources of a kingdom at his command, Amon was drinking to the full of forbidden pleasures from day to day, putting off the thought of repentance and pardon till he should grow old. As those who live for their own pleasures are generally unkind to their inferiors, it is probable that Amon was secretly hated by his attendants. These attendants, unable longer to endure their master, watched their opportunity, rushed upon him within his own palace, probably when he was asleep, and murdered him in a moment. King Amon lay down, wearied with one day's sin, intending to rise refreshed by sleep to begin another. He lay down to sleep in Time, and suddenly awoke in Eternity. It is well that our eye cannot follow the guilty soul to the judgment-seat of God; the sight would be too dreadful; it would overwhelm us. A veil has been thrown over that awful scene. God has kept its secrets to himself. The wicked are like chaff which the wind driveth away.

III. "The people of the land slew all them that had conspired against king Amon; and the people of the land made Josiah, his son, king in his stead." The murderers suffered the punishment of the guilt, and the son of the slaughtered king peaceably ascended his father's throne. Josiah was a child of eight years old when he was acknowledged king; whether he became king immediately after his father's death, or a few years afterwards, we do not know. Either in the eighth year of his life when he was crowned king, or in the sixteenth year of his life, when he had already reigned eight years, "he began to seek after the God of David his Father." Four years after his first decided personal dedication to the service of God, he took courage to begin a thorough reformation of his kingdom. Both in the capital and throughout the country he destroyed all the machinery of idolatry, and established again the worship of the true God. His religion began early and continued to the last. His reign of thirty-one years was a time of spiritual refreshment in ancient Israel, and his memory is fragrant even in our own day. For more than two thousand years Josiah's name has been a household word among all who fear God, as an example of youthful piety in the high places of the earth.

When a train is running along the rails in the dark, the driver keeps a sharp look out forward. If he see a green light, he slows and creeps cautiously forward, ready at any moment to stop or turn; if he see a red light he pulls up at once, and either goes back or stands still till the danger be removed; it is when a bright white light is held out that he goes quickly, confidently forward on his journey.

The case of Manasseh, held aloft before our eyes in the pages of the Bible is like the blue light, and means. Beware: he who passed this way nearly perished. He was saved, as it were, by fire. In this path of late repentance, here and there one succeeds in clearing the pit-fall, but most perish. The case of Amon is like the red light, and calls for instant turning. He who tried to pass this way perished in the attempt. "Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?" The example of Josiah, following the Lord fully in earliest childhood, is like the white light of safety waving over the path. Forward fearlessly in that line; the path is pleasant, and the issue safe!

Take now, one by one, the chief lessons which lie in the life of these three kings.

1. There is no limit to the mercy of God. No mountains of transgression rise so high that this flood cannot cover them. Sinners the chief are welcome to complete forgiveness. Although the prodigal has wasted all in riotous living, let him but arise and go to his Father.

and he will be received without upbraiding. In gospel times this blessed truth has been much more fully made known. The blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth from all sin. "Whosoever will, let him come." The same blood of the Lamb that is needed to wash away the sin of a little child, is sufficient to free the hoariest sinner on the earth from every spot and wrinkle. No human being, of any age or any character, needs to hesitate and hold back, from a fear lest his sins should prove too great, or too deeply engrained by time. Christ saves to the uttermost. Not one of all the human race through all the generations of time, who comes to the mercy-seat with his sins, will be sent away with the burden on his back, because it was too great. If through the window of the Scripture, we could see only such holy men as Samuel and Daniel and John going in at the gate of heaven, we would be cast down; we would not dare to hope that such as we are could be admitted there. If only great saints got in, we who are great sinners would lose hope. But when we see Manasseh, and men like him, going in and getting welcome, there is hope for us. If we follow their steps in repentance, we shall be permitted to join their company in rest. If, like them, we arise and go to the Father, like them we shall be permitted to lean on his bosom and dwell in his home.

2. Beware of turning the riches of God's grace into a snare. If, because an old sinner has been forgiven when he repented, you refuse to turn in your youth, you lose your own soul, and your blood will be upon your own head. As Manasseh's case is recorded in the Bible, that an aged sinner desiring to turn may not be cast into despair, Amon's case is recorded beside it, that the young may not delay an hour, lest they perish for ever. Here the lesson is written as if with the blood of that murdered youth, "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation." If a youth who will not come to Christ now because he has heard that men may be converted in their old age, should die suddenly unpardoned, he will never hear another invitation, or see an open door again.

3. None of us will be either saved or lost in consequence of anything in our parents. There are indeed advantages and disadvantages, greater than we can well measure, in an education and example for good or evil at home; but this is not the thing that decides. They who have the greatest home privilege may perish in their sins; they who have the least may walk with God through life, and at last enter into rest. Amon saw his father born again when he was old; at a time when he had reached manhood, and was capable of judging, he saw his father enjoying peace with God, and living in love with men. But the son did not inherit his father's goodness. The son of the repentant, converted father, lived unrepenting and unconverted. Again, Josiah was the child of an ungodly parent, and yet he became a godly child. These two lessons are plainly written in the history; the one to make the presumptuous humble, the other to give the despairing hope—these two lessons, a converted father cannot secure the safety of an unconverted son; and an unconverted father cannot drag down a child in his fall, if that child for himself follows the Lord. The salvation of a father does not bear his son into heaven; the loss of a parent in his own sin cannot tear away his converted child from the love of God. Every one stands by himself. The soul that sinneth, it shall die; the soul that believeth, it shall live.

The shadow of these spiritual things may be seen in nature. A tree once wild and barren has been grafted at length, and is now a good tree bearing precious fruit. From that old tree a young one springs, whether a seedling or a sucker: the young tree grows up wild and barren, until itself get a good stock engrafted in; and if a good stock is not engrafted in it, the tree will be wild to the end in spite of its parentage. But, on the other hand, although the parent tree remain evil till it is cast into the fire and is burned, the young tree that has sprung from its seed or root may receive a new nature by engrafting in its youth, and bear good fruit abundantly even to old age. Thus in our own day and in the spiritual sphere, many a youthful Amon, child of a converted Manasseh, lives in sin, and dies unsaved; and on the other side, many a child Josiah, in an ungodly house, seeks and finds the Saviour whom his parents never knew. Not he that is descended from an unconverted man, but he that is and continues to be himself unconverted shall be lost: and on the other hand, not he that is descended from a believer, but he who himself believes shall be saved. Child, have you enjoyed no privilege at home in your youth? Come yourself now, and with your whole heart, to Jesus; the sins of others will not keep you back from his bosom, or shut you out from his heaven. On the other side, have you been gently taught to pray in infancy at a godly mother's knee, and been gravely guided in your childhood by a godly father's care? Be thankful for the boon; but beware. You cannot pass unconverted into heaven on your parent's skirts; trust, not in your father as a god, but in the God of your father!

PRAYING WITH CHILDREN.

WHEN children are offered in baptism, there is a solemn covenant administered to the parents who bring them. It is well understood by all, or at least ought to be, that the good, which the ordinance is in any sense to be expected to bestow, depends upon the faithfulness with which its provisions are kept. Now, among these it is specified that the parents shall "pray with them and pray for them."

A mother once came to me sad at heart, bemoaning the continued impenitency of her household. She had eight children, and not one of them had ever been converted to the Saviour. In the course of the conversation she alluded to the fact of her having brought each in turn to be baptized. I asked her whether she had been faithful in dealing with their souls. She told me she had often talked with them, and tried to make them see their sin. But, I continued, have you ever prayed with them? She paused a moment at the suddenness of the question, but replied somewhat faintly, No. Do you mean to have me understand that you never took any one of them with you apart, to implore the presence and power of the Holy Spirit, I inquired again. She answered that she had never had the courage to do so. I am afraid I shall misjudge you, I pressed on; I want to know if it is possible that you should have come eight times to this ordinance with your children,—from that young man down to the babe I received last week,—on every occasion solemnly promising to “pray with and pray for them,” and yet never offering a single petition according to your engagement? Her only admission was in the tears into which she burst. My dear madam, said I, you know now why your family are unblest. When you think of covenant promises, you must remember your own as well as God’s. Nineteen years of wrong are behind you.

There is something very impressive even in the mere sight of a praying Christian. I have read within a little while the story of a faithful worker in the ministry, who had been away from home for a week assisting in a revival. When he started to return, he was accompanied by the pastor and a young friend to the limits of the village. There on the hill-top, full of solemn feeling, they parted with a joint supplication. Climbing the fence, they were hidden from the road, and there knelt among the branches of a fallen tree, that no eye but the All-seeing might rest upon them. They all prayed and separated. A few weeks thereafter, among the converts, came a rough honest farmer to join himself to the people of God. He told how he was ploughing in the field one day, and saw up by the road-side three men kneel to pray. The very thought of it moved him. And the more he pondered the more his own prayerless life came in review. And he found no peace till he himself became a follower of the Saviour likewise.

There ought to be in every Christian Church one season specially set apart for prayer in connection with the ordinance of baptism. Where the ordinance of the Lord’s supper is administered four times a-year, call it the “Quarterly meeting for parents and baptized children.” Announce it by name. Ask parents to bring their children, and ask children to come. If it be a full service, let both sermon and prayers and praises be appropriate to the general theme of the ordinance, its duties, its privileges, and its obligations. No harm if it comes oftener; bring it on immediately after communion, so that those who join the Church that Sabbath can present their children the same week. There are two ordinances in the Church of Christ. We have “preparatory lectures” often enough, but did you ever hear one “preparatory” to baptism?

This affords an opportunity for familiar explanation of this whole ordinance. But above all, it gives the most fitting time conceivable to urge upon the baptized children their duties. And then the union of faith in the prayers that are offered cannot fail to avail much. Hold up the children in the arms of a warm trust in God, and then see how soon he will come to let his light shine on them.

Family prayers also afford opportunity for “praying with and praying for” the children under the covenant. A strange notion seems to have crept into the minds of fathers that they are not ever expected to perform this duty. But they will search the Scriptures in vain for any passage to warrant such immunity. And the very least they can do, unless they are desirous to break outright their engagements, is to assemble their home-circle every day for a united offering to God.

I know a father who was accustomed every evening to draw his little children to his knee, immediately as they left the table after the last meal, before they were drowsy, that they might repeat their own prayers; and then take his Bible to read and pray himself with at the household. Trained to it from the earliest practicable hour, those boys and girls grew up to honour the custom; and one of the severest punishments in that admirable family would have been for him to refuse permission for me to bend by his side. And I have seen as manly a lad as ever grew, go meekly and willingly to the dear old spot, and long never to outgrow the love of it. That I take to be one of the ways of “praying with and praying for” children.

Ten years ago, when an unconverted man, I boarded in the family of a pious woman, whose husband was not a Christian. There was a daughter of nineteen, another of fourteen, and a son of ten. Every morning after breakfast, I heard that humble woman gather her family in the kitchen, and read with them a chapter—“verse-about,”—in the Bible. Then as I could not help listening, there was a peculiarity of service which mystified me. At last I asked one day if I might remain. She hesitated, her daughter blushed, but said I could do so if I really desired it. So I sat down with the rest. They gave me a Testament, and we all read. Then kneeling on the floor, that mother began her prayer audibly for her dear ones there, her husband, and herself; and then pausing a moment, as if to gather her energies or wing her faith, uttered a tender affectionate supplication for me. She closed, and her daughter began to pray. Poor girl, she was afraid of me; I was from college; I was her teacher; but she tremulously asked for her blessing as usual. Then came the sweet daughter, and at last the son—the youngest of that circle, who only repeated the Lord’s Prayer, with one petition of his own. His amen was said, but no exultation. I knew in the instant they were waiting for me. And I, poor, prayerless I, had no word to say. It almost broke my heart. I hurried from the room desolate and guilty. A few weeks only passed, when I asked them for permission to come in once more; and then I prayed too, and thanked my ever-patient Saviour for the new hope in my heart, and the new song on my lip. It is a great thing to remember, that there is in the gospel as in the law, provision made not only for "thy son and thy daughter, thy man servant and thy maid servant," but also even "for the stranger that is within thy gates."

Now I give these two instances, among many, that throng my remembrance, to show how, in default of any better way, this duty of family prayer may be conducted. I cannot now, if I would, discuss the obligation in this matter; I have only to say that I cannot understand how any parent, who offers his children under the covenant, can manage to quiet his conscience with less than this.

But there will always be left with mothers the main responsibility, I suppose, in this praying with children. Many a man there is who blesses God for his "mother's prayers," who never heard his father lift his voice. I want to say a few words, therefore, directly to mothers, if I may be permitted to do so, but they must be reserved for another communication.

A TRIPLE CONQUEST.

More than a year ago, as the Basle Magazine (1860) tells us, an old woman lived in a small hut in the south of France. She had encountered many a trial and sorrow during her long pilgrimage, yet thought she had never seen such a woeful day as dawned upon her one Monday of a new month. Her house rent was then due; and she could not pay it, for the winter had been long and severe, and her earnings small. She would willingly not have opened her eyes to the light that morning, yet she must rise, for there was no one to do anything for her. It was a cold winter day,—a drifting wind had so enveloped the little hovel in a wreath of snow, that to go either out or in seemed impossible. There sat the old woman on her small, hard stool, alone in her distress, and wept and wept, "till she had no more power to weep."

And as she sat, and wearily gazed on the bare wall before her, ah! what did she see there? what made her old eyes lighten up so youthfully? She had noticed a kind of hole high up in the wall, and a ray of hope darted like lightning through her soul. Who knows, she thought, but some treasure may have been hidden here in former days? And new strength and activity came to her aged limbs; she stood up on the table, seized a knife, and began cautiously to loosen the lime near the spot, and observed to her delight that certainly there was a loose board which covered a cavity in the wall. What might be concealed there? Gold, silver, jewels? Joy gave her strength and success. Soon the barrier was removed, her withered hand was thrust into the opening, hoping to bring out a bag, or a casket; she drew something out, —what was it? A book,—an old, worn-out book!

"Ah, my God!" sighed the old woman, and tears once more streamed from her eyes, "what good can a book do to me? Oh! if I had only something to quiet my hunger, to pay my rent!"

She came down from the table, and from all her golden hopes, threw the book angrily aside, and relapsed into her former gloomy, comfortless musings.

But once more she thought, "Who knows, perhaps some treasure may lie in this book, which in time of war has been thus concealed."

She took it up again, and began to feel and turn it over; but, alas! she found nothing,—nothing but dry paper leaves, one after the other. She was about to throw it away, when her eyes falling on a page deeply marked, she put on her spectacles, went to the window, and spelt out the words—

"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

"Weary and heavy laden, that I am, God knows that I am. Who is it that speaks here? Who will give rest to old Martha, whom nobody ever asks or cares for?"

And the aged woman read and read in the holy book, while the great Friend and Comforter drew nearer to her, and the word from his mouth became sweeter to her soul, and the thought grew deeper in her heart, —he knows thee also, he loves even thee!

Yes, she sought and sought till she found the Saviour. And now she has become rich, rich as a queen, for all things are hers, earth and heaven, time and eternity. Now she can kneel down and pray to him who calls her, the weary and burdened one, to himself. Hunger and care are over; yes, she has found the pearl of great price, Jesus and his word. And he takes the burden of her earthly cares. The landlord waited patiently till she should be able to pay him when the winter was past. He even spoke to the neighbours, and brought the case of poor old Martha kindly before them. One man cut a path to the hut through the snow, and his wife came in with a basket of provisions. Strange, ever since she discovered the treasure, she has felt herself cared for by God and man, as if she were loved by all. She can smile now, and yet she weeps—tears of gratitude, of love, and of shame and sorrow too, that she should have only learned to know the best Friend at the end of her life. But she takes all to the Lord, and receives from him the gracious message, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love, therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee." She has renewed her youth as the eagle, and gained strength and joy for life and for death. The word of God, now that she can search it daily, is the light to her feet, and the lamp to her path, sweeter than honey or the honeycomb, her treasure, her comfort, her delight.

Thus has the Lord dealt with aged Martha in the south of France, and turned her mourning into joy.

Something different, and yet the same, passed in another dwelling, which we shall now enter. There the Bible was not built into the wall, for, since the wedding morning, it lay bright and handsome on a shelf; and yet it was walled up, and a sharp instrument was needed in order to set it free.

This cottage was pleasantly situated on a hill, surrounded by fir-trees, fresh meadows beyond, and then a stream which, through a green valley, pursued its cheerful course.

All around was fair and peaceful; but ah! in the abode of man all was dark with care and sorrow. Here dwelt a widow, the mother of three children. Not many days had passed since her husband had been carried out to his grave; and now several persons came forward to claim payment of debts, which she had known nothing of. When she saw that the sum required would take almost all her little property, her heart was full. She stood in her little apartment, wringing her hands, and wishing that she and her children were lying at her husband's side. Frau Linner had possessed the Scriptures from her childhood, and yet she knew not the mighty Friend, who has said, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

The children were in bed; and dumb and motionless the mother sat, looking out into the dark night, and feeling her own soul as dark. She had no tears to shed. She was angry with her Creator, her husband, her creditors, with all mankind; and while her heart was encompassed by such feelings, no word of comfort from the love of God could reach her soul. Just then she heard footsteps on the road. "Is it any one who can want anything with me, the most desolate creature under heaven?"

Isaac, an old Jew, her neighbour, entered. "What is the matter, Frau Linner? why so sad? Be easy; give me your furniture, and you can pay your most pressing debts, and hope for better times. What say you to that, Frau Linner?"

The afflicted woman had few words to say. Sorrow and vexation were gnawing at her heart. She consented at last, for she knew of nothing better. That very night Isaac carried the furniture to his house, for the woman preferred its being done in the dark, to save herself the shame of the neighbours' observation.

"Have you nothing more that is worth giving, neighbour?" said Isaac, after he had carried table, chairs, desk, and other articles away.

The widow sighed, and gazed with dismay at her desolate apartment. Ah, she thought of the time, when as a young and happy bride she had left the nicely arranged dwelling, to go to church with her husband; and now, he in the grave, she in misery! Then her eyes fell on the Bible, which since that day had lain there on the shelf. It was a gift from her pious god-father, now in heaven, and still quite new and bright, for it had never been made use of.

Hastily she took it up, handed it to the Jew, and said, "Take that with you also, Isaac, it is of no use to me." And Isaac took the sacred volume under his arm, while an expression of mingled compassion and mockery passed over his Eastern countenance. Silently he laid down some money on the table, said "Good night," and left the house.

But the widow remained standing on the spot where she had given the Bible to the Jew. There she stood for long, silent and sad, while a new distress was added to her old sorrows, and seemed like a fire above her head.

"What hast thou done?" said a voice in her inmost soul; "Thou hast given away thy salvation, thou hast sold thy faith!"

"Ah," she replied, "what good has the book ever done to me? it never paid my debts!"

"That it has done thee no good, is thy own fault; why hast thou never read it? Hadst thou done this more, who knows but things might have been otherwise now?"

A feeling of anguish unknown before, became deeper and deeper; she stood as if chained to the table on which the money lay, and felt as if the ground were sinking under her feet. At last she came to herself, gave one glance at her children, saw that they were sleeping soundly, then went out, shut the door, and disappeared like a bird. She must go to Isaac, to the Jew, and get back her Bible.

Breathless she reached his dwelling. It was Friday evening, and seven candles threw a clear light far across the street. A kind of shame came over Frau Linner; she hesitated to go in, and standing on a stone, cast a hasty glance into the Jew's sitting-room. But what did she behold? There sat four men round the table, and listened with evident interest and astonishment, while Isaac read aloud out of her own Bible, from the New Testament.

They had intended to make merry over the old book; for this purpose Isaac had called them together. In hearing of the birth of Jesus, they had indeed found cause for mockery, that the Son of God should be born in a stable and laid in a manger. But the further on they proceeded the more grave they were. When they came to Mary's song of praise all laughter was at an end. Chapter after chapter, from the various Gospels, Isaac read, and at times the words he met with appeared almost to overpower him. When he came to the scene of agony in Gethsemane, he could go on no more, and in silence closed the book. It was past midnight; the other men rose, with sad, earnest looks, and each departed to his own dwelling.

And Frau Linner? Hardly had she looked at her Bible, and seen the Jews engaged around it, when the icy bondage of her soul gave way. She gazed for one moment, saw how strangers were interested in the holy treasure she had rejected, and could bear to look no longer. She burst into tears and hastened home. There she fell upon her face, and felt as if her heart were bursting with repentance and sorrow. "O Jesus, holy God, I am the Judas who sold thee for the pieces of silver! I have sold my Saviour, and trodden him under foot!" Then she thought of her early days, her first approach to a communion table,—how happy she had then felt in her Lord, and vowed to be faithful to him in life and death. How much of love and faithfulness had she since received from him, how many gracious warnings and knocks in providence at the door of her heart! And now? Her own heart condemned her, and passed the sentence of guilty over all. "Thou art a child of wrath," sounded in her soul. She felt as if the Lord with eyes of fire were looking through her whole past life, all she had done or neglected to do, her thoughts, words, and deeds of sin.

She lay prostrate till the break of day; her "soul was among lions," the waves and billows went over her head, but at length the Morning Star arose. With the whole burden of her sins she ventured to approach Golgotha. She looked up to a crucified Redeemer, she heard his words of mercy, his blood seemed to drop like balm on her wounded conscience. She could say at last with Jacob, "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved," and with David, "Bless the Lord, O my soul!"

The children were still sleeping. The mother left her house once more. She hastened to Isaac to reclaim her Bible, and this time did not fail.

As she entered, she found the Jew in the same place where she had seen him the night before. The Bible lay open before him, his hands covered his face, and he was weeping bitterly.

Frau Linner took possession of her Bible again. But Isaac purchased another, and read and searched it day and night, and read it with his family and friends, while what he found there became to him more precious than gold or silver.

And peace and blessing returned to the habitation of the widow, for now she had found a Saviour, now she knew how to pray. She was still poor, and yet rich. She laboured hard, with diligence and prayer, and the Lord blessed her industry. By degrees she was able to buy back her furniture, and she led a quiet, tranquil life with her God and her Bible, bringing up her children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

One bright Sabbath morning the bells rang for worship, and the church was already filled. Then Isaac, the Jew, and his family, walked slowly up to the altar. Then he witnessed a good confession before many witnesses, and acknowledged with a clear voice that Jesus Christ was the true Son of God, his own Messiah and Saviour, his only hope and confidence for time and eternity.

As the pastor laid his hands upon that grey head, and an expression of indescribable joy came over the Jew's countenance, many a Christian heart felt ready to respond with deep thankfulness, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." "O Lord, arise, have mercy upon Zion! Our eyes wait for thy salvation."

"O God of Israel, view their race,
Back to thy fold the wanderers bring,
Teach them to seek thy alighted grace,
To view in Christ their promised king.

Haste, glorious day, expected long,
When Jew and Greek one prayer shall raise,
With eager feet one temple throng,
One God with grateful rapture praise."

CROSS-BEARING FOR CHRIST.

BY REV. THEODORE L. CUYLER.

THERE are some passages in the Bible that cut like a razor. One of the most incisive is this, "He that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me."

Its keen edge cleaves right through all the excuses of selfishness, all the plausible pretexts by which men would justify their derelictions of duty. Christ offers no compromise. His simple alternative is—Follow me and live, or forsake me and die. Either take up the cross for me, or let it alone. But do not step over it. Do not steal slyly around it. Do not lay it quietly to one side. Do not waste life in shivering and trembling at the sight of it, and in conjuring some device to make it sit easy on the shoulder. Crosses were made to be hard and heavy. He who is not willing to bear one for me shall never wear the crown. This is the substance of the Bible teaching in regard to cross-bearing.

Every man has his cross. Some are called to bear a peculiar burden at one time, and a very different one at another. What is a cross to you, may not be to me any labour or reproach; it may not cost me the slightest inconvenience. It would be very arbitrary to specify any one act or duty or service as the adequate measure of devotion to the Saviour. The service must involve some sacrifice of selfishness, and cost some privation, or it is no cross.

In apostolic days the bare recognition of Jesus Christ as a divine object of worship was visited with odium the most intolerant, and malignity the most furious. Simply to say, "I believe in the Lord Jesus Christ," meant confiscation of goods, stripes beyond measure, dungeons like the dungeons of Philippi, and a baptism of blood like that of Paul's nigh the gates of Rome. But in our day many a Christian professor whose orthodoxy is unimpeachable, and who really believes that he would rather go to the stake than abandon his loyalty to the Redeemer, is yet totally unwilling to be found at a prayer-meeting. He considers it "not genteel." So would he regard the removal of the wine-bottle from his dinner-table, even though his own sons were sipping a fatal love for the poison. Anything that infringes on gentility, is gall and wormwood to him. Religion to be attractive to him must be "genteel;" and he would almost be content to lose a place in heaven if he thought that he would be obliged to recognise there those "vulgar people" whom he now passes every day in the street. Pride is his pet sin. Refinement is his idol. To keep on the sunny side of fashion is his morning and evening anxiety. And a sneer is to him what the scourge of thongs was to Paul and Silas—what the red-hot pincers were to the martyrs of the Inquisition. He is ready to follow his Master, provided that Master will lead him into no associations with "vulgar people," and into no place where foul odours will come between the wind and his gentility.

2. "What a ridiculous and contemptible Christian!" exclaims one of our readers; and yet that very reader is just as sore and as sensitive in regard to his own besetting weakness. I need not say what his especial cross is. If you would find out, just hand him a subscription paper for a benevolent object. His idea has always been to get all he can, and to keep what he has got. Giving money is his cross. He will do anything for you, provided you do not touch his purse. And when such a man does give, he deserves especial honour. For he has shouldered up a cross that is excessively galling upon his darling passion—the love of lucre.

3. To another, money-giving is easy. His purse never grows rusty in the clasp. He will at any time give you a bank-check, if you will excuse him from personal exertions for the kingdom of Christ. Work is his cross. Therefore he is glad to commute with his conscience by making liberal donations, on condition that he is not asked to teach in a mission-school, or go out on tract distribution, or embark in any labour that requires time and bodily effort. "You are welcome to my money, but don't ask me to work," is the frank response which he makes to every recruiting officer of Christ who endeavours to draft him into actual service. Now, such a man ought never to be excused. He needs to be set at work for his own spiritual good; he wants exercise; his soul's health requires that he should be put to some pretty severe and patience-trying toil. Two hours' teaching every Sabbath afternoon in the ragged-school would give him a grand appetite for his evening exercise and family worship. To dislike a duty is commonly a good reason why it should be undertaken.

4. Kindred to this dread of personal labour is another man's dread of public participation in social worship. That it would be benefit to himself, and a blessing to others, if he would only open his lips in the prayer-meeting, he is ready to admit. But that "cross" he has never yet consented to take up. He says he tried it once, and "broke down." So did Dr. Tyng, when he first undertook extemporaneous preaching; but he persevered until he stands at the head of fluent, off-hand pulpit orators in America. But, my good friend, I beg of you, do not hide away behind the post any longer in the prayer-meeting. The leader has long ago given up the idea that you have any prayer to offer. Suppose that at the next meeting you volunteer. It will send a thrill through the house to hear your unaccustomed voice; and your brethren will go home and say, "Behold he prayeth!"

5. But there is still a fifth who is willing to give, to labour, and to pray, provided that no active opposition is to be encountered. He is a capital seaman in smooth weather. The good brother's weakness is timidity; he nurses his popularity like a sick child; and as he never exposes it to give it strength, he soon has none left to expose. His Christianity is sweet and loveable; but it shuns exciting issues and close encounters with rampant sins. He is an undoubted saint; but he has not a single fibre of Martin Luther or William Wilberforce in him. For his final salvation he meekly trusts to that Saviour who bore the crushing cross up Calvary's mount; but when that persecuted Master calls on him to "take up a cross" of reproach for him, he straightway begins to make excuse. Alas, for us all! We pity him for his weakness; and yet we go away and practise ourselves the same indignity toward that heavenly Friend who says to us in tones so tender, "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me. And he that taketh not his cross and followeth after me is not worthy of me." No cross—no crown.

THE FIRST CENTURY AND THE NINETEENTH.

A GLANCE at the apostolic age and our own in the way of comparison will show a vast extension and multiplication of the facilities and means of doing good. We will suppose a man in the primitive age converted to Christ, and feeling that impulse which awakes universally with the awakening of a new life in the soul—the impulse to do good, to win souls to Christ. What is he to do? To preach the word. To go from street to street, from house to house. If he is a Jew, the synagogue may, under favourable circumstances, be open to some of his first efforts. If he is a Gentile, perhaps some "Tyrannus" may concede him the use of his "school" for a lecture or two. But his main dependence must be on speaking the word of life to individuals and groups whom he may chance to meet with. And in doing this he is met by universal opposition; not the inert opposition merely of indifference and contempt, nor yet only the intellectual opposition of logic and ridicule, but an opposition which is backed by the law and wields the police, and has the sanction of all that is venerable in established worship and ancient superstitions, and which, being instigated by the powerful instincts of selfishness, is active and unscrupulous and full of peril to liberty and life itself. It is soon perceived (for what is so keen-sighted as selfishness?) that the free and spiritual ideas of the new system can only succeed by overturning and revolutionizing everything that is established. Among the Jews it must "destroy the holy place and change the customs which Moses delivered to us." In the pagan world, every religious name, idea, and usage, must pass into scepticism and contempt before it—for it affirmed no less than “that they be no gods which are made with hands.” From Jupiter Stator, therefore, who, from his awful elevation, guarded the eternal city, and “the great goddess Diana, whom all Asia and the world worshippeth,” down to the patron god of a fountain or a crossing, all are threatened. The movement can only end in causing their “temples to be despised and their magnificence destroyed.” And of course the whole army who “have their wealth” and dignity from these venerable and splendid institutions, from the high-born pontifex and augur to the shrine-makers and petty artisans and very menials employed in the temple services, all are instinctive enemies and active opponents of the new faith. And the spirit of the old idolatry has so completely pervaded government, and law, and national history, the ties of home and ancestry are so interwoven with its names and myths, that the solid fabric of society seems to stand like an impregnable wall against the progress of the gospel.

And now, to overcome all this active and passive opposition, what can the Christian do? To conciliate prejudice, to draw attention, to spread information, what means has he at hand? He has no copy of the Bible or New Testament to put into the hands of a friend with the request that he would at least read and examine. Books are too scarce and costly for that. Much less has he a Christian tract or volume to bestow, calculated to excite inquiry, meet objections, and smooth the way to truth. No church-edifices, no regular assemblies to hear of the great salvation, no press, no Christian literature nor Christian organizations, no helpful antecedents in the way of Christian or general culture,—what an absence of material helps over against all this combination of material hindrances and discouragements! Only his own weak voice to be lifted up in commendation of the “way which is everywhere spoken against!”

Pass from the first century to the nineteenth, and how is the position changed at every point. Law, government, literature, education, society, all, nominally and passively at least, on the side of Christianity. When a man is converted to Christ, and at his Redeemer’s feet inquires, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?—how wide the field which is open before him! How various and complete the appliances at his command! Can he speak well? He may be bold and fervid as he will in commending his Saviour to all men in all places, “no man forbidding him.” If he should even pass the limits of prudence, the worst that can come of it is that he should be called a fanatic or a meddler. Christ and Paul bore those names before him; and the glow of holy love must be very faint within him if he does not rejoice in being called “a fool for Christ’s sake.” But no man can hurt his person or hinder his work. Does he wish to devote his whole life to this work in the Christian ministry? The Church will give him the best education of the age. She will give him a “holy and beautiful house” in which to deliver his messages, and an attentive congregation to listen to them. She will place him in a respectable and even commanding social position, whence his voice will be heard and his influence felt through every rank and institution of society. The education of the young will be respectfully submitted to him. In the inauguration and management of every great movement of the time, his counsels will carry a weight and authority which belong to the men of no other profession. Is he impatient of “building on another man’s foundation,” and “ambitious” (such is Paul’s own expression, Rom. xv. 20) “to preach the gospel where Christ has not been named?”—there are Turkey, India, China, Japan, the isles of the sea, all open to Christian labour, the Church ready to send him thither and support him on the field, and the most powerful governments of the world guaranteeing the perfect security of his person while he is at work for Christ in the very heart of Satan’s dominions.

If, from age or other circumstances, he determines to abide in a secular calling, he can make the gains of that calling tell on the cause which he loves in almost any form and any part of the world that he may choose. Admirable organizations, both ecclesiastical and voluntary, will transmute his liberality into any shape, and bestow it in any region that he may desire. For a few pence he can give away a Bible in Bagdad or Shanghai, or distribute some hundreds of tracts in a fair or caravan of Central Asia. Christians have thus been preaching and itinerating in the heart of France, and teaching children in India, while they were following their calling at home. A merchant, not long ago, was thus teaching and training fifteen youths for the ministry, and yet all the time managing his business and correspondence at his counting house. Qui facit per alium facit per se, is not only good law, but good gospel too. Christianity to this extent admits of proxies. He who only “receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet’s reward;” what, then, shall he receive who sends forth a prophet at his own charge, and supports him on his mission?

In addition to all that he can do through others, his personal service may be given in Sunday school, Bible class, tract distribution, city mission, visitation of schools, jails, asylums, canal basins, wharves—every place where men do congregate, or where a solitary soul may be addressed with “the word of truth, the gospel of salvation.” And rarely, indeed, will he find that his approaches will not be met with kindness and respect at least, if not with earnest attention.

Can he write well? The journals of the day, in their wondrous multiplications and reproductions, will in a few days bring a telling paragraph before the eyes of readers who can scarcely be numbered or counted for multitude.

No age which the Church has seen is at all comparable with our own for liberty, security, and manifold instrumentalities of Christian labour. A “day” has been foretold (Zech. xii. 8), when he that is feeble among them shall be as David and the house of David, as God, as the angel of the Lord before them." Something of this vast and divine augmentation of power is seen in the present circumstances of the Church—when a Christian who has a thought to utter or a shilling to give, can make it tell in the uttermost parts of the earth.

And now, if with all this advantage we have the fervent love and simple faith of the first age, when Christian tent-makers "wrought at their occupation," and the meanwhile "reasoned in the synagogue, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks;" when those who were scattered abroad by persecution went everywhere preaching the word; when a "physician" was the "beloved" companion of an apostle, and holy women "bestowed much labour," and were acknowledged as "helpers in Christ," and a Christian "house" had a "church" in it, and the servants of Christ were ever "labouring fervently in prayers" (that perpetual and universal, and withal most powerful form of Christian labour), "that the Word of God might have free course," and that their brethren in distant Churches "might stand perfect and complete in all the will of God;"—if thus the love of the first century work through the boundless freedom and material facilities of the nineteenth, how rapid and powerful will be the growth of the Church!

BIOGRAPHY.

THOMAS NELSON.

OUR readers are familiar with the name of the publishers of the Family Treasury, and some of them knew personally the Christian character and worth of the late Mr. Thomas Nelson, Senior, who died on the 23d March last, at the good age of fourscore. There are some valuable lessons to be learned by men of business, as well as by others, from his life and death. We proceed accordingly, in conformity with a wish expressed in many quarters, to give a brief sketch of what our pages have often recorded in other instances, namely, the grace that shines in the life of the righteous, and that makes their memory exceeding precious in the eyes of God and man.

Mr. Nelson was born at Throsk, a few miles east of Stirling, in 1780. He came of a God-fearing race. His grandmother cast in her lot with the Erskines, in days when earnest evangelical religion was held cheap, and when the lamp was like to go out in the temple of the Lord. His father was a simple, devout man, leading a quiet life on a small farm not very far from the field of Bannockburn, refusing to take advantage of offered opportunities of making money by a pottery on his ground, and preferring to hold on the even tenor of his way, rather than be harassed by multiplied worldly cares, perhaps to the injury of his soul. He attended the ministrations of the Rev. Mr. Macmillan of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Stirling, whose high-toned expositions of Bible truth, enforced by the native dignity of his personal character, made a deep and abiding impression on the heart of his young son. We are familiar still, in our own day, with great gatherings at sacramental seasons in many parts of our Highlands. Such things took place also, at the period of which we speak, in many parts of the Lowlands in connection with Churches of different Presbyterian denominations. Robert Burns has directed his keen satire against such open-air celebrations, as if there had been little difference between the case of Scotland in last generation and the Church of Corinth in the days of Paul. Yet, beyond all question, this is a profane caricature; and examples like the one before us, prove how that among our forefathers there were not a few, who made a point of attending such diets of preaching, and who received a mighty impulse to their faith from the act of showing forth the Lord's death.

Mr. Nelson's father thought nothing of travelling forty miles in order that he might enjoy the privilege of such communion seasons. His son frequently accompanied him. And who can tell, how often the dispensation of the Lord's supper, with its material signs and emblems, may be more really instructive to young people than many of the regular services of the sanctuary? Certain it is, that Mr. Nelson often delighted to refer to such occasions up to the eleventh hour of life—proving that, although he was only a spectator of the ordinance as a boy, he was yet alive to the meaning of the heavenly picture, which set forth the glory of Christ's dying love. His was one of those cases, especially common perhaps among the families of the righteous, in which it was impossible to point to any marked epoch, when he came for the first time to taste and see that God was gracious. There was no well-marked historic incident on which conversion turned. From his earliest years he had witnessed a living exhibition of gospel faith under his father's humble roof; he had been insensibly breathing the atmosphere of Christian teaching and example. His first recollections were mixed up with a sense of the fear of God, and the sacredness of the day of rest, and the value of the Holy Scriptures, and the prayers of the family altar, and the blessed spectacle of the bread and the wine. It was among such influences that the shoots of the spiritual life expanded, making it evident that the things of eternity had thus early become a great reality to him.

It is of more consequence to notice, how the existence of right principles was manifested, when he had soon after to meet the shock of the world's duties and temptations. Like so many among the youth of our land, he made up his mind to go to the colonies—selecting the West Indies as his destination. The momentous hour of leaving the parental roof came, and his father accompanied him on the road to Alloa, the place of embarkation. We are left to conjecture what passed by the way.

One thing only we know—that after many weighty counsels, his father said, “Have you ever thought that in the country to which you are going, you will be far away from the means of grace?” “No, father,” said he, “I never thought of that; and I won’t go.” His resolution was taken at once to retrace his steps, and a pet scheme was abandoned at the call of duty. His conscience made the decision; he weighed the case in the balance of the sanctuary, and felt that it was better to serve God than mammon. How few of our adventurous youth there are, with whom the thought of the means of grace counterbalances the hope of worldly gain at the age of seventeen!

When about twenty years of age, Mr. Nelson went to London, and after experiencing his own share of difficulties familiar to young men in pushing their way through the world, he at last entered the service of a publishing house, which determined the course of his after life. The home-principles under which he had been reared made him diligent and conscientious in his daily duties, whilst they led him to court the companionship of those that feared the Lord like himself. The tide of the world’s temptations swept past him without shaking his faith, as the swollen waters of the Thames by night and by day rush past the solid arches of London Bridge. One of his early associates in business was the late Mr. Kelly—afterwards raised to the Lord Mayor’s chair—whose published biography shows how Christian character is after all the true passport to the blessings of this life, as well as of that which is to come. Mr. Nelson and a few other young Scotchmen—connected with the Reformed Presbyterian Church—formed themselves into a fellowship meeting. They thought more about the services on the Sabbath, than the sights of London during the week. They encouraged each other in the graces and duties of the heavenly life, whilst multitudes of young men among them from the north made shipwreck of conscience and character. So far it being the case that the fear of God is a poor or unworthy motive to live under, is it not rather the very highest of all motives—the safeguard against evil—the spur to every duty before God and man—the likeliest thing to the reverence, which fills the breasts of the unfallen angels around the throne? One of this group of Christian disciples held a situation in one of the dockyards during Lord Melville’s days at the Admiralty. An order was given to execute some piece of work on the Sabbath, which he respectfully but firmly declined to do,—the result being that he lost his place. Lord Melville, however, had accidentally come in contact with him several times in visiting the yard, and on learning the cause of his dismissal, rebuked the official who had issued his order, and shortly afterwards advanced him to a higher post,—thus verifying the saying of the wise man, “that by humility and the fear of the Lord, are riches, honour, and life.”

Mr. Nelson had already begun to show his love for the standard works of our old theological authorship, which characterized him in after life. He was deeply read in Puritan divinity; and one could not but notice in him some of the sterling elements of Puritan character,—its reverence, its strength of purpose, its prayerfulness, its feeding on the divine word, its constant looking up to God. As he was now among books, he delighted to collect copies of his favourite authors for his private use; and so it was, that on beginning business for himself in Edinburgh, he resolved to issue cheap editions of such books, in order that they might be brought within the easy reach of thousands. Such cheap issues are a common feature of the publishing trade of the country now, but it was otherwise in the beginning of this century; and he was among the first to introduce the new order of things by the publication of works like those of Paley, Leighton, Hervey, Romaine, Newton, and many others. We do not dwell on what happened in after years, only remarking, that he often blessed God for the way by which he had been led, and for the measure of success with which he had favoured him. As life advanced, he often looked back on many difficulties which had been smoothed down and overcome; he was afraid of pursuing after the world lest it might eat away the life of his soul; he felt a livelier responsibility in giving more of his gains to the cause of the Redeemer; and he was deeply concerned about the spiritual well-being of the three or four hundred workpeople in his establishment at Hope Park.

We pass on to notice the closing section of his life—ending with the death-bed of the righteous. For above a quarter of a century Mr. Nelson had been more or less of an invalid, except from 1843 to 1850, when he was in the enjoyment of vigorous health. By far the greatest part of his time, when he was unwell, was spent in retirement; and those who had the best opportunities of judging can testify, that his sick chamber was in no ordinary sense a house of prayer. Many—many a time he rose at midnight to call upon his Maker. The memorandum-books which he has left behind are full from beginning to end of quotations from the religious books he was reading, or ejaculations of his own spirit before the mercy-seat. One little incident will show the place that prayer had in his daily life. A friend in the ministry happened to call one day, and after some religious conversation, told him that he could not stay longer, in consequence of an engagement,—thus being unable to join with him in prayer. On calling on another occasion, Mr. Nelson, remembering what had occurred at the previous visit, and apprehensive that the same thing might happen again, observed, “We will take the prayer first to-day.” So, on the passing to and fro of members of the family, on any occasion of temporary absence, his uniform habit was to sanctify meetings and partings by prayer. Prayer was, in a word, the very vocabulary of his heart—it came to him like a mother-tongue.

His last illness continued only about a fortnight,—though it was a fortnight of almost uninterrupted agony. His disease—an obstruction in the bowels—was entirely beyond the reach of medical skill. The furnace became hotter and hotter; and often his piercing cries, from excruciating pain, were heard over the whole house. And so it continued till within a few minutes of the time, when he drew his last breath in the presence of all the members of his family. What a mystery, that the all-loving God should thus heap suffering upon suffering to the very last, and that, by the endurance of physical pain, he should at once bring down the body and lift up the soul! How easily, we think, he might interpose, at least in the case of his own people, and give peace of body as well as peace of soul in the closing days of life. But no. He is carrying out a stupendous plan of grace, in the execution of which he will not be hurried by the shortsighted wishes of his creatures. Enough to know and to witness the victory of faith over all bodily torture, and the discipline of preparation thereby for that heaven, where there is rest for the weary!

We proceed, accordingly, to give a few of his dying sayings, which may not inappropriately find a corner in the religious magazine published under his name. Whenever a Bible text was quoted, even under his sorest distress, a chord was instantly struck in his heart; he generally finished the passage himself, adding some pithy saying of his own with reference to its meaning. Thus it was, that he gave full proof of his thorough acquaintanceship with Scripture, and his clear mastery of its vital truths.

He delighted to dwell on the completeness and all-sufficiency of Christ's work, as the alone foundation of a sinner's peace with God. Thus on one occasion, in conversation with his pastor, the Rev. Dr. Gould, he said, "I think I can sum up the whole gospel in one word; and that was, substitution. The covenant between the Father and the Son was not a thing of yesterday. The Father delighted in Him; so should we. What I need is not mere mercy, but mercy accompanied with truth. I see mercy in the light of the sun, in the air I breathe, in the flowers of the field. I must see God's justice satisfied as well; and mercy is now given, because justice has been satisfied in the sufferings of His eternal Son. I need no other Saviour. I have a clear right to come to Him, because I feel myself a great sinner. I need no other title or plea." On another occasion he spoke about the wonderful love of Christ in dying for the ungodly, and said, "To me the most wonderful thing of all is, that with all Christ endured, He spoke as if He got a great bargain—a great prize—in saving sinners: 'He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied.'" At another time the passage was quoted, "I will forgive their iniquity; I will remember their sin no more" (Jer. xxxi. 34)—and he replied, literally with laughter in his mouth, as if rejoicing in God's free grace, "What a strange thing that God should forget! God forget! Who ever heard of such a thing as this?" The remark was made that God forgets, because He remembers Christ. "Yes," said he, with solemn emphasis, "Jesus takes the front!" On another occasion he was speaking about God's love to our fallen world, and said, "It was a wonder God did not cut off the whole generation of Adam, and create a race that would have served Him better; but then there would have been no revelation of His mercy." It is unnecessary to multiply like expressions, which were constantly upon his lips. These are enough to show the simplicity and strength of his faith in apprehending and appropriating the offer of pardon and eternal life through Christ, whose work, he often observed, "admits of no supplement." It was beautiful to notice, how with great natural strength of character, his soul melted into tenderness at every allusion to the love of his Redeemer.

Having such a sense of God's grace and covenant-mercy, he gave ample proof on his death-bed of his entire submission to the divine will. It became evident, after more than a week's suffering, that the case was hopeless. Dr. Moir was then requested by some members of the family to tell him, that he and the other physicians who had seen him could do little more, and that, so far as man could judge, a fatal issue might be apprehended within two or three days. He received the announcement with perfect calmness, saying, "I thought so; my times are wholly in God's hand. He doeth all things well. The Lord's will be done!" At the time of the doctor entering the room to break the fatal message, he happened to be reading for his morning portion the fourteenth chapter of Luke's Gospel. And after his leaving him, he at once took up his Testament again, and began at the verse at which he had left off, saying—"Now, I must finish my chapter." No one entering the room a few minutes after could have told from his demeanour that any such interview had taken place. His mind had not been in the least thrown off the balance by the near prospect of dissolution—quite the contrary. There was no excitement—no hurry of preparation for his great change—no departure in the smallest detail from the routine of his daily religious habits and exercises, and his close walk with God. His conversation that forenoon was often bright and cheerful, as if the sunshine of heaven was playing around him. Next morning he was decidedly weaker, yet, as usual, he took his Testament, and went on to read the chapter next in order—the fifteenth of Luke's Gospel. He never thought of turning to special passages, as more peculiarly appropriate to a death-bed. Next day he was asked if he had been reading his chapter, to which he replied that "he had not been able to do so as yet, but he hoped to do it after a little." He was not permitted,—and so it turned out, that the last Bible passage he read was the story of the prodigal returning home and saying, as every child of God says at death as well as in life, "I will arise and go to my Father!"

The sufferings which he endured from day to day, and indeed from hour to hour, made him dwell with all the greater fervour and frequency upon the mercies of God—so many, so undeserved. Thus, after severe spasms of pain, by which he was sorely enfeebled, the first words that generally fell from his lips were precious texts like these: "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him;" "I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord;" or, "My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord;" or, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life," &c. He prayed against murmuring,—and when the pain seemed greater than the human frame could well bear, he exclaimed, times without number, in the words of the metrical version of the twentieth Psalm,— his sinking voice giving singular pathos to the supplication of his heart. On one occasion he said, taking the retrospect of his past life, "I might have been born a poor African slave, and sold in the markets of Cuba or Brazil, if God had not ordered it otherwise. God has been very kind to me. I can set up my Ebenezer and say, 'Hitherto hath the Lord helped me, and I will trust Him for the future.' I am lying here a poor, helpless creature, but, through Christ strengthening me, I can do all things. . . . Suppose I were to get more strength, the great question would be, What use would I make of it? Would I employ it in glorifying God? Unless I did this with it, it would be nothing worth." On being asked whether he would like anything in the plan of salvation altered, "What," said he, "alter the result of infinite wisdom! That would never do." And on being asked again whether he had any wish to alter the time of his death, he replied, "Alter the time! No, no. God appointed the time of my coming into the world, and He has the same right to determine the time of my leaving it. Were He to ask me to choose the time, I would just refer it all back to Him. God's choice would be my choice."

He expressed great thankfulness for anything that gave him any relief—such as a little ice to moisten his mouth—sometimes remarking, that "these things were refreshing to a sufferer, but that the promises should be more refreshing than anything else." Over and over again he thanked Dr. Moir for all his professional and Christian services during these days, and for many long years before. He seemed almost incapable of looking on the dark side of death—the grave had lost its terrors—it was in his eye not a prison-house, but the ante-chamber of heaven. Hence his desire that he might honour God in his affliction, and that it might prepare him for what he called "the refined society of heaven." "If I were to be admitted to the company above," he remarked, "what would the angels and the redeemed say, were I to murmur here at the Lord's doings! He knows what pain is best for me. He sits by the furnace; I will not suffer more than I require. We are as the clay in the hand of the potter. But every parallel fails, because God both makes and shapes the clay. He has absolute power over the clay." He never spoke of death without seeing in it the occasion for the display of the love and power of Christ—as when he said one day, with a full heart, "I can never get over that love of His in going through the dark valley!" After a night of great suffering, on being told that the break of day was at last come, he said, "The Sun of righteousness is just as free to me, and to all, as the morning light. The daylight obeys Him—the winds and the waves obey Him—everything in creation obeys Him! Oh, for the grace of genuine obedience! I need more truth in the inward parts.

Many were the prayers he offered up for his household, individually and collectively. He entreated all around him to make sure of Christ. "O children! give yourselves to the Lord decidedly. Make the world a secondary matter. I wish that I had seen the vanity of the world more clearly. I see it to be but a trifle. Think more about God and His great salvation. I feel now that I am going to leave you." And on its being remarked that he had often thought so in former years, he replied, "Yes; but I am sure now. And supposing I was spared, there was no harm in speaking about eternity. Let us improve the short time that is left." Two little incidents may be noticed, having specially to do with his family circle. He gave a present of a Bible to all the members of his household, writing their names, with the date, on the fly-leaf—this being the last time he took up the pen, two days before his death. On looking at the date, he paused for a moment, and then said with great solemnity, "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." After this he prayed for all, mentioning each by name, "that they might treasure the word in their hearts; that they might study it daily, and study it devotionally,"—and after prayer, he made the remark, "that the principles of the Bible would be binding through all eternity, and that it was only in heaven we could love God, as we were commanded, with our whole heart, and soul, and strength, and mind." The other circumstance was the gathering of the whole household around his bed—and the cordiality with which he entered into the proposal to sing some Psalms selected by himself, when there seemed sure evidence that the hours of his earthly existence were well-nigh numbered. Those who were present will never forget that most impressive scene. He had always taken great delight in psalm-singing; and now it seemed like a sad and yet joyful farewell. Sometimes his voice almost died away,—at other times it appeared to have lost nothing of its wonted strength and volume, and was heard clearly above all the others. His soul was in the exercise. Praise was closing his life below, and leading the way to the nobler songs above. It was quite characteristic of him that he never got to relish most modern hymns, and that he always went back with new zest and relish to David's Psalms. One of the last remarks he made, in speaking of the songs of heaven was, "I think I hear them singing that new song now." He spoke as one about to join in it through eternity.

The windows of his bed-room looked out upon Arthur Seat and Duddingston Loch, and it was as the grey light of the morning of the 23d March was dawning on one of the most picturesque scenes around Edinburgh, that the Master came. The servant was summoned away, like one who had been waiting for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning. There was no abatement of suffering; it was a sore conflict till within a few minutes of his departure. Friends would have been thankful to have seen a single quiet hour before death; yet it was not to be—and now that all is over, they have cause to be far more thankful for such special dying grace. “Blessed is the servant, whom His Lord, when He cometh, shall find so doing.”

Such was the character of Mr. Nelson's last illness, with this simple trust in the mercy of God through Christ Jesus. But it would be incorrect to say, that during the many years of shattered health through which he passed, he felt always sure of his peace being made with God. On the contrary, he was often in the position of a child of light, walking in darkness. Seasons of great bodily uneasiness, caused probably by the early inroads of the disease then unsuspected, which ended his days, were also seasons in which he spoke doubtfully, and even despondingly. He often brooded over the question of his personal acceptance with God, and sometimes almost refused to be comforted. And yet no Christian friend could well wish better evidence of his estate even then, than by hearing his earnest prayers in his bed-chamber or in the family for an interest in Christ, or his confessions as to his unworthiness and shortcomings, or by witnessing his delight in learning about the revival of religion at home or abroad. He was grieved, because faith was weak and obedience imperfect; still, all the while this was nothing else than that genuine contrition of heart, which is itself both the work and the witness of the Holy Spirit. He sometimes failed to see that there is a vast range in the degrees of faith among the best of God's people, and that even when weak as a grain of mustard seed, it was still the very faith that saves and sanctifies the soul. During these years of which we speak, it was often remarked, that when his illness assumed for the time a really serious form, at once his doubts vanished like mountain mist, his soul gathered fresh strength, and he was willing to resign himself unreservedly into God's hand. Nothing could better prove how much bodily ailments had in his case to do, as they often have, with the darker experiences of the people of God. Wearisome days and nights may frequently sink the soul as well as the body, and render it for the time hard to mount up as on eagle's wings.

We refer to all this the more specially for another reason. We have stated that the approach of death made no change on one of his daily religious habits; and in many such instances it is precious to observe how, ere death comes, God blesses the soul that seeks Him. He is only known in one single instance to have failed to observe family worship,—and that omission, though a very special one, caused him great concern. A friend from across the Atlantic once remarked that he was never more struck with anything than with the patriarchal way in which he asked a blessing before meat. Thus it was with regard to all else—his religion being that of every-day life, and the things of eternity occupying the upper chamber of his heart. Hence, when his dying day came, it found his exercises of soul thoroughly confirmed, so that that day did not materially differ from ordinary days in his later years. What a lesson as to the cultivation of religious habits! and what a comforting proof of God being true to His promise, that “at the evening time it shall be light!” We know that there are cases, in which His people may sometimes go to the grave without a ray of inward peace. This is one of the greatest mysteries of grace, which eternity alone can fully unravel,—although it ought not in the least to shake our reliance on the God of the Promise. It is, however, the more encouraging to record examples, in which the soul's passage into the unseen world has been smoothed by God's abundant mercy.

We cannot close without remarking, that Mr. Nelson's life supplies a good example of sterling Scottish piety, exhibited unobtrusively in the walks of business. He admired the Covenanters, and had not a little of the spirit that makes one willing to do or suffer for Christ, as the case may be. He had been brought up in the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and during his last days he had much heavenly counsel with Dr. Gould of Edinburgh and Mr. Anderson of Loanhead;—but his heart beat warmly to all the followers of Christ, of every name—and many are the clergy from other lands, both in Europe and America, who can testify to his being a lover of hospitality, and a lover of good men. One of the most marked private seasons with him was during the weeks which were, from year to year, set apart for prayer by Christians over the world. He was careful to jot down the days for such devotional exercises; and when the hour of the day came round which was recommended as convenient for devotion, he was then sure to be found in his room, pouring out his heart before God, and joining his soul in sympathy with the souls of all who loved the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and in truth.

How many there are in our country, men naturally of retiring habits, not mingling very much with the world beyond their daily walk in business—confined, it may be, for many years to the dwellings of Jacob—who yet nightly help on the cause of Christ by their private prayers. Their sincere devotional life is like a perpetual Sabbath and memorial before God; not as if they were indifferent to what is taking place in the busy world around, but that they are prepared to interpret all such events aright in the light of God's word and of the glory of the latter day. During these closing days of his earthly sojourn, Mr. Nelson only once specially referred to the news of the day. He felt anxious to know what President Lincoln had said in his inaugural address; and on being told, he replied, “Well, well, I think the best thing that could happen would be a peaceable sep-ration between the North and South. But be that as it may, these recent events in Europe and America prove that Christ is claiming the nations, and they are part of his "inheritance." It seemed the easiest and most natural of all things for him to pass from the concerns of time to those of eternity. Any reference to what was occurring for the moment had the same serious impress as when he spoke to one of his sons (knowing that it was the week of the communion in his congregation in Greenock), and said, "Perhaps you will be able to wait and see the end;" or when some one, for curiosity, asked him if, after entering heaven, he would have any desire to come back to this world, he at once replied, "What would I come back for?"—meaning that to depart and to be with Christ was far better. These were some of the ways in which he was constantly showing his love to the Saviour, and yet no one confessed more readily than he how feeble and cold his love had been, causing him to say, "What a shame not to love Him better!" The same meek and humble spirit made him acknowledge how little he had done for Christ in his day and generation, and it prompted his ready reply to the remark that, nevertheless, Christ had surely done much for him. "Yes," said he, lifting up his hands from his bed, his voice having the ominous sound of a rapidly-approaching change,—“Yes. He could not possibly have done more.”

May Scotland ever be blessed with a race of such men, who, rising by patient industry to an honourable position in business, exemplify not only something of the independence and sagacity which other nations ascribe to us, but also that fear of God, and that love to His truth, and the interests of His Son's kingdom, which are the true elements of all personal character, as well as of all success in life! He is buried in the Grange cemetery, in the well-known line of tombs containing the ashes of Dr. Chalmers and many other Scottish worthies,—his grave being next that of Hugh Miller. With many of the imperfections which cleave to the best of men, we feel on relating these few incidents of his life in connection with the mellow and ripened grace of his death-bed, that to all such aged Christians the words of the psalmist are peculiarly applicable, "They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing; to show that the Lord is upright; He is my rock, and there is no unrighteousness in Him."

SONNET.

"Casting all your care upon him."

WHEN from a world of tumult we retreat,
To commune with the Lord in secret prayer,
We gladly bring our burdens to his feet,
Who bids us cast on him our every care;
Yet is it seldom that we leave them there,
But when again the busy throng we meet,
We still are "heavy-laden," still repeat

The tale of griefs which Jesus died to bear.
Oh! we should "roll our burden on the Lord,"
Though faith be trembling and our eye-sight dim;
For, did we realize his gracious word
Whose love is strong to bear his people's load,
We should go forth from communing with God,
His peace our own—our care consigned to him.

"Roll thy burden on the Lord, and he shall sustain thee."

THE CENSUS.

ALTHOUGH the readers of the Family Treasury within the limits of the British isles may be reckoned by scores of thousands, the name, and rank, and age of every one of them will be found in one great book, which was written lately all in one day, and will be safely kept among the records of the kingdom. It was an interesting and somewhat solemnizing act to write the names and ages of all the family in the census paper on the morning of the 7th of April last, and to know that all the millions of the nation were written on different pages of the same book at the same time. All the names are in that book; no man can reach it now to change or blot out his own. They have gone into the archives of the kingdom, and are far beyond our power.

It reminds us of another book, in which are written the names, not of a nation merely, but of a world—not of one generation only, but of all generations. In that book names are written as well as names, inmost thoughts as well as outward profession. It is in the keeping of the King Eternal, it is shut from the eyes of men and angels, it will be opened in the judgment of the great day. My name is there, and yours, reader. Our character is there, and our sins are there, not as we represented them, or our neighbours read them, but as God sees them. Every word and thought of ours will be brought out—the multitude of our sins, to be laid either to our Redeemer's charge or our own. If we are in Christ, none of these heavy counts will be marked against us; they will be all blotted out. "There is now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus."

There is another book, distinct from the book of judgment, with names in it, and nothing but names. It is called "The Lamb's Book of Life." Sinners' names are there, but not their sins. All whose names are in it are just before God in the righteousness of Christ. They will not tremble when the books are opened, for no debt remains charged in their account. Oh, to have our names in that book! What kind of persons are admitted to that privilege? Not the great, not the good. There are none great, none good among men. Those who get their names in that Book of Life have neither inherited nor wrought their righteousness; they have obtained it as a free gift from God. They who know themselves only sinners, and cast themselves unreservedly on Christ the Saviour, are found written there. There is no question whether he will give your name a place in his book of life. He is willing to do that, he longs to do that. The question is, Are you willing to give him a place in your heart? He is waiting, knocking now.

Although the book lies hidden in the deep of eternity, all the writing is inserted in it now. No corrections or additions can be made in it for any one after his day on earth is done. The book is sealed. Those that are in it cannot be blotted out, those that are out till their departure cannot be put in. Here and now the writing is done. Your name, reader, is going down on the Lamb's Book of Life, or not, according as you are giving yourself to Christ, or withholding. In the very act of casting yourself, as a sinner, on the Saviour's love for all you need, your name is silently, surely printed in his book. The writing of the Spirit is a double writing, sinking into two sheets simultaneously,—marking the new nature on the tables of your heart, and the new name in the family register of heaven. Neither the troubles of time nor the powers of darkness can ever obliterate either impression. God's family are a whole family. No child shall be excluded from home, for the father's love cannot want one of the children.

A STANCH CONVERT.

In the year 1854, a Mussulman, from a good family, in one of the north-west provinces of India, came to Bombay. He had, in some way, obtained a Bible, and had been brought to the knowledge of the truth by reading it. He wished to learn the ways of Christian truth more perfectly, and also to be permitted to profess his faith in Christ, without fear of harm from his former co-believers in Islam. There was no doubt in regard to his earnestness and sincerity. He was after some weeks' trial gladly received to the fellowship of the little mission Church. He was baptized by the beloved missionary, Rev. Mr. Hume, the last time he ever entered the house of God on earth, when he was too feeble to undertake the other services of the occasion.

Near the close of 1856, this convert, K— B —, left Bombay for his native provinces. On the outbreak of the rebellion, May 1857, he was at Delhi, and, with other Christians, was in danger of losing his life. He escaped, and joined the British at once. It was at the darkest hour in that time of trial. The path of safety for a native of that land, as well as present honour and wealth, seemed to be in joining the rebels and upholding the native dynasty. It required no little courage at the time when the event was so doubtful, to espouse the cause of the British. K— B — did not waver. He introduced himself to the authorities, and was employed by them, on the strength of a paper which he had with him, given to him by an American missionary in Bombay.

He was a man of good address, tall, slender, dark, with a full black beard. He became a messenger to carry letters to the British, who were besieged in Lucknow, and to get news from them, and also of the plans of the rebels in Delhi and Lucknow both. He was at one time arrested by a rebel band, and taken before one of their infamous leaders, charged with being a spy, but as no proof was found against him, he was released.

When peace was restored, the Government proceeded to reward its native faithful servants and allies. K— B— received a present of five hundred pounds in cash, and a grant of a village, a tract of land in perpetuity, the annual rental of which is five hundred pounds. This is the form of reward most gratifying to all the natives of that country, and most eagerly sought. It is in accordance with the customs of the land. It is the form of reward which has been most used from time immemorial. It gives the person rank among the gentry. There are many such proprietors, made such by the native powers before the advent of the British. This reward was unexpected by K— B—. He had but done his duty, and why should so much honour be put upon him? It is the policy of the British to show their subjects the advantages of loyalty to them at all times. While they have severely punished those found in actual rebellion, they have rewarded liberally those who stood firm. The good effects of this policy will be apparent, should another struggle ever take place in that country.

How did the Christian look upon this wealth? He said, "God has given me this prosperity, and I must use it, not for myself, but for his glory." He erected a school-house for the use of the villagers of his new domain. He procured a teacher from a mission station some distance off. He made application to Government to give him the charge of some native children who had been made orphans during the rebellion. His request was granted, and he now has in training for Christ ten boys and eight girls, who were thus left. He supports them entirely. Thus is he heaping coals of fire upon the heads of those who once sought his life.

Recently, K— B— has taken a long journey to visit the missionaries and native brethren in Bombay and vicinity. The principal object of this visit was to ask for a missionary to go back with him and take charge of the religious instruction of his people, and to preach to the natives in that region. He proposes to assume the entire expense of such a mission himself, if the missionary could be found. Who will go? It would not be expedient for any one now employed in our missions in Western India to go so far away and to learn the new language, while labour is so much needed, and is so much blessed, in the field already occupied. It would seem to be a very hopeful opening for a new man to enter.

There are now some three or four mission stations in India entirely, or in great part, supported by native princes. Three native princes have professed Christianity themselves. Every such movement as this is matter of much hope, in reference to the spread of the gospel in that land.—Independent.

THE CHILDREN'S TREASURY.

"I WILL ARISE, AND GO TO MY FATHER."

LUKE XV. 18.

BY THE REV. JAMES BOLTON, KILBURN.

THIS parable, like the sun, shines as radiantly and powerfully to day as it did nearly two thousand years ago, when Jesus spoke it. For all these years it has been calling and lighting sinners back to God. Who can say what good it has done in that time! How often its verses have been wet with tears! How many souls it has saved! What multitudes now in glory would tell us, "That story brought me here!" It caught them by the hand as they were sinking, and drew them, as sweetly as an angel might, to the Rock of Ages.

Now, let us read it together; and I will underline those passages which seem to me the most important:—

"And he said, A certain man had two sons: and the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living. And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living. And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want. And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine. And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him. And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough, and to spare, and I perish with hunger! I will arise, and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against Heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants. And he arose, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against Heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet: and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry: for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry."

There are four chief points in this unhappy and yet happy youth's history: What he left—what he went to—what he came to—what he returned to.

May the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of Jesus, teach us life lessons from each of them.

1. What he left.—If some poor lads tramped off from London or Edinburgh, they would leave very little except thievish companions and beds of straw. When the swallows quit England in the autumn, they leave very little except fogs and frosts. But this youth left his father, his home, and abundant supplies. His father—and such a father!—so generous, so kind, so considerate—see how ready he was even to indulge his sons—how at once, and without grudging, he divided to them his living. See how he says to the other brother, "All that I have is thine!" See what a depth of love was in him, in his treatment of the prodigal before he had uttered a word of confession—"When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him!" Was he not just such a father as you would wish to have? I had such a father; and I used to hope that he might attend my death-bed, and lay me in my grave.—How could I bear to be parted from him! And now that he is gone, I feel as if I had wasted every moment that I was not close to his side.

This youth left such a father!

He left his home. Evidently it was a country home. There is mention of a "house" and a "field;" and a "calf" and a "kid" imply cattle and flocks. Perhaps it was in a retired valley, embowered in trees, surrounded with pastures.—If you opened the windows, there were warbling and fragrance in the air. And it was not dull within; for "music, and dancing," and merriment, only needed a beckon, to burst forth. In this cheerful country home the youth had been born and had grown up. There he had drunk in his earliest delights; there he had sported without cares or fears; and there ten thousand invisible tendrils had clasped him, and sought to bind him there for ever.

But he left this dear home.

And he left abundant supplies. We are told that "the ass knoweth his master's crib."—He knows where he is well fed, and he sticks to it. And here this youth had plenty of food—for the hired servants had "bread enough and to spare;" and warm clothing—for if there was a best robe, there were others; and "a fatted calf" hints at occasional feasting.

Would you ask for more than a devoted father, a dear home, and plenty?—What millions of sons have sighed for them in vain! But he left them all.

And herein is he not a picture of us? In this Christian land, and in our Christian family circles, are we not from infancy offered a heavenly Father, a heavenly home, and heavenly supplies? How by parents, teachers, ministers, by Bibles and pious books, God presents us with these—presses them upon us—would have us understand that in Jesus "all that he has is ours." But, alas! we do not care for these precious blessings; they are nothing in our esteem; we turn from them. Which of us by nature rejoices in our heavenly Father, our heavenly home, our heavenly supplies, and is so satisfied with them that everything else seems chaff and tinsel? No, unless the Lord works a change in us, our habit is to leave these, God's inestimable benefits—to leave them to others—to leave them till sickness or old age—to leave them without a regret, as we leave our cradles and our white baby dresses.

2. What he went to.—What was it that lured and attracted him? We have heard of youths going on the Continent to travel and to finish their education. Hundreds go out to India annually to army appointments. A lad started for Australia, laboured hard there in the gold diggings for five years, and when he landed at Portsmouth, could drive to his mother's cottage in a carriage and four. Jacob was obliged to flee abroad from the anger of Esau; but he prospered exceedingly, till he had become "two bands." Joseph was compelled to emigrate into Egypt; but there he rose to be a prince and a saviour.

But observe, this young man's idea and plan was—

1st, To get to a distance.

2d, To enjoy himself recklessly.

No sooner had his father done as he requested him, than he gathered all together—selling it, or drawing it from the bank—and took his journey into a far country.—"Let me put as many miles as possible between me and my father's eye and ear and tongue, so that he shall not be aware of what I do, and so that I shall have no reproofs, no counsels, no warnings."

And then he "wasted his substance in riotous living." He said to himself, "Now I can gratify myself without hindrance—now I will throw restraint to the winds—now, come Pleasures, I and you will be play-fellows!"

He did this in his ignorance. So foolish was he, that he never thought of what comforts he was forsaking, and what troubles he might run into. He was like a silly sheep, wandering from its fold, its clover, or its turnips, to a wilderness infested with wolves.

He did it, too, in his self-will. He must be independent—free as a lark in the sky. This liberty has a strange fascination for the young; but it is a Will-o'-the-wisp, which misleads us into a bog, and then vanishes.

And he did it in his passion for pleasure. That had set him on fire, and now flamed up in him till it burned him to ashes. It is a terrible thing to have a passion for pleasure; it is certain to grow stronger and stronger, and draw us on and on, till it lands us in the centre of the spider's web. I beseech all of you to beware of it, and struggle and pray against it.

These three things—ignorance, self-will, and a passion for pleasure—hurried this youth into "a far country" and to "riotous living."

And here also is a glass in which we behold ourselves. When we determine to have our own way, we seek to hide ourselves from rebuke and instruction. We dread interference. We say to God, "Depart from us." I remember at school, in America, a band of naughty boys fitted up a cave for themselves in a dense forest, where they could smoke and gamble.—It was the secrecy of the thing which was its charm to them. And then "out of sight and out of mind," as we imagine, we yield ourselves to what is sinful—we indulge fleshly inclinations—we join with evil associates. One would suppose that we were the butterflies of an hour, who have nothing to do with judgment and eternity; or lambs in a butcher's paddock, frolicking within sight of the knife.

3. What he came to.—He had his idea and his plan, and nobody opposed him in them. And now, what does he reap from his sowing? He has been draining a sparkling cup.—What is at the bottom of it? Can it be? Is this indeed him—"feeding swine?" Yes; there is no mistake about it. There he is following a herd of hogs as they rummage over the stubble! But that was not the worst of it. There is no particular disgrace in feeding swine. In Essex you will meet scores of lads doing it. I have walked and talked with them; and they were as honest and intelligent, as willing to read a tract or answer Scripture questions, as any lad in our Sunday classes. I declare I would rather feed swine than be a swine as many are in their tastes and habits.

So I repeat it,—this youth's new occupation was not the worst of what he had come to. Was he not beggared, degraded, starved? Was he not beggared? He had wasted his substance till he had spent all, and that was vice.—What his father had laboured for and intrusted to him, he had consumed on his iniquities,—every farthing of it. What a wretch this proved him to be. Was he not degraded? Had he not been wallowing in the mire of dissipation? And now was he not driven to engage himself as a common menial to a farmer, and be thankful for the lowest employment? Here was wretchedness! And was he not starving? He could buy nothing, not a dry crust for himself; and the "mighty famine" prevented him from picking up fruit, or begging a meal from those around,—ordinarily they would not have grudged it, but now they had to treasure up the scraps and crumbs for themselves. Why did not his boon comrades, who had "devoured" his wealth, support him? They had clung to him whilst he had wealth; but now that they had sucked the juice out of the orange, they threw it into the ditch; whilst his summer lasted they frisked about with him,—when his winter set in they bade him adieu!

The poet touchingly sings—

"And he who has but tears to shed,
Must shed those tears alone!

But why did he not obtain what he needed with his pay? It appears that the farmer ordered him to go and earn his pay before he could board him; and so he commenced his task famishing, envying the pigs the husks which they ate so greedily: "and no man gave unto him."—He was pale, and lean, and haggard; his cheeks were sunken, and his bones nearly through his skin; his remaining rags hung loosely upon him, his feet were naked, "but no man gave unto him." And was it not a mercy that it was so? for had he been relieved, he might never have said, "I will arise and go to my Father." But how deplorable was his condition now! Contrast it with what it was a few months before—under his father's roof, at his father's table, waited on, admired, not a want unmet!

And this is what the World does for its votaries! These are the wages of Satan! This is the bitter fruit of those buds and blossoms which smell so delicious! Said a dying youth to me: "Could I have realized that by my gaiety I should shorten my life from seventy to twenty, I would have broken from it, had it been twice as enticing! And not only have I shortened my life so, but squandered what I have had of it!"—And he sighed so hotly and heavily that I was reminded of him who cried to Abraham for but a drop of water from Lazarus's finger tip to cool his parched tongue!

But so it is! Scores of youths will not believe this; they must taste those honeys and poisons for themselves. They must dive amongst those pearls and sharks for themselves; they must flutter in those gilded chambers and fiery lamps for themselves! Then will they discover that—

"Pleasures are like poppies spread,—
You seize the flower, the bloom is shed;
Or as the snow falls in the river,
A moment white, then melts for ever.

And they may congratulate themselves if they do not come to "feeding swine"—to beggary, degradation, starvation.

4. What he returned to.—There is something beautifully suggestive about this. He returned to exactly what he had left, with the addition of the best robe and the ring.—He returned to his Father, his Home, and abundant supplies! But you say, "Then what was the difference?" Simply that he had another heart in him. He returned to precisely what he had left, but he returned to it with an altogether altered heart. That was the difference, and it made all the difference; it made his father yearned for, his home a paradise, his abundant supplies priceless. They were not transformed, but he was.

He was in his right senses—"he came to himself." He had been intoxicated or "possessed"; now he viewed things as they are, and perceived his guilt, and his danger, and his ingratitude. He was emptied.—He was no more your fine proud fellow, tossing his head and saying, "I can forage for myself." Now he hung his head, and would be grateful for the smallest scraps. He was humbled—"I am no more worthy to be called thy son." Who shall say what his conscience upbraided him with when he arrived at that conclusion, that his Father ought to disown him!—I dare not disclose the glimpse which I have of it! He was contrite—"I have sinned."—I have no excuse, no merit to plead. He was hungry. He longed now for what he had before despised. He was submissive—"Make me as one of thy hired servants." He only sought to be forgiven and restored, and his father might treat him as he chose.

Now, if all these are not marks of a converted heart, I do not know what a converted heart is; and it was this converted heart which caused him to return so gladly, to what he had left so gladly, and which reinstated him in his father's favour, and the best robe and ring besides.

Now, that is all that is required to gild with hues of gold to us, our heavenly Father, our heavenly home, and our heavenly supplies! They are golden, but not to us, because our hearts are hard, and cold, and averse to them. When our hearts are renewed by grace, then we shall pant after them and prize them. But what a deal some of us have to suffer before that! We are like those wild colts which Mr. Rarey sought to render fit for the royal stables. They might have been led straight into them had they been gentle, but they resisted and fought, and had to be thrown and conquered, and then submit heaving and trembling!

But to close.

Notice the one thing in which all this youth's future happiness centred,—it was in arising and going to his father. Had he shrunk from that, or delayed that, or tried letters and messages, he might have perished, as he saw that he was perishing; but arising and going to his father conducted him to pardon, peace, honour—his father's embrace, the fatted calf, the robe, the ring, the shoes!

And what but this have we to do that we may obtain pardon, peace, honour. We must arise and go to our Father. For God is our Father in Jesus.—We may approach him as such, confidently in Christ's name. You may be imperfect in doctrine, but surely you know that you have sinned, and that you must go to God and acknowledge it, and entreat him to blot it out for Christ's sake, and receive you as his penitent child. Have you done this seriously and sorrowfully? If not, why linger? Why continue to expose yourself? Why be "wanting" when there is all that you "want" waiting for you? Is it God that you are afraid of? Behold Him as depicted by Jesus himself!—When the youth was approaching, the father happened to be standing at the wicket gate. Now it is a fact that fathers can see further than most people,—they can discern their children a wonderful way off. So when he saw this youth toiling towards him, though he was worn and wan,—a tattered skeleton, he felt a strange commotion within ; then he said to himself, " Yes, it is he !—it is my long absent boy !—it is my Benjamin, for whom I have mourned, and wept, and prayed."—" And he had compassion, and ran and fell on his neck ;" and there,—whilst the son was sobbing out on his bosom, " Father, I have sinned ; I am no more worthy ;" he was kissing him, and bidding him say no more, and commanding the servants to adorn him like a king !

And hark to his reason for all this, " For this my son was dead and is alive again, he was lost and is found."

Jesus intended that you should understand from that, that so God will welcome you, if you will say as you finish reading this story, "I WILL ARISE, AND GO TO MY FATHER!" Amen.

WHAT IS PRAYER ?

It is not closing the eyes, and clasping the hands together, and standing up as you do in church, and at school, or kneeling as you do at home, and repeating certain words. That is not praying. I have heard of a man who "prayed, and did not pray." What would you understand by that ? It was an old man who, from his infancy, had never gone to bed at night without repeating the prayer his mother taught him,—

" This night when I lie down to sleep,
I give my soul to Christ to keep ;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to take."

And yet he had never prayed one real prayer ; for saying prayers is not praying. There may be some of you who have said your prayers from your earliest years ; who, though now not very young, have never omitted in the morning, " Our Father who art in heaven," or in the evening, " This night when I lie down to sleep"—(for even many old people have no prayers but these, which they merely repeat like parrots, without understanding even what they mean) ; you may not have omitted these for a single day, and yet it may be true of you, that you have never prayed." If a person were to come to you and repeat certain words which he did not understand ; if he did not seem to think of what he was saying ; if he kept looking about him all the time, as if he were not speaking to you ; if he were to fall asleep while he was speaking ; if he went away without ever waiting for an answer, or hearing what you had to say, —what would you think of him ? And yet that is what very many do to God ; and that is what they call prayer ! What would you think of a person putting a letter into the post-office without an address on it, or putting only unmeaning words, or nothing at all, in the inside of it ? Would it be strange if no answer came ? would he have reason to say, " I wonder I am getting no reply ; other people, I hear, are getting answers to their letters, but I am getting none ?" Are not your prayers very much like something of this kind ? They are not addressed to God ; or they are like a blank sheet of paper neatly folded up, and addressed in a good hand ; but there is nothing in them, and so nothing ever comes of them. Like unaddressed letters, they are, as it were, sent to the " Dead-Letter Office," and come back as they went away, or are never heard of more ; or like blank letters, there is nothing to reply to, and so no reply is received.

Paul had many a time said prayers before,—oftener, perhaps, than most people now-a-days, for he was very attentive to outward duties ; and yet God says in our text to Ananias, " Behold he prayeth !" as if it had now for the first time been true of him—as if he had never prayed before. And so it was. He had often said his prayers—he had never prayed. What, then, is prayer ? You have it in the first word of Matt. vii. 7. Ask. You have it in Ps. l. 15 : CALL UPON ME. You have it elsewhere : " They cried to God." " Asking" is praying ; " calling upon God" is praying ; " crying to God" is praying. Look at yon sinking vessel. See yon mother standing on the wreck with her infant in her arms, and yon man clinging to a plank, and others holding on by a boat that has turned upside down, and cut off the last hope of not a few. Amid the loud whistling of the wind and the dashing of the waves, what is that you hear ? Listen ! above the sound of wind and wave, what shouting and bitter cries, " Help ! help ! Save me ! O save my child !" That is prayer. Or see that poor boy. The day is stormy and bitter cold ; he has been lying all night under the arch of a bridge, or in some common stair ; he has no home, no parents to provide for him, and he comes to your door to ask for help. He is more destitute and more helpless than the robin-red-breasts, that hop about our windows in winter. He is cold and hungry. How he pleads for some of your warm clothing to cover him, and some of your nice food to satisfy the cravings of his hunger : " Help a poor homeless boy. Give me a morsel of bread. Do not send me away." That is prayer. Or there is another : a palsy-stricken man, hardly able to walk, ill-clad, wasted and worn looking, unable to speak so as to be understood. He just stands before you, as much as to say, " Look at me ; see how poor and needy I am, how much I need your help ; and though I cannot ask it in words, this stammering tongue and trembling hand speak of themselves." That is prayer.

Dear children ! do not these describe your condition ? You are like the sinking, shipwrecked ones, perishing, going down to hell ; and you cannot save yourselves. Oh, will you not cry for help,—for deliverance,—for salvation ? " Lord, save me, save me ; I am perishing !"

" There is a dreadful hell,
And everlasting pains ;
Where sinners must with devils dwell,
In darkness, fire, and chains."

* From the " Golden Fountain ; or, Bible Truth Unfolded,—a Book for the Young" (and a very valuable one). By the Rev. J. H. Wilson, Edinburgh. T. Nelson and Sons.

Can you think of going there, without ever asking to be saved, without crying to God to deliver you? Such crying is praying. To pray is just to beg, and every praying child is a beggar. We are poorer than the poorest, and so we need to beg; and if we are like other beggars, there will be no want of praying. Prayer is speaking to God—to a real, living person,—as real as we are ourselves. True, you cannot see God; but he can see and hear you as really as those beside you can now. He is not far away,—he is close at hand! You have heard of the electric telegraph, how quickly messages go and come by it. You can send a message to London, or to any other part of the country, along those mysterious wires, and though hundreds of miles off, your friends will get it and send an answer to you in a few minutes. But God hears, when you speak to him, more quickly than even in this way, for he says, “Before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear.”

Now, how is it with you, when you pray? Do you feel that you are speaking to God, asking, begging from God, crying to God? What do you think of, when you seem to be praying? Do you desire what you ask? Is your prayer mere words, or is your heart in it? Is it something inflicted on you as a punishment? Is it a task which you must perform every morning and evening? Are you like the praying machines used in some heathen countries; the people writing prayers on pieces of paper, putting them into a kind of roller or barrel, and every time the roller goes round, reckoning it one prayer? Are you like a boy who was proud, because a lady who heard him, said, “How sweetly he prays!” and who, after neglecting his prayers for several days, repeated them over as often as would make up for the omission, lest something should happen to him,—but never really praying, till, when an old man, he felt himself to be a sinner, and cried to God for mercy? Is it a disagreeable duty to ask bread when you are hungry, or help when you are in danger? If you were condemned to die, would you not feel it a privilege to be allowed to ask the Queen for pardon? And will you not regard it as a precious privilege to be allowed to pray to God,—to tell him your wants, to cry to Him for help? If you have never really prayed before, begin to pray now.

Returning from his ways:
While angels in their songs rejoice,
And say, Behold he prays!”

WHAT SHOULD I PRAY FOR? There are two very good guides to follow in praying—the prayers recorded in the Bible, and the promises of God. Have you ever noticed the hundreds of prayers there are in the Bible? I could not tell you how many. The Book of Psalms is full of them; and God’s people in all ages—whether they have been young or old—have liked to take these prayers, and make them their own. You will find there prayers for every case. They are fit for children as well as for grown-up people. They are so short that any of you may remember them, and yet so comprehensive as to include everything you can need or desire. First of all, we have the prayer for a new heart, and this should be our first request, “Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me!” For pardon,—“Pardon mine iniquity, for it is great!” For salvation,—“Lord, save us, we perish!” For mercy,—God be merciful to me, a sinner!” My dear young friends, commit these Scripture prayers to memory, and make them your own,—pray them for yourselves.

And then another guide in asking aright is God’s promise. You are always safe in asking what He has promised. Take his own promise, and plead it with him. Remind him of what he has said, just as you would remind your father and mother if they had promised you anything. He wishes you to do this. He says, “Put me in remembrance.” Well, then, his greatest promise is the Holy Spirit, and he says, “He will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him,” showing that we are to pray for this blessing. It is the Holy Spirit—who (who is also God, equal with the Father and the Son)—who leads us to think about our souls and to seek their salvation; who shows us the evil of sin, and the wickedness of our own hearts, and the danger of being forgetful of God, and away from him. It is he who shows us Jesus as the very Saviour we need, who gives us the new heart, who enables us to understand the Bible and the way to be saved, who makes men holy and happy, and who prepares them for heaven. How blessed, then, are they who have the Holy Spirit! All the things in the world are not so precious as this; and for this, blessed be God, you are told to ask. What should I pray for? Pray for the Holy Spirit. What shall I say? “O Lord, for Jesus’ sake, give me thy Holy Spirit.” Do remember this, for nothing is so important. You might have all the wealth in the world, and yet, without this, you would have no peace, no joy—you would be miserable and poor.

Then there is that wondrous prayer,—“The Lord’s Prayer,” which we so little think of, and so little understand when we repeat it. Are you grieved, as you hear wicked children or wicked men taking God’s name in vain, or speaking amiss of the Bible, or the Sabbath, or the sanctuary, or anything that pertains to God?—“Hallowed be thy name.” Would you have the poor heathen to know about Jesus, and the wicked to be made good, and Jesus to be loved and honoured over all the earth?—“Thy kingdom come.” Would you be humbly submissive to the will of God, and have this earth to be liker what heaven is?—“Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven.” Would you have your bodily wants supplied?—“Give us this day our daily bread.” Would you have your sins pardoned?—“Forgive us our debts.” Would you be kept out of the way of evil, and preserved from bad company and bad things?—“Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil.”

Pray for your friends that they may be Christ's, that they may be saved, that they may be comforted in sorrow, that they may be made holy, and prepared for heaven. If you had a little brother drowning and could not help him, wouldn't you cry to those who could? And if you have brothers or sisters who do not love Christ or believe in Christ, will you not cry to God for them? How it grieves you to see your mother weeping,—how you wish you could comfort her, how you seek to dry the tears that run down her cheeks, even while you weep yourself! Perhaps you think, "If I were only a little older, how I would comfort my mother; I would stand between her and want; I would protect her; I would not suffer an angry word to be said to her; she would lean on my strong arm,—she would share my all!" And can you do nothing now? Yes, very much; you can comfort and help her now; but still more—you can pray for her. "Lord, bless my mother. Lord, comfort my mother. Lord, provide for, and protect, and care for my mother. Lord, be my mother's God as well as mine." When you see godless children around you, who have no fear of God, and no love to God, and no respect for the Bible or the Sabbath, and you think that speaking to them would do no good; still, could you not pray for them, that God would convert them, and give them new hearts, and make them what they ought to be?

And so, whatever you need, just go and tell God, as you would your own parents. Open up your heart to him. There is nothing too great to ask, and nothing so little as to be beneath his notice. For health and peace and comfort, for deliverance in danger, for help in distress, for relief when your heart is heavy, for direction when you don't know what to do—pray to God! Your precious soul should be your first concern, and if you have begun to think about your soul, you will be sure to pray about it. During the revival at Dundee in Mr. Mc'Cheyne's time, when so many were brought to Christ, the prayerfulness of the young people, both alone and together, was one thing very marked. You might have seen young boys kneeling together, sometimes in their own closets or in solitary places, crying for mercy. That was their first and most earnest cry, as it should be yours. "We will easily know if he be earnest," said one of them regarding another, "for then he will not need to be bidden to pray." Do you need to be bidden to pray? Nothing has been more remarkable during the recent outpouring of the Spirit, than the prayerfulness, especially of many young converts; "in everything" by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, making their requests known unto God."

Perhaps you would like to know how others, just such as you, have prayed. I find one boy, when he had come to feel himself a sinner deserving hell, crying out, like Peter when he was sinking in the water, "O Jesus, save me, save me." And afterwards, in directing others, I find him saying, "Go and tell Jesus that you are poor, lost, hell-deserving sinners; and tell him to give you the new heart." I hear another, five years of age, as he lay on a bed of sore sickness, praying, "Sweet Jesus, save me, deliver me." There is a third. His master is telling him the need and comfort of prayer; but he says, "Sir, I cannot pray, for I cannot read." "You could, John, use the short prayer of the dying thief, 'Lord, remember me.'" And now he is laid on a sick-bed, and as his master sits by his bed-side and reads God's word to him, he suddenly stops him and says, "Sir, if you please, I should wish to have you stop reading; I should wish you to hear that I can pray now." And then he says so simply and earnestly, "Lord, remember me! The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin. Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out. Lord Jesus"—but he gets no further, and with these words on his lips, he dies. Once more, there is a poor cripple, with little knowledge and few advantages; let us listen to his simple prayer: "O Christ, the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world, have mercy upon me, have mercy upon me. Wash me thoroughly from all my sins. Cleanse me from all mine iniquities. Clothe me in the spotless robe of thy righteousness. Sanctify thou my heart and life by thy blessed Spirit, that I may serve thee while here on earth, and be fitted for thy presence in glory. O Christ, hear my prayer. And do thou receive my spirit at the last, when it shall please thee to call it from this body of clay. Amen."

I merely give you these to show what they prayed for. You can find words for yourselves; you can speak to God in your own words. It does not need long prayers or fine-worded prayers. Only let them be the prayers of the heart; asking what you feel you need.

"Jesus, Saviour, pity me;
Hear me when I cry to thee.
I've a very naughty heart,
Full of sin in every part.
I can never make it good:
Wilt thou wash me in thy blood?
Jesus, Saviour, pity me;
Hear me when I cry to thee."

THE BIG AGATE.

In a small country village Dame Smith kept her toy shop. The village had not many people in it, but it had its full share of boys. Boys will have kites and tops and marbles, so the dame did a pretty brisk business.

One day, on her return from the city, where she had gone to lay in a stock of new things, she brought among the rest one large, splendid agate. This she intended for the centre piece of her marble box. She hadn't a notion that any of the village boys would buy it. She knew the length of their purses better than that. But she thought it would make a fine show in her window.

It was sure to be known among the boys whenever Dame Smith went to the city. Her shop was closed that day. They always watched for her to come back in the evening, and looked to see her get out of the stage and take all her boxes and bundles into the shop. Then, after she would go in and shut the door, they loved to scramble into the stage and search through the straw on the bottom, to see if by chance she had left anything. But I suspect they were welcome to all they ever found. Dame Smith knew well enough all she had brought. Hadn't she been reckoning over her packages, from the time she left the city, in order to be quite sure that they were all "on board?"

The morning after this particular visit to town, a good many boys went to school round by the way of the shop, that they might get the first look at the new things.

Dame Smith was ready for them. She had been up since sunrise, getting her window in order. She knew they would be there bright and early. She knew what to expect from boys, for she had been watching them ever since she had kept shop. Indeed, I don't believe there was a boy in the village about whom she could not tell you something. She rather liked to have a large party of them come in at once, for she never allowed them to be rude; in fact they were just a little afraid of her. She used to let them look as long as they liked at her things, and she meanwhile would watch their behaviour. Dame Smith was very fond of boys, and considered them the most pleasant sort of customers.

As I was saying, on this particular morning a good many boys went round that way, to get a first look at all the new things. They stood about the window, and crowded so close that the dame inside was rather afraid they might crush in the glass. But she didn't say anything. She had a good deal of patience with boys, and never liked to spoil their fun.

When the youngsters had spoken their minds about the different wares, and each had fixed upon the thing which he meant to save up his pennies to buy, they came to the big agate. They had thought they knew all the kinds of marbles there were, but here was something new. They wondered whether it were heavy, whether it would break easily, whether it would shoot straight, and all they could wonder about it. Their fingers ached to get hold of it. One boy proposed to go in and ask the price, but the rest said it was school-time now, and they could stop in the afternoon as they went home.

Bob Lee had said nothing while all this talk was going on. He had spied the agate the first thing, and had been counting in his mind how he might get it for his own. He very seldom had pennies to spend. His mother was poor, and her sixpences were precious.

Bob was the last one to leave the window, and the agate was the last thing his eye rested upon. Foolish boy! still to keep looking at a thing he couldn't have. Why didn't he try to think of something else?

That morning his lessons were poorly said. His thoughts were elsewhere. At noon, when the scholars went out for a romp, he strolled off by himself to a quiet corner of the play-ground, and sat down under a tree in ill-humour. He wondered why he should be so poor, and hardly ever able to buy what he wanted, while the other fellows so often had pennies to spend. He wouldn't go and play with the rest, which might have raised his spirits and made him forget his discontent; but there he sat and grumbled.

Presently he thought that, though it was not allowed by the master, he might slip out at the back gate, and go have another look at that dear agate. Slyly he ran off when the boys were not looking, and a few moments brought him again at the old lady's window. There, to be sure, was the wished-for agate, glistening in the noon sun. He looked and longed, then thought he would just step in and ask the good lady to let him take it in his hand. He tried the door. It was locked. "The old lady must be taking her dinner," he said. So back he went to the window. Suddenly he thought, "I might easily knock out one of these panes, and put in my hand and take it. The old dame's so deaf, she'll never hear me off in that back room." No sooner said than done. In a moment his handkerchief was wrapped round his fist, and handkerchief and fist went through the glass among the marbles. How frightened he was at what he had done! He surely expected to see the old dame rush out and take him by the collar. But no. The good lady was enjoying her dinner, without an anxious thought about her shop.

When Bob at last saw there was no danger, his courage came back. He felt as brave then as any coward. He picked up the agate, rolled it round in his hand a minute, then quickly thrust it into his pocket, and looked about to see if any one were near. Then off he ran to school, and was there again before the boys had missed him.

The dinners had been eaten while he was gone, and now the master rang the bell for the scholars to come in. As they walked toward the school-room they talked of the fine time they expected to have in the shop that afternoon. When Bob heard them his heart beat quick. He felt sure they would find him out. As soon as school was over he ran away home, lest the boys might ask him to go with them.

Great was the dismay of the party on reaching the shop to see the shattered window. Of course this was not a handsome window, and the shop was neither large nor fine; but it was the best of its kind in the town, and the best these boys knew about. So it seemed as great a disaster in their eyes as the breaking of an elegant city window would seem in yours. Besides, they were puzzled to know who was the breaker. They knew it must have been a boy. Boys do most of the window smashing. But all the town boys loved Dame Smith.

The party entered the shop. The old lady looked keenly at each one as he came in, then shut the door and stood before it.

"Who broke my window?" she asked.

"Why, we don't know, ma'am!" one boy said.
 "None of us fellows broke it."

"Which of you were here this morning?"

"All of us," they answered.

"Was any boy here this morning who is not here now?"

The boys thought a minute, then one of them cried out, "Bob Lee was here this morning, and is not here now."

"Did he know you were coming this afternoon?"

"Yes. We all said this morning we were coming."

"Don't let us say any more about it now," said the dame. "I feel pretty sure that none of you did it. Not one of you has the look of a thief. I forgot to tell you that my beautiful big agate is gone."

At this the boys opened their eyes wide, but said nothing.

"Come!" called the dame at length, "we won't let this spoil our pleasure. Come see the new things from town."

The boys had a splendid time looking over the entire stock, and those who had money to spend exchanged it for what they liked best. At length they bade "good-bye," and went scampering down the street to their homes.

When they were gone, the good woman sat down to consider what would be kindest and wisest to do about the bad boy.

At this moment the door opened, and Mrs. Lee came into the shop. Her eyes were red. She had been weeping. When she saw Mrs. Smith the tears came again, and she could not speak, but held out her hand, in which lay the agate. In a moment Dame Smith knew the whole story. She was distressed, but still tried to comfort the poor mother. She didn't begin by telling her that the agate was not worth a great deal, and wouldn't have been much of a loss to her; or, that now she had it back again all was right. Oh no! She knew that the fact of Bob's having stolen was sadder than the loss of a thousand agates. But she told the poor woman that this was probably the first fault of the kind which her son had committed. That perhaps if she should now faithfully talk and pray with him he might be led to feel sorry for what he had done, and ask pardon of God.

A good while the dame talked, and then the poor mother seemed less unhappy.

Mrs. Smith asked at length how she had found the agate.

Mrs. Lee said that after Bob came home from school that afternoon, he sat for a long time on the door step, very busy with something he had in his hand. What it was she could not see, as Bob's back was toward her. Presently, having occasion to pass out at the door, she attempted to go by Bob, when he seemed startled, and jumped up. As he did so, something rolled from his hand to the ground, and it was the agate! She was sure of having seen that agate in Dame Smith's window this morning, as she passed by on an errand. One look at Bob's face left her without a doubt that her boy had stolen it. He had no money to buy such a thing. So now she had come to confess his sin, and restore the stolen property. If it had been a thousand pounds Mrs. Lee could scarcely have felt worse. The sin of stealing was what grieved her.

And where all this time was Bob with his pricking conscience! Do you think he was happy? He was waiting at home for his mother, dreading to see her kind, troubled face, yet anxious to have her return. He felt wicked and afraid to be alone.

I am happy to say that when his mother did come, Bob went to her, and with many tears told how sorry he was, and begged her to ask God to forgive him.

How did Bob Lee come into all this trouble? He looked too long—then he coveted—then he stole! These are the three steps in that path of sin. The way to avoid walking on any road is to avoid taking the first step upon it. David made a good prayer—"Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity."

In the heart there is more of this sin of coveting than ever comes to the knowledge of men. But God knows it. He has said, "Thou shalt not covet." Ah, boys, beware! If Bob Lee had not coveted he would never have stolen.

THE SLAVES OF KING "FIRE-WATER."

I suppose that some little reader will wonderingly say, "Who is King Fire-water? and where does he live? Does he keep a great many slaves, and is he kind to them, or does he treat them very badly?"

And perhaps some little blue-eyed girl who has just learned her geography lesson, and somewhere on the map has traced with her rosy fingers those odd words, "Terra del Fuego," or "the land of fire," will venture a shrewd guess that this king with a very strange name lives somewhere in those regions, or perhaps where—as she has read in some pleasant story book—the sun drops like a great red ball into fair tropical seas, making them all one mass of rosy fire. But you are not quite right, dear Blue-eyes, for this king of whom I am going to tell you has a very great kingdom, and you may find his slaves in almost every land under the sun. There are some, I know, in the pleasant city where you live, and some on the sea-shore where you went last summer with your cousins. There are some on the wild western prairies, and some under the burning southern skies, and some sailing on the blue sea. You are sure to know them the minute you see them. The king does not dress them well. Their clothes are almost always tattered and worn, and their hats knocked in, and your little brother, who has only walked a fortnight without a chair, would feel much mortified to stagger about as they do. King Fire-water never gives his slaves anything to eat, but he has always ready for them a terrible drink—all poison and fire; and the worst of it is, he has taught them to love it, so although they sometimes see that they are growing thin and old, and wretchedly poor, and must very soon die, still they can never refuse it when it is offered, and, indeed, they are so crazy for it that they are willing to part with everything else they have in the world, rather than go without it.

Now, when I further tell you that this wicked king makes his slaves sleep in barns and station houses, and, oftener yet, with the miserable pigs in the gutter, you will wonder how he ever finds any one willing to come into his service. But this is the way he manages. When he sees a nicely dressed man whom he wishes to make his slave, he offers him a cup of his best poison. It looks so beautiful, "when it moveth itself aright," like water with a small piece of sunset dissolved in it, that the poor man thinks it must be very good. He drinks it, and feels so happy. He thinks he is the richest and greatest man in the world, and Fire-water is a good old king, who has been very much slandered. So he drinks again, and again, but all the while the cruel fire is steadily burning, and by-and-by he suddenly wakes up and finds that it has burned all his patience, and love, and strength, his pleasant home, and all his comforts, and he himself is one of the wretched slaves of King Fire-water. Sometimes he struggles very hard to escape from his tyrant master; but, alas! he generally finds himself bound by the strongest kind of a chain. There is a name I have given to this chain. Some people call it "Habii," and bad habits are the very worst chains to break that I ever knew. Dear Black-eyes—who have stolen back to the dinner table to see if there were any of that pretty red fluid left in the wine glass, and who mean to buy a cigar with your very next pocket money—be careful! Don't let such a chain get wound around you.

Now, I am going to tell you a true story about one of King Fire-water's slaves. He was a grown-up man, and had a wife and four little children—the eldest not more than seven years of age. He had drank so much of the king's poison, that all his money had been burned, and almost all his wife's and children's clothes, and what is more, the last loaf of bread in the house. Now, at the time my story begins, it was winter, almost night, and wretchedly cold. Sue, and Jack, and Sally, had been crying and fretting in chorus for more than an hour, and poor patient baby had nearly sucked off both his thumbs, when, oh, joy! mother came back with some bread and meat, and a little pan of coals. The little starved children had a famous supper, and there was enough left for breakfast. "If father only don't find it," cried Jack and Sue, and they hid it carefully away. Then locking the door very securely, the children with the poor mother, who was sick and lame, all went to bed to keep warm. They were very much afraid their father would come home, and once Sally cried out in a frightened voice: "Hark! isn't somebody coming?" But Jack answered drowsily, "It's only a window shutter, or the other family up stairs," and soon they were all sound asleep.

About twelve o'clock that night the poor slave was trying to get home. The king, who loves to torture his victims, had refused to give him drink without money, and so he was coming home as crazy and fierce as some wild animal. But the king had some work for him to do, and he said to his slave, "Your wife was busy drawing brushes to-day, and this is her night to be paid for them. You had better go home, and see if there isn't something to eat in the house, or maybe you can steal her money. Never mind if she is sick and lame, and your little children starving." So the slave reached home, and finding the door locked, gave it a great kick. The poor frightened wife heard him, but dared not let him in. But he was very strong and angry, and in a few minutes he burst open the door, and was in the room. Before the poor woman could speak he dragged her out of bed, and said,—

"So you dare to keep me out of my own room; I've a good mind to kill you!" and he looked at her with two eyes very much like those you've seen in pictures of great hungry tigers. Then he cried again, clutching her shoulders till they were black and blue, "Give me your money, and I'll let you go."

But she only sobbed, and begged him to have mercy. Then he pounded and beat her, for you know the goodness was burnt out of his heart, and at last when she almost fainted, he threw her out into a great snow-heap, and then fastened up the door with nails, so she couldn't get back.

He looked for the money in vain, and at last shook up Jack to make him tell where it was.

"I don't know, indeed, father," cried Jack.

Then King Fire-water whispered, "Their mother has taught 'em. They'll tell a lie for her any time. They love her a great deal the best."

The slave was mad with rage, and seizing the little warm sleepers, one after the other, he set them up in their scant night-dresses and bare feet, in a row against the wall. A very sorry little regiment they were, shivering with cold and fright. Poor baby tumbled over again and again, and vainly tried to comfort himself with his thumbs.

Then came the angry question, "Which do you like best—your mother or me?"

Poor little children! In their innocence and simplicity, the answer came in prompt chorus, "Mother."

The furious man seized an old stick in the corner, and began most unmercifully to whip his little shrinking children, one after the other, down to poor baby, who only cried gaspingly through his blue lips and little chattering teeth, "Mammy, mammy, mammy!"

The poor mother, almost wild at hearing her children's cries, tried in vain to open the door, then flying around to the window she arrived just in time to see the heavy blows fall on poor innocent baby's shuddering limbs, and she sent up a cry so shrill and piercing, that the neigh-ours' windows flew up on every side, and soon two or three strong men came to the rescue. They forced open the door, and the wicked man was caught, and tied down with strong cords.

King Fire-water never helps his slaves when they are in trouble—he only mocks and sneers. So when the judge said that the man must go to jail and stay there three months, there was no one to help him, or say a word to comfort him. Everybody was glad to see him go, even, I fear, his own little children.

Now, perhaps, you will think that when this slave comes out of prison he will be so angry with his old master, who has made him all this trouble, that he will try to break his chain, and will clear the ashes out of his heart, and ask God to put some new kindness and love in it, and will try to make a pleasant home for the wife and children who have been unhappy so long. But I cannot tell. King Fire-water is very careful that his slaves shall not escape, and his chains are very strong.

Dear Black-eyes and Blue-eyes! I know you will not have anything to do with this wicked king. You will always be afraid of the dreadful fire that may lie hidden in the bright crimson cup. You would rather drink pure water, bright and flashing like diamonds, the sweet cool water that comes up in the "old oaken bucket," or that you find bubbling up in the dim, old woods, and where, falling upon your knees, you scoop it up in your rosy palms—the nicest drinking cup in the world.

But you can do more yet. You must always be on the watch for the beginning of little chains. Give them a good pull whenever you get a chance, for they are always comparatively weak and easily broken at first.

PICKED BOYS.

SOME months since four bright boys were put under my care for the hour of Sabbath school. During the hour, as the returns were rendered for contributions to the missionary fund for the past year, it was found that the sum given by that class was more than had been collected from any other, and indeed so large that I expressed my astonishment.

"But," said one in reply, "we are all picked boys."

The expression pleased me in another sense, however, than the one they intended, and I caught at it as suggestive of a thought which I trusted they would not soon forget.

"Yes, you are all picked boys. As you came along to church, you passed many of your own age idly lounging, profaning the Sabbath. Why are you not like them? I see you anticipate the answer. Because you are all picked boys.

"Whose goodness picked you out, chose you, that you should be here learning of the glorious God, of a blessed heaven, and the way to win it; and not only that, but gives you the honour of helping others to obtain this knowledge, while many were left in ignorance and sin!

"You are picked boys—picked out for some special purpose. Ask yourselves every day if you are answering that purpose."

They listened with deep interest, for they were pleased with being "The Banner Class" in missions. "And now," I added, "as you claim to be picked boys, when you grow up to manhood, should God spare your lives, what should you all be then?"

They were not slow to say, "We should all be picked men."

"That is it. All your lives long, if any act of high moral courage is to be performed, any work of self-denying heroism to be undertaken for the glory of God or the good of your fellows, I hope you will always be picked men. At home, at school, on the playground, in business in after-life, you who have had so many advantages, and enjoyed so many privileges, should show the result in everything that is industrious, truthful, noble, conscientious, and high-principled.

"Picked boys! Chosen for some nobler purpose than merely to enjoy yourselves, or gather together the greatest amount of money; chosen to do great good all your life; chosen to stand like a rock against persuasion to do wrong or compliance with sin. Chosen! To whose mercy does that word make a demand for deathless gratitude? If God has chosen you, will you not now choose him?"

As they listened and seemed interested in the thought, I explained to them in simple words the great conflict on this earth between the enemies of God and the true followers of the Lamb, and the final and universal triumph of his people, for he is "King of kings, and Lord of lords." "And now if you would like to know what kind of people are the soldiers in this great battle whose victory will end in blessing the whole world, turn to Rev. xvii. 14.

They opened their Bibles and read, "And they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful."

Chosen and faithful! And the words lingered in the teacher's own ear as a solemn personal monition of heavenly choice and expected fidelity to important trusts.

WHAT SORT OF EYES!

HARRY often wished he could see Jesus. Often he looked up and down the street in the hope that he might be coming along. He would like to have been one of those children who got into his arms and received his blessing. He would like to have been in the ruler's house when Jesus raised his little girl from death.

Harry was a little boy who thought a great deal about his Saviour. When he was naughty he was sorry, because he knew his conduct would not only grieve his mother and his father, but his Saviour in heaven; and he tried not to be naughty—he tried very hard. He prayed for the Holy Spirit to make him willing, to make him desire above all things to be God's child; and he thought if he could only see the Lord Jesus, it would be much easier to be a good boy always.

One day the superintendent of the Sabbath school, talking to the scholars, said they could see Jesus with the "eye of faith." Harry, who was listening, was very much taken by that—"could see Jesus with the eye of faith. Oh, what sort of eyes are they?" the little boy thought. He forgot everything else the superintendent said. Perhaps he told what they were; but Harry was thinking out the matter himself, and not arriving at anything clear, he pushed up to his teacher and asked, "Are they big eyes, or black ones? Are they spectacle eyes?"

His teacher could not answer then, because she was hearing the lesson; but after it was through, she called Harry to her side, and asked him "who he was named after."

"My uncle Henry," answered the little boy with some surprise in his face.

"How do you know you have such an uncle?" she asked further. "You never saw him."

"Oh, I know it," said Harry; "I know it because he sends me things."

"How do you know that he sends them?" asked Miss Jay.

"Oh, I know, because he writes me," answered the little boy, "and his letters all say, 'From your affectionate uncle Henry.'"

His teacher looked as if, after all, the proof were somewhat doubtful. He saw the look.

"Oh, I know," persisted the little boy, "because folks have seen him there, and they told me; and if I grow up a good boy, he's promised to take me and do for me. Oh, I'm just as sure—as sure as if I'd seen him;" and Harry did look as sure as could be.

"You never saw him with your two bright blue eyes," said Miss Jay. Harry shook his head. "But you believe in him just as fully as if you had." Harry nodded. "Well, that is seeing him with the 'eye of faith,'" said his teacher. Harry's face flushed with a strange new thought. "That is the way we see Jesus Christ," she said. "Jesus sends us things. He gives us the sun to warm and light us, bread to eat, and clothes to wear. He has written to us; the Bible is his word. Other folks have seen him. Peter saw him, and John and Matthew, and they tell us what he did and said. And he promises to take us to himself in heaven, if we trust in him and do his will."

Harry listened with his heart as well as his mind. They were both wide open to receive instruction; and his teacher spoke slowly, that he might take it all in.

"Eyes of faith is seeing things with your heart," said Harry at last—"making you feel and believe just as if you're sure."

"Yes," answered his teacher, "that's it; believing, it sees God, and takes God at his word."

The little boy carried home with him a new and precious thought from the Sabbath school that day. It was a seed-thought, which he kept in his bosom; and he kept it so warm, and prayed so often over it the little prayer, "Open, O Lord, my eyes of faith to see and know thee, and love good and hate wickedness," that, like the Son of God when he was a little boy in Nazareth, he "waxed strong in spirit, and the grace of God was upon him."

THE BEST SCHOLAR.

"Who is the best scholar, or have you any best at your school?" I asked a group of school-girls.

"Lucy Towne," quickly replied three or four at once.

"What makes her best?" I asked.

"Oh, 'cause," bashfully answered one whom I looked at. As that proved nothing, I asked the others.

"She recites best," answered one.

"She's always ready, and never keeps the class waiting," said another.

"She never gets excused," said a third.

"She's never late," said a fourth.

"She keeps all the rules," said a fifth.

"She helps me," said the littlest.

"She's real nice at play, and never gets angry," said a seventh.

* Gethsemane meaning oil-press.

"And something else," said one who had spoken before.

"Ah, what is that?" I asked.

"Mother says Lucy loves and obeys God," answered the child.

The secret, then, of her being the best scholar is because she is God's scholar, and is taught by the Holy Spirit those precious lessons of penitence, humility, and love, which cannot but make her a good scholar in any school.

"How old is Lucy?" I asked, becoming much interested in what I heard of her.

"My age," said the chief spokesman, "twelve this month."

"I suppose Lucy studied all the time. I am sure I can't do that," some little girl says. But I found afterwards that Lucy had time for many things besides her books; for when she studied, she studied; and when she played, she played.

Her favourite place of study, in pleasant summer days, was the bank under an old oak in her father's garden. Here she used to go alone with her books, and before opening them she prayed to the Lord Jesus to help her to fix her mind on the lesson; and not waste her time over her books. So, if a lady-fly lighted on the page, she did not stop to talk to the lady-fly; or if a bird sung overhead, she did not attend his concert; or if a bee buzzed round a wild violet, she let it go about its business, and she minded hers. Thus, you see, things which usually tempt heedless children to idleness and inattention, had no effect upon Lucy Towne, because she was armed against them beforehand, by having a distinct purpose in her mind, and by prayer for grace to carry it out.

And I well know, if all the children in the school would become God's scholars first, be taught of him, mind his rules, and love his word, and learn his lessons, all the grumbling and fretting and crying which now cloud school life would pass off, and school become one of the happiest and busiest spots on earth.

CHRIST IN THE BOAT.

SOME time ago, a little class in Sabbath school, having finished their lesson, were looking earnestly at a print in a Children's Paper they had just received. It was that touching scene representing the disciples with Christ on the Sea of Tiberias. The wind had risen since they left the shore, and was swaying the sail almost into the water. A very high wave was dashing against the prow of the frail boat, and threatening the next moment to sweep over all.

One of the boys said earnestly, "What a dreadful storm. You can almost hear the thunder. How glad I am that I was not there."

Little Ally looked up from the paper and said, "I should like to have been in that boat."

"You would like to have been in such an awful tempest?" asked the first speaker in surprise. "Why?"

Ally replied simply, "Because Jesus was there."

It was a sweet reply. I have never forgotten it. I hope you will never forget it. To love to be near the Saviour, even in a storm! To love to be near him, because his presence can make us forget the tempest, and trust in him that when he thinks best he will hush the angry winds and waves. One of our charming hymns says,—

"With Christ in the vessel, I'll smile at the storm."

Those who love the company of Christ he will take, sooner or later, to be with him for ever. Ally did not have to wait long. A few days of violent suffering from fever, and last week he went to be with Jesus. That the blessed Saviour was with him in the heaviest storm that ever broke over this dear boy, we may learn from his dying words, "I love Jesus."

My dear child, would you like to have been in the boat with Jesus? Are you in the ark with him now? Do you love to think that he is near you? If you do, no storm, nor tempest, nor thunder, nor lightning can ever really harm you. The harder it blows, the sooner it will bring to the shore.

"There anchored safe, your weary soul
Will find eternal rest;
Nor storms shall beat, nor billows roll
Upon your peaceful breast."

MY NEW BIBLE.

AN aged convert from heathenism, a native of one of the Hervey Islands, some years ago received as a present a copy of the Bible. A few pages or chapters only had been given him before this, and he was greatly pleased in becoming the owner of the volume. After receiving it he said, "My brethren and sisters, this is my resolve: The dust shall never cover my new Bible; the moth shall never eat it; the mildew shall not rot it.—My light! My joy!"

Dear children, is not this a good resolution for you to make? Among the gifts bestowed by kind friends, every one of you has, I suppose, a Bible. Once it was your "new Bible," and it cannot be very old now. It would be a sad sight to see the dust gathering undisturbed upon it day by day, and moths making it their home, as it lay unnoticed in some corner of your shelf. Do you every day read some part of it, keeping in your mind that it is God's Book?

How sweet thus to become acquainted with Jesus, the children's friend. And then, I am sure it will not be long before you too can say of that blessed Book,—
"My light! my joy!"

THE ACCUSER AND THE ADVOCATE.

BY THE REV. CHARLES BRIDGES, M.A., RECTOR OF HINTON-MARTEL.

Zech. iii. 1-7.

IF we could see what is passing in the invisible world, there would be much matter for fear and trembling; still more for rejoicing confidence. Here, then, is the vision in a miraculous way put before our eyes. It is the cause of Zion pleaded in heaven against most powerful opposition, and with a most triumphant issue. The angel Jehovah (called Jehovah in the next verse) is the great and glorious Advocate. Joshua stands before him as the representative of the people of God. Like him, they are all "brands plucked out of the fire." Against them all the power of Satan is employed to resist. On their behalf the boundless grace of the Omnipotent Jehovah is called into exercise. Here, therefore, we have before us the resistance and the victory.

1. The Resistance of Satan—resistance from a quarter where we could not have expected it. Think of Satan standing in the accuser's place (see Ps. cix. 6, 7),—acting against us here even at the mercy-seat! Accused spirit! Well does every Christian know him to be his enemy! Through him evil first came into the world; through him it still holds its empire. All the hindrances in any good work, such as those which Joshua and Zerubbabel met with, we know from whence they come; and yet more, all the hindrances in our own hearts. There is the proof of his working still nearer and more painful.

But could we have thought that "the adversary" would have made heaven itself—the holy place, the dwelling of the holy God—the scene of his enmity? What! the very mercy-seat besieged with his ceaseless accusations? Yet so the Scripture represents it. God's throne is a throne of justice (Ps. lxxxix. 14); and justice requires that, ere the sinner can gain his cause, all that can be urged against him, as well as all that is in his favour, should be brought into court. Hence Satan's accusations must be heard; and they are always at hand. His name is "the adversary" (1 Peter v. 8). His office is, "the accuser of the brethren" (Rev. xii. 10). In the earliest times, "when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, Satan came with them" (Job i. 6). His pleas were in readiness against the patriarch of Uz (i. 8-12; ii. 1-8). In the text he stands forth against Joshua, and still does he present himself against the children of God, with a malignity as fierce as ever to resist us, when we are pleading before heaven's mercy-seat, or labouring with energy and perseverance in our Master's cause.

1. What was the matter of accusation against Joshua and his fellows, we may gather from the history. We read of their early zeal when they returned from the captivity, and laid again the foundations of the Lord's house. But the opposition of their enemies slackened the good work. Lukewarmness became the prevailing habit. Worldliness crept in, and with it unbelief. "Thus people say"—while living themselves in cieled houses—"the time is not come, the time that the Lord's house should be built" (Hag. i. 2-4). In this low and heartless state, do not we see how much material the great enemy had for his accusing work? But let us search closely near at home.

2. What may he not have to say against us? We do not clothe him with the omniscience of God; yet proof enough have we of him as a spirit deeply conversant with our hearts, thoughts, and purposes. In our natural state, awful indeed is our connection with him. He dwells, works, and rules within us—"taking us captive at his will" (Eph. ii. 2; 2 Cor. iv. 4; 2 Tim. ii. 26). And even when One "stronger than he" has cast him out, yet will "he return to his house, from whence he came out" (Luke xi. 21-24), hoping to find entrance there.

Mark his continued assaults upon the children of God—how he follows them in their business and their pleasures, in solitude and in society, to the house of God and in secret retirement. Everywhere the one object of our observant enemy is "seeking whom he may devour" (1 Peter v. 8)—to destroy the life of God in the souls of his people. Material for his accusation abounds. "If our hearts condemn us," much more he, who is so intimate with its unsearchable secrecies.

See how we are even in our best times, and in our best works. We can only come to the mercy-seat as Joshua, clothed with filthy garments. Well, therefore, may Satan accuse; and well may the accused stand confounded. Touch but the string of what God has to complain of in his servants, and what a train rises up before us! What a mass of sin? Instead of attempting to reply, the mouth is stopped. What shall we say? It is all true!—alas! too true! Conscience could add even more.

What, then, is the result? Does the opposition succeed? Is the cause lost? Is the poor self-condemned criminal cast away? Very different. When Satan accuses, Joshua does not stand upon his own defence. A better Advocate appears for him—the Judge from heaven: "He shall not fail, nor be discouraged. He shall send forth judgment unto victory" (Isa. xlii. 4; Matt. xii. 20). We can oppose no name but that of the great Advocate. The cry goes upward, "O Lord, I am oppressed! Undertake for me!" (Isa. xxxviii. 14.) The cause shall be carried through safely, yea, triumphantly. "The adversary" brings in his accusation to condemn. What is the answer? "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us" (Rom. viii. 34). We pass on to consider more fully—

II. The Triumphant Victory—Satan's rebuke—"The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan!" There is no denial of Satan's accusation. The Advocate's language, as before (see Amos iv. 11), is as strong as could be used. Such degradation!—such danger! Nothing short of a miracle could have saved. "The righteous is but scarcely saved," though surely saved (1 Peter iv. 18)—saved indeed, but not without deep afflictions, severe conflicts, Omnipotent help. What a setting out is there of sovereign grace and love! Be Satan ever so clamorous, God never gratifies him with a hearing. All his accusations are answered by free and gracious election. Even the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem rebuke thee! Canst thou hinder the adoption? Canst thou alter the election of God? Here is the yearning of infinite tenderness—it cannot forget the object on which it had once rested. Here is the display of unchangeable faithfulness—"Having loved his own that are in the world, he loveth them unto the end" (John xiii. 1). The doctrine of free grace is the mightiest weapon against the malice of Satan. God admits no charge against his elect. "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?"

If I am to be saved by any merit of my own, the want of this merit will at once condemn me. But where all is of grace and free gift, no amount of guilt can ever condemn where the perfect righteousness of the incarnate God is freely imputed.

Every way, therefore, the deliverance is complete. The Babylonish furnace is the figure of our security (Dan. iii. 25; Isa. xliii. 2, 3). He brings us through it—"through fire and through water, unto a wealthy place" (Zech. xiii. 9; Ps. lxvi. 12). I claim my property in them. Apostate spirit! they are not thine, but mine. Have I begun to deliver, and shall I not perfect it? Can I be weary of showing mercy, so long as thou art unwearied in showing mischief?

But, observe the strength of the affirmation—Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire? Thou knowest it is. Thou canst not deny it. I rejoice in him as "a pattern of my long-suffering"—a monument of my grace—the object of my Father's love and mine—a rebel overcome—a wanderer brought home—a sinner saved by grace—a child of wrath made a child of God. Accuse him thou mayst; condemn him thou canst not; destroy him thou shalt not. Once plucked out of the fire, and cast in again! The result is, "the accuser of the brethren is cast out" (Rev. xii. 10). Joshua stands accepted before God.

Observe the stamp and seal of his acceptance. He had stood before the angel clothed with filthy garments. For, not only his open sins, but his very "righteousnesses are filthy rags" (Isa. lxiv. 6). But a better covering is prepared for him. "Go," spake the Lord to those that stood before him, "take away the filthy garments from him. And unto him he saith, Behold I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee; and I will clothe thee with change of raiment." Gracious mark of acceptance upon every child of God! the robe "washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb" (Rev. vii. 14). Such a covering of our guilt that even the Lord's piercing eye "bath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, nor seen perverseness in Israel" (Num. xxiii. 21).

Nor is this any loose and licentious doctrine. Never does the gospel realize acceptance to the people of God, save in the way of holiness. Hence the seal of acceptance was followed by the command, "Let them set a fair mitre upon his head"—the priestly mitre, with the golden letters emblazoned on it,—"Holiness unto the Lord" (Exod. xxviii. 36). Not till the free gospel has spoken pardon and peace, is the true work of holiness laid open. The selfish spirit now melts to love. A new life begins to shine with heavenly brightness. The heart, before entangled in vanity, is now fully for God. There is an instant response to the call of service—"Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" (Acts ix. 6). The "live coal from the altar" warms the inmost soul with the glow of real devotedness. The answer is prompt to the call—"Here am I; send me" (Isa. vi. 5-8). And now comes the grand consummation—grace preparing for glory, grace perfected in glory—"Whom he justified, them he also glorified" (Rom. viii. 30). The same hand that plucks out of the fire brings to the temple. There the mitre marks out the "royal priesthood, the holy nation, made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light" (1 Pet. ii. 9; Col. i. 12). Hence the gracious promise,—"If thou wilt walk in my ways, and if thou wilt keep my charge, then thou shalt also judge my house, and shalt also keep my courts, and I will give thee places to walk among those that stand by,"—among the glorious attendants on the Son of God, the cherubim and seraphim, the angelic hosts around the throne. Joyous prospect! Wonderful grace to a polluted sinner, once a very brand in the burning, now not only saved from the burning, but walking in the high places among the company of the blessed!

1. And now look once again at this brand in its original state, its fearful condition—the danger of everlasting banishment from God! Under this tremendous load of guilt and misery does the unconverted sinner lie, with but a step between himself and "wrath unto the uttermost!" Did he but know how he is "heaping coals of" everlasting "fire upon his head," how he is wrapping the poisoned garment of condemnation round his own soul, by his wilful choice of separation from God! But, alas! none can realize the danger of an unconverted state, save those who have been plucked out of the fire. Sinner, what will be your need of pleading advocacy, when you stand before the "great white throne?" A thousand witnesses are ready to accuse and resist; and what if there be no advocate to plead, no shelter from wrath? Oh, to realize the misery of being brands left in the fire! When the purposes of Divine grace shall all of them have been completed—when heaven shall have received its countless multitude of ransomed souls—what will it be to see all these immortals plucked from the ruin of the fall, and you yourselves left to perish? And think how near to you may be this hour of recompense—this last hour of the forbearance of God. And think how many have been sealed up in impenitence for "the damnation of hell." Oh, prize your privileges and opportunities while they remain to you; improve them while they keep, as it were, the door open for you. Who knoweth but that at the last the stamp may visibly be declared—"Sealed unto the day of redemption?" (Eph. iv. 30.)

2. But, plucked out of the fire, still the marks of the fire remain. The Babylonish miracle has never been repeated—to be in the fire, and yet "the hair not singed, nor the smell of fire not passed upon them" (Dan. iii. 27). With us the marks of fire will be found on the brand to the last. The sinner, though he becomes a saint, remains a sinner still. The old sores break out afresh; the conflict only ends with the last breath of "the body of this death" (Rom. vii. 24). Till then "the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and we cannot do the things that we would." Still we "find the law" in its full activity, "that when we would do good, evil is present with us" (Gal. v. 17; Rom. vii. 21).

3. But with all these "fightings without, and fears within," the ground of confidence is triumphant. Does Christ suffer Satan to resist his Church? Yet will "he be a wall of fire round about, and the glory in the midst of her" (Zech. ii. 5). If Satan goes to and fro to destroy (Job i. 7), Christ has his angels going to and fro to protect (Zech. i. 10, 11). If Satan has four horns to scatter the Church, Christ has his "four carpenters to fray them, and cast them out" (Zech. i. 18-21). Whatever poison there be with Satan, He is the omnipotent cover from the evil. Satan is the destroyer, Christ the saviour; he is the tempter, Christ the succourer; he is the accuser, Christ the advocate; he is "the prince and god of this world," Christ is the King of saints, and the Lord of glory; he is a serpent for cunning (Gen. iii. 1), a lion for strength (1 Pet. v. 8), a dragon for malice (Rev. xx. 2). Yet Christ has a name that meets this fearful array of might and malice. He is the "Counsellor," and no subtlety of the serpent can deceive him; "the mighty God," no strength of the lion can overcome him; "the everlasting Father," no malice of the dragon can be above his fatherly tenderness. And in all these he is wonderful, ordering and guiding his wisdom as a cover for his harassed people (Isa. ix. 6).

4. Nothing can be more complete than the eternal security of his people. If God will not hear the blood and intercession of his dear Son, if Satan can pluck the Advocate from the right hand of God, if he can tear away His compassionate faithfulness from his bosom, then—not till then—shall the penitent sinner be cast in his suit, and lie down in despair.

5. Yet never think yourselves secure against his assaults. "He departed from" the tempted Saviour only "for a season" (Luke iv. 13, with xxii. 53).

6. Beaten off, he will come on again. Oppose with unceasing prayer. "Pray with all prayer, with all perseverance in prayer" (Eph. vi. 18). Stand and stand again, "and having done all, stand" (Eph. vi. 13). Remember, we are born conquerors—at least, new-born so. The victory takes its date from our new birth (1 John v. 4). We stand conquerors to the end. The victory is proclaimed. The Advocate and Judge pronounces the criminal innocent, and in the face of men and angels makes public testimony to his righteousness. How confounded will Satan be, who, as the great accuser, had threatened him with the terror of this day, and now finds the day of darkness and gloominess changed into the bright sunshine of everlasting acceptance! "The rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth: for the Lord hath spoken it" (Isa. xxv. 8).

BIOGRAPHY.

JOHN ANGELL JAMES,

THE APPRENTICE AND STUDENT.*

A BIOGRAPHY was not needed to tell the present generation how John Angell James lived and laboured with his glowing heart, and eloquent tongue, and pen of an earnest Christian writer. There have been great and good men who have lived unknown, and only broken from under the cloud as their sun set. Their own generation failed to recognise a prophet in its midst. Their life was a struggle with an adverse lot, and their hour of death the beginning of their usefulness and fame. Angell James lived through half a century, amongst the best known and highly honoured of a long roll of illustrious nonconformist contemporaries. He found his place in his day, and no man was more fully or justly appreciated. Amongst his contemporaries there were men more eminent for special gifts. Hall stood alone in the eloquence of his pulpit, John Foster in depth of thought, Jay in the rich sententious utterances of a devotional spiritual mind. Angell James embraced the gifts of all, though not in their distinctive eminence. Few minds were more complete, took in a wider circle of ability, or possessed a greater practical power of turning all to immediate working account. His mind touched the living world at many points. All his capacities were of current value, his assets realizable for the immediate discharge of the obligations of his high calling, and for the demands of his ardent and benevolent spirit. A man who united in himself the qualities of a great preacher, an eloquent platform speaker, an indefatigable pastor, and of an effective, instructive Christian writer; and who added to these a social, affectionate nature, with a commanding, massive personal appearance, an expressive eye, and a richly modulated voice, which bore the words of the orator from heart to heart, could not but gather around him the love and sympathy of his generation. It needs no record of what it knew and felt, and has engraven in thoughts deeper than memory. And yet this preacher, with his many elements of popularity,—eloquent from the first, and devoted in heart and mind to the glory of his Master, had his early struggle, his novitiate of seven years, during which he spake with few to listen, in which he learned humility from empty pews, and to sympathize with brethren whose life is a conflict with the difficulties of a narrow lot and a circumscribed ministry.

The "Biography of Angell James," now published, and executed with an ability that will secure for it a first place amongst its class of memoirs, will preserve to the generations that are to come the life it so happily records. It will continue to repeat and enforce its great lesson, that human talents are never so truly great as when they reflect the honour and are spent in the service of Him who gave them.

The early destination of John Angell James was not to the ministry. Though his mother was a woman of eminent godliness, she does not appear to have marked in her boy the germs of the future preacher, or to have suggested or desired his dedication to the ministry. Her pious care and prayers made an early and deep impression on John Angell's mind. Her custom was to take her children one by one into her chamber to be alone with herself and God. On these occasions she prayed with them and over them, urging them with a mother's tenderness and love to yield their hearts to the Saviour. The memory of these first lessons was never erased, and to his latest years James gave thanks for a Christian mother. Like other distinguished ministers and missionaries of our time, he began life apprenticed to a secular employment. The list is a remarkable one of those who, in recent years, have risen from the ranks to the position of commissioned officers in the army of the Church. Daniel Wilson, the metropolitan of India, was bound seven years to a London silk merchant. Raglan, the Cambridge fellow and devoted missionary of Tinnevely, served till his twentieth year in his uncle's house in Liverpool. Morison, of Chelsea, was a Banff watchmaker's apprentice. Mackay, the martyr of Delhi, whose high promise was cut short at the first outbreak of the Indian mutiny, was a working stone-mason. The loving, self-denied, single-hearted David Sandeman was called to his higher work when training to business in a Manchester warehouse. Though not of the schools of the prophets, grace separated these men to the ministry; and their subsequent academic training but filled their quivers, and gave point and polish to arrows for which their bows were already bent.

At the close of James' brief school life, when thirteen years of age, he was apprenticed to a draper at Poole, in Dorset,—a man whose business practices and formal family religion, were little fitted to produce a favourable impression on the character of his young apprentice. (Of himself at this time he says, in his autobiography, "I was a careless youth, except at intervals when a serious thought would cross my mind, and a remonstrance of conscience would disturb my tranquillity. I never despised or ridiculed religion, but always had a respect for it. My mother's example and prayers did, I daresay, occasionally come to my recollection. . . . Sometimes, on a Sunday, I would go by myself and pray. I wanted to be pious, but knew not how. I believe God the Spirit was then striving with me. I made no effort to quench his motions in my soul; but, at the same time, I took no pains to nourish and strengthen them, and it was rich grace in him that he did not leave me. Feeling the difficulties of my situation, I prayed that the Lord would raise up some one in the house to be my guide. I am sure I was sincere in this." His prayer was answered, and a guide sent in the person of a fellow apprentice, and subsequently in that of a poor cobbler of the town of Poole. Neither preacher nor evangelist startled his slumbering conscience, or proved the interpreter, the one in a thousand, to guide his steps in the way of life. At a certain stage of a young man's history, the preacher is out of the circle of his sympathy. A word from one of his own age, or the living word of a companion's example, is the weapon that subdues him. John Angell James slumbered till aroused by the example of a junior apprentice on his knees.

On the occasion of the first evening of a young apprentice entering the sleeping apartment, he observed him kneel down by his bed-side and pray in silence. It was not needful that James should have heard the words. He was rebuked and emboldened by the deed, and henceforth resumed his own practice of prayer. "I shall ever have reason to bless God for this act of Charles B——," is his brief, memorable record of an incident that was the hinge of a great change. Learning that Charles was in the habit of visiting a pious cobbler after the business of the day was over, he sought permission to accompany him. There was nothing prepossessing in the appearance of the cobbler or his wife, and their house was small, mean, ill-furnished, in a low situation, and not overly clean. But he found in both what he wanted. The man and his wife were eminently pious and communicative. Religion had elevated and refined their characters. In their manners there was a gentleness and softness above their rank. Though a rigid Calvinist, the cobbler had none of the dogmatism, captiousness, or pride of the Antinomian party, then so prevalent in England. In his house James found his first school of divinity, and his training-place for public prayer. The first prayer he ever uttered, save in the secrecy of his own chamber, was in the fellowship meeting gathered under the humble roof of this early guide. The occasion was too memorable not to be noted in his autobiography. The record shows how considerate the cobbler was of the feelings of the young convert, and wise in his suggestions for allaying the apprehension of mis-carrying in the exercise. "In order," says James, "to take off all fear from my mind he requested me the first time I prayed to go and stand in a small place that was boarded off, in which coals and other matters were kept. Here, in this dark corner, I stood to pour out an audible prayer for the first time with a fellow creature." This was the budding-season of the young convert's religious life. It was accompanied with no pungent convictions of sin in its earliest stage, no poignancy of godly sorrow, no great and rapid transition of feeling, nor even with any very clear illumination of knowledge. Angell James's religious character was a growth rather than a revolution,—old things passed silently away. A new formation arose with its new order of things without a visible preceding catastrophe. There were the clear evidences of a change, but not the convulsion that has so often searched and shaken souls in a season of conversion. His delight from that time was in prayer; alone, in the shop, or riding into the country on his employer's business, he could not help pouring out his heart to God. His joy was in the company of the Lord's people. They became his chosen companions, and in their circle he found his happiness. Reviewing at an after period his religious character during its earlier stages at Poole, he remarks with great ingenuousness, "I now see it was strangely imperfect. It was too much a religion of imagination and the feelings. I courted, and not unfrequently enjoyed the luxury of weeping under sermons. The mellifluous tones of Mr. Durant's musical voice, like the breath of heaven passing over the strings of an Æolian harp, swept over the chords of my excitable heart and set them all in motion; but I was not sufficiently aware of the functions of conscience that religion is a universal thing, dictating how everything is to be done, and following us with its commands, constraints, and warnings into every department of action, my judgment was not sufficiently enlightened as to the motives and extent of duty, nor my conscience sufficiently tender as to its performance. I did many things which I now see to be wrong, and left undone many things which I now see to be right."

It was whilst actively employed as a Sabbath-school teacher that his thoughts were first turned to the ministry. He became conscious of an aptitude to teach. His religious friends encouraged his aspirations towards a more extensive sphere than his weekly class of boys; and though his father at first opposed his abandoning business, his reluctance being overcome, the youth was enrolled a pupil of Dr. Bogue, at Gosport. At the time of his entering college he was not a member of the Church; he had not even been baptized; the views entertained by his excellent mother preventing his baptism in infancy. The order of the Church was certainly violated in his being accepted as a candidate for the ministry before he was even baptized as a Christian. But his acceptance in that character did not precede the evidence of his possessing the faith of a Christian. The great law was still inviolate, that demands that the preacher speak from faith to faith. Received into the college, he was baptized by Dr. Bogue in the presence of a large assemblage of the Church, and immediately thereafter admitted into full membership.

The literary and theological studies of Gosport at the time of his admission, were of the most meagre description, and James's previous education did not compensate for their poverty. During his early school course he was more remarkable for feats of physical strength than scholarship. He was a bright, merry boy, with exulting animal spirits, and a kindly generous temper; first in the rough fun of the play-ground, in the practical jokes so dear to thorough English lads, and not unwilling to show his powers at a stand-up fight; but books were not his favourites. A schoolfellow in after years, inquiring what had become of him, and learning that he had turned out an eminent Nonconformist minister, exclaimed in wonder, "John Angell—what! thick (Dorsetshire for that) thick headed fool—why, he was fit for nothing but fighting!" Reading, writing, and accounts, with two years' drill at Latin, the benefits of the latter being pretty well effaced by the subsequent Poole apprenticeship, was his preliminary preparation for the Gosport institution. On his entrance he was introduced at once into a class in the middle of a system of divinity, deep in the mysteries of Jonathan Edwards' "Freedom of the Will." He was expected to master that treatise, and to reflect the commentaries of his professor upon it in his notes and exercises. We are not surprised that, in recalling his college novitiate, he should assure us that to a youth who had just left the counter, who had no previous habits of study, and who had gone through no process of mental training, the volume of Edwards proved a pons asinorum. "To tell the truth," says James, "I did not and could not pass over it, so I tumbled over the side of the bridge into the water, and narrowly escaping drowning, scrambled up the bank, and got into the road again, with the rest of the train a little further on." Even after he found himself in the train, its progress was neither rapid nor quite in the direction his inexperience in study required. The institution wanted labourers, and a consequent subdivision of labour. The conduct of its studies mainly devolved on one man; a man of large mind and noble heart, and who had drunk in his theology from Owen, Howe, Turretine, and Edwards. But Dr. Bogue stood alone. Though his tastes and acquirements had been as decided in scholarship as in theology, he could have done little for his pupils in the department of general or classical literature, or even in the more strictly professional department of Biblical study. The college was improvisatore to meet an exigency of the times; a school for missionary training and sound theological study. It sprang from the zeal and liberality of the Haldanes, and was sustained by their beneficence. Its meagre intellectual training was strongly felt by James throughout his subsequent life. Yet Gosport left its profound impression on his mind. In the college were eight missionaries preparing for the foreign field, from whom he caught the inspiration that breathed in after days through his stirring missionary appeals from the pulpit and the platform. Morison, the distinguished China missionary, was of their number; a man remarkable even while at college. Studious beyond most others; grave almost to gloom; abstracted—somewhat morose, his appearance communicating to all around the impression of a mind absorbed in the contemplation of his mission; an object that seemed to swell into a more awful magnitude and grandeur, the nearer he approached to its direct work. James remembered his coming to him at one time, when his mind was greatly depressed, and with child-like simplicity inviting him to go aside, that they might pray together, when they retired to a chamber, where he poured out his burdened spirit, and was heard in that he feared. With what truth James adds the reflection, "How would it lighten our cares and troubles thus to commend each other to God, while it would give a strong and sacred cement to our friendship, and prove to us, in the fullest sense of the expression, the blessedness of the communion of saints." Was it not that hour of fellowship with Morison, and of their united fellowship with God, that drew from the heart of James, nearly forty years afterwards, that burst of sacred eloquence, "The voice of God in China," which had its response from British Christian hearts in an offering of two and a quarter millions of Bibles for that land!

Superficial as was the education of Gosport, there can be no doubt that it formed and determined the great principles of James' theological belief. It introduced him to the old divinity, and gave him a relish for the writers of the great age of English theology. From the first he was planted on the good old paths of the Puritan fathers, and no novelties in theology could subsequently turn him aside. He thanked God, towards the close of life, like Jay, "that he had been kept from whims." To his substantial Gosport fare may be traced this happy and continuous theological health. Even to the insufficiency of his early college discipline, the Church to which he belonged owed his zealous advocacy, at an after period, of a more thorough theological education. Alive to his own defective training, he was amongst the foremost to vindicate for the students of his denomination an education that should place within their reach the highest scholarship, and the fullest intellectual culture; and not a few of the ministers of the present day can tell with what wisdom and love he watched over, in his later years, the rising college of Springhill. It may be questioned how far a fuller and more exact academic training would have been in harmony with the essentially free and fervent character of his eloquence, and whether he would not have lost in force what he might have gained in precision. He seems to have apprehended that such might have been the result, from a remark he drops in his autobiography: "Perhaps," he says, "if I had been trained to logic and metaphysics, I should have been spoiled as an effective speaker." He escaped, at least, the danger of being educated out of nature, though he never failed to regret that he had not been educated more fully; and even after grey hairs were upon him, he was all but ready to have taken his place once more on the college benches. With unfeigned humility, and the self-knowledge of a truly great man, and in beautiful consistence with his uniformly expressed sentiments, he thus refers, in his autobiography, to his own disadvantages, yet to the service he had nevertheless been able to render to the Church by his writings. "When I think," he says, "of the advantages enjoyed by the students of our own times, and recollect that they have, in some cases, six years to pursue their studies, I could almost weep to think of my own disadvantages. When I see what men are now presiding over the studies of our colleges, it seems to me as if now I could gladly go and sit down at their feet to repair, at the approaching end of my own course, the disadvantages I suffered at the commencement. No man has ever been more conscious of his defects than I am of mine. No man ought to have more excuse made for him than myself. It is not surprising that I cannot write in such a pure classic style of elegance as those who have had a more perfect education. How should I? Yet, through God's most abounding goodness, I have not been idle, or useless, or unknown; I have become an author of works—neither few, nor neglected, nor unblest—written in good, plain, dramatic Saxon language, and most of them written but once. To me my course is more wonderful than anything I have ever known; I mean, that one so partially educated, so limited in his attainments, so confined in his knowledge, should have assumed a standing such as has been assigned to me in this extraordinary age. Instead of lifting me up with pride, it humbles me in the dust; for, in addition to my original defective education, I have had the disadvantage, as I may call it, of having been placed in a situation so public, and requiring such constant demands upon me, that I have had little time for reading and study, and for thus making up my original defects."

To preclude the possibility of the college becoming a quiet seed-time to himself, he was placed before he was two months at Gosport on the preaching list, and sent a sowing amongst the rural and village congregations. Bishop Heber has a touching poem on a British oak dwarfed in India by the ceaseless stimulus of her blazing sun. A youth seventeen and a half years old, after a two months' college attendance, subjected to the stimulus of a preaching tour, is in a like perilous condition. Denied his season of hibernation, his time for gathering strength for after growth, he is in danger of proving but a dwarfed product. It indicates the vitality of James' powers that he bore this ordeal. Though he suffered for years from the process, he did not sink under it. Less than two years wound up his college course; and at its close, an invitation to spend four Sabbaths at Birmingham introduced him to the scene of his future ministry. It was with no thought that that busy centre of manufacturing industry was to be his home for life that he alighted from a Birmingham coach, on a Saturday evening in the midsummer of 1804, to the great relief of the deacons of Carr's Lane congregation, who, in despair of his arrival, had made their anxious round of the inns of the town, inquiring for the young preacher. Young indeed! not yet nineteen years of age, and whose complement of college training had been one year and a half. Yet that youth had not filled up his short engagement of four weeks before the grave men of Carr's Lane felt they could not let him go. He was the man for their Church, sent to repair its ruins, and reassemble its scattered members. If they were disappointed for a season, it was that a richer, fuller harvest might crown their hopes. They had not misjudged the man. They only expected too much from the youth—to reap before he himself had sown. A call to the pastorate being accepted, John Angell James entered upon the charge of the congregation; "where," as his biographer remarks, "his usefulness won for him the noblest and most enduring fame; and where tens of thousands whom he taught to trust in the mercy of Christ, and to keep his commandments, will regard him with immortal love and reverence."

The features and work of that ministry we reserve for another paper.

A VISION.

Gloomy and black are the cypress trees,
Drearily waileth the chill night breeze.
The long grass waveth, the tombs are white,
And the black clouds flit o'er the chill moonlight.
Silent is all save the dropping rain,
When slowly there cometh a mourning train;
The lone churchyard is dark and dim,
And the mourners raise a funeral hymn:

"Open, dark grave, and take her;
Though we have loved her so,
Yet we must now forsake her,
Love will no more awake her:
(Oh, bitter woe!)
Open thine arms and take her To rest below!

"Vain is our mournful weeping,
Her gentle life is o'er;
Only the worm is creeping,
Where she will soon be sleeping,
For evermore—
Nor joy nor love is keeping
For her in store!"

Gloomy and black are the cypress trees,
And drearily wave in the chill night breeze.
The dark clouds part and the heavens are blue,
Where the trembling stars are shining through.
Slowly across the gleaming sky,
A crowd of white angels are passing by.
Like a fleet of swans they float along,
Or the silver notes of a dying song.
Like a cloud of incense their pinions rise,
Fading away up the purple skies.
But hush! for the silent glory is stirred,
By a strain such as earth has never heard:

"Open, O Heaven! we bear her,
This gentle maiden mild,
Earth's griefs we gladly spare her,
From earthly joys we tear her,
The undefiled;
And to thine arms we bear her,
Thine own, thy child.

"Open, O Heaven! no morrow
Will see this joy o'ercast,
No pain, no tears, no sorrow,
Her gentle heart will borrow;
Sad life is past;
Shielded and safe from sorrow,
At home at last."

But the vision faded, and all was still
On the purple valley and distant hill.
No sound was there save the wailing breeze,
The rain, and the rustling cypress trees.

HOURS WITH LIVING PREACHERS.

I.—THE LONG-SUFFERING OF GOD.

THIS slowness to anger, this long-suffering or forbearance on God's part toward those who provoke him every day, and in the face of all their provocations, what, it may be asked, does it particularly declare concerning him, that he should thus claim it as a part of his excellent greatness?

It declares, in the first place, his power. He has no need to hasten his work, lest if he do not execute a sentence at once, he may not be able to execute it at all, the offender in some way or other eluding his grasp, and escaping beyond his reach. There can be no fugitives from his justice who fills heaven and earth, to whom all the ages and all the worlds belong. What he does not punish now, he can punish by-and-by; what he does not punish here, he can punish there; what not in this world, in the next. He is, in the words of the Psalmist, "strong and patient;" patient, because he is strong, because all power belongeth unto him. What need for him to be in a hurry? He may well defer his anger who has all time and all eternity in which to work out the counsels of his will, whom none can escape, being as he is Lord and absolute disposer of men alike on this side of the grave and on the other.

But the long-suffering of God declares better things than these, tells of attributes in him more glorious even than his power. It is a declaration of his love, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. Here is the true secret of Christ's forbearance with sinners. He knows what powers of the world to come are at work in his Church for their conversion, and, being converted, for their perfect restoration to spiritual health and strength; the efficacy of that blood which he once, and once for all, shed upon his cross, the prevailing might of that intercession which he is evermore carrying forward in heaven. He knows the effectual operation of the Holy Spirit in quickening those that were even dead in their trespasses and sins. He knows how the man who is standing out the most obstinately against him now, who is most fiercely in arms against his own blessedness, may to-morrow throw down his arms, yield himself vanquished, and suffer himself to be led, like Paul, a trophy and captive of the divine power and love through the world.

And as the eye of the cunning lapidary detects in the rugged pebble, just digged from the mine, the polished diamond that shall sparkle on the diadem of a king; or as the sculptor in the rough block of marble, newly hewn from the quarry, beholds the statue of perfect grace and beauty which is latent there, and waiting but the touch of his hand,—so he who sees all, and the end from the beginning, sees oftentimes greater wonders than these. He sees the saint in the sinner, the saint that shall be in the sinner that is; the wheat in the tare; the shepherd feeding the sheep in the wolf tearing the sheep; Paul the preacher of the faith in Saul the persecutor of the faith; Israel a prince with God in Jacob the trickster and the supplanter; Matthew the apostle in Levi the publican; a woman that should love much in the woman that was sinning much; and in some vine of the earth bringing forth wild grapes and grapes of gall, a tree which shall yet bring forth good fruit, and wine to make glad the heart; so that when some, like those over-zealous servants in the parable, would have him to pluck it up, and to cast it without more ado into the wine-press of the wrath of Almighty God, he exclaims rather, "Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it," and is well content to await the end.

And even where this proves not so, where the riches of that grace and long-suffering appear to have been spent in vain, wasted upon obdurate sinners, who despise those to the last, still the manifestations of that grace and long-suffering shall not therefore have been for nought. They shall have served their purpose, and if not that purpose which he most desired, which was nearest his heart, namely,—that of bringing men to repentance and to life—if not that, yet another; I mean that of clearing the righteousness of God. For God, in his infinite condescension, is not content with merely being just and righteous in all his ways; he desires to approve himself such, and that his justice and righteousness and goodness should so plainly appear to all the world, so lifted above all cavil, that none should be able, with the least apparent grounds of reason, to call it in question. And thus, in regard of the final condemnation of wicked men, and that severe and terrible doom which he shall one day execute upon them, he will be clear when he is judged; every mouth shall be stopped. No one shall be able to say that the long-suffering of God had not waited for him; or that, however guilty, he had, like the wretched Haman, been hastened and huddled to his doom (Esther vii. 8-10).

So far from this, nothing is more remarkable than the slow advent of the divine judgments. The king's wrath may be as messengers of death, but because it is so, therefore it is long before the King of kings suffers his whole displeasure to arise. Note, I beseech you, the way in which he warns before he threatens, threatens before he strikes, strikes lightly before he strikes heavily, strikes heavily before he causes that blow which shall leave no room for another to descend. Note how this is so everywhere, in Scripture, in the lives of others, and in your own. Note it in Scripture. If God brings in a flood on the world of the ungodly, it is only after his long-suffering has waited for them while the Ark was a-preparing (1 Pet. iii. 20); and though his Spirit, as on that occasion he declared, should not always strive with man, "yet his days," that is, his days of grace, "shall be an hundred and twenty years." Again, "the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. xv. 16); therefore they are allowed still to abide in the land, and their excision root and branch is for centuries deferred; they must fill up the measure of their sins before their judgment can arrive. The guilty cities, Sodom and Gomorrah, cannot perish before God has gone down and seen whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it (Gen. xviii. 21); words spoken after the manner of men, yet with a blessed truth behind them, that, namely, of the extreme deliberation with which the divine judgments proceed. And this patience, this long-suffering, this deliberation, they are, as I have said, if possible, for the salvation of man; and if not for this, if he is resolute to perish, if he has made a covenant with death and hell which he will not break, then for the vindication of God, that he may be justified in his doings, and clear when he is judged.—R. C. Trench, D.D.

II.—"THIS IS THE VICTORY THAT OVERCOMETH THE WORLD, EVEN OUR FAITH."

WHAT is the representation here made of our position? We have an enemy. That is plainly said. Every one of us, who has any of the hopes or aims of a Christian, has an enemy, whose existence, whose ceaseless activity, may well trouble and alarm him. We cannot escape from him. It is a foe of our own household. It is a foe with whom we are compelled to associate every day. The world; the things that are seen; the present state; the life that is, with all its cares, its interests, its pleasures; this is our enemy. We do not speak in a fantastic, unreal, or exaggerated sense; we are not counselling a morbid fear of things which God has created for our use and for our enjoyment, as though a serpent lurked in each, and made its very touch deadly. But we do know, every one of us, that, taking the present state as a whole, the world in the aggregate of its influences upon us, it is not a friend to our highest good, if our highest good be that which God seems to represent it to be in his word of revelation. Let yourself alone but for one day; surrender yourself but for one day to the guidance, to the operation upon you, of your world, less or greater; move about in it, listen and talk, work and enjoy in it, for one day, without any counteracting and countervailing power consciously evoked and appealed to within; and where would you be at the end of that day? Should you be nearer to, or further from, the goal of life, if that goal be a heavenly one, if that goal be the love of God, the attainment of a divine rest, a spiritual happiness, and an eternal home?

It is thus that we must test the world, and not by any lower or more arbitrary standard. If this strange complicated thing which we call our being, ourselves, is ever to know unity, repose, complete satisfaction, all its parts having attained their object, and consciously resting in their perfect joy; if this is the hope which Christ came to inspire in all who will have him for their Saviour; then that must be our enemy which tends to distract and to unsettle us, to turn off our attention from the aim of life, and to bid us find or seek repose in this thing or that thing which is either doubtful of attainment, inferior in nature, limited in extent, or brief in duration.

The world is our enemy, on the supposition that we have any aim or any hope beyond it. Not otherwise. The world is our friend, if all we have ever to look for is bounded by the life that is. If we do not believe in Christ, if we do not desire to be with him, if we do not wish above all things so to live that that hope, of being with him hereafter, may not be interfered with; then we cannot do better than get all that this world has to offer us; make peace with it, adopt its principles, claim its friendship, sue for its rewards; else shall we be losing both worlds, the world that is and also the world that shall be.

But this is not so, avowedly, with any of us; God grant it be not so really. We do wish, every one of us, to get safe to heaven. If by any one great sacrifice or great exertion we could secure this, I do not believe that there is one person in this congregation who would refuse or hesitate to make it. I scarcely believe there is one here present who would not willingly lay down even this precious life that is, for the certainty of a sure and instant entrance into a world of safety and of immortality. But it is not thus that our warfare has to be waged. Rather is it by a protracted, a wearisome, often a desultory process that we must make our way; by wakefulness, by discernment, by discretion, by being always ready, by being patient of delay and disappointment, by a willingness oftentimes only to stand and wait, by experience dearly purchased, by rising sadder and wiser from painful falls, by making an onward step when we can, but more often by hardly refraining from a backward one, by being ever prepared to find real foes of fancied friends, or to see the mountain-side, which seemed but now empty and untenanted, bristling on the sudden with armed enemies; it is thus that the Christian conflict is waged; and many a man who could have nerved himself for one brief decisive struggle, however sharp or unequal, fails, faints, and at last deserts, amidst the ceaseless and less heroic exertions by which he must fight his way into the kingdom of God in heaven.

The world; that is our foe. Sometimes the world is made but one of three foes, the flesh and the devil being added to it. But, like each of these also—like the flesh, like the devil—it is sometimes made to embrace all that opposes the Christian warrior. It is the flesh which gives entrance to all; it is the devil who directs and uses all; but the world furnishes the material of all. The world contains everything that can either tempt or harass; and the victory of the Christian, like the victory of Christ himself, is then completed, when he can say, without enumerating aught else, I have overcome the world.

Now, therefore, we can understand why the apostle should sum up the whole of our victory in the one word faith.

So long as our eye is steadily fixed on One above, so long as we set God and Christ really before us, so long as we retain the unshaken recollection of God's being, and of his right over us, and of his having spoken to us and loved and redeemed us in his Son, so long the world is powerless to entrap, to seduce, or to terrify. But, alas! here is our weakness, that we look off from God: the spirit is willing; the day begins well; the prayer of the morning is earnest and effectual; the blessing has descended as we knelt; the heart has been warmed, the spirit refreshed, the mind strengthened, the will firmly resolved; the communication is open and we have used it; we think, as we rise from prayer, that, though all should be offended this day, yet shall not we; though all should prove unfaithful to our divine Lord, yet shall we surely follow him even if it were to prison and to death; but the flesh is weak; duty itself calls us back into the things that are seen and temporal, bids us work, bids us mix with men, bids us play a manly part amongst the people of our generation, bids us come forth and not hide ourselves in the seclusion of an indolent contemplation: and the result of all is, that, long ere the day is at its height, we have lost the dew of its morning; the world is with us, and we with it; God is in heaven, and we upon earth, and between us and him there is already a great gulf fixed. Then the very least of temptations may assail us successfully; our strength has departed from us, and man, left alone, cannot but fall. At night, with great difficulty, we force our way back across the barrier which has been interposed; but it is to remember with shame and sorrow how often we have fallen; how much we have walked by sight, how little by faith; how slight a trial has been too great for temper, for humility, for kindness, for charity; how little has been said or done for God's glory, how much for vain-glory, for self-indulgence, for men-pleasing!

My brethren, well might this and every sermon end with the three words, Let us pray! Yes, let us all pray. How little do we know, till we heartily try it, not only the benefit, but the happiness of prayer. God is very near us; we are not straitened in him. God would have us pray in order that he may answer. He needs not words; he knows what is in us, our sins, our weaknesses, our desires, our wants, even before we ask; yet he would have us ask, he would have us open our hearts to him, he would have us confide in him, that he may comfort, that he may soothe, that he may strengthen, that he may bless. In the evening, and morning, and at noon-day, will I pray, and that instantly: and he shall hear my voice. O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come.—C. J. Vaughan, D.D.

III.—ENTER INTO THY CLOSET.

"ENTER into thy closet." In the great cathedral at Rome are ranged a number of confessionals, closets of carved wood for penitents of every language. You see inscribed with gilt letters over one, Pro Italica Lingua; over another, Pro Flandrica Lingua; on a third, Pro Polonica Lingua; on a fourth, Pro Illyrica Lingua; on a fifth, Pro Hispanica Lingua; on a sixth, Pro Anglica Lingua. In each instance, the father confessor is waiting in secret to hear the secrets of penitence. A modern writer, having thus described this arrangement, tells us that one who witnessed it "was impressed with the infinite convenience—if we may use so poor a phrase—of the Catholic religion to its devout believers."

But "infinite convenience, if we may use so poor a phrase," belongs rather to the religion of that suppliant who, when his heart is breaking, has no need to wait until he can kneel on some consecrated pavement, no need to wait until he can prepare language, no need to wait until he can reach a distant priest, whose soul may be more ignorant, stained, and troubled than his own; but who, in every hour of every night and day, in every spot on sea or land, may find a closet in which the Infinite Father is listening for whatever the overburdened heart may murmur, speak in what native tongue it may—a Father who not only hears the spoken prayer, but sees the prayer that is too deep for speech.

By the word "closet," the Saviour is understood to convey an allusion to the room in the ancient Jewish dwelling, which was set apart for the office of lonely prayer. Yet, as "stone walls do not a prison make, nor iron bars a cell" for the soul, neither are they, nor any material boundaries answering to them, essential to make the soul's closet of devotion. Even the Jew who lived in the dullest age of ceremony felt this. "The angel said unto me," writes Esdras, "Go into a field of flowers, where no house is builded, and pray unto the Highest continually" (Esdras ix. 25). Abraham found a closet, when, arched in the waning twilight of the grove, "he called upon the name of the Lord." Isaac found a closet in the silence of the fading fields at eventide. Jacob found a closet in the solemn darkness of the night. David found a closet not only in "the chamber over the gate," but in the chambers of the forest and the rifted rock. Jesus found a closet, when, high up in the tranquil mountain air, the morning star found him where the evening star left him, "alone, yet not alone." A closet for the spirit is whatever helps to close the spirit in from all distraction, and thus make it feel alone with God.

meaning. It means more than mental seclusion in some unexpected place and time. You may have fugitive, uncertain snatches of opportunity for secret prayer, even in the "dusky lane or wrangling mart." When most in the world, you may have occasional power to sequester the spirit, to forget the mere surroundings of existence, and even amidst the crowd of crossing voices to find "secret silence of the mind;" you may often, as if by accident, even when in "the press" of London streets, thrill with a sense of the Saviour's nearness, may "touch the hem of His garment;" and then, for the moment, the soul will be in a "closet;" but, disciple, it is not "thy closet." "Thy closet" is the soul's own fixed, familiar place of resort for communion with God. It may be hill or hollow; chamber, or secret wood-path, or the walk over the sheet of sea-side sand; no matter, but it must be thine own. The Saviour assumes that each disciple has some such habitual retreat, the shrine of his most blessed recollections, the place where the soul feels most at home, enjoys its Sabbaths, its hours of vision, and its walks with God. This is what he means by "thy closet."

"Enter into thy closet," is the invitation to which you must now give heed. By foresight, by contrivance, by the power of resolute, severe punctuality, "enter into thy closet." Enter it every day. If such an arrangement can be made, enter it, sometimes, as Doddridge often entered the old vestry at Northampton, and as many a Puritan ancestor entered his own "holy of holies" to spend long hours of devout seclusion there. In many words, in many ways, the Saviour is still urging his ancient invitation, "Enter into thy closet." In moments of intense life, moments when you realize the soul more than the body, moments when you seem suddenly and magnetically conscious of the presence of "Him who is invisible," and when, quite unaccountably, you long to pray; what is this strange religious susceptibility, and what are these desires after God, but his desires after you moving in your heart,—the clear touches of his living Spirit, the whispers of his "still small voice," saying, "Enter into thy closet!" When sad with indistinct premonitions of calamity, when struck down by some blow which benumbs your natural promptitude of thought, you instinctively turn to the Almighty for help, and the All-wise for guidance,—when, after the elements of true piety, which are the elements of true prayer, have been hardened in a worldly atmosphere, they are brought into fusion again by the fire of adversity, and all your glowing soul, "melted within you because of trouble," flows forth to God; what is this but the voice of Christ through affliction, saying, "Enter into thy closet?" "Come, enter thou into my chamber, and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast." By his word, by his Spirit, by his afflicting strokes, by his ministers, and now, by this silent page, he says, "Enter into thy closet."—Rev. Charles Stanford.

THE REFUGEE.

NORTHWARD of the great plain of Hindostan rises the mountain chain of the Himalayah, which gradually ascends till its loftiest peaks attain the height of more than twenty-eight thousand feet above the level of the sea, wrapped in perpetual snow. As may be supposed, much of this mountainous district is uninhabited: in some comparatively sheltered spots, however, are to be found villages, peopled by a bold, fierce, and hardy race of Asiatics; ignorant also, and uncivilized.

Into one of these villages, many years ago, entered a solitary traveller. He was toilworn and travel-stained, and his condition so far excited the compassion of the natives that they willingly gave him what he most needed, food and shelter for rest.

The traveller was not a man of their race or language, he was a European and an Englishman. This was easily gathered from his complexion and general appearance: it was easy also to perceive from his dress and manners that the stranger was a person of some consideration. But he was travelling alone. Alone he had traversed the broad plain, and threaded his way through its swampy borders at the foot of the mountains; alone he had climbed them from stage to stage, to the spot which he had reached where his strength had given way.

How long a time these wanderings had occupied, whence the traveller had come, whither he proposed to go, and how hitherto he had subsisted on his journey, the villagers did not know.

Days and weeks passed away, and the stranger was yet among them. His strength was partially restored, but he gave no sign of departure; and the Indian dialect in which he spoke to the natives was unintelligible to them. At length, however, by signs rather than words, he made known his wish to remain among those by whom his life had been preserved, and by whom he had been hospitably treated. His request was tacitly granted: it was not much, probably, to allow him a patch of mountain slope for rude cultivation, and a site on which to raise a hut for shelter; and thus the civilized Englishman was, without opposition, domiciled among the rude mountaineers. His habitation was a mud-walled cabin, roofed and thatched with grass; and his subsistence was obtained by the occasional labour of his hands, or by the trapping of animals.

Years passed away, and the mountain village was still the Englishman's home. He had never left its neighbourhood, or descended to the plain; and when, as sometimes happened, strangers entered it, he remained concealed, or absented himself until they were gone. It was natural for the villagers to make comments on this strange behaviour on the part of their guest, to argue that he must have been guilty of some crime among his own countrymen, by which his life had become forfeited to justice; but whatever were their suspicions, they did not withdraw their hospitality. What the stranger had been was nothing to them: he was harmless now.

And the nameless man never enlightened the dusky natives of the village as to the cause of his voluntary or involuntary self-banishment from his countrymen. In process of time, he could converse with them in their own tongue, but he rarely cared to prolong a conversation, and never let it be directed to his own past history.

Meanwhile the unhappy recluse (for he was evidently unhappy) was sinking lower and lower into the degradation of savage life. With a body unoccupied, except by the efforts required to provide for the merest necessities of life, and with nothing to detach the mind from these pursuits, excepting the probably unwelcome remembrances of a past wasted life, he became like those around him, and not only adopted their customs, but fell into their vices. All, or almost all traces of his original superiority were lost; his countenance was haggard, his hair matted and filthy, and his body neglected and scantily clothed in the mean garb of the natives.

One summer, an Englishman of military rank entered these mountain regions in quest of health and change of scene. Attended by a slender retinue of servants, and conducted by a native guide, he journeyed on from day to day through the mountain passes, ascending higher and higher, until he reached the village above mentioned. The white face of the officer attracted curiosity; for the visit of a European to that secluded spot was of rare occurrence; and, either forgetful or careless of their now naturalized guest's anxious and morbid desire for concealment, the natives informed their visitor through his guide that the village contained another white man who lived even as they lived, and who had been fifteen years a dweller on the mountains. Impelled by curiosity, and, as was soon to be proved, by a higher motive, the English officer sought the miserable abode of his fellow-countryman, and looked in at its low entrance.

There sat the nameless man, savage alike in aspect and demeanour, and seeking to hide himself from the inquisitive and pitying gaze of the visitor, while alternately commanding and entreating him, in language scarcely intelligible, to go and to leave him in peace. It was evident that anger and fear were struggling in the mind of the refugee; and it needed the kindest and the gentlest persuasions, combined with solemn assurances of good will, to draw forth the wretched man from his lair.

At length, however, the compassionate officer gained so much on the confidence of his unhappy countryman, as to induce him to disclose his name and the motives which had led to his exile. He was the son of an English gentleman, he said, and had come out to India in the expectation of making a rapid fortune. He had obtained a government appointment which might have led to this result; but temptations had been thrown in his way, to which he had yielded. He had plunged into reckless extravagance, had disgraced himself and his name, had in the course of a few years squandered his means, lost his situation, and at length awoke from a dream of infatuation to find himself a ruined prodigate, hopelessly in debt, and threatened with a debtor's prison, while those who had been his companions in sin and excess of riot abandoned him to his fate. With degradation thus staring him in the face, and help or sympathy nowhere to be found, the miserable man had fled from the pursuit of law, determinately casting himself off from civilized life; and having found an asylum with the people among whom he dwelt, he desired only to be left in peace.

"This is very sad," said the compassionate visitor, when he had possessed himself of these details; "and can you, my poor friend, be content with a life of privation, such as you now live, a mere animal existence, without aim and without hope?"

"What would you have me do?" demanded the refugee gloomily and evasively.

"Return with me to —,"

"Return! return to be scoffed and despised: probably to be persecuted by unrelenting creditors; to end my days in prison; or, at best, to witness happiness in others which is lost to me for ever, and refinements which I can no longer share! No, leave me. You have promised not to harm me. I claim your performance of that promise."

"I will not further urge you," said the sorrowing visitor, when he saw, or fancied he saw, in the frenzied expressions of the unhappy man, symptoms of incipient insanity, with which it might be dangerous to tamper: "but has it never occurred to you that, while you were fleeing from man's justice, and from the consequences of debt undischarged, there is another debt you owe, and another tribunal from which there is no escape?"

The maniac (for so he might almost have been termed) glared fiercely at the speaker. "What do you mean?" his looks expressed, if not his words.

"Do you not know," returned the Christian officer, gently and soothingly, "of whom it is said, 'Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea: even there shall thy hand lead me; and thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me, even the night shall be light about me.'"

The countenance of the wretched man was slightly agitated as these words fell upon his ear; but it was only for a moment. It became fixed in insensibility, and thus it remained while the compassionate evangelist, with earnest solicitude for one so apparently lost and beyond the reach of all ordinary appliances of the gospel, spoke of a debt which, remaining uncanceled, must consign him to everlasting banishment from happiness and God, and pointed out the way of escape from the wrath to come.

The effort to arouse the slumbering intellect and comprehension of the self-made savage seemed vain.

Perhaps he scarcely listened to the appeal; or it may be that the language in which it was couched—so unaccustomed to his ear—required too great an effort of the enfeebled mind to be understood. So thought the Christian stranger, as he watched the object of his solicitude; and when, after earnest prayer, he rose from his knees to witness the same evident obduracy and utter indifference of aspect, his heart sank within him. "Twice dead: plucked up by the roots!" was the feeling which predominated in his mind when he prepared to leave the miserable cabin.

He did not withdraw, however, without one more attempt to rekindle the dying embers of intelligence in the self-abandoned man, or at least without putting the means of instruction within his reach. He had with him a few religious tracts; and these he placed in the hands of the refugee, entreating him to read them. He then went on his way, with the impression deeply fixed on his mind that for one so utterly lost to self-respect, and so sunk in low and vicious habits, there could be no hope.

* * * *

Two years passed away, and the Christian officer once more ascended the mountain, and, arriving at the village, he directed his steps towards the hut, the solitary inhabitant of which had often, in recollection, been present to his mind. In the interval which had elapsed, he had not been idle on behalf of the poor fugitive. Guided by the clue obtained on his former visit, he had retraced the unhappy man's history, and had sought out his family connections, who had naturally long mourned for him as dead, and who joyfully received the tidings of his existence. And now the benevolent visitor was charged with the pleasant task of conveying to the exile assurances of a loving welcome to his home in England, of restoration to society and the position from which he had fallen, and of the discharge of every pecuniary claim against him.

And yet the steps of the traveller were slow, and his mind was troubled. The refugee yet lived, he knew; for this he had ascertained; but what could he expect to find in him but the same moral and mental wreck, yet more hopelessly broken and battered, over which he had mourned two years before. Probably, the mind, then trembling on the balance, had received its final overthrow; or the nature, then so degraded, had become ferocious.

It was with feelings of almost unmingled sadness, therefore, that the visitor approached the refugee's hut; and so absorbed was he in these thoughts that he failed to perceive, what he afterwards saw, a marked and striking change in the aspect of this mountain home. But his reflections were interrupted by a joyous cry of recognition; and before he had recovered his self-possession, his hand was grasped by his fellow-countryman, from whose eyes were flowing tears of gladness.

"You are come again! oh, I cannot speak what I feel; but I feared I should never see you again; and yet I have hoped and prayed."

Prayed! did the Christian visitor hear aright? Had the poor wretch really prayed? prayed for anything? "And are you indeed glad to see me?" he asked, with much emotion.

"Glad! Have I not cause to be glad, sir, when by your means salvation was brought to such a one as I?"

"And is it so, indeed?" demanded the visitor. "Have you truly found salvation?"

"By the precious blood of Christ,—sin forgiven—my great debt paid. Yes, I hope it is so, indeed," exclaimed the poor solitary.

"But how?" asked the officer, scarcely knowing what he said.

"It was this," replied the refugee, leading the other into his cabin, and placing a well-worn but carefully preserved tract in his hands; "it was this dear little book which reminded me of the love of God in sending his Son into the world to die for sinners, even the chief; which told me of the willingness of Jesus Christ to receive, pardon, and bless all that come unto God by him; which assured me that, to be saved from everlasting punishment deserved by my sins, I must go to him for mercy: and that even now, at the very last and lowest time of guilt and misery, might be the accepted time, and the day of salvation."

The Christian officer looked at the tract; it was very plain and simple, but it told of man's need and God's mercy. He remembered it as one of those which, almost hopeless of result, he had given to the then debased and miserable wretch before him. But the seed he had thus sown, weeping in soul, had sprung up; the man so utterly lost, almost to a sense of shame, and living a death-like existence, as one among the tombs, was now "clothed and in his right mind," and sitting at the feet of Jesus.

A few months later still, the Christian traveller and the rescued refugee were in earnest and deeply affecting conference in the residence of the former in British India.

"Think well of it, my friend," said the officer. "There are those at home who will gladly receive you. Ease and comfort for the remainder of your life—which may not be long—await you. You have endured privation and suffering; nay, you are suffering now. Will you not return to England?"

The restored penitent shook his head, and tears glistened in his eyes. "I thank my friends, indeed I thank them," he said; "and I love them: but I love my Saviour, and I must work for him. Here, here, where I reviled and opposed him, dishonoured his name, and brought disgrace and ruin upon myself by my sins; and there, where those poor ignorant mountain villagers gave me a home when I was a poor wretched wanderer—here and there must I be to tell the blessed story of God so loving the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life; and to proclaim the faithful saying which is worthy of all acceptation, 'that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.'"—Protestant Churchman.

BIBLICAL TREASURY.

I.—THE HEBREW DAY AND YEAR.

IN the present age, when time is so accurately measured by clocks and watches, and every movement regulated almost to a minute, we have difficulty in conceiving the simple and general way in which it was observed by the nations of antiquity. Their only time-pieces were the heavenly bodies—the sun, the moon, and the stars—set in the firmament to divide the day from the night, and be for signs and for seasons, for days and for years. The genial climate of Palestine, and the generally bright and cloudless skies, invited the Hebrews to be much in the open air; and their simple pastoral and agricultural life afforded them constant opportunities of marking the apparent course of the sun in the heavens by day, and of the moon and stars by night. In what is, perhaps, the most ancient poem in existence—the Book of Job—we have mention made of Orion, the most magnificent of all the constellations; of the Pleiades, or cluster of stars, to which the arm of this ancient hunter is pointing; of Arcturus, that conspicuous star near the constellation of the Great Bear; and Sirius, or the Dog Star, the most brilliant of the whole, which was fixed on by the Egyptians, under the name of Sothes, as pointing out, by its appearance in a particular part of the heavens, the commencement of one of their great astronomical cycles.

The first and most obvious division of time is that pointed out by the sun. From sunset to sunset, "the evening and the morning," formed the day of the Hebrews. At first, the division into hours does not seem to have been resorted to. Day was divided into three portions—morning, noon, and evening—night into three watches. It is only after the return from the Babylonish captivity that hours begin to be mentioned; and Daniel uses this term as fixing the time when, after the trumpets sounded, the people were to fall down and worship the golden image of Nebuchadnezzar.

The natural day from sunrise to sunset is universally adopted among Eastern nations, and this period is divided into twelve parts or hours. But it is only at the Equator, and a short space on each side of it, that these hours can be permanently of equal length. As the latitude increases, the period from sunrise to sunset is constantly varying—the day lengthening in summer when the hours consequently become longer, and shortening in winter when the hours become proportionally shorter. In the latitude of Palestine the longest day is about fourteen hours, the shortest day twelve hours, of time measured by a common watch. And thus the hours of the winter day are one-third shorter than those of the summer. The Hebrews reckoned their first hour at sunrise; so that at the mean or equinoctial periods their third hour corresponded to our nine o'clock A.M., their sixth hour to our twelve at noon, their ninth hour to three o'clock P.M., and their twelfth hour to our six P.M. This mode of reckoning appears to have been long in use, and well understood in the time of our Saviour. "Are there not," says he, "twelve hours in the day?" But at this period, too, and probably introduced by the Romans, the mode of reckoning by the common or civil day seems also to have been well known to the Jews. In the account of the trial and crucifixion of our Lord, the evangelists Matthew, Luke, and John mention the hours of the civil day; while Mark reckons, in the first part of his narrative of this event, by the natural day: "And it was the third hour, and they crucified him."—the third hour here, reckoning from sunrise, corresponding to the ninth hour of the other evangelists. Indeed, in the subsequent part of the narrative, Mark reckons by the civil day, and thus coincides with the other narratives in stating the death of the Saviour to have taken place "at the ninth hour."*

The night was divided at first into three watches—the evening, the midnight, and morning; but afterwards, especially after the Romans had introduced to the Jews their military regulations, the night was divided into four watches of three hours each—the first watch commencing at sunset, the next at nine o'clock, the third at midnight, and the fourth at cock-crowing or three in the morning. These four periods are thus alluded to by Christ: "Watch ye therefore: for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning,"—thus specifying the terminations of the different watches, or the periods when the guards were relieved.

The moon exhibiting her varied phases in her revolution round the earth pointed out another division of time; and the new moon marked some important Jewish festivals. The period from new moon to next new moon, embracing twenty-nine and a half days, formed the Hebrew month. Twelve of these lunar months formed the year, which thus consisted of only three hundred and fifty-four days; but in order to include the days that remained over, a month was added or intercalated every third year, which consisted of thirty-three days, and was called Ve Adar. But even with this addition the year falls short of the real period, measured by the earth's revolution round the sun. The beginning of the civil year of the Hebrews, the month Tisri, was in August or September, according as the new moon fell within either of these months. The beginning of the sacred year, marked by the occurrence of the great feast of the passover, fell towards the end of March or beginning of April, and which was also regulated by the occurrence of the new moon.

The week of seven days was one of the earliest divisions of time, and may be said to be a moral division, as it is not indicated by natural appearances. But though thus pointed out to mankind in general, the Sabbath of rest, so admirably suited both to the physical and mental requirements of humanity, became almost peculiar to the Hebrews, no such observance having been kept up by the Pagan nations of the world around them. And down to the present day, the week terminated by its sacred day of rest is still peculiar to Christian communities, and unknown to all others.

The Hebrews divided the year into four seasons, but in the latitude of Palestine these seasons differ considerably from those of Europe. "The harvest is over, the summer is gone," would appear to us in Western Europe as a misplacement of the seasons, and yet as applied to Palestine it is literally correct, drawn as all the illustrations of Scripture are with the utmost accuracy from nature and from life.

In that genial climate wheat and the cereal grains sown in winter or early spring, come to maturity in May, so that the harvest is actually finished before the extreme heats of summer commence. In the climate of Palestine there are six months in the year, from May to October, in which rain rarely falls,—indeed, in the clear unclouded skies of June, July, August, and September, rain is almost unknown. The "early rains" commence in October, and continue to fall gradually during November and December. The greatest amount of rain-fall is in January and February, and then it moderates in March, April, and May, thus forming the "latter rains." Taking an average of nine years, the annual amount of rain which falls in Palestine has been estimated at sixty-four inches. Of this quantity one-half falls from October to January, forming the "early rains," and the other half from February to May, constituting the "latter rains." The spring forms the most delightful season in Palestine, with a mild, serene, and moderately moist atmosphere. In this season every kind of vegetation makes rapid progress; innumerable flowers blossom in the valleys, and the corn and fruits of the earth press on quickly to maturity. The summer and autumn are dry and hot, with all the characteristics of a tropical climate. The winter is open, but chill and moist, January and February, as we have seen, being the months of greatest rain-fall. Thunder storms are not unfrequent, such as we find vividly pictured in Psalms xviii. and xxix. by the accurate observations and beautiful touches of David, the sweet singer of Israel. In the summer and autumn the brooks and small rivers are perfectly dry, while in winter they suddenly swell into torrents. At this season, too, occur the floods or "swellings" of the Jordan, whose stream, however, is kept full flowing even in summer by the gradual melting of the snows of Lebanon.

In thus glancing at the divisions of the Hebrew times and seasons, we may perceive that beyond the simplest observations of those divisions marked out by the heavenly bodies, their astronomical investigations did not extend. They seem to have taken the division of the day into hours from the Babylonians; their year was not so nearly approaching to accuracy even as the Egyptian, and other modifications they adopted from the Greeks and Romans in later times. But like other simple and primitive nations living much in the open air, a general observance and knowledge of the heavenly bodies no doubt was cultivated by all, and formed a source of interest and pleasure unknown to the mass of mankind now living in cities, and leading a more artificial life. And we nowhere find such noble and exalted allusions to the firmament and the heavenly host with which it is furnished, as in almost every page of the Holy Scriptures. r.

II.—"FOUR QUATERNIONS OF SOLDIERS"

ACTS xii. 4.

No book so richly rewards study as the Bible. The closer and more minute one's inquiries, the more striking often are the results.

The phrase quoted above may be cited as an instance. As a "quaternion" is a company of four, the casual reader would be apt to suppose that "four quaternions" is a mere periphrasis for sixteen, just as we say three score and ten for seventy. But a more careful reading of the narrative shows that the expression is not a mere periphrasis, but is used advisedly. Let us look at the story a little more narrowly.

Herod on a certain occasion had seized Peter, and resolved to have him executed on the following day. To prevent the possibility of escape or rescue, he ordered the prisoner to be guarded in the strictest manner practised in the Roman military imprisonment. This method was to chain the arm of the prisoner to the arm of a soldier. In case of escape, the laws of the service required the soldier to be put to death. This penalty effectually prevented collusion. Every other chance of escape seemed equally to be cut off. Even should the soldier fall asleep, any attempt of the prisoner to get away would awaken him. In the case of Peter, to make assurance doubly sure, we are told that he was chained to two soldiers, one to each arm. In addition to this he was locked up in a cell, and the two soldiers with him. More even than this, it would seem that, at the same time, two other soldiers kept watch outside of the cell.

Here, then, we see why there was a quaternion. He was, at the same time, in the custody of four soldiers—two inside the cell, chained one to his right arm and one to his left, and two outside the cell, keeping watch against any attempt at rescue. "Peter was sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains, and [also] the [two] keepers before the door kept the prison," that is, kept watch.

But why four quaternions ?

The Romans divided the night into four watches—the first from six to nine, the second from nine to twelve, the third from twelve to three, and the fourth from three to six, or until the morning. This explains why there were four parties of soldiers assigned to this duty. Each quaternion was on duty during one watch, or space of three hours, and was then relieved by another.

This gives us also a pretty near approximation as to the time when the damsel Rhoda let Peter into the house where the disciples were assembled praying for him. A casual reading would lead to the supposition that this occurred some time in the early part of the night, say eight or nine o'clock in the evening.

Let us see. "Now as soon as it was day, there was no small stir among the soldiers what was become of Peter." These soldiers had good reason to be uneasy. They knew well the rigour of the Roman discipline. In fact, they were all that very morning ordered to execution for allowing Peter to escape. Does this throw any light upon the time when he escaped? In which watch of the night was it? Not in the first, not in the second, not in the third; for in either of these the discovery would have been made when the watch was changed, and the fresh relay of soldiers came to take charge. It was, then, in the fourth watch, between three and six o'clock in the morning, that Peter's rescue occurred. It was these last four who were thus miraculously overpowered with sleep, and who woke only at daylight to find their prisoner gone.

That prayer-meeting, then, must have lasted nearly all night, for they were still in session when Peter reached the house.

MARK x. 21.

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

IT is not raw recruits, beardless boys, that are thrown into the deadly breach, or placed in the front of battle. On the contrary, where the bullets fly the thickest, and the carnage rages fiercest, the ground is held by veterans,—men that, inured to war, and familiar with the sight of blood, the flash of steel, and the roar of cannon, wear stern determination on their faces, and scars and medals on their breasts. The post of danger is assigned to veterans; and heavy burdens are for the back, not of boys, but men. This is common sense; and to deal otherwise with men were to deal unfairly. It were little else than murder to bid a boy who had just left his mother's side, nor set foot before on a deck, climb the shrouds to reef the top-sails in a storm, when masts bent to the breaking and the ship was reeling down into the trough of the sea. No man that loved his son, and possessed sense and consideration, would put tender youth to such a terrible trial.

Why, then, since Jesus really loved this youth, did he subject him to a trial that would have put the faith of the oldest Christian to the strain? Samson's hair is left time to grow; nor is it till his shoulders are covered with flowing locks that he has to confront the shaggy lion; he is at least a man before he is put to the work, not of one, but of a thousand men. But here Christ calls one young in years, and younger still in his regard to himself, to undertake a gigantic work; and when the boy, so to speak, who has never seen the flash of steel before, is ordered to the front—into the very thick of the fight, and he shrinks back, I confess that at first sight I wonder less at that, than that Jesus should put him to so sore a trial. Let the best and oldest Christian imagine himself in this young man's circumstances! Suppose his case to be yours! Think how you would feel were you suddenly called on to give away all the earnings of a life-time, or to part with an ancestral estate,—the old house, the old trees, the lands that had been in your family for many generations,—to leave some pleasant home, the scenes of your boyhood, the society of friends, reputation, wealth, rank, to descend at a step into the condition of a beggar, and follow the fortunes of a man himself so poor, that he had not a place where to lay his head. How would that make the boldest of us hesitate, the strongest stagger? It was a dreadful trial. How many of us could stand it, God only knows! If any look more with scorn than sympathy on this faltering youth, I do not; and who are sure that they would have acted otherwise would do well to remember these warning words, "Let not him that putteth on his armour boast as he that putteth it off."

"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, for it is easy; and my burden, for it is light." And what object could he who said so have in laying what appeared far from a light burden on this youth? It was not to break his back, but the back of his pride. It was not to repel, but to attract him; it was not to quench the smoking flax, but blow it into flame. It was to bring him to a sound knowledge of himself; it was the application of a test whereby he might be convinced that he was not what he seemed to others, and seemed even to himself; and that, in fact, so far as genuine faith and piety were concerned, these words were true of him, "One thing thou lackest."

I. How important one thing may be.

It not unfrequently happens that the want of one thing vitiates and makes void the presence of all things else. Lacking its mainspring—which is but one thing—a watch with its jewels, wheels, pinions, and beautiful mechanism, the finest watch that was ever made, is of no more use than a dead stone. A sun-dial without its gnomon, as it is called, time's iron finger that throws its shadow on the circling hours—but one thing also—is as useless in broad day as in the blackest night. A ship may be built of the stoutest oak, and manned by the ablest officers and stoutest crew, but I sail not in her if she lacks one thing,—that trembling needle which a child might mistake for a toy, but on which, insignificant as it seems, the safety of all on board depends—lacking that one thing the ship shall be their coffin, and the deep sea their grave.

It is thus with true piety, living faith,—that one thing wanting, the greatest works, the costliest sacrifices, and the purest life, are of no value in the sight of God—are null and void. Still further, to show the value of piety, and the valuelessness of everything without it, and how its presence imparts such worth to a believer's life and labours, as to make his two mites weigh more than other men's two millions, and his cup of cold water more precious in God's sight than their cups of gold—let me borrow an illustration from arithmetic. Write down a line of ciphers! made of nothings they amount to nothing. You may add thousands, and tens of thousands, and thousands of thousands, filling sheet after sheet, and covering the face of earth and heavens with them, still they express nothing, and are worth nothing. Now I take the lowest number of the ten, the smallest digit, and placing that at their head—magic never wrought such a change! What before was nothing rises instantly into thousands, or millions, as the case may be; and whether they represent pounds or pearls, with that one thing, one stroke of the pen, how great is the sum of them!

Such power resides in true faith—in genuine piety. It may be the lowest piety; it may be the love of smoking flax; the hope of a bruised reed; the faith of a mustard seed; the hesitating, faltering confidence of him who cried, "Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief." Still, so soon as a man gets true piety, it changes the whole aspect of his life and the whole prospect of his eternity. It is that one important thing, wanting which, however amiable, moral, and even apparently religious we may be, our Lord says to us, as he said to this young ruler, "One thing thou lackest;" and in this case, sad to say, the one thing lacking is the one thing needful.

This case suggests two or three important cautions, which we would do well to attend to. Having by nature a heart that is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked, we are prone to say, Peace, peace, when there is no peace to be found; I pray you, therefore, to observe—

II. That we may be amiable without being truly religious.

It is sad to find the grace of God associated in some people with an unkindly, uncharitable, sour, severe, stern, sullen temper. It should not be so. It is a most incongruous conjunction. To borrow the wise man's figure, it is like a jewel in a swine's snout. If the world's enmity to God and his image is such that a Christian is not a man loved, be it so; but let him be lovely, and loving too. Let him be like Christ! What a beautiful example his! Into whose eye did he ever start a tear; in whose pillow plant one thorn? His very look bred hope in the bosom of despair, and invited the guiltiest to his feet. The voice that controlled the elements of nature won the confidence of little children, and he who was more than a man among men became a child to children. Ready to serve as to save all, he had tears for them that wept, and ears for them that begged; a hand for all that needed, and forgiveness for all that sinned; hope for a weeping Magdalene; paradise for a dying thief; prayers for his murderers, and pity for the pitiless; and for all that suffered such ready sympathy, that Martha, never doubting it, passionately exclaimed, "If thou hadst been here my brother had not died." Well did a woman, as she hung on his lips, and looked up into a face where human mildness was blended with divine majesty, raise her hands to cry, "Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked."

A picture this not to admire only, but to copy! A pattern to imitate by attention to such counsels as these: Be courteous; be merciful; forgiving and forbearing with one another; be kindly affectionate toward one another in brotherly love; condescend to those that are of low estate; let not the sun go down upon your wrath; let no wrath, or malice, or evil speaking proceed out of your mouth; love one another, as I have loved you; love is of God, and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. How often do Christians mar the effect of their piety by running counter to, or neglecting these blessed rules! They shine, indeed, but like a lamp where the flame gleams dimly through foul and smoky glass. Let us not forget the little but emphatic word of Christ's memorable saying—"Let your light so shine"—not only shine, but so shine; shine so bright and beautiful, with such a smokeless flame, through a life of such transparent purity—"that others seeing your good works may glorify your Father which is in heaven."

However much to be lamented, it is not to be denied that grace has in some a hard struggle with a naturally harsh, severe, imperious, and uncharitable temper. If among Christian men I sought a contrast to Christ himself, it is here in Jonah—standing in sacred Scripture rather a beacon to warn off, than a light to guide us on. A great sinner himself, he had experienced much mercy and a very remarkable deliverance from death at the hand of God; yet see how that stern and gloomy man calmly contemplates the destruction of Nineveh, with its six score thousand children who knew not their right hand from their left! Nineveh is spared; and now, lest his reputation should sustain some little injury, and he, forsooth, might be accounted a false prophet, how he frets and fumes! What a pitiable, revolting exhibition of human pride and selfishness! It has led some to doubt whether, with such a temper, Jonah didn't belong to the Baalam order of prophets: whether he was really a true man of God. We cannot doubt that; still his case proves how much the grace of God has sometimes to overcome, and illustrates the saying, that grace will live where neither you nor I could. Grace living in Jonah's heart appears to me a greater wonder than Jonah's living in the whale's belly: and his deliverance from such a temper was, at least, as great a miracle as when the monster, cleaving its way through the deep, struck the shore, and vomited him out safe on the dry land. No true Christian shall die, and therefore no true Christian should live with such dispositions, and in such a state. Though green fruit is sour, it always sweetens as it ripens, and mellows to its fall. When God justifies, he will certainly sanctify.

While, as is illustrated by this case of Jonah, saving grace may be found where there is a sad want of what are called natural graces ; on the other hand, let it not be forgotten that these have adorned many who were entire strangers to the grace of God. They are not to be confounded with one another ; nor is it to be imagined that natural graces ever can compensate for the grace that is to salvation. There may be much that is beautiful in us, without anything holy—presenting circumstances more or less analagous to those in nature. The moor, with its golden gorse, the mountains robed in purple, the woodlands, where sunbeams play on a carpet flowered with sorrel, hyacinths, and anemones ; the bank by the water side fragrant with thyme, or studded with modest primroses—these uncultivated wilds have beautiful flowers ; and our unsanctified nature has beautiful specimens of humanity in affectionate parents, sweet children, gentle sisters, loving brothers, kind acquaintances, and, when a man's back is at the wall, friends true as steel. What a fine specimen of this, the man before us ! Yet, turning his back on Christ, how does he warn us that the sweetest, the kindest, the gentlest of us may want the one thing needful ! and that, however lovely and loved you may be, and may deserve to be, “except you are born again you cannot see the kingdom of God.”

III. There may be much moral correctness without true religion.

To our eye, there seems a wide difference between the judge, with the robes of office on his back, and thought and dignity in his mien, and that poor, pale, haggard wretch at the bar, who throws stealthy glances around, and hangs his head with shame. Yet the difference that looks so great to us may be very small in the eyes of God ; and would look small in ours if we knew the different upbringing and history of these two men. The one never knew what it was to want a meal ; the other often went cold and hungry to bed. The one, sprung of wise, and kind, and reputable, and perhaps pious parents, was early trained to good, and, with all the advantages of school and college, launched on an honourable and high career. The other, bred up a stranger to the amenities of cultivated and Christian society, had no such advantages. His struggles with misfortune and evil began at his cradle ; he was born to misery ; none ever took him by the hand to lead him to church or school. A child of poverty, and the offspring of abandoned parents, his only lessons were how to swear, and lie, and drink, and cheat, and steal. The fact is, it is just as difficult for some to be honest as it is easy for others. What merit has that judge in his honesty ? None. He had no temptation to be else than honest. The truth is, that much of our morality—of that unblemished character and decent life in which many trust, who say to some poor guilty thing, “Stand aside, I am holier than thou,” and plume themselves on this, that they have not sinned as others have done—is due, not to their superior virtue, but more favourable circumstances. Have they not sinned as others have done ? They have not been tempted as others have been. All the difference between many a strictly honest man and decent woman on the one hand, and those on the other hand on whom the brand of infamy has been burned and the key of a prison turned, is just the difference between yonder green branch on the tree and these white ashes on the hearth—the one is bathed in the dews of night and fanned by the breath of heaven ; the other, once as green, has been thrust into the burning fire. The one has been tried, and the other has not. No doubt God's grace can preserve man in temptation as his presence did the bush that was wrapped in flames and burned unconsumed. Not otherwise, however. Therefore, be clothed with humility ; and, ever praying, “Lead us not into temptation,” let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

Thus we explain the reply of this youth to our Lord's repetition of the commandments, “Master, all these have I observed from my youth.” A child, so to speak, of fortune, the heir of affluence, reared perhaps with pious care, with a noble property to supply his wants, an honourable station to sustain, and kind parents to win his affections, it is easy to account for his observance of the law—such as it was—without an element of divine love in his heart or of true piety in his character. His purse filled with money, what temptation had he to steal ? Blessed with an amiable temper, he had none of those quick and fiery passions which explode into acts of violence, and hurry men into unpremeditated crimes. Having the honour of a holy office to sustain, no wonder that he was not addicted to the grosser sins. Possessing naturally kind affections, and blessed with indulgent parents, no wonder that he honours them if living, and if dead, cherishes their memory and adorns their tomb.

Now, had this man known the spiritual nature of God's law, and how it is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart, and how there may be adultery in a look, theft in a desire, and murder in an angry passion, he had not said, “Master, all these things have I observed from my youth,” but, Alas ! alas ! my Master, all these things have I broken from my youth,—save me, I perish ! And since this man, with affections so amiable, and a life as fair as ever won the esteem of mankind, yet lacked the one thing needful ; since he had nothing of godliness but its lifeless form—nothing of religion but an empty shell ; since the eye of Jesus, under his attractive exterior, detected a selfish and unregenerate heart, what need have we to try ourselves ! Your temper may be sweeter than Jonah's, yet you may lack the one thing needful ; your life may be purer than David's, still you may lack the one thing needful ; you may be more honest than one to whom a dying Saviour opened the gates of Paradise ; a pattern of filial obedience, you may be able to say with the elder brother of the prodigal, “Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment,” still you may lack the one thing needful. Look within ! This fair exterior may be but the garish paint, and odorous wrappings of a mummy case; within, is only dust and death. Try yourselves, therefore. You may have still to be saved. See if the heart is right with God. Unless it is right, all is wrong. Nor only try yourselves, but ask God to try you, crying, "O Lord, search me, and try me, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting."

IV. We may feel some interest and anxiety about good things without true religion.

The path, as we advance, grows more gloomy; the subject more solemn; the gate seems to straiten, and the road grow narrower that leads to eternal life. How much is there in this case to impress, alarm, and warn us! Here is a man so amiable that he won our Lord's affections—"Jesus loved him," yet without saving grace; here is a man of the highest morale, yet without saving grace; here is a man repairing to the very fountain-head of eternal life, seeking it in Christ, yet a stranger to the grace of God—lost, for ever lost, so far as we know or read in Scripture. The curtain drops on him, with his face to the world, and his back to heaven.

I look on this as one of the most alarming cases in the sacred record. It calls on the best of men to try the foundations on which their hopes are resting. How should it alarm many professing Christians—people who in their life, their manners, disposition and deportment, come far short of one who himself came short of eternal life! If he missed the prize, what ground have they to hope for it? He had something, but they have nothing about them for Jesus to love; in no sense can they say, Master, all these things have I observed, and am observing from my youth. If this man did not get to heaven, how are they to get there? "If these things were done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" If the righteous, the really righteous, those who have been washed in the blood of the Son, and sanctified by the Spirit of God, are scarcely saved, where shall the wicked and the ungodly appear? "Be not deceived, neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners shall inherit the kingdom of God."

Why, this ruler gave more apparent evidence of grace than many who repair to the Lord's table and bear an excellent character in the church. Look at his earnestness! He did not postpone to some more convenient period the concerns of his soul; on the contrary, these engrossed his attention, and eager on this great object, like a man thoroughly in earnest, as one engaged in an affair that brooked no delay, "he came running to Christ." Look at his humility! A noble by birth, a ruler by office, a man of high position and immense wealth, he kneels at the feet of one who drew his first breath in a stable, and wandered the world so poor that he often had not a place other than the cold ground where to lay his head. Look at his respect and reverence! Others called Jesus a glutton and wine-bibber, the associate of publicans and friend of sinners; not so this man. He may call others Rabbi, but the carpenter's son and maligned of Pharisees, he esteems and honours above all. Jesus is not Master merely, but good Master. "Good Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" Then look at the object he sought to grasp! He had everything this world could afford or its worshippers could desire—a happy temper, the affection of attached friends, a noble reputation, possessions greater than his wants—yet he felt a void within that the world could not fill. Aspiring after honours God only could give, seeking a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, he looks beyond this world; as if he knew the avenger was at his heels, and heard his step and breathing, he runs with all his might for the City of Refuge. Yonder is Christ; he makes right for the crowd, dashes into it, elbows his way through, and throwing himself at Jesus' feet, cries, "Good Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?"

No wonder, when they saw this man turn his back on Christ, and heard our Lord's solemn words on the dangers of riches and the difficulties of the rich, that the disciples were astonished out of measure—saying, "Who then can be saved?" If this good ship does not make the harbour, what hope for others?

"Who then can be saved?" We are prepared to answer the question. All, the greatest sinners may be saved that seek what the young ruler lacked. If a man, clinging to the world, will stay in it, he shall go down with it, sink with the sinking ship. But accept the offer Christ makes of peace by the blood of his Cross, and you are saved—saved in spite of your riches, as well as of your sins. This man went away sorrowful. Mercy to pardon all your sins, and blood to cleanse your souls, faith to believe in Christ and grace to follow him, are at your acceptance; and in your offer now. Though this man then went away sorrowful, you may go away joyful—not gloomy, but glad—rejoicing in the Lord, and joying in the God of your salvation. Cast yourselves at the Saviour's feet, and you shall rise to say, Jesus! lead on! I follow. Farewell father and mother; farewell brother and sister; farewell lover and friend; farewell riches and reputation; farewell ease and indulgence. Saviour! I accept this cross. Lead on! where thou goest I will go; where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God shall be my God.

EQUATORIAL AFRICA AND ITS PEOPLE

DU CHAILLU'S TRAVELS.

WHATEVER else may be disclosed in the accounts of new travellers of regions of the earth hitherto unknown, unhappily one thing may be relied on without fail,—tidings, to wit, of stray brothers and sisters of humanity, whom the wolf has dragged far from the shepherd's fold.

In the literal desert, the traveller may hope to light on the green oasis, with its shady palms and fountain cool; but never in the moral. The utmost that can be looked for, in the shape of moral or spiritual verdure, are occasionally a few dim traces of ancient Christian usages, like the "Saubatta gudda" and "Saubatta kenna"—the greater and lesser Sabbaths, that Dr. Krapf found among some of the tribes of Eastern Africa. No traveller need cherish the hope of bringing home tidings of a lost Christian community, reposing amid the beauties of a holy Christian life; or of bearing to the Churches of Christendom any message more cheering than the old cry, "Come over to Macedonia and help us."

Especially is this true of Africa. In missionary maps, the part of that great continent which is not Mohammedan, is distinguished as a monotonous triangle of almost unmitigated black. It was so before travellers began to penetrate into its vast interior, and it is so still, after all the disclosures that have recently been made in it. The present age is pre-eminently an age of African discovery. Things have changed wonderfully from the days when Bruce, the Abyssinian traveller, wrote, by the quiet shore of Loch Lubnaig, his account of regions where not even Scotchmen had ever been before. Year after year some enterprising traveller returns to tell us of new parts of Africa to which he has penetrated, and of their mountains, rivers, lakes, animals, and people. Within the last ten years, we have had the accounts of Dr. Barth, and of Denham and Clapperton, regarding the portion of Africa lying between the north and the centre of the continent; the east has been traversed by Dr. Krapf and his comrades; Major Burton and Captain Speke have recently brought to light in that region the great lakes, of which but a dim tradition existed before; Mr. Petherick has at various times penetrated far into the region where the sources of the Nile must one day be found; Dr. Livingstone has made us familiar with a large section of the south; Dr. Baikie and Mr. Hutchinson have given us accounts of the expeditions up the Niger, and now a fresh traveller, Paul B. Du Chaillu, makes us acquainted with a portion of the west, lying along the equator, in a book which, from various causes, has excited an interest only second to that of Dr. Livingstone.

Mr. Du Chaillu, or, as the natives used to call him, Chally, is an American gentleman, of French extraction. His father had a trading factory on the coast, and for four years the son was engaged in commercial pursuits, during which time he became acquainted with the languages, and accustomed to the climate of the country. The years from 1856 to 1859 were devoted by him to systematic explorations of the interior. During that time he travelled, always on foot, and unaccompanied by any but blacks, two thousand miles. Besides discovering many new animals and plants, he has added considerably to our knowledge of the physical geography of the district. Of the animals with which he has made us well acquainted, by far the most remarkable is the gorilla,—a huge ape, as tall as the human species, possessed of gigantic strength, and awfully fierce, one stroke of whose paw can shatter the human body, and which has driven the rhinoceros, the giraffe, the buffalo, and nearly every other animal from the forests which it haunts. But our present object is not to describe Mr. Du Chaillu's adventures, or to speak of the animals which he pursued. We wish to introduce our readers to the people of those parts, and especially to their religious, or rather their irreligious condition and necessities. We are very sure that even a brief statement on that subject cannot fail to stimulate the Christian compassion of every reader, and to give him a fresh interest in those blessed Christian enterprises which seek to plant the tree of life in Africa, that its leaves may be for the healing of the miserable nations there.

The general impression conveyed by Mr. Du Chaillu of the condition of the tribes he visited, corresponds with the usual estimate of the African people. They are generally very low in the scale of civilization, and lead—what to most of them must be—a miserable life. The population of Africa has been reckoned at one hundred and fifty millions, and of these, three-fourths are in a state of domestic slavery. Their customs are often very fierce, and outrageously cruel, and as if to complete their miseries, the foreign slave-trade affords a ready and never-failing resource for the strong to take vengeance on the weak. Whoever gives offence to the ruling authority in a tribe; whoever fails to pay what is due, or what is demanded; whoever is made prisoner in war; whatever woman forgets her duty to her husband,—is consigned to the tender mercies of the slave-dealer. Sometimes this traffic is carried on between tribe and tribe; at other times the transactions are for the foreign market. In spite of all that is done to destroy it, the slave-trade flourishes on the coast of Africa. Slaves are brought to the slave-factories from a much greater distance in the interior than even where Mr. Du Chaillu penetrated. We have a sad account of a visit paid by him to a Portuguese slave-pen at Cape Lopez. The male slaves were fastened six together by a little stout chain, which passed through a collar secured to the neck of each. The women and children were not manacled after this fashion. Some of the slaves were quite merry, while others were sad and filled with dread of their future. It seems that they firmly believe that they are bought to be eaten, and that the white men beyond the seas are great cannibals. One of the chiefs whom Du Chaillu visited, ordered a slave to be killed for his dinner, and could hardly be convinced that white men did not consider human flesh a luxury. While Du Chaillu was at Cape Lopez, a slave-schooner of one hundred and seventy tons appeared in the offing, and a cargo of six hundred slaves was packed in two hours into the narrow hold. The expression of those who had been so merry was now changed into one of gloom and horror. Nameless terrors rose before their imaginations, and the frightful miseries of the voyage would form a sad contrast to the comparative ease and comfort of the slave-pen.

It can hardly be said that the natives of western and southern Africa have any religion. Europeans are accustomed to call it fetishism, or the worship of charms. The usual objects of their worship are idols, serpents, birds, rocks, feathers, teeth, mountain-peaks; and their beliefs hardly go beyond good and evil spirits, the power of charms, and the significance of dreams. It is hardly possible, after the most elaborate inquiries, to construct anything like a theological system. Superstition appears to have run wild; and every man, it is said, believes what his fancy, by some accident, most forcibly presents to him as hurtful or beneficial. They believe in two great spirits, Abambou and Mbuirri, both evil, though sometimes willing to do good. These are not represented by idols, but have houses built for their occupation when tired of wandering, and food offered to them, and are feared and implored to do no harm. The people have idols, however,—very repulsive figures,—which are believed to live, move, and have a being; but—what is singular—they have no priests. Their superstition is almost incredible. Charms or greegrees are provided against every species of evil. These consist of skins, claws, teeth, bones, feathers, pieces of skin, ashes, &c. A string of these is usually worn about the neck or the waist. One protects from sickness; another makes the heart of the warrior brave; another gives success to the lover; another protects against sorcery; some cure sterility, and others make the mother's breast abound in milk for her babe. The greatest curse of the country is the belief in witchcraft. To this, every death that happens is almost invariably ascribed. When an African is once possessed with the idea that he is bewitched, his whole nature appears to change. He becomes suspicious of his nearest friends. "The father dreads his children, the son his father and mother, the man his wife, and the wives their husband. He fancies himself sick, and often becomes sick through his fears. By night he thinks himself surrounded with evil spirits. He covers himself with fetiches and charms, makes presents to the idol, and to Abambou and Mbuirri; and is full of wonderful and frightful dreams, which all point to the fact that the village itself is full of wicked sorcerers. Gradually the village itself becomes infected by his fears. The people grow suspicious. Chance throws their suspicions to some unworthy individual, who is supposed to have a reason for a grudge. Finally the excitement becomes too high to be restrained; and often they do not even wait for a death, but begin at once the work of butchering those on whom public suspicion is fastened. On the death of a free man, at least one or two persons are killed; but this is not generally the case when women, children, or slaves die. The law of witchcraft makes no distinction, as regards its victims, between prince, slave or free man, male or female."

To illustrate the frightful results of this wretched

superstition, it may be best to give, almost in our traveller's own words, an account of some incidents which he witnessed at various times. One day he happened to hear that a man was to be killed for causing the death of some one in the village. The man was said to be a notorious wizard, who had done much harm. He was taken to see him, and in a rough hut he beheld an old, old man, with wool white as snow, wrinkled face, bowed form, and shrunken limbs. His hands were tied behind him, and his feet were in stocks. Several large negroes stood over him, and insulted him with blows and opprobrious names. The old man submitted in silence. He was evidently in his dotage. The truth was, he had lived too long; people were tired of supporting him, and wished an excuse for making away with him. Du Chaillu made a strenuous but unsuccessful attempt to save his life. During the night he heard singing all over the town, and a great uproar. The people were exciting themselves to the proper pitch of frenzy. Next day, under the auspices of the fetish-man, the unhappy wretch was voted to death. While sitting in his room, our traveller heard a couple of sharp, piercing cries, and then all was as silent as death. Proceeding to the spot whence the cry came, he met a crowd returning, every man armed with axe, knife, cutlass, or spear, and both weapons and bodies sprinkled with the blood of their victim. In their frenzy they had tied the poor wizard to a log near the river bank, and then deliberately hacked him to pieces. They finished by splitting open his skull, and scattering his brains in the river. On their return they seemed as if they had rid their country from a great curse. Before night, the men whose countenances for two days had been utterly hideous, were again as mild as lambs, and as cheerful as though they had never heard of a wretched tragedy.

Another illustration of the frightful cruelties connected with the superstitious beliefs of the people once presented itself to Mr. Du Chaillu in a horribly unexpected manner. Hunting in some woods near a village, he saw on a tree a pair of beautiful green pigeons, which he was desirous to secure. By great efforts he got through the almost impenetrable jungle to the foot of the tree, where he found the ghastly corpse of a woman, evidently young, and with features once mild and good. She had been tied up here on some infernal accusation of witchcraft, and tortured. The torture consisted in lacerations of the flesh all over the body, and in the cuts red pepper had been rubbed. The body was then deserted. This is said to be a common mode of tormenting with these people. Such scenes are constantly occurring in all parts of heathen Africa.

Even the tender frames of mere children are not exempted from these barbarities. On one occasion a little boy of ten years had been accused of sorcery. On being examined, he confessed that he had "made a witch." The whole town seemed immediately to be seized with the devil. They took spears and knives and actually cut the poor fellow to pieces. For hours they continued excited, and frantic with rage. But though susceptible of these dreadful fits of excitement through their devilish superstitions, the Africans are not usually hard-hearted, but the reverse. The very villagers that hacked the boy to pieces showed the utmost kindness to Du Chaillu when attacked by fever. The hearts of the women softened at the sight of his distress;—they tried to cook nice food for him; they sat by him to fan him, brought him mats for his bed; water, and refreshing fruits; and at night, when he awoke from a feverish dream, he would hear their voices, as they sat around him in the darkness, pitying him, and devising ways for his cure.

Nothing can be more frightful than the scene that occurs when a chief dies, and it is necessary to find out the sorcerers that have caused his death. Mpomo, an old friend of our traveller's, was on the point of death. Hundreds of people were about him; and they had spent the night before drumming about his bed-side, to drive out the devil. Dying wretches cannot even have the comfort of dying in quiet; the more noise that can be made, the greater is the likelihood of the evil spirits being driven away. On the day of his burial, proceedings were begun to discover the persons who had bewitched him. A great doctor was brought up the river, who proceeded for two days and nights with his incantations. At last, on the third day, when the people were wrought up to an extraordinary pitch of frenzy, the final incantation began. The people were all assembled in the heart of the town, and armed with spears, swords, guns, and axes, were rapt in an indescribable fury and horrid thirst for blood. At length, silence being produced, the doctor began. "There is a very black woman who lives in such and such a house" (describing it), "she bewitched Mpomo." In a moment the crowd rushed to the house, seized the poor girl described, dragged her to the water-side, bound her with cords, and returned to the doctor again. "There is an old woman in such and such a house, she bewitched Mpomo." The crowd in like manner rush for her; she is the niece of a neighbouring king, and a noble-looking old woman; nevertheless she is dragged, like the other, though not bound. A third time the doctor's voice is heard. "There is a woman with six children. She lives on a plantation towards the rising sun. She, too, bewitched Mpomo." Again a furious shout, and in a few minutes more, a good, much-respected woman is dragged to the river. The doctor then appears, and specifies the grounds on which each of them is accused. The first was a few weeks ago refused a request for some salt which she made to Mpomo, that article being scarce; she had therefore bewitched him. The second was barren, and envied Mpomo, who had children; therefore she had bewitched him. The third had asked him for a looking-glass, which he had refused her; so she had killed him with sorcery. As each accusation was recited, the people broke out into curses. Every one rivalled his neighbour in cursing, each fearful lest lukewarmness in the ceremony should expose him to a similar fate. The victims, however, were not to be killed outright. They were to be subjected to the ordeal of drinking the mboundon. The mboundon is a very powerful poison, prepared from a plant which is found in the woods. If the accused person dies after drinking it, he is guilty. If he recovers, he is innocent. The poison is so powerful that sometimes within five minutes of its being drunk, blood will be seen flowing from the mouth, nose, and eyes; and the natives affirm that it bursts the veins. The mug was first handed to the woman last accused, then to the royal niece, and then to the first accused. The mother of six children had hardly drunk it when she suddenly fell down, and before she touched the bottom of the boat in which the trial took place, her head was hacked off by a dozen rude swords. The king's niece followed. The third victim struggled and cried, attempting by her energy to resist the working of the poison in her system, but in vain. Her head, like that of the rest, was hewed off. Then began an indiscriminate hacking. In an incredibly short time the bodies were all cut in small pieces, and cast into the river.

Among those who had been forced to take part in this brutal massacre was a brother of one of the victims. He dared not even refrain from heaping curses on his poor sister. In the evening he came, broken-hearted, to Du Chaillu, who had striven in vain to avert the horrid tragedy. The white man tried to comfort the poor fellow, and pointed him to the true God. Tender and touching must have been the words of the negro—our hearts thrill as we read them—"O Chally, when you go back to your far country, let them send men to us poor people, to teach us that which you call God's mouth"—meaning the Bible.

Horrible though these details are, they yet show how susceptible these people are of being mastered by an idea, and how tremendous a power their beliefs have over them; and in that point of view they are full of hope. For, let the truths of the gospel be substituted for the chimeras of superstition, and faith in the blood of Jesus for the wild creed of sorcery, and what a blessed change would result! Many illustrations may be given—grotesque enough, some of them—of the power of their superstitious faith. One of the hunters had shot a wild bull, and when the carcass was brought in, sent Du Chaillu an abundant supply. King Quenqueza was that day to dine with him, and he expected him to eat as much as would make several hungry white men sick. Great was his surprise when, coming to the table, and seeing only meat, Quenqueza refused to touch it. He explained that neither he nor any of his family could partake of the flesh of the animal, because, many generations ago, one of their women had given birth to a calf, instead of a child. Another family dared not taste crocodile for a similar reason. Others were interdicted boa, monkey, or pig, from the same belief. They will suffer the pangs of starvation rather than violate this prejudice; and they firmly believe that if one of a family should eat of such forbidden food, the most revolting consequences would follow. Not only would Quenqueza not partake of this food, but he would not eat anything that had been prepared or kept in the same dish. Such power of self-denial and loyalty to conviction, if transferred to the service of Christ, would make Christians of very firm and intrepid texture.

We fear that our illustrations of the superstitions of these wretched Africans have already bordered so closely upon the horrible that our readers will be hardly willing to accompany us a step further in the same direction, and get some particulars of the Fan, or cannibal tribes. In hunting the gorilla, Mr. Du Chaillu was brought much into contact with some of the cannibal tribes, not without a constant dread that they might some day take a fancy to the flesh of the white man, and make the experiment upon himself. It is singular that in the same district where, in bodily form, the brute approaches nearest to the man, the man, in mental and moral characteristics, sinks nearest to the brute. We can easily understand the feeling that made Mr. Du Chaillu almost shudder as he shot the gorilla, as if there were something human in the huge brute, and at the same time look on the inhabitants of the country as if they were hardly of his own race. We say we can understand this feeling, although nothing could be more unwarranted or unphilosophical than the inference that the gorilla is not wholly a brute, and the negro not wholly a man. We find no inclination to such theories on the part of Du Chaillu. On the contrary, we rejoice to acknowledge the spirit of reverence for the Bible, the Sabbath, and other Christian institutions, by which his work is characterized, as well as the missionary longings which indicate his firm belief in the regenerating and civilizing power of the gospel, even over such horrid cannibals as the Fans.

On entering a Fan village, he was not long of getting sad evidence of the habits that prevailed. A woman passed him, bearing with her a piece of a human thigh, just as one might carry from the market a piece of roast or steak. On one occasion, when he was talking to the king, some Fans brought in a dead body which they had bought in a neighbouring town, and which was now to be divided. Our traveller was too much horrified to witness the scene, but from his house could hear the party growing noisy over the division. The man had evidently died of disease. On inquiry, it was found that to eat the bodies of such persons was quite common. One tribe buys the dead bodies of the neighbour tribe, who in return buy theirs. They also buy the dead bodies of a great many slaves from other tribes, for which they give ivory, at the rate of a small tusk for a body. The disinterring of dead bodies after burial, for the purpose of devouring them, is also one of their practices. These stories are so horrible, and seem so incredible, that Du Chaillu has deemed it expedient to appeal to the concurrent testimony of a friend, the Rev. Mr. Walker, an American Presbyterian missionary at the Gaboon station, who authorises him to say that he vouches for the entire truth of these stories.

The chief village of each family of the Fans has a huge idol, to whose temple all that family gather at certain periods to worship. The worship consists of rude dances and singing. The idol-houses are mostly surrounded by a number of skulls of wild animals, prominent among which is that of the gorilla. To take away or disturb those skulls would be counted sacrilege, and worthy of death.

"Notwithstanding their repulsive habits," says Du Chaillu, "the Fan have left the impression upon me of being the most promising people in all Western Africa. They treated me with unvarying hospitality and kindness; and they seem to have more of that kind of stamina which enables a rude people to receive a strange civilization, than any other tribe that I know of in Africa."

In so brief a sketch as this, it is not easy to distinguish tribe from tribe, or to give with minute accuracy the characteristics of each. But we must allude, though in a somewhat cursory way, to a few other points. In regard to the state of the women, it is for the most part very low. The burden of tilling the soil rests on them, for the men spend their strength in hunting. When a tribe is in motion, and burdens have to be carried, the women are the bearers. In general, their moral character is bad. They are faithless, intriguing, profligate, although slavery and death may be the punishment that awaits the detection of their guilt. The children are generally much neglected, and the infant mortality is something fearful. When the crops have to be secured, a great push must be made; everybody must go to the fields; and on these occasions all the children except those not weaned are left together, to spend their time playing in the mud, and greedily munching the few ground nuts which their mothers may have left them. The industrious habits of the women, as might be expected, are fitful and irregular. Mr. Du Chaillu remarks, as a curious instance of extremes meeting, that like the gay ladies of fashionable circles, they are apt to spend the night dancing, and great part of the day sleeping. The fields are, of course, very ill cultivated, and notwithstanding all the fertility of the soil, the people are often exposed to want of food—encouraging, doubtless, the cannibal propensities of some of the tribes. The dancing scenes are often extremely disgusting; the women forget all modesty, and seem to vie with each other in outraging propriety.

The men, too, are often addicted to mean vices. The very warriors in some districts applaud tricks inhumanly cruel and cowardly, and seem to be quite incapable of open hand-to-hand fight. "To surprise man, woman, or child in sleep, and kill them then; to lie in ambush in the woods for a solitary man, and kill him by a single spear-thrust before he can defend himself; to waylay a woman going to the spring for water, and kill her; or to attack on the river a canoe much smaller and weaker than the attackers;—these are the warlike feats I have heard most praised and seen most done in this part of Africa."

Such of them as have come in contact with white men, and have learned to trade with them, have acquired a set of corresponding vices. Greed, cunning, lying, are the too common accompaniments of their trading. In some cases, the white men themselves have exercised a bad influence on them. It may readily be believed that such of them as have had to do with slave-traders have been sadly demoralized through their connection.

All the African tribes appear to be alike in one particular—their dread of death. Their associations with death are of a peculiarly mournful character. On one occasion, at sunset, Mr. Du Chaillu was surprised by a mournful, heart-piercing chant—a wail whose burden seemed to be, "There is no hope!" It was a chant for the dead. They have a tradition, that at the sunset hour the evil spirits walk abroad among them; and as they sang, tears rolled down the cheeks of the women, and fright marked their faces and cowed their hearts.

They seem to have no idea of anything after death. "Death is the end." "Now we live; by-and-by we shall die; then we shall be no more." "He is gone; we shall never see him more; we shall never shake his hand again; we shall never hear him laugh again." This is the dolorous burden of their songs. Even their songs of mirth have the same thought in them:—

"When we are alive and well;
Let us be merry—sing, dance, and laugh;
For after life comes death.
Then the body rots, the worms eat it,
And all is done for ever."

In some tribes, the sight of death is terrible. They dread to see a dead person. Their sick, unless they have good and near friends, are driven out of the village to die in loneliness in the forest. Once, when Du Chaillu was there, an old man, poor and naked, and lean as death himself, hobbled into a Bakalai village. A conversation followed. "Where are you going?" "I don't know." "Where are you from?" (A neighbouring village). "Have you no friends there?" "None." "You are sick." "They drove me away for that." "What will you do?" "Die." The women of the village showed him a little kindness, but the men, seeing death in his eyes, drove him away. A few days after, his poor lean body was found in the wood.

We might write on to almost any extent, on the wretched condition of these poor Africans. We have been utterly saddened by the picture which the book presents to us of the moral condition of so very large a section of the human family. We can think of nothing so sad as a life cheered by no pure joy, destitute of all the gladdening influences of a happy home, saddened and maddened by superstition and its revolting orgies, and terminated by a death whose gloom is unrelieved by a single ray of hope. We can understand the depth of feeling with which our traveller thanked God that he was not an African. We can only adore the wonderful sovereignty of Him who makes one nation so to differ from another, as the people of Britain from the people of Africa.

But have the people that dwell in darkness seen no light? Has the day star shone on high shed no brightness on this valley of the shadow of death? The missionary of the cross has found his way to these tribes,—at least to some of them, though he has not penetrated among them so far as the adventurer. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions has several stations, manned by devoted missionaries, in Equatorial Africa. In Mr. Du Chaillu's pages, we have some pleasant sketches of missionary life and labours. Here is one at Baraka, on the Gaboon river:—

"A little before nine o'clock, the ringing of a bell calls the children who live at home in the villages to assemble in the schoolroom; and here, presently, the work of instruction goes busily on, being begun with prayers and the singing of a hymn in the native tongue. The missionaries and their wives are here assisted by native teachers, who are able to take charge of the less advanced classes. The children are taught in their native tongue first, and after mastering their A B C, go on to reading the Scriptures in the Mpongwe. Then follow lessons in geography, history, arithmetic, and writing, and English lessons. Many of the scholars are bright and well advanced, reading English well, and having a good understanding of history and geography, and even writing in English. There is, of course, much attention to religious instruction; and by reading, explanations, and inculcations of Bible precepts, efforts are made to settle the rising generation firmly in the great life principles of the religion of Christ. . . . Sunday is the great day of the week; then the bell calls all who will come together in the little bamboo church. The missionary children and employés attend, dressed in their best; and even the heathen of the village follow this custom, and are found in church wearing their best garments, perhaps their only ones. . . . The positive success of the mission is so far not great. . . . The missionaries do their best, and wisely leave the rest to God, knowing that he works in his own good time, and often effects great ends with very slight means."

In the Bible, Africa seems to be represented by Ethiopia. Ethiopia was the land of Cush—the region of the blacks—and even more than Egypt itself, the representative of the race of Ham. But it is worthy of notice, that in the missionary psalms, special mention is made once and again of Ethiopia, and a peculiar satisfaction seems to be felt that days of gospel blessing were to dawn on the once banned and outcast descendants of Noah's wicked son. "Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands to God." "I will make mention of Rahab with Babylon to them that know me: behold Philistia, and Tyre, with Ethiopia, this man was born there."

Ebedmelech the Ethiopian shared God's mercy in the days of Jeremiah; and the treasurer of Candace, the Ethiopian eunuch, in the time of the apostles. The nineteenth century of the Christian era is a late period, alas! to begin the work of African evangelisation. But it is only now that the vast continent may be said to be opened up, and the wail of Africa's griefs and sorrows to be distinctly heard. Few things can have a stronger claim on Christians, than to labour and pray for the conversion of Africa.

B.

THE WAY TO HAPPINESS.

A SERMON ADDRESSED TO THE YOUNG,

BY THE REV. WILLIAM ARNOT.

"The kingdom of God is . . . righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost."—Rom. xlv. 17.

IN one sense, the kingdom of God rules over all worlds and all orders of being. Every creature is subject to the Creator's power; but the kingdom described in this verse of Scripture is a different thing. It is a new reign which God has set up in one rebellious world. It is the gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

When mankind had broken God's law, and become rebels all against his authority, he neither deserted nor destroyed them. He set up his throne in the midst of his enemies, and invited them back. This kingdom is still in the world. Many of the rebels have come into it, and many are hastening in at the present time. All are welcome. The motto over the open gate is, "Who-soever will, let him come." The apostle Paul is already within that kingdom, a faithful servant of the King. At his heavenly Master's bidding he invites the outcasts to come in. In order to persuade them to enter, he tells them what the kingdom is. It is made up of three things: righteousness, peace, and joy. Righteousness is the widely spreading root, Peace the towering stem, and Joy the lovely fragrant blossom.

We would all and always fain pluck for ourselves that beautiful flower. If a band of little children escape for a single day from a crowded city, and be permitted to rove through flowery fields in June, every little hand will soon be stretched eagerly out to pull the daisy or the butter-cup that nestles in the grass beneath their feet: as certainly and eagerly do weary human hearts, old and young alike, grasp at joy wherever they think they can see its blessed blossom opening. Though often disappointed, we don't give up; we try, and try again. As a plant, frequently crushed to the ground by a traveller's foot, always points up to heaven again, as long as life remains, so a human soul, after many failures, aims still upward, and ever chases the joy that ever flees.

Nor is the habit evil. It is the outcome of an instinct planted deep in our being by God before sin began,—an instinct that sin has not been able to extinguish, and that will act strongly, sweetly for the Creator's glory and the creature's good for ever, in all the ransomed of the Lord.

People fail to gain the prize because they do not "strive lawfully." They seek the last first. They seek joy before righteousness and peace. They stick a withered branch into the ground, and then vainly look for blossoms. We may seek joy, but we must seek it in the right way. If a wounded deer lie down for rest with the hunter's arrow sticking fast in its flesh, the attempt to obtain ease will increase the pain. The only way to comfort is to get the arrow taken out.

People often very foolishly blame religion for destroying their pleasure. It is not religion, but the want of it, that makes them unhappy. We are so made that, as long as any life remains in the conscience, we cannot be truly joyful while we are at enmity with God. In days when the law was much more severe in this country than it is now, and death penalties much more frequent, three men were lying in prison in a county town of Scotland, under sentence of death for an act of house-breaking. Some of their rustic companions were admitted to see them ere they suffered. One of the visitors, after a pause, addressing one of the convicts, complained that he did not seem so cheerful as he used to be. "I would be as cheerful as any of you," replied the condemned man, "but that hanging always comes into my head." I give the fact, as I ascertained it at the time, without change, because it supplies a singularly close parallel to the case in hand. The question of the visitor betrayed an extreme measure of heartlessness and stupidity; the convict's answer was simple and true. Why should any man in his senses expect great mirthfulness in a human being with unpardoned sin staining his conscience, and the wrath of God abiding on him? How can he be merry who hangs by the frail thread of life over a dark eternity? He may indeed be, and be often is, drugged into a state of spiritual insensibility, so that, being unconscious of danger, he is not tormented by fear; but whenever there is any measure of life in the conscience, guilt on his soul drives joy from his heart.

In this verse of Scripture joy is not the first, but the last of three. Joy is the home in which the pilgrim rests; righteousness and peace are the path by which he reached it. We shall now examine, in the light of Scripture, these three things: the first two as the way to the last, and the last as the natural issue of the other two.

The same three things, in the same order, are expressed and more fully explained in an earlier portion of the same epistle (ch. v. 1, 2). We must look to the earlier and fuller statement for an explanation of that which is later and shorter. On this method, which is most certainly correct and safe, we find that righteousness in our text means "justified by faith;" peace is "peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ;" and joy is to "rejoice in hope of the glory of God."

I. RIGHTEOUSNESS. It is the want of righteousness or guilt that disturbs our peace and damps our joy.

Here lies the root of the ailment, and here, therefore, must the cure begin. As soon as the conscience awakes to a sense of spiritual things, its instinctive cry is everywhere substantially the same as that which was long ago expressed and recorded by the psalmist; "If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquity, O Lord, who shall stand?" (Ps. cxxx. 3.) Felix trembling under the preaching of Paul is a fair specimen of humanity. He did what we would all do in the same circumstances. As soon as he felt his own guilt, he feared God's judgment. The kingdom of God is not an outward and material, but an inward and spiritual power. By the express testimony of its King, it is "within" the loyal subjects. It is a thing of the conscience and the heart. Now, the first stone in the foundation of that kingdom is righteousness. Guilt is the ailment; the cure must be righteousness. I must be just with God, ere I can rejoice in his presence. God and I must be agreed ere we can meet in peace. He cannot lay aside his righteousness in order that he may be like me; I must be delivered from my guilt, in order that I may be at one with him. This is the essence of Christ's work; this is the foundation-stone of his kingdom in human hearts.

But a righteousness suitable to our need must obviously consist of two parts; the evil must be removed, and the good imparted. In the figurative, but easily understood language of Scripture, we must be relieved from the filthy rags that cling to us, and clothed in the fine linen clean and white, which is the righteousness of the saints. Christ's sacrifice and work correspond to the twofold need of guilty men. His death blots out the guilt, and his life becomes the righteousness of his believing people. Christ personally is everything in the gospel. Salvation is not to accept a doctrinal system, but to have a divinely righteous Saviour standing in the place of guilty lost men. When I accept Christ, as he is offered in the gospel, my guilt is laid on him, and his righteousness is put on me. This is the turning point. The root of the matter lies in small compass. My guilt, if it remain marked to me, will crush me in that day; but if I am Christ's in simple believing trust, my guilt is no longer mine in God's sight; it has been borne by Christ for me, and it has been blotted out in his blood. The divine Redeemer, God and man in one person, took upon himself the guilt of all who have trusted in him from the beginning of time, or shall trust in him till the last. For that guilt he made full atonement. By the eternal and unchangeable covenant of God, Father, Son, and Spirit, that guilt so expiated cannot be charged again. God is just to forgive sins to all Christ's members, because the price has been already fully paid by Christ the head. Believers are not half saved, and half lost. It is finished. "There is now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." They walk at liberty, for the Son has made them free. The honour of Christ, as well as the comfort of his people, is concerned in the completeness of the pardon. Those Christians most glorify their Lord who count most confidingly that no sin is marked against them. "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin."

The other side of the saint's righteousness is equally sure and equally perfect. Believers have not only lost their own guiltiness, but the holiness of Christ has also by faith become their own. He whom they have now put on, not only bestows, but is their righteousness; and therefore, in the great day, the Judge will see upon them, "no spot, nor wrinkle, nor any such thing."

II. PEACE enjoyed flows from righteousness possessed. A state of war is painful, whether it be between persons or nations. The measure of its painfulness depends on the nearness and power of your enemy. If he is far distant or feeble, you are not greatly disturbed. Now, an unforgiven sinner is at war with the Nearest and Greatest. According to the vivid language of Scripture, "it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." You can neither resist his power, nor escape from his presence. How deeply disturbed is the human heart that is not at peace with God!

On the other side, when that storm is hushed at the command of Jesus, "there is a great calm." It is "a peace that passeth understanding;" it is a peace that "keeps the heart and mind."

In the kingdom of God, righteousness is the first thing, and peace follows it. When I have righteousness, then I have peace. The peace of which this text speaks dwells on earth; but it has been produced there by another peace which has its home in heaven. It is when God is at peace with me, that I am at peace with God. When his anger is turned away, my confidence in him begins. I need not cherish my dread, when he has taken his wrath away. When peace is proclaimed from the judgment-seat to me, peace echoes from my glad heart up to heaven again.

Now this peace, as explained in the fuller expression of the fifth chapter, is peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ. It is not peace in the conscience maintained by hiding from God. Ah! many people are at peace with God, as a citizen of Glasgow is at peace with a citizen of Pekin—by having nothing to do with him. Those Athenians who sauntered under the shade of trees on the borders of the market-place, chattering news with every passenger, were not consciously agitated by a sense of sin, and a fear of the Holy One. They had woven a very thick veil of politics and philosophy and idolatry, under which they crept and lay, so that the face of God did not come through as a consuming fire in the conscience. They kept out of the way. The unknown god to whom they reared an altar did not disturb their peace, because he was unknown. The peace which enters as an element of the kingdom in a believer's heart is "peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ." It is not the peace which the prodigal enjoyed in riotous living at a great distance from home; but the peace which he attained when he lay on his father's loving breast.

III. Joy in the Holy Ghost. Here at last is the thing we have all been seeking all our days; it is joy or happiness. Joy springs from peace, and peace rests on righteousness.

Now, we do not venture to say that nobody finds any joy except those who find it in this method. There are many pleasures of sin, and many people taste them. We confess frankly that there are joys which do not spring from righteousness and peace; but they are both shallow and short. If there were not joys in sin it would be more easy to persuade the world to seek the joys of holiness. The power of sin lies in the pleasure of it. There are pleasures on both sides; and, alas, those on the side of sin lie nearest, and are more easily reached. It is not a case in which you have joy on one side and grief on the other. There are joys and griefs too on either side, but they differ deeply in kind and in duration. Our text, without denying that sin has joy, commends to our choice the joy of righteousness.

A person employed to gather fruit in a garden was attracted by a cherry more fully grown and more richly coloured than the rest. Seizing it by the stalk he pulled it from the tree, and placed it between his lips. At the same moment that he tasted the sweetness of the fruit he felt the sting of a wasp in his tongue. The insect had been burrowing unseen, unsuspected in the heart of the tempting morsel. Such is sin to youth—an outward skin of sweetness, and lasting torture underneath.

There are two conditions possible to a human soul in this life,—the one, to be in sin and at enmity with God; the other, to be righteous in Christ's righteousness, and at peace with God through the blood of the cross. These two conditions are, in respect to joy, in one aspect like each other, and in another as widely different as any two conditions could be. In respect to the happiness which they respectively yield they are related as night and day are related in respect to light. In the region nearest us, and at certain times, they may approach or seem to approach an equality. The night sometimes, through moon and stars and wintry meteors, has a good deal of light in it; and the day sometimes, through rising smoke and hovering clouds, has a good deal of darkness in it. A night of many stars may seem brighter than a day of many clouds; but the night is notwithstanding far different from day. An infinitude of darkness, with some sparks of light scattered on its nearer edge, is a different thing from an infinitude of light, with heavy clouds hovering close to your eye, between it and you. Immortal souls in sin and under wrath may have many bright joys as they traverse this life; but these joys are only sparks on the surface of an eternal night: on the other hand, Christian disciples may have many sorrows, but these are only clouds moving in the thin atmosphere of earth, hiding heaven from view for the moment, but leaving all the eternity beyond an undimmed, unending light. The wrath of God is an infinite sorrow; peace with God an infinite joy. To the unforgiven some joys glitter on the edge of the darkness ere they fall into its unmeasured, unending deep; to the forgiven some griefs hang on the margin of the saint's inheritance ere they enter the joy of their Lord. The choice is to-day before us, and we are silently, secretly making our choice now. Either we choose death, made pleasant to the carnal mind by a thin coating of sin's sweet pleasures; or we choose life, not deterred by some clouds of godly sorrow that hang for a while on the horizon, but will be driven away when the Sun of Righteousness has arisen in his strength.

If holiness had no pain, and sin no pleasure, where were the discipline of earth, where the meetness for heaven? Holiness, we confess it,—holiness has pains for the fallen. Sin, we confess it,—sin has pleasures for the fallen: and yet the difference between the two, even in respect of happiness, is infinite and eternal.

The point with which we are at present mainly concerned is, to show that the righteousness of faith and peace with God bring joy to their possessor, and not grief. The glory of God our Saviour is involved in this. And yet we cannot do much in this department by argument. No proof will convince those who are without; and those who are within do not need any proof. We must fall back on the old counsel, "O taste and see that the Lord is good." Those who are at enmity with God cannot be made to understand how sweet it is to be at peace with him, through the blood of Christ.

We turn rather to the other side, and counsel believers to rejoice in the Lord, and let their joyfulness be seen and felt. Pardon of sin, and peace with God, and hope of glory, should make a pilgrim glad, even while he is marching through the wilderness of this world. But it is not enough to say that a true Christian, though exposed to many sorrows in this life, enjoys the blessed hope of rest; he enjoys the good things that are going in this life, better than those do who have no other portion. When the sun has risen in the east, you not only see the risen sun; you see also all that lies between, bathed in his golden light. Thus Christ seen by faith afar, gilds all the path that stretches between the pilgrim's feet and the gate of glory. While the language of unbelief is, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die;" it is a mistake to suppose that the language of faith is, "we must thirst and starve to-day, for to-morrow we shall live for ever." Meat and drink are sweeter now to him who sees eternal life, than to him who knows only death beyond.

It is most interesting and instructive to observe how simply the Scriptures connect conversion with joy. Here we read of the kingdom of God, and of those who are filled with the Holy Spirit; and yet this is called joy. This one thing turns upside down all the conceptions of the unconverted of every rank and name. Their main idea about real godliness is, that though very necessary, it is very dull. Read the first part of this text, "The kingdom of God is,"—and leave the remainder blank. Bid any pleasure-seeker, whether from the ranks of the refined, or the ranks of the rudest, fill up, according to the best of his judgment, the three main elements of the spiritual kingdom of Christ within the saints; and, if he write off honestly at the dictation of his own heart, he will complete the sentence in some such way as this—The kingdom of God is,—Long prayers, long faces, and gloom. I don't expect by this argument to get any of these to change their view; this kind goeth not out by argument. They feel religion to be sad: it is dark from their view-point, and my word cannot turn their experience upside down. Ah! they must become new creatures ere they experience new tastes. When they rejoice in Christ Jesus, then they will know that to be in Christ Jesus is a joyful thing. Although we should describe this feature of the kingdom with the tongues of men and of angels, those who have not been born again will fail to see its beauty.

One well-marked feature of the present revival, for which all intelligent Christians should give glad thanks to God is, that it is attended with a considerable measure of "joy and peace in believing." The Scriptures suggest a channel through which happiness, swelling in the heart, may get free vent—"Is any merry, let him sing psalms." It is a grand God-glorifying feature in the reviving of our day that, in some good measure, the children of Zion are joyful in their king.

STUDIES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND CHARACTER.

JONATHAN EDWARDS.

PART THIRD.

THERE are many points from which we may regard with interest the life of President Edwards. He was a great philosopher, a profound theologian, an eminently earnest and spiritual man. But there is one light especially in which, at the present day, his history is deserving of study; and that is in its relation to the great religious revival which occurred during his time. It is to this we propose to confine our attention in the present section of our sketch, and we may notice, by way of beginning, the origin and character of the—

FIRST AWAKENING IN NORTHAMPTON.

It was by no means a sudden and unlooked for outburst of interest. It did not force itself on the public attention till 1734, and it is usual to name that year and the following one as the properly revival era of the period. But so long before as the beginning of 1732, the state of religion, which had previously seemed on the decline, began gradually and perceptibly to grow better. An unusual flexibility of disposition appeared in the young people. Meetings that were wont to be devoted to frivolity, were changed into meetings for prayer. Several notable conversions took place, and the manifest quickening of feeling reacted upon the minister, and led to his preaching, among others, those remarkable discourses on Justification by Faith, which are well known to have contributed largely, under God, to the subsequent results. The movement, however, may be said to have reached its crisis in December 1734, when five or six individuals appeared to be very suddenly converted one after another, and some of them in a manner so arresting, as to awaken very great numbers, of all ages and conditions. The year 1735 opened, in consequence, under deeply interesting and peculiar circumstances. Religion became the only subject of conversation in every company, and almost the only business of the people appeared to be to secure their salvation. In the spring and summer following, the town appeared to be full of the presence of God. There was scarcely a house which did not furnish the tokens of his presence, and scarcely a family which did not present the trophies of his grace. "The town," says Mr. Edwards himself, "was never so full of love, nor so full of joy, nor yet so full of distress, as it was then!" In the months of March and April, when the work of God was carried on with the greatest power, he supposes the number of apparently genuine conversions to have been at least four a day, or nearly thirty a week. This blessed state of things did not continue beyond the month of May 1735. Why? Why should not a town that had been permitted in such a marvellous way to behold the glory of the Lord, have maintained persistently the elevation it had reached? The reasons are only too easily given. In the first place nothing exhausts the physical nature so much as keen and excited feeling. It seems inevitable that a revival such as occurred at Northampton, should be followed by something like a reaction. Besides, we cannot wonder, if, after a year of grace, the work of conversion should begin to proceed more slowly. By that time the hearts of the impenitent must have grown harder, and their spiritual darkness more complete. But in addition to these causes, which must operate everywhere in similar circumstances, there were special influences tending to arrest the awakening at Northampton. Edwards himself mentions two striking events in Providence in the town, and two unhappy cases of enthusiasm in neighbouring villages; and to these may be added the breaking out of a miserable ecclesiastical controversy, which engrossed time, and talent, and attention that would have been much more wholesomely occupied otherwise. "A revival of religion," it has been well said, "is nothing but the immediate result of an uncommon attention on the part of a Church and congregation to the truth of God; and an effectual way, therefore, to put a stop to a work of grace, is first to direct the attention of Christians and sinners to something else."

Five years elapsed before the Spirit of God returned in visible power to Northampton. The interval was not an idle one for Mr. Edwards, nor altogether an unfruitful one for his flock. He was much occupied in extended labours outside of his proper field, and while thus engaged, he had the satisfaction of knowing that the great mass of the new converts were continuing steadfast, and that others, now and again, were being brought into the Church. From the 16th of October 1740, however, we date the commencement of—

A SECOND REVIVAL.

It was connected with the visit of George Whitefield. He came on the day we have mentioned, to see Mr. Edwards, and remained with him till the 20th. During that time he preached five sermons, adapted to the circumstances of the town,—reproving the backslidings of some, the obstinate impenitence of others, and summoning all by the mercies with which they had been distinguished to return to God. His visit was followed by an awakening among professors of religion, and soon afterwards by a deep concern among the young; and there were some cases of hopeful conversion. The feelings thus produced increased through the winter; and in the spring of 1741, religion became the object of general attention. In the month of May, in particular, a private lecture by Mr. Edwards made a deep impression; and during the summer and the early part of the autumn, there was a glorious progress in the work of God, on the hearts of sinners in conviction and conversion, and great numbers appeared to become the real disciples of Christ. One of the most interesting features in this awakening is thus referred to by Mr. Edwards in a letter to Mr. Bellamy. "There has been, this year past," says he, "the most wonderful work among children here, by far, that ever was. God has seemed almost wholly to take a new generation, that are come on since the late great work, seven years ago. Neither earth nor hell can hinder his work that is going on in the country. Christ gloriously triumphs at this day." The effects of these two religious upheavals could not but be conspicuous. "There has been," says Edwards, writing in 1743, "a great and abiding alteration in this town, in many respects. There has been vastly more religion kept up in the town, among all sorts of persons, in religious exercises and in common conversation. There has been a great alteration among the youth of the town, with respect to revelry and frolicking, profane and licentious conversation and lewd songs. And there has also been a great alteration amongst both old and young with regard to tavern hunting. I suppose the town has been in no measure so free of vice in these respects, for any long time together, for sixty years, as it has been these nine years past."

While the river, "whose streams make glad the city of God," was thus overflowing the scene of Mr. Edwards' ministerial labours, an unusually favourable opportunity was afforded to him of forming a judgment regarding "revivals" generally; and he, of all others, was not the man to let such an opportunity slip. As was customary with him, he carefully collected the facts that seemed likely to throw light upon the subject. He then as carefully classified them; and as the result of his meditations, we have numerous letters preserved by his biographer in his Memoirs, and at least three treatises which the Christian Church will never willingly let die. Of two of these treatises we desire to give here a very brief description. The first we shall notice is entitled at large, "A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God in the Conversion of many Hundred Souls in Northampton, and in the Neighbouring Towns and Villages of New Hampshire, in New England; in a Letter to the Rev. Dr. Coleman, of Boston." Or more briefly, it is called—

"NARRATIVE OF SURPRISING CONVERSIONS."

The letter is divided into three sections. The first section, which is introductory, gives a history of the awakening—describing its rise, progress, and general results. The second shows the character of the spiritual changes wrought upon the subjects of the revival; bringing out the fact that the conversions experienced were strictly analogous in their essential nature, though they differed in the manner in which they occurred. While the third section is made up of specific cases, illustrating the positions that had previously been laid down. The treatise, as even those may guess who have never looked into it, is a deeply interesting and instructive one. Christians in general will feel their spirits refreshed and quickened by perusing it; the anxious and doubting will find much to help them in their difficulties; and above all others, those should read it who are called to "deal" with souls seeking salvation. But we cannot give a better idea of its character, than by quoting one or two of its facts and sentiments.

Dealing with souls.—"Whatever minister has a like occasion to deal with souls, in a flock under such circumstances as this was last year, I cannot but think he will soon find himself under a necessity greatly to insist upon it with them, that God is under no manner of obligation to show mercy to any natural man, whose heart is not turned to God; and that a man can challenge nothing either in absolute justice or by free promise, from anything he does, before he has believed on Jesus Christ, or has true repentance begun in him. . . . I think I have found that no discourses have been more remarkably blessed than those in which the doctrine of God's absolute sovereignty, with regard to the salvation of sinners and his just liberty, with regard to answering the prayers, or succeeding the pains of natural men continuing such, have been insisted on. I never found so much immediate saving fruit in any measure, of any discourses I have offered to my congregation, as some from these words (Rom. iii. 19), "That every mouth may be stopped;" endeavouring to show from thence that it would be just with God for ever to reject and cast off mere natural men."

New light.—"In this town there has always been a great talk about conversion and spiritual experiences, and therefore people in general had formed a notion in their own minds what these things were. But when they come to be the subjects of them, they find themselves much confounded in their notions, and overthrown in many of their former conceits. And it has been very observable, that persons of the greatest understanding, and who have studied most about things of this nature, have been more confounded than others."

Diffusion of intelligence.—"There is no one thing that I know of which God has made such a means of promoting his work amongst us, as the news of others' conversion. This has been owned in awakening sinners, engaging them earnestly to seek the same blessing, and in quickening saints."

Date of conversion.—"In some converting light is like a glorious brightness suddenly shining upon a person and all around him; they are in a remarkable manner brought out of darkness into marvellous light. In many others it has been like the dawning of the day, when at first but a little light appears, and it may be is presently hid with a cloud; and then it appears again, and shines a little brighter, and gradually increases, with intervening darkness, till at length it breaks forth more clearly from behind the clouds. And many are doubtless ready to date their conversion wrong, throwing by those lesser degrees of light that appeared at first dawning, and calling some more remarkable experience they had afterward their conversion."

Tastes.—"While God was so remarkably present amongst us by his Spirit, there was no book so delightful as the Bible, especially the book of Psalms, the prophecy of Isaiah, and the New Testament. Some, by reason of their love to God's word, have been wonderfully delighted and affected at the sight of a Bible; and then, also, there was no time so prized as the Lord's day, and no place in this world so desired as God's house."

Humility.—"Such persons amongst us as have been distinguished with the most extraordinary discoveries, had commonly nowise appeared with the assuming, self-conceited, and self-sufficient airs of enthusiasts, but exceedingly the contrary. They are eminent for a spirit of meekness, modesty, self-diffidence, and a low opinion of themselves. No persons appear so sensible of their need of instruction, and so eager to receive it, as some of them; nor so ready to think others better than themselves."

The work from which these extracts are taken was written for the satisfaction of friends. It could not but be, however, that a movement so remarkable as it describes, should raise in the world a good deal of suspicious opposition and dislike. And by-and-by, therefore, Edwards felt called upon to prepare another treatise of a more controversial nature, in which the character of the awakening was vindicated and further explained for the benefit of enemies. It is generally known by the title of "Thoughts on the Revival."

It is divided into five "Parts." The first shows that the movement was a glorious work of God; the second insists upon the duty of all to promote it; the third gives instances in which those connected with it have been injuriously blamed; the fourth makes suggestions as to the right conduct of it; and the fifth follows up in a fuller and more positive way the line of thought pursued in its predecessor. It would be well if those who still have their doubts about the marvellous visitations of the Spirit of God in the present day, could be induced to read, were it only the first part of this treatise. As a calm, thorough, and convincing defence of revivals, it is eminently satisfactory. He argues that the reasons why many questioned the reality of the work in New England, were just these three: First, they judged of it a priori,—that is, they had their own preconceptions about it, and refused to look the facts fairly in the face; second, they would not take the Scriptures as the only rule whereby it could be justly tried; and, thirdly, they would not be at the pains to separate the good from the bad in it. Our readers can say for themselves if such unreason as this has become extinct. Even yet it is probable there are some sincere Christians who shake their heads when mention is made of outpourings of the Spirit, and great awakenings following as the result of them. There has been enthusiasm here, and extravagance there, and inconsistency yonder, not to speak of the mixture of false doctrine that has cropped up even in the most promising districts. These cannot be associated with a true work of God. The whole thing must be nothing better than an unnatural and an unwholesome excitement. Alas! that it should seem to any now-a-days such an incredible thing that the Spirit of God should move powerfully among masses of men, or that Satan should be doing his utmost to mar a divine work. It looks as if the Church were losing somewhat of the simplicity of its faith, and were being corrupted by the sceptical spirit of the world. "I suppose," says Edwards, speaking of his own time, but the words are equally applicable to any,—"I suppose there is scarcely a minister in this land, but from Sabbath to Sabbath is used to pray that God would pour out his Spirit, and work a reformation and revival of religion in the country, and turn us from our intemperance, profaneness, uncleanness, worldliness, and other sins; and we have kept from year to year days of public fasting and prayer to God, to acknowledge our backslidings, and humble ourselves for our sins, and to seek of God forgiveness and reformation; and now when so great and extensive a reformation is so suddenly and wonderfully accomplished, in those very things we have sought to God for, shall we not acknowledge it? or do it with great coldness, caution, and reserve, and scarcely take any notice of it in our public prayers and praises, or mention it but slightly and cursorily, and in such a manner as carries an appearance as though we would contrive to say as little of it as ever we could, and even glad to pass from it? And that because the work is attended with a mix- ture of error, imprudence, darkness, and sin; because some persons are carried away with impressions, and are indiscreet, and too censorious with their zeal; and because there are high transports of religious affections, and some effects on their bodies, of which we do not understand the reason."

Our space is more than exhausted, but we cannot close without saying, what must have occurred to many others, that those who have self-sufficiently questioned the genuineness of the work of God at the present day, because, as they say, it has not met with the sympathy and support of the higher style of minds, would do well to inquire, first, if the revivals that have recently taken place really differ in any essential particular from the revivals of last century in New England; and second, supposing they find, as they will, the two movements marvellously similar in character, if it is nothing in their eyes that we have as a witness on the side of such awakenings as are now occurring,—of their scripturalness, desirableness, and utility,—the great and influential name of President Edwards.

K. L. W.

"GO YE THEREFORE, AND TEACH ALL NATIONS."

A FEW things about the COMMAND.

And we must remark, first, what a singularly loving one it is. Imagine Mohammed on his dying bed saying to his disciples, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth;" what would be his command? "Go ye therefore, with sharp scimitars, and propound faith in the prophet, or death as the dread alternative; avenge me of the men who threw stones at the prophet; make their houses a dunghill, and cut them in pieces, for vengeance is mine, and God's prophet must be avenged of his enemies." But Christ, though far more despised and persecuted of men, and having a real power which that pretended prophet never had, says to his disciples, as he is about to ascend to heaven, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." It is the voice of love, not of wrath. "Go and teach them the power of my blood to cleanse, the willingness of my arms to embrace, the yearning of my heart to save! Go and teach them. Teach them no more to despise me, no more to think my Father an angry and implacable Deity. Teach them to 'bow the knee, and kiss the Son,' and find peace for all their troubles, and a balm for all their woes in me. Go ye; speak as I have spoken; weep as I have wept; invite as I have invited; exhort, entreat, beseech, and pray, as I have done before you. Tell them to come unto me, if they be weary and heavy laden, and I will give them rest. And say unto them, 'I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, but had rather that he should turn unto me and live.'" What a generous and gracious command is that of the text, "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

"Go ye and teach all nations." The Greek has his philosophers; teach him; he is but a child; he is a fool, though he thinketh himself to be wise. There be polite nations, which have a literature of their own far larger and more extensive than the literature of the Christian: teach them nevertheless; they are to be taught; and unless they are willing to take the learner's place, and to become as little children, they can in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven. Do not debate and argue with them; put not yourself with them upon their level as a combatant concerning certain dogmas; insist upon it that I have sent you—sent you to teach the most erudite and profoundly learned; and when you shall claim it, I am with you always to back your claim, and men shall be willing to sit at your feet to be taught the name of Jesus.

I do not know whether all our missionaries have caught the idea of Christ—"Go ye and teach all nations;" but many of them have, and these have been honoured with many conversions. The more fully they have been simple teachers, not philosophers of the Western philosophy, not eager disputants concerning some English dogma—I say the more plainly they have gone forth as teachers sent from God to teach the world, the more successful have they been. "Go ye therefore, and teach." The fact has been proved, brethren, that there are no nations incapable of being taught, nay, that there are no nations incapable afterwards of teaching others. The Negro slave has perished under the lash, rather than dishonour his Master. The Esquimaux has climbed his barren steeps, and torn his toil, while he has recollected the burden which Jesus bore. The Hindoo has patiently submitted to the loss of all things, because he loved Christ better than all. Feeble Malagasy women have been prepared to suffer and to die, and have taken joyfully suffering for Christ's sake. There has been heroism in every land for Christ; men of every colour and of every race have died for him; upon his altar has been found the blood of all kindreds that be upon the face of the earth. Oh, tell me not they cannot be taught! Sirs, they can be taught to die for Christ; and this is more than some of you have learned. They can rehearse the very highest lesson of the Christian religion—that self-sacrifice which knows not itself, but gives up all for him. At this day there are Karen missionaries preaching among the Karens with as fervid an eloquence as ever was known by Whitefield. There are Chinese teaching in Borneo, Sumatra, and Australia, with as much earnestness as Morison or Milne first taught in China. There are Hindoo evangelists who are not ashamed to have given up the Brahminical thread, and to eat with the Pariah, and to preach with him the riches of Christ. There have been men found of every class and kind, not only able to be taught, but able to become teachers themselves, of the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ.

THE FIRST MIRACLE.

FROM the wilderness, the scene of His solitary wrestling with the powers of darkness, the Son of Man, with the work of his life clear before him, retraces his steps to the banks of the Jordan. His sudden disappearance must have perplexed the Baptist. Anxiously has he been waiting for the sound of that returning footstep,—for some sign, at least, which might mark, as by a luminous trace, the presence and outgoing of a new life in the world; wondering where and in what manner the glory that dwelt in Him would first shine forth in the eyes of men. Unnoticed as when He first came a way-faring man from Galilee, he passes through the crowd again; but one eye discerns the unknown Christ; and the first words that fall on the ear of Jesus, coming up from the wilderness after those stinging taunts and accursed whispers of the Tempter, are words which speak of suffering and redemption,—“Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.”

And now, by slow degrees, there are to gather round him a few faithful and loving souls,—a band of men whose hearts God had touched, drawn to him by a secret and resistless power,—at first with but faint and glimmering perceptions of his Divine nature, and the true glory of the kingdom he has come to set up on earth,—but to be trained, by daily communion and hard discipline of trial, to higher faith, and clearer spiritual insight. This is that goodly fellowship of the Apostles, whose humble Galilean names are spoken in all earth's languages, whose saintly memories are shrined in all devout hearts with reverence and affection next his own,—who, as the first companions and followers of the Son of Man, forsaking home and kindred that they might cleave to him, are, to the Christian's eye, like satellites for ever burning in a lucid ring round him, the bright and morning Star. As might have been expected, his first associates were chosen from among the disciples of the Baptist,—the inner circle of the religious life of Israel,—men in whose souls a deep and earnest longing for the coming of the Messiah had been awakened, and who, like their master, were watching and praying day by day in the belief that the kingdom of heaven would immediately appear.

On the day after John's first announcement, two of his disciples seeing Jesus passing on the way, followed him to his lowly dwelling. The day was waning, and night came on, yet they lingered in rapt attention to words which made their hearts burn within them; and, ere they left, a new hope had dawned in their hearts. In that poor chamber they had seen, at evening time, a heavenly vision, the light of which was never in any coming darkness to fade away from their eyes,—in whose joy, and strength, and glory they were to walk to life's latest day. One was Andrew; the other the youthful son of Zebedee, in whose fresh, genial, ardent nature there then sprang up that tender attachment to Jesus of Nazareth, as tenderly returned, which for ever links the name of John, as the beloved disciple, the Benjamin of the Gospel-Twelve, with that of his Lord. Andrew could not rest till he had found his own brother, and imparted to him the wondrous discovery; and then Simon, the “man of Rock” amongst the brotherhood, a spirit strong and fearless, alive with fiery impulses, and generous unselfish affection, stood, for the first time, face to face with Christ.

It is now time that Jesus should bend his steps from the valley of the Jordan homeward to Galilee. At the outset of his journey he meets with Philip, a townsman and friend of the two brothers, who instantly responds to the call, “Follow me,” and hastens to announce to his friend Nathanael, an Israelite indeed, a man of open, guileless nature, that in Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph, he had found the Christ, and looked upon that face, for a sight of which they had so often prayed, as the consolation of Israel. The doubts of Nathanael (better known amongst the apostles as Bartholomew, “the son of Tolmai”) vanished with almost the first words that fell from the lips of Jesus. The Saviour's eye had seen him under a fig-tree, where, as in a safe and secret oratory, screened by the dense low-hanging foliage from human sight, he had been pouring out his soul to God. There must have been something in the look or tone of Jesus which assured the devout and sincere seeker for truth, that He who had seen him there had read his deepest thoughts; and in the immediate conviction of His divine omniscience, Nathanael cried, “Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Israel.”

The Saviour's reply to this frank confession being addressed not to Nathanael alone, but to all his first disciples standing round, contained a mystery of truth which, as yet, they could not fathom,—“From henceforth ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man.” To no special season in his life did these words apply; and, certainly, to no vision of angels to be seen by the outward eye; but to the continuous abiding of the Divine energy upon him, and its ceaseless outgoing from him in gracious ministrations,—a life and power from ethereal springs flowing into him, and flowing forth in streams of blessing to the bodies and souls of men, so that in and through Him, the mystical ladder of the patriarch's dream,—the Mediator touching in his own person the Divine nature on the one hand, and the human on the other,—there might be opened, and kept open for ever, a communication between earth and heaven. Let the soul see the glory of Jesus Christ, and by faith live in Him, and in this fallen world angel visits are no more "short and far between." From each spot of earth touched by the knee of contrite believing prayer, under the fig-tree or in the inner chamber, on the bed of languishing or far off upon the sea, a new and living way, consecrated by the blood of Jesus, leads into the Holiest.

It was the third day from the calling of Nathanael, perhaps from their leaving the ford of Bethabara, when a marriage festival was held in a town of Galilee, about three leagues north-east from Nazareth. This town was the abode, very likely the birth-place of Nathanael, —a place, up till this time, of no mark or repute, quietly lying in the foldings of these Galilean hills, unlinked with any of the stirring events in the old-world life of Palestine, till it is suddenly brought forth from its obscurity, and touched by a gleam of sacred remembrance that endears the name of it for ever. There is another village in Galilee, Kefr Kenna, about half the distance from Nazareth, on one of the roads to Tiberias, which monkish tradition has selected as the scene of the miracle, owing to its being more conveniently situated for the resort of pilgrims. We owe the reinstatement of the real site to Dr. Robinson, who, from the hill above Nazareth, saw some ruins on a slope at the foot of the northern hills across the plain, which he found to bear the name Kéna-el-Jellil, the exact rendering of the Scripture name, Cana of Galilee; and, as such, identified with the locality of the miracle by earlier traditions. It is now deserted and without inhabitant, a few broken heaps on a bare brown hill-side. War has swept over it, and wasted it, leaving only these stones as the mouldering relics of the once peaceful and happy hamlet. There are no more betrothals, nor vintage songs, nor pleasant laughter of children; the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride are heard no more at all in Cana.

From the manner in which the mother of our Lord is introduced in connection with this marriage, and her familiar footing in the house, it may be inferred that it took place in the dwelling of some acquaintance or relative of her own. She was there from the first; and as soon as it is known that Jesus is in the neighbourhood, he and his newly-chosen disciples are asked to come. He at once complies. In all likelihood it was not the kind of scene or society in which these disciples expected Him first to appear on his return from the Jordan, and the solemn events that had there transpired. Still less could it have entered into their minds to conceive that a private dwelling, crowded with the light-hearted guests of a marriage festival, would be the theatre He should choose for the first manifestation of his glory. It might seem strange, and almost incongruous, that he who, a few days before, had been fasting in the wilderness, leading there as austere and lonesome a life as Elijah or the Baptist, should be seen seated at the banquet, mingling with the joyous company, entering into the spirit of the festive season, certainly not frowning upon it, as if all this was but hollow and thoughtless merriment. It is clear that his presence cast no chilling shadow on the guests, and did not damp the general rejoicing.

Nor is it difficult to see why, for the sake of these disciples, the Saviour should have selected this as the first occasion in which they were to see him in the society of men,—why, with the delicate and tender wisdom which we trace in all his dealings with them, He meant thus at the outset of his ministry to teach them a lesson which they needed to learn. Some, if not all of them, had been followers of the Baptist, venerating him for his severe and mysterious sanctity, deeply impressed by the stern, self-denying, unworldly life he led in the deserts. Fresh from the atmosphere of religious excitement in which they had lived, it was natural to think it was only by a life and ministry like John's that any thorough regeneration could be wrought in the corrupt mass of society, and any genuine or lasting spiritual result achieved. The life and ministry of our Lord were to be altogether different in character from that of the Baptist, its strain to be pitched on quite another key-note. The preacher of the desert was an ascetic, under the Nazarite vow from his birth, keeping himself aloof from men, neither eating bread nor drinking wine,—in all things unlike his brethren. The work of Jesus, on the other hand, was to be done on the broad highway of the world. His life was to be one of intimate fellowship with men. He was to enter into their joys and sorrows, to mingle in the crowd where all might throng and press and touch him, that from His quickening and gracious presence virtue might go forth to heal, and gladden, and bless them. Therefore it was meet that his first appearance with his disciples should be at a festal gathering,—that the first of his miracles should bear the stamp of a broad, complete, genial humanity.

The givers of the feast had not been able from poverty to make sufficient provision for the entertainment of their guests. So large and unlooked-for an accession to their numbers made a demand on their hospitality to which their straitened means were quite unequal. Mary at once applies to her Son, persuaded that in this difficulty he will be able to come to their help. Her words imply a belief in his ability to supply the deficiency, and in some immediate and supernatural way. Not certainly from any previous experience of his miraculous power, as has been supposed. The statement of the evangelist, that this was the beginning of His miracles, is decisive. No sign nor wonder had been ever done in the quiet home of Nazareth; but she who, from his earliest infancy, had a store of strange experiences in her heart, who had beheld him go forth alone, and return with these five grave and God-fearing men as his disciples, seeing the reverence with which they regarded him,—hearing from them, perchance, some report of what had passed in the interval,—was no doubt longing to see the veil of his humiliation cast aside. It was natural to expect that he would take the first occasion to show his divine power in friendly requital of the kindness of this poor household. But with this feeling there was blended a certain impatience or officiousness,—an overhasty expression of a mother's wishes to her Son. It is this that explains the manner in which he met the application, the manifest reproof which his reply conveyed, in the gentlest terms indeed, but still designed to be felt as a rebuke. The point of his answer does not lie in his addressing her as "Woman!" a term which has, to our ears, a tone of severity or coldness which did not belong to it as it came from his lips, as was touchingly proved in a later day when his eye rested on her as she stood weeping by the cross, and he said, "Woman, behold thy Son!" It is in the words, "What have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come." Rather, What in such a matter as this have we in common? thereby reminding her that in that higher sphere of his life in which He was to speak and act as Son and Servant of God the common rights of earthly relationship could not hold, that into this sacred region a mother's wishes could not enter, that He must be the sole judge when the time has come to manifest his glory as the Christ. His language was in spirit identical with his first words uttered years before in the temple when Mary said, "Thy Father and I have sought thee;" and quietly setting aside the earthly father's claim, he said, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" Or, as on a future occasion, when His discourse to the people was interrupted by an announcement that his mother and brethren were without, desiring to see him, he looked round about on his disciples and said, "Behold my mother and my brethren!" In all that appertained to his spiritual work, one will, that of his Father in heaven, was paramount; earthly ties had no place,—claims of human kindred must be forgotten,—the laws and the conditions of the lower relationship must bend to those of the higher.

We need only note in passing the emphatic rebuke and condemnation which these words furnish to the tendencies, dating as far back as the application to the Virgin of the name "Theotokos," or "Deipara," "Mother of God," which in the later phases of Romanism, have developed into the system of Mariolatry,—the exaltation of the Virgin to the throne of heaven, and the worship of the mother as Mediatrix in place of the Son, the one Mediator between God and man. Over against the prayers of the Romish Hymnals and Litanies, scarcely to be quoted without irreverence, "Show that thou art mother, and command the Son!" let the words, "What have I to do with thee?" be set, and all such blasphemous ascriptions must appear as insulting to the lowly maiden of Nazareth, as they are dishonouring to the glory of the Son of God.*

Thus mildly repelled, Mary makes no reply, but with perfect confidence in His wisdom and sympathy, inferring from his look more than his words implied, she leaves the issue in his hands, only saying to the servants, "Whatsoever he saith to you, do it." There was no long delay. The frequent ablutions which the Jewish law enjoined made an abundant supply of water on such an occasion essential. At the lower end of the apartment, six large vessels of stone, each containing at least twenty gallons, were ranged. These the Lord, unnoticed by the guests, commands the servants to fill with water. They are filled to the brim. Again he speaks, "Draw out now!" the "now" marking the divine volition by which the instantaneous change was wrought. They drew, and that which a few moments before had been poured in as water, is carried as wine to the ruler of the feast. The remark he makes to the bridegroom, on tasting it, simply attests the genuineness of the miracle. It affords no pretext for supposing that there had been excess on the part of the guests assembled at these lowly nuptials, but only alludes to what was too common on occasions when wine flowed freely,—an inferior quality being kept in reserve till the taste was dulled, and could not detect the difference. This was wine, rich and generous as any crushed from amber or purple clusters that long-past summers had ripened on the slopes of Lebanon, though he knew not how the coarse flagons of a peasant of Cana brimmed so suddenly with a beverage that might have sparkled in the golden beakers of Herod's banquet-hall. The secret was soon known; the bewildered bridegroom could only turn to the servants, and they who drew the water knew.

By this deed of power, wrought within a sphere so narrow as a village household, and for an occasion so common as a poor man's wedding-feast, that the Son of Man first on earth "manifested forth his glory." It was Omnipotence, calm and effortless in its invisible operation, which without sound or sign had gone forth from Him. Not in the name of God, as Moses or Elijah might have invoked it, but by a silent movement of his will, had this been done. Above all the prophets He stood in serene and solitary elevation, the anointed One in whom the Spirit dwelt without measure; and in the light of this brilliant evidence of His glory, the men he had called to follow him rose to a higher faith,—"His disciples believed on Him." It is a remark as old as Augustine, and devoutly made by him, but frequently quoted in a different spirit since, that this miracle of water changed into wine is one that every year repeats before our eyes,* when the spring rains that nourish the budding vine-leaves are by secret alchymy transmuted into the sweet and subtle juices that fill the swelling grape, and crimson in the drooping cluster. True it is that everywhere nature is unceasingly displaying mysteries and marvels of Divine power and goodness before our eyes; the signs and wonders of His glory are not only looking down upon us out of heaven, but springing at every moment out of the earth, as if He had stooped down and written in the dust with his finger the letters of his name. The book of nature has its miracles on every page as well as the volume of revelation, if we were but wise and would observe these things. But when we see the Son of Man by a silent volition reach in an instant the end which in nature is only attained through a slow, continuous, never-varying process in the appointed succession of the seasons, does He not thereby all the more signally assert and vindicate his supremacy over all material laws and natural agencies?

* The "Psalter of St. Bonaventura," one of the most popular manuals of Romish devotion, is based throughout on a deliberate substitution of the name of Mary in place of that of Jehovah, "How excellent, O Mary, is thy name in all the earth, who hast set thy glory above the heavens," &c.

* Ipse fecit vinum in nuptiis, qui omni anno hoc facit in vitibus Illud autem non miramur; assiduitate amisit admirationem.—Augustine, quoted by Oshawson and Trench.

We have already noticed the significance of this, the first of the gospel miracles, as bringing out in clear relief the distinctive character of the Saviour's ministry. As the first medallion struck to commemorate His assumption of regal state on earth, the image and superscription it bears is that of the Man Christ Jesus,—his heart throbbing with natural sympathies, his face shining with a frank and winning graciousness towards men.

And a symbolic meaning as profound lies in the special occasion out of which it rose. It was not to a common friendly gathering, but to a marriage-feast that He was invited,—and he went. It was not what we might call a necessary of life that failed, bread or meat; it was a luxury, only needful in so far as it was in harmony with the festal character of the gathering. He supplied it, and dispelled the sadness that clouded a poor man's brow at his seeming want of hospitality.

By this miracle our Lord did special honour to God's ordinance of marriage, making of twain one flesh. His presence gave the nuptial rite a higher consecration; His blessing sanctified and sealed the vow which bound husband and wife together in a covenant of love and truth, twining two lives in one, so as to be—

"The two-celled heart, beating at one stroke and making this union, "honourable in all," the symbol of a holier betrothal, and the eternal espousals of Himself and his Church. The heavenly guest of Cana has left the abiding benediction of his grace on the family and the house. We see the print of his footstep within the fenced and quiet enclosure where the household altar stands, and a godly seed is trained by believing parents "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." From the lonesome wilderness He came to the Galilean dwelling to hallow and ennoble all the relationships of life, all the sweet domestic charities, all loves and friendships and kindly sympathies between man and man.

His presence there rebukes and denounces the attempt so often made to exclude God from his rightful dominion over the whole nature that he has so fearfully and wonderfully made. It condemns alike the wild Manichean fancy which makes matter the work of the Evil Spirit,—giving to Satan, not to Christ, the lordship of the body,—and the monkish asceticism which pursues a phantom sanctity, not through self-restraint, but self-mutilation,—not by ruling the passions in the fear of God and training the affections in his love, but by uprooting and trampling them under foot as common and unclean. It shows us that the true Christian ideal, as exhibited in the graces of the One perfect humanity, is not to be reached in the hot-house air of the cloister, where all that should be wholesome and robust is blanched and sickly,—or in the rigours of the anchorite's cell, where all that should be beautiful and genial is stiffened and petrified,—but in the open air of the world, by mingling in the society of men, entering into common joys and sorrows, shrinking from no allotted duties nor trials, but preserving a Christian spirit in them all, and thus finding amid the dust and heat of life's beaten highway a path where we may walk humbly with God. Too often has it been seen that in aiming at a fictitious and impossible purity, nature has only sunk into fouler abysses of corruption.

Still further, the miracle, looked at in its unique and salient features, becomes a type or prefiguration of the great and blessed change which in His spiritual kingdom the Redeemer was to accomplish in the world. The first miracle of the Jewish lawgiver was to change water into blood, as a sign of judgment. The first miracle of Jesus is to change water into wine, as a sign of grace.—an announcement of the hope and gladness which His appearing and his work on earth were to bring to the souls of men. It was water in vessels, provided for the legal rite of purifying, that was by His word transfigured and sublimed to higher virtues, and so made to minister to the innocent enjoyments of the feast. And all that was good and true in the elder dispensation was in His hand in like manner to be exalted and spiritualized. He came not to destroy but to fulfil; not to abrogate the good, but to change it into the better; to translate the truth of all its rites and symbols into nobler and more enduring forms. He was to take the nature of man and cast it into a purer and heavenlier mould, to refine and enrich it through the purifying virtue of His love, making that which had borne the image of the earthly bear the image of the heavenly; entwining with all other ties and affections the golden thread of grace, which gives them strength by giving them sacredness. And thus we may affirm that in every renewal and transformation wrought by the living word of Christ in man, elevating that which is natural into that which is spiritual, the marvel of Cana receives perpetual fulfilment.

The quantity of wine supplied, if, as we have no reason to doubt, all the water in the vessels underwent this transmutation, may excite surprise. It has occasionally led to remarks somewhat in the spirit of the disciples on a later occasion,—“To what purpose is this waste?” But in this way, our Lord, while providing for an immediate want, no doubt designed by an act of kindness delicately done, to bestow a gift which in the straitened circumstances of his hosts, would be of substantial value. The gold, and frankincense, and myrrh were not wasted when laid at his feet in the poor abode of Bethlehem. And may we not discern in the largeness of the supply the stamp of divine munificence,—an emblem of the grace which giveth liberally and royally—which, in the higher necessities of the spiritual life, has promised to supply all we need, not according to our sense of it, but according to His riches in glory—which would have us ask much and expect much, because He is able to do for us exceeding abundantly, above all that we can ask or think?

Nor can we fail to see in it a foreshadowing of another marriage feast, when, with gladness and rejoicing, the bride arrayed in spotless vestments, and radiant with the beauty of holiness, shall be brought into the palace of the King; when the new wine shall be drunk in the kingdom of the Father, and blest in knowing more of the love which passeth knowledge, and the peace which passeth understanding, and the joy that is unspeakable and full of glory, the guests at the eternal Festival shall say,—

THOU HAST KEPT THE BEST WINE UNTIL NOW!

AUGUSTINE—HIS "CONFESSIONS."

ONE of the greatest and wisest living teachers of Christendom once said in our hearing, that the highest style of ministerial success is not the conversion of individual souls, but the leavening of the community with great general principles of Christian truth. Tried by this test, the most precious gift that God has given to the Church since the days of the apostles is the author of the "Confessions." Augustine the preacher is one of the few ancient preachers who still deserve to be studied as models. As a preacher, though not as an orator, he probably excelled John Chrysostom, the orator of the ancient Church. As a preacher, however, he could influence directly only a small number of his own contemporaries. But Augustine the doctor has influenced and moulded every great spiritual movement in the Church for fourteen hundred years. He and his immediate successors, by the proclamation and vindication of gospel truth, to some extent rolled back the tide of the Pelagian heresy, in the Western Church, through the fifth and sixth centuries. After this heresy, renounced and denounced in form, had been accepted and believed in fact, when the Church lay buried beneath the nightmare of Popish superstition and will-worship, it was mainly by his writings that the life of God was sustained in the bosom of God's "hidden ones" throughout the long night of the middle ages. When the life-giving stream of divine grace re-appeared, like another Arctusa, in the sixteenth century, it was Augustine, more than all other human teachers together, who raised up such men as Luther and Calvin to lead the people of God forth from their Babylonish captivity. And it was the careful study of his works that led to the formation of that institution of the Port-Royal (a "little flock" of God in the fold of antichrist, ultimately dispersed by Jesuit persecution), which has been immortalized by the Christian genius of Nicole, and Arnauld, and Pascal. At this hour, directly or indirectly, consciously or unconsciously, by sympathy or by antipathy, his influence is coextensive with Christian civilization. His spirit surrounds our spirit like an atmosphere. From the babe who lisps its prayer by its mother's knee, to the loftiest theologian and metaphysician, there is not a Christian, in any land or age, whose mind is free from the guiding and moulding power of "the doctor of grace."

His doctrine first achieved notoriety in its antagonism to that of Pelagius and his followers. Pelagius, under the name of Christianity, taught a pagan philosophy, without the pagan philosopher's frequent confession of darkness, and want, and woe. He maintained that there has been no fall; that every man is born such as the first man was created; that salvation means merely preservation from certain downward tendencies inherent in the nature of man as a creature; that for this salvation each man must depend upon himself, that it is within his own reach, and must be attained, if attained it be, by his own endeavours; and that by the "grace" of God is meant merely the outward revelation of the truth, along with a certain unexplained help which God in providence supplies to him who helps himself. In opposition to this baptized paganism, the Bishop of Hippo taught "the doctrine of grace." Augustine maintained that man was created "upright," with no inherent proclivity to evil, but a natural disposition to God and good; that now, however, he is fallen and lost, incapable of knowing, or loving, or serving the Lord; that the "grace of God which bringeth salvation" includes not only outward revelation in Christ, but inward regeneration, illumination, sanctification, the work of the Holy Ghost; that in bestowing that grace Jehovah is a sovereign; and that, once having bestowed it, he never withdraws it. This doctrine of natural depravity and death, of sovereign predestination to life, of the Spirit's efficacious grace, and of the saints' perseverance in grace, was, in his estimation, simply the doctrine of the gospel as opposed to the Pelagian heresy. It is the common doctrine of all the first reformers. After the defection of the Lutherans, and the rise of Arminianism, it has come to be associated with the name of Calvin. With the momentous exception of the great doctrine of justification by Christ's righteousness, which no one of the Church fathers apprehended and expounded in its due place and proportion, Augustinianism is the system which was finally formularized by the Synod of Dort, and which is now the creed of all the "orthodox" Churches of Reformed Protestant Christendom.

The personal "Confessions" of Augustine illustrate the origin of the creeds and confessions of the Churches.

It is sometimes imagined that these creeds and confessions are the product of mere idle speculation about things not plainly revealed, and not necessary to be believed; that the imposition of them has been but the amusement of arbitrary Church power. In point of fact, they originate in the very nature and necessities of the Church;—her nature, as an institution appointed to bear witness to the truth; and her necessities, as bound to preserve her own existence by guarding against opposing error. Thus, for example (the work of the four great ecumenical councils of the age of Augustine), the creed of the Church regarding the person of Christ was framed to guard against the heretics who taught, either that he is not true God, or that he is not true man, or that he has not two distinct natures, or that these in him do not constitute one person. Still more striking is the history of her creed regarding his saving work. Not only was it framed as an antidote to heresy; it expressed what had been discovered in the experience of God's saints to be the only relief to a burdened conscience, the only balm to a wounded heart; it was discovered, not in the dreamland of metaphysical speculation, but in the sunny meadows of God's revelation of grace. The whole creed of evangelical Christendom on this point is summed up in these two facts: on the one hand, that man is hopelessly fallen, guilty, depraved; on the other hand, that his salvation comes only from divine grace, freely providing for his guilt an atoning sacrifice, and for his depravity a life-giving Spirit. Our evangelical systems of theology do but unfold, in coherent order, all that these two facts involve. The facts themselves are confessed in the prayers, and verified in the experiences of all the children of God. But perhaps their most impressive verification, in post-apostolic ages, was in the experience of Luther and Augustine. In order to prepare a doctor of justification by grace, by Christ's sole righteousness, God gave to Luther an experience, all but unexampled in its severity, of the majesty of the divine law, and of the depth of human guilt. In order to prepare a doctor of conversion and sanctification by grace, of a salvation entirely from God, he gave to Augustine a wondrously profound experience of man's impotency, his spiritual blindness and death.

Accordingly, when the Pelagian heresy called him to vindicate the doctrines of grace, Augustine was able to say with truth that he then advanced nothing new, nothing but what he had long before believed and recorded in his "Confessions." The "Confessions" were written long before the controversy had begun; they show that at that early period Augustine was an Augustinian; they show that his Augustinianism was but the systematic exhibition of what he had experienced in the agony of his conversion to God. We do not purpose to give any detailed analysis or extract of this remarkable work. The general reader will find an abridged translation of it in Milner's Church History. The theological student will find a magnificent delineation of the Pelagian and Augustinian systems in Neander's Church History. We shall only give such notes as may illustrate the power of divine grace in Augustine's conversion.

Aurelius Augustinus was born at Tagasta in Numidia, A.D. 354—the same year with John of the Golden Mouth. In our article on Chrysostom (February), we pointed out some other coincidences in the history of these twin stars of the Western and Eastern Churches; that they were both the offspring of Christian mothers and of heathen fathers, and that both, at an early age, were left orphans to their widowed mothers' care. In other respects the early life of the future doctor of the Church contrasted most disadvantageously with that of her great orator. Gifted with extraordinary natural talents, he charges himself with having been an extraordinary instance of natural depravity. Even in infancy, he tells us, before he could distinctly speak his wishes, if these wishes were withstood or not understood, he would break out into stormy rage. He records, with pungent contrition, that on one occasion he accompanied a troop of black-guard boys to rob an orchard of wretched fruit, though he could have had for the asking as much as he chose of the best fruit at home. He gives as an illustration of sinful perversity that, while making brilliant progress in the study of Latin literature, he manifested an invincible repugnance to the study of Greek. When, at a very early age, he went to Carthage to be a teacher of rhetoric and practise the law, he confesses that he had no higher motive in life than a devouring thirst for literary renown. And here he plunged more deeply than at Tagasta into sensual indulgences, of which he continued the slave until he received a new life from God. While the heart went thus astray, the head, too, was turned. The prayers, example, instructions of his mother retained no hold of his mind. He fell into the heresy of the Manicheans. From Carthage, in his twenty-ninth year, he went to Rome. He continued to make progress in his literary profession. He continued to mingle gross sensual excesses with refined intellectual speculation. A sentence of Cicero's "Hortensius" profoundly moved him with the feeling of the vanity of his life. But it did not reclaim him to God or good. Highly accomplished, vainly seeking by mere intellectual pleasures, or by the grosser pleasures of sense, to satiate the soul's undying thirst, he was visited from time to time with desponding and weary remorse. How many of our own cultivated young men are at this hour in the same condition?

In the providence of God he was led to Milan. As a rhetorician, for the gratification of his taste, he began to attend the preaching of the good Bishop Ambrose. Gradually and insensibly he was so far won by the bishop's personal character, and convinced by his scriptural preaching, that he abandoned his Manicheism, though only, at the first, to fall into the abyss of scepticism. But one day alone in his garden, he was driven by the sense of his misery to pour out his heart in fervent prayer to God for light. While he was praying, he heard a voice which cried, "Take! take! read! read!" (the word of God). He eagerly seized a roll of New Testament MS., unrolled it, and read the first sentence on which his eyes lighted, "Not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying [let us walk]: but put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof" (Rom. xiii. 13, 14). We do not need to account for the vision. It is to the word of God, and to the Holy Ghost bringing it home with power to his heart, that Augustine ascribes his conversion. He immediately made open profession of Christianity, and from that hour began to live a Christian life. After remaining two years in the class of catechumens, he was baptized by Ambrose, A.D. 388, in the thirty-fourth year of his age. Of his subsequent career we need say only that it abundantly evinced the genuineness of his conversion; his natural fervour as a man was purified and melted into the sunlight of Christian charity; and his subsequent place and power as a bishop was consecrated, we have seen with what effect, to the praise of the glory of that grace by which he had been called from death to life.

For the encouragement of Christian mothers, we subjoin a few notes regarding his gentle mother Monica. Though no mother among us may reasonably hope to be blessed to give another Augustine to the Church, yet any Christian mother may reasonably strive to be another Monica. From the many hints that are furnished by the "Confessions," we conclude that she was by no means "strong-minded," but rather the opposite. But she was a true Christian, a daughter of God. And she loved her son, and strove and prayed for his conversion, with a Christian mother's devoted affection. He truly and tenderly loved her in return. But spite of all her entreaties and instructions, he plunged into one lawless excess after another; and long, long, she had to wait before her prayers were answered and her pains rewarded. She had no doubt occasional glimmerings of hope. One day she waited on her minister, on whom she had often waited before, and implored him to do something to reclaim her lost child; wearied with her importunity, the good man somewhat crustily dismissed her, assuring her, however, that it was impossible "that he should be finally lost who was the child of so many tears." Here we see a troubled smile dimly dawning through the tears. On another occasion she, too, had a vision, in which she was assured that before she closed her eyes in death she would see her son a Christian. But these somewhat questionable assurances were dim and feeble as compared with the actual fact, that he was rushing down the way of destruction. And when she went down to Carthage on occasion of his leaving for Rome, and he, in his kindly anxiety to spare her the pang of parting, slipped away to sea by night, she may have given way to utter despair—the mother may have died in her heart. Perhaps it was her Divine Father's purpose thus to wean his daughter from the world, by breaking her earthly idol. But he did not forget his promises or despise her prayers. When we next see Monica she is sailing down the yellow Tiber from Rome, knowing that she shall never again behold her African village, knowing that she is dying, but exulting in death, and seeing a new joy in the dawning heaven, because she is dying in the arms of a Christian son, who in answer to her prayers has been born again into the kingdom of God. As she closed her eyes, she thought only of his personal salvation. But as he buried her on the shore at Ostia, it may be that the recollection of her true heart's self-forgetting affection to him, gave him a deeper view of the selfishness and baseness of his past ambition, and fixed in his heart a deeper purpose to live to God's glory and the world's good. RED LIGHTS.

A BLACK night, an iron-bound coast, a howling wind, and a raging sea; and, bang! there goes the signal-gun! But the sound is almost drowned in the storm. And now streams up a rocket, like a serpent of fire, showing for a moment the devoted ship labouring and rolling in the trough of the sea, and tumbling on to certain ruin. "Light is sweet;" but that red light is ghastlier than the darkness, and shoots a pang to the heart of the hundreds who are watching on the cliffs.

When the Spanish Armada threatened our coasts, the English commander sent fire-ships into the midst of it; and the great galleys fled in every direction—some stranding on the rocks, and some drifting away into the sea. It must have been strange to stand on some eminence during that eventful night, and watch the breaking up of the host, and the twinkling of their scattered lights, as they spread like fire-flies over the deep.

When Horatio Nelson shattered with his cannon at Trafalgar the whole naval power of France, his friend, Lord Collingwood, had to carry home the captured vessels. But they were not to reach our shores. A great storm arose; and what a scene of terror it must have been, as one by one the huge men-of-war, their ribs already rent and torn in the battle, sank under the waves, or became wrapt in the flames to which they were abandoned! It was well to abandon them to the flames, for English humanity had already saved the inmates. But how often have cases of fire occurred where this was impossible! And how awful the result! A great ship, with hundreds on board, drifting madly in mid-ocean, the flames feeding on her timbers and climbing her masts, and none to help, and none to save, and a fearful gale urging her to destruction! It is the most terrific picture that the imagination can contemplate. What an awful tale does that distant blaze suggest, as it gleams over the darkening sea!

Now, look across the ocean of life. We are all sailing there. Many of us are going prosperously and pleasantly; most of us are going, at least, comfortably and easily.

Week comes after week, and year after year, and finds us much as we were—not much better, not much worse—losing old friends, making new acquaintances—eating and drinking, marrying or giving in marriage—labouring for daily bread, and getting out of life what enjoyment we can. And as we are doing, so are other men doing in every tongue and nation of earth; and as this generation is doing, so were our fathers—age after age gliding down the stream, rougher at one time, smoother at another; but not very different now from what it was before. But stop! what is that blaze that lightens up the horizon? What is that devoted vessel hurrying on, with sloping masts and dripping prow, and timbers scathed with the fire, and gaping to the sea—a cloud of vengeance above it, and a blast of perdition urging it on its way? Read the name on its side. It is JUDAS ISCARIOT. Across eighteen centuries we catch the signal of that soul's ruin and doom. Or, again, look at that other so many centuries nearer. How, in the despairing darkness, the flames of remorse leap up and curl round the shuddering ship, "set on fire of hell" before the time! That is poor FRANCIS SPIRA, who three centuries ago denied his God, and drifted into the midnight of despair. Look where we will across the tide of time, in every country and in every age, we cannot escape the sight of these waifs and wrecks, whose sins are open beforehand, going before us to a terrible judgment. And sometimes it is not one lone wreck, but a vast and general conflagration that seems to red-ten the deep. How many pestilences, how many famines, how many wars, have decimated the generations of men! The destruction of Jerusalem, the engulfing of Lisbon, the Black Death of former centuries, the Cholera of our own time—how many and vast calamities rush upon the mind as we think of the subject! Yes; the sea of life is not all a calm and prosperous one, or, at least, it is never free from lurid and warning lights.

My friend and reader—reading these sentences somewhere far away, and unknown to me who am writing them—I do not speak of these terrible things that you and I may hug ourselves in our safety and happiness. Many people like to hear of great and crushing calamities, because they have the secret comfort of thinking that they are not exposed to them. Are you sure that we have no interest in these things ourselves? Some of those of whom I have spoken were signal sinners; but not all. They were men like ourselves, with like passions, consciences, and sins. Those Galileans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices, were not sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things. The truth of God brought another lesson out of their fate. These red lights concern all who sail the sea of life.

But I wish now to appeal to your own experience and observation. History is a distant and doubtful thing; but we all know what we have ourselves passed through.

You and I, reader, were once at school, in some great town, or English village, or Scotch parish, or Irish hamlet. We are now grown up, and those who were boys and girls with us have grown up too. We have all gone a little way on the stream of life, and we know a little about those who have sailed it with us. We ourselves, I will suppose, are outwardly virtuous and prosperous; we have sailed well, and the sun shines upon us.

But what of all that little fleet that set out along with us? How many wrecks? How many drifted asunder? How many have sunk into the deep even in the mid-day calm? How many have dashed upon the rock? How many are dismantled for eternity?

I know nothing more touching than thinking thus of our old associates. Some of them are far away, in Australia or Canada, and we shall never see them more. Others are near us, but separated in spirit. Others are deep in some pursuit of the world—it is their life and their hope. Some are struggling slowly against misfortune, finding life a hard and heavy work. Others are floating on the top of the wave, far higher than we would ever have expected them to be. And some are away from us for ever—citizens now of that dark land from which they shall not return.

But we are happy if there are not some of our old acquaintances who set out on life with us together, but who are now like beacons and warning fires to us. Are there none of them in the drunkard's grave, or in the Valley of the Shadow that hangs over the drunkard's life? Have none of them split on the rock of crime! Or, at least, are there not some who have been smitten by sudden and great calamity, even though we cannot trace any reason for it in their actings and their life?

Yes; this is what I for my part have to confess, though I cannot venture to explain it. Of those whom I knew well when young, and whose course I have followed since then, there are one or two who seem to have been singled out for great and crushing calamities, whose boats have dashed upon the rock while I have been sailing upon the stream. Have not some of you, my readers, observed the same thing? And can you say that those your associates, who were smitten while you were spared, were sinners of a darker type than yourself? I cannot say this. Looking into my own heart, knowing my own history, and remembering what those my friends were in our early days, I dare not say that the judgment which spared me came on them for their greater sins. Rather, as I look on some of them, and remember well how they resisted some temptations into which I fell, and stood forth for right when I was cowardly and false, I tremble as I think, if such things have been done in the "green tree" on earth, what shall be done with the "dry tree" when it falls into eternity?

I do not wish to press this in the least upon any readers who do not think it concerns them. Some of you may have never met with such cases. But with those who, like myself, know them well, I should like to take counsel. You and I, at least, have to do with these things. They have come across us in our individual history. Others have nothing to do with them, but we have, and we alone. We cannot shake them off. God has planted them in our lives, and made them part of our personal history. They are not like things which occurred ages ago, and which concern other men as much as us. These red lights are in our track, and if we wilfully sail past them and drift into perdition, what shall be the end of those who, with such warnings, obey not the gospel of Christ?

But now, my dear friends, who have been kind enough to consult with me so far, if I know anything of the human heart, you will probably be saying by this time, "Yes, I know that such things have happened, and that in my own experience; and I cannot shake them off, for they are too near me. But what lesson do they bring? If it was the ruin of some one who had been conspicuous for his crimes, I could see something in it, and would listen to the friendly moralist. But these calamities have fallen black and heavy, on people who, as you acknowledge, were not much worse than others; not worse than you or than myself. What lesson is to be found there?"

My friend, I shall give you no answer to this. I merely refer the question back again to your own conscience. It is not my business, much as I should desire to help you, to deduce lessons from events which have occurred in your own history; and were I to attempt it, I would in all probability make mistakes. Besides, there is no need. This is one of those cases, in which, as I believe, every man's conscience speaks loudest and truest, if he will only listen honestly to it. Therefore I would only ask you, as I wish to do myself, to think over your own history, and the disasters which have fallen on those around you, and not on you, and to ask your own conscience what it says on the subject. If you can honestly say that you escaped because you deserved not to die, then you are surely happy. But can you say this? Can I? Let us think together on the subject, remembering only those echoes of a divine voice,—

"Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?"

"Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance?"

'Remember, therefore, the goodness and severity of God; unto them, severity, but unto thee, goodness.'

"Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish."

"Thou doest terrible things in righteousness. According to thy fear, so is thy wrath."

"One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; but is long-suffering to usward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance."

And now, my dear friend, I have left you to deal yourself with these fatal lights around you, because our conscience, if we listen to it, is quite able, by God's blessing, to tell us the truth about them. But there is another light which our conscience does not tell us of, of which we must speak before we separate. For the red lights on the sea of life tell only of ruin; but there is a light come into the world that men may live and not die.

I have seen it rising slowly, broadly, and wonderfully on the horizon of life. I have tried to turn to it the prow of my own bark, and my desire is to sail towards it evermore, leaving behind the shadows and the darkness, and passing into the everlasting dawn.

We are all sinners exposed to the just judgment of God. There are storms of indignation and wrath, and tempests of tribulation and anguish, whose proper home and work is in a world of sin. But God restrains them for a while, and keeps back the thunderbolt. Only now and then, as providence passes on, does a stray flash escape, and a sinner perishes in his sin. Yet surely the clouds are gathering, and the end of these things is death. Our hearts condemn us. Year after year loads us with sin. Other men die by the judgment of God. We live, but all our days pass away in his wrath, and we feel as if our lives were more dreadful than death could be. And our fears are true; for God, who is greater than our hearts, has said it.

The Lord Jesus Christ, the eternal Son of the eternal God, stands on the horizon of this dark life, and calls to light and blessedness. Not on the horizon of human life generally; but in your life, and in mine, my dear reader, He has appeared. From our earliest years we have been hearing his voice. Christ is speaking to you, week by week, as if I had no existence; and to me, as if you were not in the world; to each of us individually, as if there were no other in the universe who had to do with him. He tells us that we are laden with sin, and weak with iniquity; that we have destroyed ourselves; that we are morally loathsome and vile in his pure eyes; that every day of our life is full of sin; that we need a most almighty salvation. And he tells us that he, to save men, has stooped from the immortal splendour and unspeakable blessedness of God to become man; that he embarked on the tossing and agonizing sea of our human life (he, the Rock and centre of all things), and was there pursued like a leaf by the storms of God, and dashed in utter ruin upon the blackest ledge of evil, the Son of the Blessed suffering intolerable pangs; and that all this was for pure love to ruined men, and compassion to lost souls. And now also God has highly exalted him, and clothed him with light as with a garment, and given him a throne built up for ever over against the troubled sea of human life, on which he sits dispensing life to men, as the purchase of his sorrow and the reward of his glorious work. He can save us from the sins that are past. He can save us from the sin that is in us. All is dark in every other direction; but Christ the Lord, in the horizon of every man's life, is the bright and morning star.

Look, therefore, to him. Look, and the star will brighten more and more, and broaden into a glorious sun. Look, and even if you cannot see him at first, you will see the great light that tells of his presence; and if you still look unto him, God the Spirit will reveal God the Son as God the Father's gift to you for salvation. Look, and do not look away, for the sea is filled with warning wrecks. Look, and the world will be filled with Him, and thy sun shall no more go down.

Yes, this world is a troubled sea; but he is a happy voyager who can stand on the deck in the white robes of forgiveness and sanctification, with Christ's word for his compass, and Christ's holy will for his guiding star, and the spirit of Christ for his unseen pilot, and the glory of Christ for his desired haven. God grant to you and me, my dear reader, a gracious breeze, "a sweet west wind of heaven," that we at last may anchor in the city of God! For "the people that dwell therein are forgiven their iniquity." D.

STUDIES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND CHARACTER.

CHARLES SIMÉON.

ON the 12th of November 1836, all the shops in the principal part of the town of Cambridge were closed, though it was the market-day; and in almost every College in the University, the lectures were suspended. It was the funeral day of Charles Simeon, who had died at the ripe age of seventy-seven, and whose mortal remains were then to be committed, till the resurrection morning, to their last earthly resting place. Heads of colleges, and professors, and men of all ages and stations and opinions came to do honour to this man of God in his end. The provost of King's walked immediately before the bier; the pall was borne by the eight senior fellows; the persons who made up the procession, walking three or four abreast, nearly extended round the four sides of the quadrangle: and a multitude of men, women, and children, all in mourning, crowded the chapel where the service was performed, giving proof that they were real mourners by their sighs and tears.

"Turning," says an eye-witness, "to my old recollections, I could scarcely have believed it possible that Mr. Simeon could thus be honoured at his death." Seldom, indeed, has there occurred a case, in which so bright a sunset has followed so threatening a dawn.

He was born at Reading, September 24, 1759. When yet very young he was sent to Eton; and at the age of nineteen was entered as a scholar in King's College, Cambridge. Only three days after his arrival in the University he was told that in the course of a few weeks he would require to attend the Lord's Supper. This announcement awakened extreme alarm in him. The thought rushed into his mind "that Satan was as fit to attend as he," and that if there was no alternative but to partake, it was absolutely necessary for him instantly to prepare for so solemn a service. Without a moment's loss of time, therefore, he bought the Whole Duty of Man (the only religious book he had ever heard of), and began to read it with great diligence, at the same time calling his ways to remembrance, and crying to God for mercy; and so earnest was he in these exercises that within the three weeks he made himself quite ill with reading, fasting, and prayer. But the effort was not in vain. The intimation that had so startled him turned out to be the means ordained by God for carrying conviction to his conscience. His prayers for light and mercy were not disregarded. A vital change came over his whole views of life and duty; and, says he himself, "from that day to this, blessed, for ever blessed, be my God, I have never ceased to regard the salvation of my soul as the one thing needful." But although he was brought thus far at that time—reaching as we cannot doubt the crisis of his spiritual history—it was not till three months after that he attained to the peace of believing—that he knew by experience the joy of God's salvation. The manner in which this new revelation, with its results, came to him, is exceedingly instructive. "In Passion week," he tells, "as I was reading 'Bishop Wilson on the Lord's Supper,' I met with an expression to this effect,—That the Jews knew what they did when they transferred their sin to the head of their offering. The thought rushed into my mind, What! may I transfer all my guilt to another! Has God provided an offering for me, that I may lay my sins on his head? then, God willing, I will not bear them on my own soul one moment longer. Accordingly I sought to lay my sins upon the sacred head of Jesus; and on the Wednesday began to have a hope of mercy; on the Thursday that hope increased; on the Friday and Saturday it became more strong; and on Easter Sunday (April 4) I awoke early with these words upon my heart and lips, 'Jesus Christ is risen to-day! Halleluiah! Halleluiah!' From that hour peace flowed in rich abundance into my soul."

Forty years after that memorable Sabbath morning, Mr. Simeon had occasion to put in writing the "circumstances of his inward experience;" and in the paper then prepared occurs the following:—"From that time," the time when peace flowed into his soul, "to the present hour, I have never for a moment lost my hope and confidence in my adorable Saviour; for though, alas! I have had deep and abundant cause for humiliation, I have never ceased to wash in that fountain that was opened for sin and uncleanness, or to cast myself upon the tender mercy of my reconciled God." And he adds at the close, "This now is my one ambition, to live with one Mary at my Saviour's feet, listening to his words, and to die with the other Mary, washing his feet with my tears, and wiping them with the hairs of my head."

Simeon was now, then, at the age of twenty, a converted man, prepared with such fervour as nature and grace combined to give him, to devote himself and his all to the service of Christ. So unobtrusive, however, at that time was the New Testament Church in England, that three years elapsed before he met with a single "religious" person. Even after his ordination in 1782, he still found himself in the same isolated position; and so earnestly did he long to know some one who had the same views and feelings with himself, that he had serious thoughts, he tells us, of putting into the newspapers an advertisement to this effect, "That a young clergyman who felt himself an undone sinner, and looked to the Lord Jesus Christ alone for salvation, and desired to live only to make that Saviour known to others, was persuaded that there must be some persons in the world whose views and feelings on this subject accorded with his own, though he had now lived three years without finding so much as one; and that if there were any minister of that description he would gladly become his curate, and serve him gratis." As it happened an advertisement so curious and so affecting did not require to be sent forth on its mission. An evangelical Christian was at last found in Cambridge, without the use of the "Hue and Cry." This was Mr. Atkinson, the minister of St. Edwards, through whom also Simeon was introduced to the Venns, a family whose intimacy he came to prize above most other earthly blessings.

His first ministerial duty was undertaken in connection with the Church where he had first heard what he believed to be the truth preached. His friend Mr. Atkinson left Cambridge during the long vacation, and he engaged to serve the charge in his absence. The extraordinary zeal with which he entered on his new work, and the equally extraordinary effects which his labours produced, immediately attracted attention to him, and made him the subject of general conversation. In the space of a month or six weeks the church became quite crowded, and the Lord's Supper was attended by three times the usual number of communicants. The very day his engagement commenced he began to visit the parishioners from house to house, and before it terminated there was not a single dwelling within the bounds into which he had not entered, with his cordial and Christian salutation and inquiry, "I am come to inquire after your welfare. Are you happy?" "He is calculated for great usefulness," writes Mr. H. Venn of him at this time, "and is full of faith and love. My soul is always the better for his visits. Oh, to flame as he does with zeal, and yet be beautified with meekness! This," he adds, "is the young man who was bred at Eton College; so profligate a place, that he told me he should be tempted even to murder his own son (that was his word), sooner than let him see there what he had seen. This is the young man so vain of dress, that he constantly allowed more than £50 a-year for his own person. Now he scruples keeping a horse, that the money may help the saints of Christ."

In the end of 1782 Mr. Simeon was appointed incumbent of the Church, over which he presided till his death. It was that of Trinity, one of the largest places of worship in the town of Cambridge, and situated in the very heart of it. Noticing its suitability as a centre for the diffusion of evangelical influences, he had often wished in his heart that it could be made his; but the gratification of his desires in this respect seemed in the last degree improbable. It so happened, however, that just at the time when he was leaving the university for good, the incumbent died, and his father being acquainted with the patron, the Bishop of Ely, an application was made for the living on his behalf. The application was successful, but he was not permitted to enter on his ministry in peace. The parishioners were almost unanimously in favour of another man; and their opposition to the settlement proposed was vehement and determined. We cannot, of course, go into the miserable affair here. It must suffice to say, that Mr. Simeon considered himself justified in forcing his way into the cure, and that the people in revenge not only appointed their favourite (as they had a right to do), to the lectureship associated with the charge, thereby leaving to the minister no more than forty guineas a year as stipend, but locked up the pews and seats which they had been in the habit of occupying, so as to prevent others from attending a church from which they resolved henceforward to absent themselves. This deplorable state of things continued for many years. "It was indeed painful," says the chief sufferer, "to see the church, with the exception of the aisles, almost forsaken; but I thought that if God would only give a double blessing to the congregation that did attend, there would on the whole be as much good done, as if the congregation were doubled, and the blessing limited to half the amount. This has comforted me many, many times, when, without such a reflection, I should have sunk under my burdens." He still held his Fellowship in King's College, and the income which he derived from it, along with his private means, made the smallness of the stipend received from Trinity a matter of indifference; and as he continued to believe that here was the very corner of the vineyard which the Lord intended him to till, he determined to hold on in faith and patience; using, meanwhile, such extraordinary methods of good doing as might present themselves, in the hope that the bitter feelings against himself would wear away, and that success would at last follow his efforts where his labours were, to begin with, so unacceptable. He was not, in the end, disappointed; but before his sun rose clear above these clouds, others as dark and unpromising rolled up from different quarters to add intensity to the gloom. His doctrine was held to be extravagant, if not unsound; his mode of action was declared to be eccentric and irregular, and his whole demeanour was pronounced enthusiastical and unchurchman-like in the highest degree. Hence he was now frowned upon by his bishop, now called to account by a college professor, and now subjected to insolence from the gownsmen. Through good report and evil report, however, the good man bravely fought his way, giving, as year after year rolled on, new evidences of the fineness of his spirit, the purity and disinterestedness of his motives, and the gracious and benevolent tendencies of the religious system which he preached. It was not in the nature of things that a light so singularly bright as that which burned in him should remain for ever obscured, either by the malice or the prejudices of men. For more than half a century he laboured in the ministry for nothing; for absolutely no emolument whatever. As his reputation increased, all the livings in the gift of his college were in succession offered to him; but true to his first conviction, that Trinity was the watch-tower to which he was appointed, he steadily refused them every one. His elder brother proposed to leave him property, the possession of which would have required his abandoning his residence in Cambridge, and on this ground he persuaded him to bequeath it otherwise. On the ground that if he did not do so, he would be obliged to resign his fellowship, and thus diminish his power of good doing, he remained unmarried. And though he derived, in the later years of his life, a large income from the sale of his publications, he accumulated no fortune, but spent it all in promoting the cause and establishing the kingdom of his great Master. No wonder, then, that after years of difficulty, and coldness, and resistance, he burst forth into the full influence and recognised honour and credit of a faithful and devoted servant of the Lord.

It is admitted by those who knew him best, that Mr. Simeon was not a man of commanding intellect, or great learning, or extraordinary powers of judgment. The wide and blessed influence, therefore, which he exercised over the age in which he lived was owing chiefly to the strength and excellence of those moral qualities which distinguished him as a Christian minister. During the half century of his active life, the power of evangelical religion revived in an extraordinary degree; and there cannot be a doubt that to that result he himself largely contributed. If, in 1830, it was no longer necessary to advertise for a Christian in Cambridge,—if the gownsmen crowded into Trinity not to insult, but to listen,—if the doctrines of grace were regarded with respect in the university, and if the Church of England was beginning in earnest to take a part in the evangelization of the world, the change was attributable to few things so much, under God, as the consistency, and wisdom, and energy of Charles Simeon! His history has, in consequence of this, an interest for us, not merely as being that of one who was brought in a singular manner to the knowledge of the truth, and who, after opposition such as few would care to encounter, achieved for himself and his cause a position of influence and respect, but also as being the story of one who played a most conspicuous part during the transition period of religious life in England. We propose, therefore, now to give some illustrations at once of that character which proved itself so influential, and of the ways in which it told upon the men and movements of his time.

Here was the secret spring whence he derived those supplies of grace which kept the fountain of his spirit so fresh and full. He rose invariably every morning, summer and winter, at four o'clock, and after lighting his fire, devoted the first four hours in the day to private prayer, and the devotional reading of the Scriptures. The copy of the Scriptures he was in the habit of using was "Brown's Self-interpreting Bible," a work which he so highly prized that he did what he could to put it into the hands of all the godly ministers of his own acquaintance. In Mr. Simeon's preaching two things appear to have been peculiarly marked; the Scripturalness of his statements, and the "unction" of his delivery. In these, probably, lay his power. How did he get them? It was, without a question, by following the practice just referred to. "Among the many sweet sentiments contained in your letters," says he, in 1811, to his friend Mr. Thomason, "I am particularly struck with one which entirely accords with my own experience, namely, the importance of a devout reading of the Scriptures for ourselves, in order to qualify us to speak to others. There is, I am persuaded, more in this than pious ministers are in general aware of. God does draw nigh to the soul that seeks him in his word, and does communicate an unction that is in vain sought for in the books of men; and that unction will, like the ointment of the right hand, bewray itself, both in the pulpit and out of it."

The biographer of Mr. Simeon has not followed the example of too many of his class and represented his hero as perfect. He has, in so many words, told us that the besetting sin of Mr. Simeon was vanity, and that, moreover, he was afflicted with a hastiness of temper which betrayed him often into unseemly irritability and impatience. What such a man might have become to the world gone well with him, and there had been no former of his character but Nature, it is impossible to say. But all the more remarkable, when we know that this was his disposition, appear those manifestations of humility, and candour, and sweetness of spirit in which his life seems to have abounded. A dignity of the Church once spent a Sabbath evening in Mr. Simeon's rooms, and ere they separated the host for the night prayed. It was such an offering, doubtless, as was often made to God in the same place; but the visitor was extremely struck by it, and he could not help saying to the curate who accompanied him on his way homeward, how much he had been affected with the deep humiliation of Mr. Simeon's prayers, particularly with the confession, that our very tears need to be washed in the atoning blood of Christ. In the year 1807, Mr.

Simeon was laid aside for a time from active duty, and his place in Cambridge was occupied by Mr. Thomason. This devoted servant of God (one, with Martyn and Corrie, of the earliest missionaries to India) rose to the occasion, and those who enjoyed his ministrations felt now and then that there was a richness and fulness in his discourses which did not appear always in those of his superior. Mr. Simeon, therefore, on coming back to Cambridge after a prolonged absence, found (a trial surely to his natural vanity!) that he had not been greatly missed. But his joy in the spiritual success of his substitute banished every unworthy feeling from his mind, and after hearing him preach he turned to a friend and said, "Now I see why I have been laid aside; I bless God for it."

The following has been often told, but it will bear repeating in this connection here. An intimate friend of Mr. Simeon once called for him and found him so absorbed in the contemplation of the Son of God, and so overpowered with a display of mercy to his soul, that he could not utter for a time a single word. At last, after an interval, with accents big with meaning, he exclaimed, "Glory! glory! glory!" The friend who witnessed this affecting transport was so overpowered by it that he began to doubt the reality of his own religion. "You see here," the tempter whispered, "a pattern of Christian zeal and fervency; what do you pretend to? It is plain you have neither part nor lot in this matter." He sunk into deep despondency, and as, some time after, he was on his way again to Mr. Simeon's rooms, he said to himself, "Ah! if my friend, who is so full of religious joy and so flourishing in his soul, knew me and my barrenness, he would not suffer me to enter into his presence." But on reaching Mr. Simeon he was taught a lesson he had not anticipated. The happy believer who had enjoyed such rapturous communion with Christ was now in tenfold greater misery than himself. He could scarcely speak now from humiliation of soul and contrition. Humbled before God, he could only cry out, "My leanness! my leanness!" and, striking on his breast, uttered the publican's prayer.

The subject of missions to the heathen had long engaged the attention of Mr. Simeon before anything was actually done by his party in the Church of England towards sending evangelists into the field. Through his influence, however, and that of others like minded, the Eclectic Society (a sort of evangelical club which existed at that time), was persuaded at last to set about the matter in earnest. Accordingly, a special meeting of those favourable to the positive commencement of work, was convened on the 18th of March, 1799, and the preliminaries being then and there settled, the Church Missionary Society was launched into existence on the 12th of April following. This great and influential association had, so far as numbers went, a very humble beginning. Sixteen clergymen and nine laymen were all that composed its first public meeting; but if the assembly was small in quantity it was rich in quality, and one might safely have predicted that such men as Venn, and Pratt, and Grant, and Wilberforce, and Simeon would not combine for any fixed purpose without achieving large measure of success.

From circumstances known, we may venture to assume, to the whole world of religious readers,—for who is unacquainted with the life of the prince of missionaries, Henry Martyn,—Mr. Simeon's interest in missions became, shortly after this, unspeakably deepened. At the meeting of the Eclectic Society, referred to above, one of the difficulties stated and discussed in relation to the commencement of evangelistic work in India, was the supposed impossibility of finding clergymen—men of education and ability—to leave all their home prospects to undertake it. Mr. Simeon proposed to get over this by sending catechists; but in the course of a year or two he was taught that when the Lord hath need of labourers he can find them anywhere. The student who, in 1802-3, seemed most certain to attain the highest honours of the University of Cambridge, and who in point of fact did attain them, was one of the young men who waited on the ministrations of the much-spoken-against incumbent of Trinity. A senior wrangler might reasonably hope for speedy advancement in any profession he chose to adopt; and though the successful prizeman on this occasion entered the Church, it would, of course, never enter the minds of Mr. Venn or Mr. Pratt, that a man with such prospects would for a moment dream of placing himself at their disposal. God, however, often surprises us, by showing how easily he can appropriate and use the highest talents. Henry Martyn, the first student of his year, the Cambridge senior wrangler, was moved by a higher spirit than that of worldly calculation to offer himself as a missionary for India; and it is one of the most memorable points of interest in Mr. Simeon's history, that "the immediate cause of his determination to undertake this office, was hearing Mr. Simeon remark on the benefit which had resulted from the services of a missionary in India." What an influential "remark" that was, which under God sent Henry Martyn to India! Think of what he became, and of what he achieved, of the thousands on thousands who have been benefitted by his life, and of the many who have by the contemplation of his zeal been moved to follow in his footsteps!—and then you may form some idea of the power of one "fittly spoken" word. It is rather remarkable, as we had occasion to show in these pages before, that this is not the only case in which a "remark" by Mr. Simeon had far-reaching consequences. If to him we may attribute, in a sense, the lifting up of the missionary banner among the clergy of the Church of England, we may also, in the same sense, attribute to him the deepening of religious earnestness among not a few of the clergy of the Church of Scotland. An appeal from him was blessed to the spiritual enlargement of one minister, who afterwards was himself greatly owned in his Master's work, Dr. Stewart of Moulin; and in the frequent tours which he made at various times in the north, the evangelical clergy there, as they themselves confess, were refreshed and heartened, and the cause which they represented—the revival of spiritual religion—was appreciably strengthened and advanced.

It should not be forgotten, in noticing the part taken by this single-eyed servant of Christ in the religious movements of his day, that great as was, necessarily, his interest in missions to the heathen,—not only Martyn, but Thomason going forth to India from his own family circle as it were,—it is doubtful whether he did not manifest even a deeper anxiety in the conversion of the Jews. In the service of the society established for the promotion of that object, he travelled through the three kingdoms, and made two journeys to the continent of Europe—one to Holland, another to France; and but a week before his own death he dwelt with deep feeling on what he called “our ignorance, as well as want of feeling on the whole subject.” “See,” said he on that occasion, “how wonderfully God speaks of his ancient people. He calls them, 1. The dearly beloved of my soul; and then he says, 2. I will plant them in their own land assuredly, with my whole heart, and with my whole soul; and then again, 3. He shall rejoice over them with joy; he will rest in his love; he will joy over thee with singing; nay more, 4. They shall be a name and a praise among all people of the earth.” It is not, indeed, wonderful that a mind so steeped in Scripture as his was, should have adopted strong views in regard to the destiny of the chosen people, and of the relation of the Christian Church to them. Such a result, we may confidently say, and it is a significant thing to say, is inevitable.

Some of his dying sayings, collected from the narrative of his last illness appended to his memoir,* must form the finishing paragraph of this sketch. When all hopes of recovery were taken away, and this fact had been made known to him, a friend, sitting by his bedside, asked of what at that time more particularly he was thinking. “I don’t think now,” was the reply made with great animation, “I am enjoying.” He then spoke with great and simple-hearted submission of his dependence upon God, concluding with these words, “He cannot do anything against my will.” “You find the Lord Jesus Christ to be very present, and giving you peace?” it was said to him at another time. “Oh yes,” he answered, “that I do.” “And he does not forsake you now?” “No, indeed! that CAN NEVER BE!” “When I look to him,” he said again with singular solemnity, “I see nothing but faithfulness, and immutability, and truth; and I have not a doubt or a fear, but the sweetest peace,—I CANNOT HAVE MORE PEACE. But if I look another way—to the poor creature—oh, then THERE is nothing—nothing—nothing [musing]—but what is to be abhorred and mourned over.” On asking him if I could do anything for him, or if he wanted anything, he said very slowly and distinctly, “Not anything; I want nothing. Are you not surprised to hear with what composure I can say that! I seem to have nothing to do but to wait. There is now nothing but peace—the sweetest peace.” And so he passed away,—the sting being taken out of death,—the same Saviour whom he had been enabled through grace to serve being his sensible support through the dark valley.

N. L. W.

“WHERE IS ABEL THY BROTHER!”

“AND the Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother?” The Lord said unto Adam, “Where art thou?” and unto Cain, “Where is Abel thy brother?” This is the order,—first thyself, ever fit to be in the presence of God, and then thy brother, where is he?

What a question this for Cain! How well he knew where Abel was, the very spot in the field where he lay; how well he remembered the last look of the corpse lying still, pressing down the grass, the blood sinking down and oozing into the opening earth: he knew it all; the picture was before his eyes for ever, drawn in colours bloody red, burnt into his very soul. “My sin is ever before me.”

Cain knew; and God knew as well. He had seen it all,—the blow, the blows, the blood, the death; and the blood cried aloud for vengeance from the ground. Thus he comes near to Cain, touching his conscience on the tender place, “Where is Abel thy brother?” There are some sins which provoke God’s vengeance, and weary out his patience more than others, and murder is one of them. It is a dreadful thing for one human being to take away the life of another, and the more dreadful form is when that other is thy brother, and such a brother—an Abel.

God has not left this world to care for itself. Though he does not always step out of his place to punish each sin as it is committed, he yet sees all, notes and remembers all. Each act and fact is as well known to him as if it alone were the sole object of his care. The law carries its sanction with it. Each breach of the law carries with it the sentence of death. It is not executed speedily. God is in no haste for execution of judgment: the criminal cannot escape him; his dignity, his authority can lose nothing by delay, and hence the sentence against the evil work is not executed speedily; and therefore, instead of using the delay for the purpose of obtaining mercy as God intends, the hearts of the children of men are fully set in them to do evil.

God virtually asks each of us on the back of each sin of omission and of commission in which our neighbor is involved, “Where is Abel thy brother?” God holds us responsible for all that we do, which by its effects has an injurious action on any of our fellow-men. The blood of the body resting red on the hand is terrible to think of; but it is only as the small dust in the balance when compared with the blood of a human soul.

* By Rev. William Carns. London: Hatchard.

It will not do for us to reply by the question of Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" He was a murderer and a liar. "I know not," says he. We do not mean to stand in his place, to occupy his vacant room? He says, "Am I my brother's keeper?" As if he had meant to insinuate, "Thou art. He is thy favourite; is he not thy special charge?" This will not do for us. It did not do for him. Master! where is the soul of thy servant? Mother, father! where is the soul of thy child? Sister, where is the soul of Abel thy brother? Minister, elder, official of whatever name in the Church of Jesus Christ! where is the soul of the man whom God put under thy charge, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made thee an overseer? Think, each of you in your several places and relations, what answer you will have ready when the Judge of all the earth comes to hold inquest over all these, and all other matters. Think of that sin which you committed; another saw it, and, excited by your example, followed in your footsteps. Stronger than he, you stopped short; God had mercy on you and arrested you in your downward way; but your weaker brother staggered wearily, blindly on, and at last his feet stumbled on the dark mountains, and he fell quick into the jaws of the second death. Where is Abel thy brother?

Think of that young man whom you once saw going forth on a Sabbath-breaking excursion. You passed him, in the pride of face, on your way to the house of God. A kind word and a gentle warning from you would have stopped him then; but he went on, and from bad to worse. Drunkenness followed, and the end was death; and you might have prevented it all had you spoken the word in season; but, like the priest and the Levite, you passed by on the other side, and left your brother to perish. Another may have passed and stopped; a good Samaritan may have been found to bind up the man's wounds, but that will be no reply for you when God asks, Where is Abel thy brother?

Do you remember that pleasant excursion you had with your friend? You set out in the morning together; you spent the day in varied talk—story, tale, quotation, joke; you poured forth all your stores, and your wit was exuberant and delightful; it was a day of gladness, and to be remembered for many a noteworthy thing; but you never spoke to him of God; you never asked whether all was well with his soul; whether he rested for righteousness on the finished work of the Lord Jesus, and was accepted in the Beloved;—for all that passed between you that day you might have been a follower of Confucius, or Mohammed, or a believer in Jove, and not a disciple of the Lord Jesus. That day's work stamped its impress deep on the soul of thy careless brother. It added another stone to the door of his sepulchre, another rivet to the strength of the chain of iron wherewith he was bound. It built him up and confined him in his carelessness. It was another stab at thy brother's heart, and God asks about it, Where is Abel thy brother?

You are your own and you are your brother's keeper; and you will never learn how to keep or care for your brother till you have learned to keep and care for your own soul, and this you will never do till God keeps you. You will never do any good to others till God has done good to yourself. You must have salvation and the joy of it before you will care to speak of it. David prays, "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and uphold me with thy free Spirit: then will I teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto thee."

These are solemn questions, dear reader, for thee and for me: Is there really the blood of an Abel on thy hands or mine? Have we, by any act of omission or of commission, sent the soul of a brother down to the pit of death? Is it so that through all eternity, in hell, some brother can lay the guilt of his eternal death, instrumentally, at your door or mine? Surely the bare possibility that it may be so should quicken us to redoubled zeal and diligence, working with our might the things which our hands find to do. And with what earnestness of soul ought we now to offer up this prayer of David's, "Deliver me from blood-guiltiness, O God, thou God of my salvation; and my tongue shall sing aloud of thy righteousness?" The apostle Paul could say, "I take you to record this day that I am pure from the blood of all men." And he could say that because he could also say, "That by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one, night and day, with tears." Have your answer ready when God comes to ask, "Where is Abel thy brother?" A.

A FAMILY TEST OF CONVERSION.

You tell me a man is changed by the converting and renewing grace of God. Let me look at him? It is something that I may see him with the Bible in his hands. It goes as confirmation that I behold him on his knees. It helps the evidence that I hear him speaking his public vows in covenant with God and his people.

But I would rather visit him in his home; see what sort of a husband and father he has become; whether he is gentle and self-restrained, when he used to be petulant and irritable; whether he is monarch of all he surveys, or the servant and minister of all,—lives to receive the incense of the family homage, to be saved trouble, and to guard his personal comfort and convenience from interference and restriction, or to lavish thought, and toil, and care, upon the welfare of all the dependent circle. Let me know, is he eager to lift off the household burdens from the frailer form at his side, and adjust them to his own broader shoulders? Especially, has he become, in a scriptural and meaning phrase, a nursing father to the little ones there? Are they only the playthings of his idle moments, with whom he frolics as so many kittens when he is good-natured, or looks upon as so many stumbling-blocks to be pushed out of the way when he is moody and hasty?

or are they young plants to be watched and nurtured for the garden of God, youthful learners to be taught the way of life, early pilgrims whose feet he is to lead with his own in the path to heaven? Show me the evidence that he has discerned and accepted his most privileged and responsible calling of nurseryman for the great Husbandman in this little plantation of immortals. I wish to see him kneel with his right arm around his eldest born, and his left on the cradle of his babe,—to hear him with a tax which he shall feel, because it is painstaking study and effort, and yet for love's sake shall not feel, because it is freely and gladly borne, reading and expounding to young learners the way of truth and salvation. If his heart is not thus turned to his children, it is not turned to Christ.—Rev. A. L. Stone.

CONSIDER THE LILIES.

THE lilies fair are found
On shadowed ground,
The shady haunts of sunny clime,
And breathe the balm of summer time :
Refreshed by morning dew, and veiled from noontide glow,
They taste the softest light and air, and this is how they grow.

Updrawn from verdant sod
By look from God,
These holy, happy flowers pervade
The sloping lawn, the forest glade :
And charmed by zephyr's wing, and lulled by streamlet's flow,
They calmly muse, they brightly dream, and this is how they grow.

They bloom in sheltered nook,
By purling brook ;
And earth how firmly, fondly loves
These treasures of her streams and groves :
The dark mould cherishes their petals white like snow,
With heaven-apportioned nutriment, and this is how they grow.

I have considered them,
The flexile stem,
The blossoms pending airily
Beneath their leafy canopy,
Their witching fragrance, spotless hue, and thus I feel and know
That God imparts their loveliness, and this is how they grow.

THE SCEPTIC'S WISDOM.

THE practice of the sceptical expositor is precisely parallel to that of a physical empiric, who, having made himself well acquainted with the mechanism and laws of his native planet, its geology, its chemical constitution, and its vegetable and animal organizations, should deny or neglect all those more mysterious and inexplicable phenomena which indicate the relation of that planet to the great system of the universe; or if he did not treat such phenomena with contempt, should persist in the endeavour to explain them in connection exclusively with the private or home economy of earth. On the contrary, he ought always to keep in mind, that this single world is an inconsiderable member only of a system far more extensive than human philosophy can embrace; and that, therefore, it is probable—nay certain, that the relation of the part to the whole overrules, in some inscrutable modes, the private mechanism of each planet throughout.

And it is thus that the sceptical expositor of Scripture, having gathered to himself (very incorrectly, it is probable) a system of divine and moral philosophy, from the homestead of the human family, resolves to receive from God's revelation not a tittle that does not naturally find a place in some compartment of his mundane science. Whatever in the Scriptures seems to pass on elliptically beyond the orbit of our world, whatever stretches itself out to greater dimensions than the human mind can readily compass, whatever dimly declares the relation of the human system to the universe of moral agents, or to the infinitude of the divine nature, all such things, because no place or nook can be found for them in the previously-digested philosophy of this terrene theologian, and because they can be but imperfectly understood, or must be received, if at all, as bare affirmations, all these things, we say, he discards and contemns; and in high scorn casts them out for the acceptance of the superstitious vulgar. This is the procedure of scepticism; and this its wisdom!—Isaac Taylor.

FOR MINISTERS.

THE right text is the one which comes of itself during reading and meditation; which accompanies you in walks, goes to bed with you, and rises with you. On such a text thoughts swarm and cluster like bees upon a branch.

There is as real an order in the evolution of parts in a tree, as in the successive additions which build a house; and if a discourse proceeds by an inward law, which disregards symmetrical plans, it may have more coherence and vitality than could be produced by rule and square.

Constant perusal and re-perusal of Scripture is the great preparation for preaching. You get good even when you know it not.

Where there is more voice, more emphasis, or more gesture than there is feeling, there is waste, and more powder beyond the shot.—J. W. Alexander.

WANDERINGS OVER BIBLE LANDS AND SEAS.

SHUNEM, NAIN AND NAZARETH.

EARLY in the morning of Wednesday, the 24th June, our little encampment in the garden of the Fountain Gardens (Engannin) was broken up again, the tents were struck, our hasty breakfast of eggs and coffee was finished, and we set off once more across the plain of Jezreel, without prospect of a shelter from the scorching sun, except such as we might find under trees or rock, until evening, when we hoped to rest in the Latin Convent at Nazareth.

Our first point was Zerin, the ancient Jezreel, now a collection of poor Arab huts. It is situated, like the other villages on the plain of Esdraelon, on a slight elevation which commands a fine view across the level, from the fertile and wooded range of Carmel on the west, to the valley of the Jordan on the east, the isolated heights of Tabor rising in the distance on the north. The dogs howl and prowl around it as they do around all Arab villages, and as they did in the days of Jezebel and Ahab, and of the murdered Naboth.

It is remarkable how even the intermittent and feeble adherence of Judah to God gave a stability to its metropolis and its government, which the transient and arbitrary dynasties of the ten separated tribes never knew.

Jerusalem was supreme and unrivalled among all the cities of Judah, as the house of David among all the families of Judah, but in the history of Israel how often the metropolis is changed; oftener even than the dynasty.

Bethel might attract the tribes sometimes when they desired to wrench some selfish advantage by mercenary sacrifices from indifferent or reluctant Powers, but it was no centre of national unity. Shechem and Tirzah and Samaria and Jezreel were royal residences rather than national cities. No heroic or patriotic songs are inspired by these names, still less any sacred psalms. They are mere Versailles, with pleasure-grounds and "Naboth's vineyards," but with no Acropolis and no Temple—idling places of a court, not rallying points of a race. What Jewish heart in exile ever wailed, "If I forget thee, O Samaria!" With the Temple and the city of God the history of the ten tribes seems to lose all its patriotic interest, and to become little more than the record of a Persian satrapy, or a series of Egyptian dynasties; little more, and therefore far less, inasmuch as all gifts of God rejected, degrade by the measure of the height to which they might have raised.

The events of national interest connected with this portion of Palestine seem confined to the period before the parting of the stream into the two channels; the descent of Barak's patriotic band from Tabor, the victory of Gideon, the flight and capture of the Midianites chieftains, the defeat and death of Saul and Jonathan on the high places of Gilboa, bewailed in David's generous dirge. From the period of the disunion the interest of the national history, religious festivals, reformations, patriotic conflicts, desperate clinging to the ancestral city even in its desecration, all are concentrated in Judah. Whatever of interest lingers about the ten tribes gathers around individual narrative, biographies of persecuted prophets, stories of humble home life. The sacred names of Israelitish history are not Samaria and Jezreel, but Carmel, Sarepta, and Shunem. The rents in the national Jewish life, however, let the light stream through on the great Gentile world beyond, and it is significant that the only narratives quoted by our Lord in connection with the history of Israel are those of the widow of Sarepta and the Syrian leper.

But perhaps the most touching and familiar story connected with the later history of Israel is that of the "great woman" of Shunem, which place was our next halting point after Jezreel. The characters are so attractive, the incidents so touching, the details so minute and the end of the story is so happy, that it rises like a strain of joyous-singing, or like an illuminated fragment of gospel narrative from the dreary chronicles of the houses of Jeroboam, Ahab, and Jehu.

The village of Solem (Shunem) is situated on the side of a hill, forming part of the range of Little Hermon and Gilboa. Belonging to it were some luxuriant gardens of lemons and oranges, such as we had not seen since leaving Jaffa and the maritime plain. They were enclosed with fences of prickly pear.

After passing these orange gardens, we came to an abundant spring welling up cold and pure from a cavern in the hill-side. A number of the villagers gathered around us with a friendly curiosity, and one kindly-looking woman offered me a draught of water from her pitcher, and made no request for baksheesh in return. We thought the spirit of the hospitable Shunammite must linger around the place.

Somewhere near this fountain and these orange-gardens the "little chamber" had actually arisen on the wall of the house of that open-hearted Jewish gentlewoman, so womanly in the thoughtful care which set the bed, and the table, and the candlestick; so princely, in the refusal of all return. She needed no favour from court or camp. She could receive no reward for care so freely bestowed. She dwelt among her own people.

Then the child's voice coming to gladden the household; the new mother's love with all its possibilities of sorrow; the boy returning from his manly occupations in the sultry harvest field, and drooping in the summer noon, and dying on his mother's knee; the little chamber entered with the mournful burden of that precious corpse laid on the bed, prepared with such kindly care of old for the man of God; the chamber door shut on the silence of death; the grief which found no utterance except in action until the prophet was reached; the rapid ride across the long reaches of the plain from Gilboa to Carmel, with the complaint which could be trusted to no messenger or mediator, but must burst straight from the mother's lips to the heart of the man of God himself; the quick sympathy of the prophet, who saw through the "It is well," which was all she vouchsafed to Gehazi, how her soul was "bitter" within her; the officious formality of the selfish Gehazi, deeming that the dignity of heavenly messengers must be fenced by courtly etiquette from too fervent petitions; the miserable unsympathizing coldness of the man who knew much of the forms of religion, and nothing of the heart of God. How, indeed, could the prophet's staff in his hand have awakened the dead child? The prophet did not use his staff. It was through no cold mechanical medium he drew the life from God, which he communicated to the boy. He shut the door upon them twain; he prayed unto the Lord, and eye to eye, mouth to mouth, warm living hands on the cold dead hands, he stretched himself, until the dead waxed warm with the life of the living, and the child opened his eyes, and the mother was sent for, and with a joy apparently as unutterable in its intensity as her sorrow had been, "fell at the prophet's feet, and took up her son and went out."

Love, with its lowly common necessities and sorrows, had come to break up the princely calm of the Shunammite lady's life, and henceforth she was to be tossed about on the sea of our common human hopes and fears, and could no more say, "I have need of nothing."

When the seven years' famine came, she fled at Elisha's warning into the land of the Philistines, and when she returned she sought his intercession with the king, and obtained the restitution of her lost inheritance, the inheritance of her son, among these hills and plains, and among these gardens of Shunem. To her as to us, God's most precious earthly gifts are not those which land the heart in a haven of rest, or smooth it into an even surface of ease, or fill it with a little quieting draught of comfort; but those which launch the heart on the seas, where it is tossed and strained, and finds goodly pearls,—those which upturn its depths, and water them, and make them fruitful. The man of God had not deceived her, or given her a stone for bread. Nor will God do so to us.

From Shunem we crossed the shoulder of Little Hermon to the poor little village of Nain, where we made our mid-day halt in the court-yard of one of its hovels, under the shadow of its one olive tree. The rest was very welcome on the breezy hill-side.

The owner of the poor cabin was friendly, and brought us coffee in a tiny cup, thick, according to Turkish custom, as chocolate, but very refreshing. Two or three bright-eyed boys gathered around us. I volunteered to mend one of their very simple garments; and they were in ecstasies when they discovered the secret of our coasting glass, and found the sheep on a distant hill brought quite close, so that altogether we parted very good friends.

A few poor cabins, on the steep hill-side, one olive among them, a little below, a well with one green tree near it, and a few ruins, or scattered stones,—and this is Nain.

The transition from Shunem to Nain seems easy and natural. You could scarcely find two points at which Old and New Testament history more easily coalesce than in the two narratives which hallow these two villages, situated so near each other on opposite sides of the same hill. The names of both are preserved unmistakably in the language of the peasants, unperplexed by any monastic traditions.

Again, it is a story of life and death and life restored, and of an only son.

This poor little village was a "city" then—a town with walls and gates, and multitudes of inhabitants, many of whom thronged out of the gate with the funeral procession, which wound down the steep side of the hill to the burial-ground outside the walls. For nearly two millenniums now, every one of the multitude who followed that one dead fellow-townsmen have passed away to the bourne from which he only ever returned. Probably they all lie buried, that busy throng, in the cave-tombs beneath this hill to which they were bearing him. And every vestige of their life has vanished except the memory of that one funeral, which has made their dwelling-place a household word in Christian homes all over the world. The procession was issuing from the gate down this hill-side—not silently, and with slow, measured step, as on such an occasion among us, but lamenting loud and passionately, with hurried steps and rent garments, weeping, and pouring forth that terrible, piercing wail as they went—the open bier borne on the heads of the bearers—amongst them one broken-hearted, desolate woman, who probably did not wail, but only wept—when they met the company around Jesus entering the city; a larger group than usual, for the day before, the centurion's servant had been healed at Capernaum, and "many of his disciples went with him, and much people."

Then came one of those revelations of the heart on whose love the universe depends, which ought to have silenced for ever all those negative definitions of a Being too sublime to feel, at which our hearts shiver and fold up into themselves.

"When the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her." It was no exceptional compassion, no mere capacity of sympathy, put on with his human nature; it was the divine pity which, though now first it beamed or wept through human eyes, is the same from everlasting to everlasting in the heart of the eternal Father and the eternal Son of his love—the same now, not measuring our sorrows by his infinity, but by our suffering. In a few minutes the cause of the widow's tears would be removed; but his words of sympathy, "Weep not," anticipated the work of mercy. His touch arrested the bier; his voice reached the dead. It was not the first time the dead had been won back to life among those hills. Yet how different the character of the miracle!

In the little silent chamber, with the closed door, in the house at Shunem, on the opposite side of this hill, Elisha had prayed and contended in God's strength with death. His prayer was heard, and through the living prophet life flowed from God into the dead child. The prophet called on God, because God knew his voice. He did not call on the dead. His voice would not have reached that inviolable world. But at Nain how different! How tranquil and majestic the bearing of the Son of God! No effort, no recorded prayer, no touch; but simply the imperial, divine, "I say unto thee, arise," from the voice which penetrated into the world of spirits, and recalled the disembodied soul from Hades, as easily, as gently as a mother's voice awakes a sleeping child. At Shunem it was the living in contact with the dead. At Nain it was the life-giving, the life himself, laying his irresistible command on death itself, the last enemy.

And great fear came on all. They must have felt, for the hour at least, that the Person was more wonderful than the miracle.

"Jesus delivered him to his mother." The heart that had been moved with compassion by her tears cared for her joy. Let us treasure up those traces of his love, and let us not say only when we think of them, "How human our Saviour was!" This love, this tender pity, this caring for our transitory joys and sorrows, are divine; divine far more than human; and only human because they were first divine.

At Nain, after our rest, we remounted, and after passing a well where they were watering a flock of graceful, long-eared goats, crossed another reach of the plain of Esdraelon. Tabor rose on our right, and beyond the low ridge which connected Tabor with the surrounding hills, towered the distant, snow-streaked Hermon. The plain was partially tilled, and was covered in many places with a waving plant, with a prickly, starchy flower, and bluish leaves, which, in the distance, had the effect of long, rippling pools of water.

Every detail of the scenery gathered a deeper interest as we advanced, for we were fast approaching the home of our Lord's early human years; the scenery through which he had not merely passed on his rapid, toilsome journeys, but amongst which he had lived for nearly thirty tranquil secluded years. That night we were to sleep at Nazareth.

Slowly, after leaving the plain, we rode up, winding through the valley under what is traditionally called "The Mount of Precipitation," to the fountain known as the Fountain of the Virgin. The fountain now flows beneath a stone arch, through a marble spout, into a large stone trough like a sarcophagus, and thence trickles away. It is an abundant spring of good water, and many of the women of Nazareth were gathered around it, talking, as they waited for their pitchers to fill, at the evening hour when we passed it. We enjoyed a draught from it, and had no doubt that, eighteen hundred years ago, one maiden of Nazareth, "blessed among women," used to take her quiet way down that winding road to this very spring. And, in after years, did not the feet of the "child Jesus" actually tread the same path?

Of all places in the world I had almost longed to see this most. It seemed as if the sight of the scenery of that home at Nazareth would help more than anything to fill up the silence of those long, unrecorded years. And now at length this little secluded hollow of the Galilean hills, which had cradled the childhood of our Saviour, opened on us; a little quiet valley, or basin, surrounded by hills on all sides, except at the narrow pass from the plain of Esdraelon, through which we entered it; a village shut out from the world; white houses, partly nestled in the bottom of the hollow, and partly, on one side, climbing the hills, which, in that place are steep and craggy,—the hill on which the city was built.

We rode through the streets to the Latin Convent—a large white building, with flat roof, and long airy corridors, where we lodged during the two nights we remained, willingly exchanging our tents for the hospitality of the monks, and their large, cool, clean rooms.

Before breakfast the next morning we all rode with Mr. Huber, the Protestant missionary, around the environs of Nazareth. As we left the village at that early hour, we saw, through an open door, two women grinding at a mill in the court-yard of a house. From the heights above we had a magnificent view, from Carmel on the west, stretching its green and wooded heights into the blue Mediterranean, over the high table-land above the sea of Galilee, to Tabor on the east, dotted thickly with trees and green to its level isolated summit, and Hermon, pale in the distance, with its silvery streaks of snow. It was a rough ride, over rocky fields, and through terraced olive gardens and vineyards, sadly ruined and wasted by the Bedouins and the Turkish soldiers. The views changed continually, and were very beautiful. The hills were much more varied in form than the round monotonous heights in the south of Palestine, near Jerusalem. We had not seen anywhere in the Holy Land such really mountain landscapes. The long waving wooded range of fruitful Carmel, with all the hills and valleys between it and Nazareth, dotted here and there with white villages, and sprinkled with clusters of trees, contrasted with the symmetrical isolated hill of Tabor, and that again with the long, pale, snow-streaked ridge of Hermon and the Lebanon. The valleys also were as varied as the hills, from the quiet oval hollow of Nazareth itself, with its corn-fields and olives, through the countless slopes, and dells, and little plains between us and the Mediterranean, to the long, ocean-like sweep of Esdraelon on the south, beautifully green (Mr. Huber told us) in spring with corn. In one olive-garden we dismounted to look at an olive-oil press, a cistern hollowed in the solid rock of the hill-side, and connected by a groove, or channel, with another deeper cistern cut out of the rock below, into which the oil flowed as it is trodden out of the olives. Any little details of domestic life had peculiar interest at Nazareth.

We returned to the convent by the steep side of the hill, up which climb the houses of Nazareth, tier above tier. Many people believe this to have been the brow of the hill on which the city was built, from which the people sought to cast our Lord down. It seems more probable than that they should have taken him more than a mile up the hills to the traditional Mount of Precipitation. The hills of the valley in this point is, in some places, precipitous and craggy.

In the afternoon, some of our party took a second ride over the surrounding country to one of the two villages, supposed to be the Cana of the miracle. But we preferred relinquishing this expedition for the unspeakable delight of a quiet ramble on foot alone over the hills in the immediate neighbourhood of Nazareth. We rambled and rested several hours on those breezy quiet hills, aromatic with the fragrant thyme, which the bees of the land of milk and honey love. On the top of the hills the air seemed like a sea-breeze, so fresh and reviving; probably, indeed, it was a breeze steeped in the freshness of the Mediterranean which we had seen from the higher ground that morning. The varied foldings of these hills form many quiet nooks, as lonely as if you were in the desert,—in the desert-place to which, in after years, He went a great while before day to pray. Just round the shoulder of the steep which Nazareth climbs, you lose sight of every trace of the village. Many lovely wild-flowers grow on the heights, sea-pinks, a little delicate blue blossom like the nemophila, brilliant scarlet poppies, the graceful wild convolvulus, and others not so familiar to us. But the burst of beauty among the wild-flowers follows close on the rainy season, and this was past when we were there.

We paused chiefly at two points on the hills to look, and sketch, and rest. One was a height just above the "brow of the hill on which the city was built," looking down an abrupt descent on the white roofs of the Latin Convent, some houses of considerable size, across the narrow valley to the opposite hills broken here and there into terraces, earth, and rocks, brown and warm in tint, with clusters of gray olives among them, and the isolated top of Tabor towering alone behind and above the range of hills which immediately bound the valley.

As we walked from this spot we saw a group of children clustered under an olive. It was a school, and we admired the taste of the master in the selection of their study, and wondered whether he knew how to give them lessons from the "lilies of the field" and "the fowls of the air." A little further up, the broad western landscape opened on us, hill beyond hill, village and cornfield, and olive groves, to Carmel, and the golden line of the Tyrian sands meeting the blue waves of the "great sea."

Our second resting-place was at the head of the hollow or basin of Nazareth, which, as before mentioned, has no outlet except at the lower end towards Esdraelon. Here we were near the ruined vineyards we had ridden over in the morning, and commanded the whole length of the valley. Just below us, was the flat roof of the Greek convent on the traditional site of "the House of the Virgin;" beyond it, on the left, a group of people thronging around a well. At our elevation we could hear no sound, but on visiting this well afterwards, we found its scanty and badly-managed water a scene of the most violent quarrelling among the women of the village for the right of the first turn. At that height, however, all this was inaudible or only reached us in a broken hum. On the hillside, on the right, the flat-roofed houses rose half hidden amongst trees, and conspicuous among them the white minaret of a mosque gleamed like ivory amidst its black cypresses. Beyond the village stretched, in the perspective of the valley to its termination, a long range of golden cornfields, broken at intervals by the olive groves which swept down across them from the hills. The valley ended in the cleft of the hills through which we had ascended from the plain, and beyond this stretched the broad sweep of Esdraelon, level as the sea, bounded in the far distance by the undulating line of the hills beyond Jordan, the land of Gilead. At that hour everything was bathed in the loveliest light. Hill, and valley, and cornfield, and the distance glowed in the warm evening tints, and the long, broken shadows of the hills, were thrown at intervals across the valley of Nazareth.

We knew we must not trust the brief twilight, and hastened to return over the broken terraces of the ruined vineyards. That afternoon walk was one of our brightest memories of the Holy Land; and yet how is it possible to transfer the impression of a delight which consisted chiefly in being there, in gathering the common wild flowers on those hills, in feeling their fragrance, in watching the common changes of sun and shade, day and evening on those scenes, in walking on the rough rocks and broken clods of earth, and breathing the breezy air, and feeling with every sense that Nazareth, the home of the Son of God for thirty years, is no dream-land, but actually a place on this common everyday earth?

On our way back to the Latin Convent we came on another olive or wine-press, hewn out of the solid rock, with a pit ten feet deep to receive the oil or wine; and crossed several tanks and terraced vineyards, all now disused, and waste, and ruined.

We have no "Gospel of the Infancy" like that early apocryphal book which is said by the contrast of its absurd stories to form such a commentary on the divine origin of the genuine narrative. Our only "Gospel of the Infancy" and childhood of our Lord is contained in two short sentences, "He grew in favour with God and man," and "He was subject unto them." Brief but vivid traces of those many years of love and service. Two brief sentences;—and Nazareth. This is all we know. But in the silence of the Book, the Land speaks to us with peculiar power, through the scenery of the daily life of that sacred home whose history is concealed with so thick a veil. In the absence of the record of words and acts, it is something to fill those years with the pictures of the breezy hills, the deep secluded valley, the wide prospects across the land from Gilead to the sea,—the glimpses of Tabor and distant snowy Hermon, the mountain landscapes and the lonely nooks on the hill-sides, fragrant with thyme and bright with flowers, among which those years were spent.

What thoughts those wide views of hill, valley, Galilean villages, the distant Tyrian shore, the great battle-field of Edraelon, and Hermon with garments "white as no fuller on earth can white them" awakened in the Redeemer's heart, and what prayers those silent hills have witnessed, the rest of the gospel narrative may tell us. Tiberias, the Mount of Transfiguration, Olivet, Gethsemane, Calvary, give us abundant comments on the silent pictures of Nazareth.

PRAYER-MEETINGS AND BROTHERLY LOVE.

"I BELIEVE in the communion of saints," should not merely be a barren article in our creed, but a blessed experience manifesting itself in our lives.

And prayer-meetings do very much to turn this into joyful reality. When little companies of Christians come together every week to lay open their hearts to God and to one another, they take one of the best means for promoting and strengthening their mutual regard. Indifference is impossible in such an atmosphere. If you are a Christian yourself, you cannot fail to love the brother who has often knelt with you at the same throne, offered the same petitions, advised with you in your difficulties, endeavoured to share with you the burden of your cares, "rejoiced with you when you rejoiced, and wept with you when you wept." You count such an one as a brother especially beloved; and hallowed friendships have often been formed in such scenes, and hallowed enjoyments experienced, that have led men to exclaim, with good Philip Henry at the close of a well-spent Sabbath,—"Surely if this be not heaven, it must be the way to it." Even an apostle was not insensible to the exhilarating and reviving power of meetings with his brethren in Christ. How often was he refreshed by them on his journeys? Let the immortal picture, traced by Luke, of his parting with the elders on the sea-shore at Miletus, tell. When a company of Christians came out to welcome him on his way to Rome, so far as to

Appii Forum and the Three Taverns, and there was union in prayer and interchange of benedictions, the sight and the exercise drove away the cloud of despondency that had previously been resting on his great spirit, and setting his face steadfastly towards Rome, where so many dangers awaited him, "he thanked God and took courage."

I am aware that there are some, perhaps a considerable number, among us, to whom attendance on such meetings is not practicable; but I am equally aware that there is a far greater number to whom it is practicable, if desired and sought. And in every instance in which this attendance is withheld, the individual should endeavour to make himself sure whether the desire is genuine, and whether, with better arrangement, he could not make himself a partaker in this part of Christian edification and enjoyment. If you can find time for fashionable entertainments and protracted evening parties, which are so often distinguished by nothing so much as their vapid frivolity and waste of golden hours, you have much reason to suspect that want of heart is the true secret of your habitual absence from the meetings of those who "speak often one to another." The Puritans, in the dark days of the Conventicle and Five Mile Acts, held such meetings at the hazard of their liberty and the spoiling of their goods, and kept alive their spiritual life by this "bread eaten in secret," until the year of blessed enlargement dawned. The Covenanters of Scotland, cowering in caves and moss-hags, startled the curlew and the plover by their midnight psalms, and kept their hearts brave for endurance and for death. And in later times, as the late Dr. Mc'Crie has testified, "our fathers grudged not to abridge their hours of labour and their hours of rest,—they scrupled not to travel with the light of the moon and the stars, and to spend hours in a smoky hovel, that they might enjoy the foretaste of heaven upon earth." And we ourselves can tell of a prayer-meeting which has existed in a pastoral district in the south-west of Scotland, in unbroken continuance, since before the Revolution of 1688, the hoary sires and the stalwart sons and modest daughters of four neighbouring farm houses, meeting fortnightly in each others dwellings in the months of winter and spring, and assembling weekly in summer and autumn, beneath the shadow of a few aged hawthorn-trees, whose sweet scent mingled with the odours of the prayers of the saints, and the two ascended together to heaven. What an evidence that the oil of inward religion is all that is needed to make such meetings perpetual. Depend upon it, prayer-meetings in a church are just like so many magnets let down into a mass of various metals, which will be sure to operate with an attractive force on all the particles of steel by which they are surrounded. They test the vigour, if not even the reality of men's piety, and often draw a line of much distinctness between the living and the dead.—*Dr. Andrew Thomson.

THE REDEEMER'S TEARS.

"Jesus wept."—JOHN XI. 35.

BY JOHN EDMOND, D.D., ISLINGTON, LONDON.

YOU know my text to be the shortest verse in all the Bible; is it not among the sweetest also? You would not like that short sentence (it was right to make a verse of it) to be blotted from the New Testament. Thousands on thousands have blessed God for these two words. Next to the comfort of knowing that Jesus shed his blood, is that of reading that he shed tears.

One of the earliest sermons I remember hearing, was preached by a minister, still living, from this text. I recall some things yet that were said on it. Perhaps it was the shortness of the verse, perhaps its sweetness, that made me, though a boy, attend and think. I should be very glad if the brevity and beauty of the text should prepare your hearts for what I am going to say about it.

There are a good many weeping scenes depicted in the Bible. I shall describe some of them, that we may come in the end to the most wonderful among them. I shall select those I name so as to show you much variety, both in the weepers and the cause of their tears.

First, let me lead you out into a desert, and bid you look below one of the shrubs growing in the place. There is a boy lying there faint for thirst, panting and ready to die. His mother laid him where you see him, that he might have a little shadow from the heat for his head, while life was ebbing away. And where is the mother herself? Sitting at a little distance, weeping for anguish. Ah! if some friendly cloud would but come, as if to join her in her weeping, her child's parched tongue might taste life yet! Did he die? You know he did not. God called to the weeping mother, and opened her eyes, and showed her a well, from which she filled her bottle, and gave the lad drink. And he lived to be the father of a great nation. You know I have been speaking of Hagar and Ishmael.

Let me ask you next to go with me into a grand house, where there are twelve men standing in an apartment. One, who is the master of the house, is opposite to the others, who seem to be strangers, and are ranged before him, with faces full of wonder. The one who is apart is speaking to the rest, and weeping aloud. Then, after he has talked to them for some time, he falls on the neck of the youngest of the company, and the two weep together. Then the lord of the house embraces all the others, one by one, weeping still. A short time afterwards and there was another weeping scene, when this same householder rode out in his chariot to meet an old man who had come in a waggon from a distant country, and falling on his neck, wept there a good while. These were tears of affection and of joy, rather of pleasure than of pain. You know the men, and recognise in that old man the patriarch that had mourned for years as dead the son who was alive, and lord over all the land of Egypt.

I shall take you now to see very different tears—the tears of an infant a few months old. We stand beside the bank of a noble river, where there are reeds growing up on the marshy margin. A royal lady comes with a train of maidens from the palace. Her attention is drawn to something hidden among the rushes. She sends one of her maidens for it, and it proves to be a basket with a lid, all daubed with slime and pitch. When the lid is raised, behold a beautiful babe crying, and with tears on its little cheeks. Before the basket was opened you knew whose child that was; and you know what a great man he lived to be. He was cradled strangely; he had as strange a death-bed, and was buried as never any one else was buried. Can you tell where his grave is?

We shall now glance at a whole assembly in tears. The very place they met in took its name from the weeping. The tears were tears of repentance; for God had met his backsliding people, and rebuked them for their sins, and they "lifted up their voice and wept." Tears of repentance are happy tears. There is pain in them, but joy too. They fall from the eyes as the shower from the cloud where the rainbow springs up in sight of the sun. Did you ever visit Bochim, dear young readers?

I shall next show you a company of women all weeping. They are met in an upper room. There is one man among them, and they are all busy showing him coats and garments of different sorts. On a bed in the room there is a dead body laid out. By-and-by the women all go out, leaving the man alone with the corpse. After a while they are called back again, to dry their tears—for the dead friend they mourned is presented to them alive. You know who she was. She has left her name to certain benevolent societies to this day.

Come with me once more, to the sea-shore, and see a company kneeling. One man in the midst is praying aloud. When he has finished, the others fall on his neck and kiss him, and weep bitterly. They can hardly stop crying and embracing. At last they accompany him to a ship in the harbour, and sorrowfully part.

They knew they were never to see him more, and that was their keenest grief. Where was that parting scene, and who was it that went away in the ship?

I shall but ask you to go with me now to the Mount of Olives, and look at a strange sight. The king of Jerusalem is coming up the slope with a covering on his head, and his feet without shoes; and a large company follow, with their heads covered in sign of sorrow. And as they come, they weep; even the king weeps. David is fleeing from his rebellious son Absalom; and by-and-by, with choking sorrow, he will weep for him slain in his sin.

But there is another scene of tears on the Mount of Olives, more affecting by far than even this. A greater King than David wept there. On the day when Jesus, near to die for sinners, rode in lowly guise into Jerusalem, hailed with hosannas, we are told that when he came nigh the city, he lifted up his voice and wept over it, saying, "O that thou hadst known, even thou in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace; but now they are hid from thine eyes!" Ah, these were tears of grief and compassion indeed—wept for enemies, that would not be friends. A great writer from that scene has drawn a title to a book he published. Did you ever read Howe's treatise, called, "The Redeemer's Tears Wept over Lost Souls?" That is the book I mean.

On two other occasions we are told of Jesus weeping. Once, a few days later than the incident mentioned, down in a garden at the foot of the same hill of Olivet, he wept by night, in that agony of his, which brought the bloody sweat in great drops from his body to the ground. It is, at least, most probable that to this Paul refers in his Epistle to the Hebrews when he says that Jesus, "in the days of his flesh, offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto Him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared." The other occasion was that of the text. The time was a few days before both the other seasons. The scene was near the Mount of Olives too; for the village of Bethany stood on the back of the hill. It is to this weeping of Jesus that I am now to call your attention.

Just notice, however, before I proceed, the difference of character in those three weepings of Christ. In Gethsemane, his own anguish, endured indeed for us, wrung the bitter drops from his eyes. On Olivet he wept for foes, resolved and doomed to perish. Near the grave of Lazarus, he wept in sympathy with loved friends. One other distinction is worth your observation. On the Mount of Olives he wept aloud. At the tomb of his friend he shed tears. Let us draw near now, and see what those sacred drops teach us. I think that those tears of Christ speak to us of four things. They are tears—

I. Here are tears of pain.

Tears are not always painful, at least chiefly so. The tears of Jacob and Esau when they met in peace, the tears of Joseph and Benjamin, are examples. Laughter itself at times runs over in tears. Is there not something touching and solemn here—that joy should go to the same fountain with sorrow to draw water? But though this be the case, tears are generally the signs of grief. If you saw a little child weeping, you would not think it glad. Now, Christ's were painful tears. There is an old tradition, perhaps not much to be minded, that says Jesus in our world was never seen to smile. Be that as it may, we may be sure his tears of which we read were from the fountain of grief. They were signs of pain within.

A great deal of Christ's sufferings was within. His worst pain was not when they scourged his back, or when the nails went through his hands and flesh, or when he said, "I thirst." The pain of crucifixion was very dreadful, but he had endured worse anguish than the bodily torture. The worst sufferings of men, generally, are not what can be seen. It must be very dreadful to see a field of battle after the carnage is over, and to listen to the groans of the wounded lying among the dead. I remember a man, who was a soldier in his youth, and wounded at Quatre Bras, giving me a harrowing description of his own and others' sufferings as the wounded lay all night in the corner of a field, and were driven next day in rough carts to Brussels. Miss Nightingale, in the hospitals of the East, must have witnessed dreadful sights of suffering. Yet, perhaps, dear young friends, there are walking the streets in health, or sitting in our worshipping assemblies, without a sign of woe, persons whose bosoms are full of a grief worse than bodily pain. Oh, God only knows the bitterness and the burden of stricken hearts! Now, never any one suffered so much as Jesus did in his heart, surrounded as he was with sin and its fruits in our world. I should like you to think of the constant burden that must have pressed his heart, seeing with his eyes what he saw. On the occasion before us, we need not go far for proof that his tears came from a laden spirit. Both before and after, we read that he groaned within himself. His bosom was oppressed. To see the bitter wages of sin,—to see the sad workings of sin itself in unbelief and slowness to learn,—to see this, both in enemies and friends, bowed down his soul in grief.

Now, you should think of this, because all this sorrow was for us. It was a part of the burden Christ bore, that we might be relieved from our burden. He had no need to expose himself to all the sad and grievous sights of a wicked world. But he met it all for our sakes. You know that our tears cannot wash away the guilt of sin. And we must not say that Jesus' tears are the fountain where these stains of ours can be cleansed; his blood it is that takes sin away. But his grief, which caused tears, was part of that suffering unto death which makes his atoning righteousness.

I. Of pain.—Jesus suffers.

II. From pity.—Jesus sympathizes.

III. In pledge.—Jesus shows what all may find him.

IV. For pattern.—Jesus sets an example.

When he wept, as well as when he bled, he was suffering for us.

But see in Jesus' tears—

II. Pity.—Jesus sympathizes.

John tells us this in almost express terms; for he says that when Jesus saw Mary "weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her, he groaned in the spirit, and was troubled, and said, Where have ye laid him?" I think it is a good explanation, in part, of these words which says that they mean, that Jesus feeling the tide of sympathy swelling in his bosom as he looked on Mary's tears, was obliged to check and restrain himself, to swallow down, as it were, his heaving pity, and let it shake his soul unseen, till he should ask the question he proposed. He could not speak without a painful effort. Then, having spoken, and been answered, his tears would no longer be kept back, but gushed over. Again, when the remarks of the Jews on his tears, partly kind and just, partly unbelieving and wrong, rose around him, he curbs his feelings anew; he groans inwardly over the dread ravages of sin—he is moved as with anger against the bitter root of all the woe around him, and advances to the grave. But is it not beautiful to see Jesus' tears mingling themselves with those of the sorrowing sisters? He feels that Lazarus was his brother too, and he weeps to think he had been sick to death, and now lay in the grave. The explanation of this feeling we have in an earlier verse of this chapter, which is as beautiful as it is simple,—“Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus.” You recollect, too, the sisters' message when their brother was ill,—“Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick.” Jesus, as we say, must have been fond of Lazarus. Yes, the Jews were right when they said, “Behold how he loved him!” Love shed those tears—love for the dead, and for the living. O happy family, equally numerous, or less so, or more so, that can put their own names into that verse about the Saviour's love to the three of Bethany, and read it about themselves!

But some of you will be ready to say, How should Jesus shed tears of sympathy with Martha and Mary, when he knew very well that in a little their sorrow would be turned into joy, as Lazarus was brought back to them alive? It is natural enough to put such a question; and you are quite right in thinking that Jesus knew that he would soon call the dead out of the grave. For not only was Jesus, as God, omniscient; but as the Father's servant, he had prayed about this, and obtained his request. A little further on in the story, we read that he said aloud to his Father, “I thank thee that thou hast heard me.” There is no real difficulty, for all that, in his weeping meanwhile. For sympathy throws itself into the feelings of others, and sees as with their light. The hearts of Martha and Mary are sore, thinking that their brother shall rise again only in the last day, and Jesus suffers with their grief. When you read the beautiful story of Joseph, you know now that it is to end happily and well for all parties, but that does not prevent your being vexed for Joseph when his hard-hearted brothers sold him to the Ishmaelites, or for his old father when he was shown his son's torn and bloody coat. Or, as you read the story of the Cross, are you kept from sympathy with the holy and blessed Sufferer, because you know that on the third day he will rise from the dead, and suffer no more? Does a mother, seeing a child undergo some operation, or administering some bitter drug, feel no pity for the little one's pain or shrinking disgust, because she hopes for cure from the treatment? Sympathy weeps with the present distress, whatever issue be foreseen.

But now see in the tears of Jesus—

III. A pledge.—These tears speak about the future, and show us what Jesus will always be.

Everything done by Christ on earth was done for all time. The meaning of his actions was not confined to the persons and the places of the hour. They stand out as parables to teach the world. When Jesus wept with Martha and Mary, his tears promised that all his suffering followers to the end of time should have his pitying regard. They dropt to the earth for you.

It is true that we must not think now of Jesus' shedding tears in heaven. If God wipes away all tears from the eyes of Christ's people, they cannot remain in the eyes of Christ himself. Tears belonged to the time of his weakness and humiliation. Nevertheless, his heart is as tender and full of love as ever. His eye looks as kindly on his suffering brethren on earth as if it poured for them floods of tears. You remember what happened to Stephen at his death. He saw heaven opened, and Christ standing at the right hand of God,—standing, as if he had risen up to see his servant suffer, and to welcome him home. You recollect, too, how in the last day, the Judge, who is the Son of man, speaks of the least of his brethren as one with himself; when they are fed, clothed, visited, he counts all done to himself. He still, in fellow-feeling, suffers and rejoices with them. Now, it is because this truth may be read in the tears shed by Jesus at Lazarus' grave that so many thousands have blessed God for the words of the text.

— Love Jesus, dear young friends, and drink in the full comfort of this sweet and soothing thought. Jesus feels for you in every pain you feel. If your heart ache, he pities its throbbing. If your head ache, he does not count even that too little a matter for him to care about. Have you not often felt the aid it gave you to bear pain or fever, to have a kind word spoken to you, in the soft tone of tenderness, by one who loved you! When your mother has taken your hand in hers, as you lay on a sick-bed, or has pronounced your name with the gentle music of her affection clothing the word, did you not feel helped and strengthened? Now, think that Jesus does more than all this for you. He speaks to the heart; he takes the soul's hand; he is with you. His presence and his pity are very real, if you will only believe it. Inasmuch, also, as he suffered himself from all kinds of trials, knows even a child's sorrows, he is able to sympathize with all sorts of grief. Especially do the tears of my text speak comfort to mourners for the dead. Oh, Jesus knows what an enemy death is; he is very much concerned to destroy death; and whether his people stand by the grave of departed ones weeping, or look forward to their own graves, shrinking, let them know that Jesus is near to dry their tears and to hush their fears.

See in Jesus' weeping—

IV. A pattern.—The Saviour sets us an example.

It is a woful thing, dear young friends, to have a hard, un pitying heart. Should any of yours be already selfish and stony, woe for you in this suffering world! If you do not get your heart warmed and softened by Jesus' grace, it will get like flint and steel. It will dry up altogether, and become a dead, withered, unfeeling thing. There is so much to pity all around us, that if we will have no fellow-feeling with sufferers, the constant refusal to show kindness will prey on the soul, and eat its marrow up. The tears that are kept in will turn to gall and wormwood within us. Pray for a tender, loving heart in your youth. You will have enough to do, to keep even such a heart from having its feelings deadened in the years of after life.

The teaching of Christ's tears to us all may be given in Paul's words, "Weep with them that weep." But there are two things I should like you to hear from me, about the sympathy which this lesson teaches you to cherish. Let it be with real distress, and let it be practical. Sympathize with real distress as you find it around you. I think there is hardly a child anywhere in these days, capable of reading, who has not often shed tears over some touching story in a book. I could name some books read by many thousands, which perhaps few persons have been able to read with dry eyes. Now, I do not say such tears as drop over a pathetic description in a story-book are necessarily worthless. I do not bid you be ashamed of such tears. But here is a strange thing: Persons may weep profusely over pictured sorrows in a tale, and have, after all, unkind, selfish hearts; do nothing, at least, to lessen real woe in the world. It is one thing to look on a fine painting of distress; and another to look on the reality, with much that is forbidding and repulsive often cleaving to it. Now, take care that you do not keep your tears for the world of fancy alone, and pass by griefs in the rough world of fact. Then, let your sympathy be practical. Let it move your hand, as well as stir your heart, and fill your eye. Try and take some grains from the great heap of human misery, and add some to the growing pile of human happiness. Jesus not only wept with Lazarus' sisters, but he brought him back to their love and their home. You cannot work miracles, but you can help, in some way, to soothe or remove distress. It is a blessed work, and he who every day dries some tears, is in training for the companionship of angels, and of Jesus, and of God.

Let me close this sermon, which has spoken of Christ's tears as tears of pain, from pity, in pledge, and for pattern, by asking you a question which will lead us back to look again at another of the weeping scenes of Jesus' life. Whether would you have Jesus weep over you, or with you? Over you, as lost, like doomed Jerusalem; or with you, as his loved ones in sorrow, like Martha or Mary? You know what should be your choice;—is it your choice? If you choose aright, be of good cheer; you have Christ's sympathy under all that may try you; and at last you will be with him, where neither he nor you shall weep more. But the place for those over whom Christ grieves, is a place of "weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth." Why should any of you see it?

"TAKE AN HARP."

ISA. xxiii. 16.

BY THE REV. JAMES DOLTON, KILBURN.

THIS simple text may help you to remember some of the truths about which we are now going to talk, just as a little stick cut out of the hedge or picked up in a wood, helps to remind us of a May-day ramble in the country, and all we saw and learned in it. Only, if we compare such texts to little sticks, we must recollect that they do not get dry as a sprig of hazel or thorn does; at any rate, if they seem to be dead, God's Holy Spirit can bid them bud and blossom and bear fruit to us, as Aaron's rod did.

Our life-lesson this time is Cheerfulness—Christian Cheerfulness. It is easy for you to be cheerful now, whilst you are young and light-hearted, and whilst your parents try to keep off from you everything which might trouble you,—as that devoted elephant in Dr. Livingstone's book is receiving into her side all the poisoned lances of the hunters, in order that she may shield her calf from them.

But this cannot last for ever; soon you will grow up and have to bear your share of vexations, and then you will be thankful to have been taught in childhood how to carry your cross. This is one of our objects in these life-lessons—to sow seeds deep in your memories, which will spring up when you are older, and when you don't find the ground so open for sowing. It is well, then, to impress the duty of Cheerfulness even upon children. Besides, are not boys and girls fretful and downcast occasionally?—Do they never look as miserable as those whining wolves in the Zoological Gardens used to, whilst the merry guinea pigs, but next door to them, were frisking about as if they had found their long-lost tails? Are no disagreeable things required of you? Have you no sicknesses, no discipline, no disappointments? What hour passes without something going against your wishes? And if you are not on the watch, you will gradually fall into a grumbling, sulky way, which resembles the angry hum of the humble bee at his work, and which, to say the least of it, is not lovely.—How different to the poor negroes on the sugar plantations, who sing so gaily at their toil that you can hear them half a mile off: Not their slavery, not the overseer's frown, not the crack of the lash, can stop their songs.

Now God delights in our Cheerfulness. He would have us be cheerful at our tasks, as well as at our play: He would have us cheerful at our meals; cheerful in lying down to sleep and rising up; cheerful in our Sabbath services; cheerful in our gifts to his cause.

And let me tell you that the Cheerfulness which he pours into his people, is rich, and varied, and inexhaustible; it comes from his own bosom. It is a well of water in them. Worldly frivolity is the froth which floats on the stream; it has been lashed into a momentary existence by the mill-wheel above, but as your eye follows it, bubble after bubble bursts, and presently it disappears. Christian Cheerfulness is the clear, sparkling, eddying stream beneath—each drop of which is solid, and flashes as if it were a diamond.

Oh, to have such a stream from the river of God's pleasures ever flowing through our souls, awake or asleep, at home or abroad, when we are in harness in the traces, or when we are unaltered in the fields!

The harp is the symbol of this Cheerfulness, as the trumpet is of action, the lute of melancholy, or the fiddle of folly.

Whenever we think of a harp we think of gladness; it expresses our ecstasies when we are joyful, and which words express so feebly.

Now in this sense God would have us "take an harp" and play on it for ever. That is, he would have us—

- I. Be happy ourselves.
- II. Endeavour to enliven others.
- III. Praise himself.

These are the three principal uses of a harp, and they are the three principal uses of Christian Cheerfulness.

I. He would have us be happy ourselves.

The harp may have been invented for this by Jubal (Gen. iv. 21) to cheer his loneliness. David probably cheered his solitude with it, when he was shepherding "these few sheep in the wilderness." It is called the "pleasant harp;"—we read of the "joy of the harp." It is joined with "singing" and with "the sound of the tabret."

And God would have us as happy as we can be,—as happy as harps, cornets, flutes, dulcimers, sackbuts, psalteries, or anything else can make us. It is supposed that religion is a dull and dolorous thing—a thing of sighs and fetters and self-denials! But if it is this to any, it is their own fault.—They tune it to their dismal tempers and habits, and then it becomes dismal to them. But who that began piety early can say that it is a burdensome thing? Who that thoroughly yields himself to its leadings can say that it is a gloomy thing? Of this I am confident that Jesus does not mean that his youthful disciples should be mopish.—He requires of them, assuredly, nothing but what will increase their happiness: All his paths for them shall be paths of peace: For them his yoke shall be light: He will feed them with such secret meat (as he did Daniel and his companions), that their countenances shall be "fairer and fatter" than if they ate from a king's table. He who has put it into the lambs to gambol in the pasture, and into the lark to pour forth such raptures as he climbs the skies—he cannot but intend that his dear children should be happy too. And he will see to it that they are happy. A hundred ills may befall them, but he will be near to whisper, "Be not afraid," as he did to the poor father to whom his neighbours brought the news of his daughter's death so suddenly—"Be not afraid," Jesus said to him! And he had done the same to Job ages before.—Messenger after messenger rushed in with a fresh calamity, but the Lord stood by him to prevent him from sinking under them; and he was able to say, "Blessed be the name of the Lord." If God designs that you shall be happy, you shall be, no matter what your circumstances. "Your joy no man taketh from you."—It is a jewel which we have here within us, where no thief can snatch it, no rust corrupt it.

How apt we are to hang our harps on the willows for the merest trifles. A rainy morning will bring us to the breakfast table soured and pettish, when in the trees yonder, the blackbirds, and thrushes, and robins are carolling their sweetest, though drenched to the skin; and when the imprisoned canary in the conservatory is warbling as if he were loose in the vineyards of his native land! Fie on us! Might we not oftener move about, harp in hand, if we "counted up God's mercies" to us, and contrasted our lot with that of others? Whatever Haman had, he could not rest whilst Mordecai sat at the gate,—are we to refuse to be cheerful, because we have not everything according to our minds? If we are in "a goodly heritage," shall we sulk at a thorn, or an unripened cluster, or a withered gourd here and there in it? "Take an harp," then, and let it ring with notes of melody, till you exchange it for a golden harp in heaven! Let it accompany you into the closet—the parlour—the train—the house of God. Where is your harp? would be a capital question for us to ask ourselves when we are needlessly dejected. Where is your harp? God might inquire of us when we repine and forebode. Thrice enviable are those whose harp—whose Cheerfulness—is the first thing which strikes the beholder!

II. "Take an harp"—that is, Endeavour to enliven others. There is plenty of this sort of employment for our harps amongst our families and friends. Be the sunshine, or the fire, or the candle never so bright there will be shadows with it—the garden wall will not shut them out from the garden, or the front door from papa's and mamma's faces.

We had a sister (a sainted sister now!) who played the harp exquisitely, but she was so exceedingly diffident that it was quite painful to her to perform before strangers. Yet, whenever any one requested it, she would instantly force herself, and say, "Oh, if it will gratify you, of course I will." There was no selfish string in her harp.—If it could amuse an invalid, or while a winter's evening, or drown a thunder-storm, there it was thrilling away as if under an angel's fingers.

Was it not thus that the "son of Jesse" devoted his harp to rid Saul of his demon spirit? When the frenzy seized the king he hastened in to him and soothed it down with his harp—charming it, as the Indian jugglers do the snakes with their tambourines. It is related of Dr. Doddridge that, as he was strolling,—unaccountably depressed—by a cottage in the village where he ministered, a maiden at her spinning wheel struck up a hymn of his own composing. Her harp, thus unexpectedly, attuned his again, and he joined her in the remaining verses, with a "will"—as the sailors say. His depression vanished as if by magic.

Now, seek to be a fountain of Cheerfulness—in the nursery—at school—to your fathers and mothers. What clouds you may disperse—what tears you may dry—what burthens you may relieve? "That daughter of mine," said a widow, "will not let a hair of my head have a chance to whiten, or a wrinkle to write itself on my forehead." "That lad"—said an officer who escaped the massacre in Delhi, of an artillery cadet who escaped with him,—"that lad prevented me from dying of despair in the jungle by his buoyant spirit."

This is how we can enliven others by our Cheerfulness.

III. "Take an harp"—that is, praise God himself.

This was the chief business of the harp, as recorded in the Bible. The prophets, therefore, bore harps, that they might mingle music with their messages of wrath or grace, or conclude them with it—addressing themselves to God, as we do in our "Glorias" in the Church of England.

"Sing to the Lord with the harp," was the call which rang out from the palace on Mount Zion and the temple at Jerusalem, and which he who uttered it, so frequently declares that he himself obeyed,—"Yea, upon the harp will I praise thee, O God my God."

And what endless, boundless themes of praise to God Cheerfulness has. There are those in nature—the night with its stars and stillness—the sea with its waves and wonders—the forest with its awful inhabitants—the mountains with their snow-crowned pinacles—the insects in the air. I can praise God over an ant, a beetle, a fly; how much more over a chaffinch's nest, or a strawberry plant, venturing forth leaf upon leaf as the weather favours—then rearing its stem till its flowers are out of the reach of mice and snails—then dropping its petals and retaining the golden berry which now fades into green, then into blonde, then into pink, then into scarlet! Are not these Themes for praise,—"matchless pieces" for a harp?

And then there are those in Providence. God's surrounding of us with such comforts and advantages—preserving us in infancy—committing us to those who are anxious to train us for God—shielding us from temptations which might have ruined us. Are our harps familiar with these anthems of praise?

Lastly, There are those in Jesus Christ our Saviour. Forgiveness of sin and restoration to God—The Scriptures, our celestial guide—The "Comforter" to renew and sanctify us—The blessed city, "adorned as a bride for her husband," to be our eternal abode when we are no more dwellers on earth. Can we ponder these blood-bought treasures and not say, O that I had a seraph's Cheerfulness,—a seraph's harp to praise God for them?

Perhaps we are waiting till we are with the seraphs to do it; but be our attempts now, imperfect as they may, we should not postpone it till then.—God expects it of us now; it is the fragrance of his lilies! A silent harp is a mournful thing. I saw one which had not been uncovered for years. The strings were snapped; the dust was on the gilt; the pedals creaked when touched. She who had brought such harmonies out of it, was beneath the sod!—It was hushed and muffled as if it waited for her, and was mute till she returned! But our harps are never to be silent, because God never ceases to bless us.

In conclusion, two things are necessary to a harpist,—

A skilful hand.

A tasteful ear.

A skilful hand.—You may have a harp of Eraud's own choosing for you, and yet, if you have not had a master to lead you into its mysteries, it will be no more to you than a shilling accordion, or a comb with a bit of brown paper over it. You must be taught how to place the fingers, and how to hurry them hither and thither, swift as a weaver's shuttle; and then if you catch the cunning, you will be a harpist.

So we must be taught Cheerfulness of God. He must pour out of his anointing oil upon us ere we shall be happy ourselves, and be qualified to enliven others, and praise himself. Ah! that is the reason that what we do of these is so feeble, we have not a skilful hand. We strum as a baby does, instead of striking the chord as an artiste does; and it will be so till we are more filled with the "Great Teacher."

Finally, A tasteful ear.—Without this, you may be drilled into playing a harp after a fashion; but it will be a penance to yourself, if not a torture to your auditors. It is absurd to labour (as there are those who will) at a jackdaw or a parrot, to extort a doleful ditty from them, when a linnet or a bullfinch would catch the glee, and warble it off as you whistled it! A tasteful ear is essential ; with that, you can judge of a pianist or flutist by the commonest street ballad. So, unless our heart be in our cheerfulness, it is a humdrum shallow thing. But when our heart is in it, it has tones and variations which no harp, no nightingale, can imitate. And if our heart is gentle, and pure, and thankful,—if it is Jesus' Throne,—what hosannahs, what halleluiahs, will gush from our lips, though we be but as the “babes and sucklings” whom the Pharisees would have rebuked. Pray for such a HEART, my dear young readers. Then, instead of having Cheerfulness shed upon you temporarily,—as the golden rays are shed upon us at noon, it will beam forth from us as that soft radiance does from the glowworm, for our own illumination, as a lamp to others, and to the glory of our God !

WHAT!

Oh, what can little hands do
To please the King of heaven ?
The little hands some work may try
To help the poor in misery,—
Such grace to mine be given.

Oh, what can little lips do
To please the King of heaven ?
The little lips can praise and pray,
And gentle words of kindness say,—
Such grace to mine be given.

Oh, what can little eyes do
To please the King of heaven ?
The little eyes can upward look,
Can learn to read God's holy book,—
Such grace to mine be given.

Oh, what can little hearts do
To please the King of heaven ?
The hearts, if God his Spirit send,
Can love and trust their Saviour, Friend,—
Such grace to mine be given.

Though small is all that we can do
To please the King of heaven !
When hearts, and hands, and lips unite
To serve the Saviour with delight,
They are most precious in his sight,—
Such grace to mine be given.

LITTLE WISHES.

Two little boys were standing before a shop window, looking in. They were looking with very eager eyes. There was a glass jar full of candy inside, and the jar had a hole in it. “See there,” said one of the little boys, pointing to it with his finger ; “if it wasn't for this window we'd get one of those sticks, wouldn't we ?”

“Oh, I wish,” cried the other little boy,—“I wish I had one.” Those two little boys were in harm's way. What ! by looking into a candy shop ? No, but by coveting the candy. They were breaking the tenth commandment, which says, “Thou shalt not covet anything that is thy neighbour's.” Wishing is often coveting. Let us see what it leads to.

A boy once in a school had a round tin whistle. It was a capital whistle. George — wished he had it. He would whistle the old cow to the pasture bars, and not have to wait for her. He could whistle to his dog ; not that he had a dog, but if he had one. He could learn tunes too—he knew he could. So he tried to bargain for the whistle. But no ; James Jones wouldn't part with it. That, however, did not stop George from wishing—coveting. How often, when it lay on James's desk, George kept one eye on his book and the other on the whistle.

One day he left his geography in school, and went to the master for the key of the schoolhouse, in order to go in and get it. The master let him have it, and he went in. As he passed along to his desk, what should he spy on James Jones's desk but the tin whistle ? James had forgot it. George seized it. Then he took his book and made off. But he locked the door easy, and crept out the back way. Can you guess why ? He hurried home ; but he durst not show his newly-got treasure to his mother, or his elder brother, or his sisters. He was afraid even to whistle to the cow. Early one morning, up in the pasture, he took it from his pocket, and whistled easy. Even that made him uneasy. It did not seem to sound good. Poor James was very much disturbed when he found he had lost his whistle, and he asked every boy if he had seen it. George, I am afraid, like the rest, said “No,” or shirked the question into meaning “no,” some way or other. It was in his pocket all the while, and he was sometimes quite scared lest it should get out and whistle him a liar—a thief and a liar too. If it should !

Oh, what disagreeable fancies Guilty Conscience whispers to us ! One lays his account with a hard master when he gets under the lash of Guilty Conscience. One night, too, as he lay abed thinking, he was so afraid the poor tin whistle would whistle itself, that he jumped up, took it from his trouser's pocket, and hid it under his pillow.

Some time after, George went with his father into the forest to chop wood, and there he lost it. “Good riddance,” he muttered to himself when he found it really gone. “Now it's all the same as if I hadn't had it.” All the same ! Poor boy, he knew better. It was a root of bitterness to his dying day. Coveting, you see, leads so easily and naturally to other sins ; and though George was not found out, he carried about in his bosom a sense of shame and guilt very hard to bear.

In this light you see what a foolish and wicked habit wishing, wishing, wishing is. They are little wishes, perliaps, but they have long, bad roots to them. Do you not know children very apt to wish they had a rich father, or handsome clothes, or somebody else's time with nothing to do, or a watch, or "anything which is their neighbour's?" But the Bible says very differently. It says, "Let your conversation be without covetousness,"—don't keep wishing. And it very beautifully adds, "Be content with such things as ye have;" for He hath said, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." He who said this is the great and blessed God: so that if we are in ever so great straits, very poor and very desolate, we can take God at his word, and trust him for help. Striving to obey the tenth commandment, in humble dependence upon the Holy Spirit to help you, will not only put a stop to a great many idle words, but it will take the roots of a wicked life from your heart.—Child's Paper.

JESSIE'S HYACINTH.

JESSIE Burns had several plants growing in pots on the window—a fuschia, a heliotrope, a tea-rose, and a bridal daisy; but the most cherished of all was a hyacinth, which was in a beautiful purple vase. She had bought the bulb and the vase with her own money at a seed-store in November; had filled the vase with pure water, a little warmed, then placed the bulb, which looked exactly like a little dried onion, in it, and set it in a south window, where it would catch the sunshine.

In a few days little white roots began to appear at the bottom of the bulb; these grew longer every day, till the vase was quite filled with the thread-like roots. Jessie changed the water once in two weeks, but after a month's watching she began to grow impatient, and to wonder why no green shoots showed themselves.

"It is a real stupid old thing!" she said one day. "I should think 'twould be ashamed to look so dry and ugly on top when it has got such lots of roots! What are they good for, if it never puts out leaves and flowers? I am half a-mind to throw it away; it isn't a bit pretty, and everybody said it would be so beautiful! Oh dear! I wish I had spent my money for something else;" and she was ready to cry with vexation.

"Be patient, my little daughter," said Mrs. Burns. "By and by it will send up a green shaft containing the flowers, which will be both beautiful and fragrant."

But Jessie looked at it with pouting lips, and said she wished it would be about it then. She didn't believe it ever would; it was just as dry and brown as it was the day she got it.

Meantime the poor, abused hyacinth was doing its very best. Within that homely cover wonderful processes were going on. Those thread-like roots absorbed and carried nourishment to the centre of the bulb, and its heart had grown warm with a mysterious life. Every fibre felt the strange thrill, and laid aside its torpor; every little cell, of which it had hundreds, had its work to do—not one was idle; and by their joint labour a little plant was in time completed, perfect in every part. Within a tiny green bud was packed away layer upon layer of tinted leaves of the most exquisite hue; and when all was ready, this tiny green bud was pushed up into light through a small opening at the top of the bulb.

"Oh, it's green, mother; it's green! It will grow now!" shouted Jessie, in an ecstasy of delight.

And grow it did. The bud parted into six broad green leaves, and among them lay nestled little flower-buds just tipped with pink. These gradually opened, till at length ten lovely blossoms hung like graceful little bells from the tall flower-stalk, filling the room with fragrance. Everybody admired it; everybody said, "What exquisite colour! what delicious perfume!" Jessie's little heart was overflowing with joy and gladness, and she exclaimed, "It wanted to have roots before it had flowers; didn't it, mother?"

"Yes, dear; first roots, then leaves, then blossoms. Just so it is with fair and lovely heart-flowers: there must be a silent, unobserved growth down deep in the soul before we can see the beautiful blossoms on the surface, scattering fragrance and blessedness all around them. We must be patient, and wait quietly for the seeds we plant to root." And as she stroked the soft curls back from her little daughter's brow, her heart grew warm with faith, and the sweet trust that many a fair plant was taking root in that young soul, to bloom for evermore; though the time seemed long since some of the seeds were sown, and as yet no greenness or beauty showed they were not perished.

"They will yet spring up and blossom, and bear fruit," said the hopeful mother; "and fill many hearts with joy and sunshine, and at last make glad the city of our God."

TOO BUSY TO FREEZE.

How swiftly the glittering brook runs by,
Pursuing its busy career;
Reflecting the beams of the cheerful sun,
In waters transparent and clear;
Kissing the reeds and the lowly flowers;
Refreshing the roots of the trees;
Happy all summer to ripple a song;
In winter too busy to freeze.

Onward it glides, whether sunshine or storm
Await on its vigorous way,
And prattles of hope and sustaining love,
Whether cloudy or bright the day.
Chill winter around may his torpor fling,
And on lazier waters seize,
But the nimble brook is too much for him,
Being far too busy to freeze.

May we, like the brook, in our path through life,
As active and steady pursue

The coarse in which real utility lies—
Which is lovely and useful too;
Still nourish the needy, refresh the sad,
And despising indulgent ease,
Adorn life's current with generous work,
With love that's too busy to freeze.

Yes, while there's a brother to warn from sin,
A sister to save from despair;
A penitent heart to be meekly taught
To utter the prodigal's prayer;
An outcast child to be turned to God;
A foe to be brought to his knees;
And heathen yet to be sought and taught;
We must be too busy to freeze.

Juvenile Instructor.

"MY DEAR SAVIOUR."

I ONCE requested the children of my Sabbath school to find for me all the names and titles of Christ they could in the Scriptures; offering, as a prize, a richly bound Bible to the little boy or girl who, without help from any source, should bring in the largest number. The names and titles were to be such, and only such, as are applied distinctively to Christ. Several lists were handed in. These were carefully examined and corrected. The largest number on any one paper, after correction, was one hundred and seventy four. Some of these were very significant and beautiful. They were such as,—Bread of Life, Chief Corner Stone, Captain of our Salvation, Immanuel, Desire of all Nations, Lamb of God, Messiah, Lion of the tribe of Judah, Morning Star, Rose of Sharon, Prince of Peace, &c.

Among those who sought to obtain the prize, was a little girl then twelve or thirteen years of age. She did not succeed in finding so many names and titles as some of the other children, but after having put down all she could find or think of, she wrote at the bottom of the list,—"And he is my dear Saviour."

Only a few weeks before, this little girl had become interested in the subject of religion. She felt that she was a sinner, and gave herself in faith and love to the Lord Jesus Christ. Some time after, she made a public profession of her faith in Christ, and is now a member of the church. There was a peculiar meaning, therefore, in what she wrote at the close of her list,—"And he is my dear Saviour." It was the outgushing of her young heart's first love, and literally true, I trust.

Children, you have often noticed the different names and titles given to Christ in the Bible,—how many and beautiful they are. You have yourselves, perhaps, attempted to prepare a list of them,—to see how many you could find. But, were you able to add at the close, "And he is my dear Saviour?" No higher pleasure could be given to the Lord Jesus, by any little child, than by addressing to him, in truth, this endearing, precious name.

IF I WERE A SUNBEAM.

"If I were a sunbeam,
I know what I'd do;
I would seek white lilies,
Rainy woodlands through.
I would steal among them—
Softest light I'd shed;
Until every lily
Raised its drooping head.

If I were a sunbeam,
I know where I'd go;
Into lowliest hovels,
Dark with want and woe.
Till sad hearts looked upward,
I would shine and shine!
Then they'd think of heaven,
Their sweet home and mine."

Art thou not a sunbeam,
Child, whose life is glad
With an inner radiance,
Sunshine never had?
Oh, as God hath blessed thee,
Scatters rays divine!
For there is no sunbeam
But must die or shine.

"WE SHALL BE CHANGED."

ON one of our autumn days, during what we call our Indian summer, when the beaver and the musk-rat do their last work on their winter homes, when the birds seem to be getting ready to wing themselves away to milder climates, when the sun spreads a warm haze over all the fields, a little child went out into his father's home lot. There he saw a little worm creeping towards a small bush. It was a rough, red, and ugly-looking thing. But he crept slowly and patiently along, as if he felt that he was a poor, unsightly creature.

"Little worm," said the child, "where are you going?"

"I am going to that little bush yonder, and there I am going to weave my shroud and die. Nobody will be sorry, and that will be the end of me."

"No, no, little worm! My father says that you won't always die. He says you will be 'changed,' though I don't know what that means."

"Neither do I," says the worm. "But I know, for I feel, that I am dying, and I must hasten and get ready. so good-bye, little child! We shall never meet again."

The worm moves on, climbs up the bush, and there weaves a sort of shroud all around himself. There it hangs on the bush, and the little creature dies. The child goes home, and forgets all about it. The cold winter comes, and there hangs the worm, frozen through and through, all dead and buried. Will it ever "live again?" Will it ever be changed? Who would think it?

The storms, the snows, and the cold of winter go past. The warm, bright spring returns. The buds swell, the bee begins to hum, and the grass to grow green and beautiful.

The little child walks out again, with his father, and says:

"Father on that little bush hangs the nest or house of a poor little worm. It must be dead now. But you said one day, that such worms would 'be changed.' What did you mean I don't see any change?"

"I will show you in a few days," says the father.

He then carefully cuts off the small limb on which the worm hangs, and carries it home. It looks like a little brown ball, or cone, about as large as a robin's egg. The father hangs it up in the warm window of the south room, where the sun may shine on it. The child wonders what it all means! Sure enough, in a few days, hanging in the warm sun, the little tomb begins to swell, and then it bursts open, and out it comes, not the poor, unsightly worm that was buried in it, but a beautiful butterfly! How it spreads out its gorgeous wings! The little child comes into the room, and claps his hands, and cries,

"Oh! it is changed! it is changed! The worm is 'changed' into a beautiful butterfly! Oh, father, how could it be done?"

"I don't know, my child. I only know that the power of God did it. And here you see how and why we believe his promise, that we all shall be raised from the dead! The Bible says, it does not yet appear what we shall be; but we shall be 'changed.' And we know that God, who can change that poor little worm into that beautiful creature—no more to creep on the ground—can change us, our 'vile bodies,' and make them 'like Christ's own glorious body.' Does my little boy understand me?"

"Yes, father."—S. S. Times.

THAT LITTLE HAND.

"He sent from above, he took me, he drew me out of many waters."

Black and blue eyes opened wide with wonder in the bright faces of the children who had gathered lovingly around old Mr. Elden, as he slowly spoke those words.

"What does he mean, Elsie?" whispered Jane Lee to her cousin. "We asked him for a story, and you know he always has one ready. I hope he isn't going to preach a sermon!"

"Wait, Jenny; we shall see."

"This text," continued Mr. Elden, "always reminds me of an incident of my childhood. When I was a little boy, I had a pleasant company of playmates, and we used to enjoy our sports together, just as you children now do. At the lower part of the village where we lived was a river, and a bridge across it. We often went there to play, and many times I have stood a long while trying to see the fish as they swam below.

"One day we were playing on the bridge, and one of our number, who had mounted the railing, was watching something in the water, when he suddenly slipped, lost his hold, and fell. We heard his cry, and the splash as he struck the water. We ran to the side of the bridge and looked over. The water had already closed above him, he had sunk so quickly, and bubbles were rising where he went down. We were too young to know exactly what to do, and too much frightened even to shout for help. The little fellow rose once more to the surface, struggling for life, but could only give us a beseeching look, when, with his arms uplifted, as if imploring help he sunk again.

"We were still speechless with horror; but a kind man had noticed our movements from a short distance, and suspecting what had happened was hastening toward us. He reached the bridge. Nothing was in sight but one little hand above the water and that was fast disappearing. We had recovered our voices, and pointing at it we cried eagerly, 'There's his hand! Oh, there's his hand!'"

"That outstretched hand! I seem to see it now,—I shall never forget how it looked to me. But our friend waited not a moment. As that hand went out of sight he plunged into the river, and soon brought the drowning boy to the shore. He looked earnestly into the pale face of our playmate as he held him in his arms, and in a tone of voice that sent a thrill of joy through all our hearts he said,—'Saved!' Then turning to the rest of us he added,—'Boys, I know you will never forget that little sinking hand. Remember, when it comes into your minds, that we all are sinking in a colder and darker place than that river, unless we have asked One to save us, who alone can do it. This boy will soon recover now, and be able to say that I took him from the river. It is my prayer that he and every one of you may be able to say of another, better Friend, as you think of the dark waters of sin, in which all who do not love Christ are sinking,—'He sent from above, he took me, he drew me out of many waters.'"

"Dear little friends," said Mr. Elden, closing his story, "I trust the prayer of that good man, for me, has been answered. Will you remember that little hand and the lesson it taught us? Jesus is ready to take hold of those little hands of yours as you lift them up imploringly from the depths of sin and evil in this world, and he will bring you at last,—not to the shore of such a river,—but to the 'Shining Shore.' Will you ask him to do it?"

THE SPIDER.

"A SPIDER! oh, I hate spiders!"

Do not say so. Spiders, I am sure, have their good side. The Bible, you know, says, "The spider taketh hold with her hands, and is in king's palaces." "The spider taketh hold with her hands"—that is a lesson of industry which I hope you are not too proud to learn, even from the most humble of God's creatures. The spider loves to work. As soon as it begins to live it begins to work. Every spider is a weaver and a rigger, and the youngest spider knows how to do these things just as well as the oldest. The spider never has to go to school to learn; it knows how by instinct. Instinct is the knowledge which God gives to those of his creatures who have not reason to guide them. Men have reason and can teach themselves. The bee builds its neat honey-comb, the bird its dear little nest, the ant its three-storey house, and the spider its web, without any help from others. They know how far better than we could tell them; indeed, they know the best way, for God is their teacher.

Not all the riggers, spinners, and weavers in the country can beat a spider in his work. Its web is a wonder of strength and lightness. See how regular and straight the threads are, and how beautiful they are fastened to the cross pieces. They never come undone. A puff of wind, you might suppose, would blow it away. No, no. The breeze sweeps through it and over it, and there it hangs, not harmed at all. It is not careless or hurried work, I am sure. The spider takes time to do its work well. It is also a persevering little creature. It does not get easily discouraged. Children try to do a thing once or twice, perhaps three times, and if they do not succeed they say it is no use, and give up. Not so the spider. If you sweep its web away again and again, again and again it goes to work and weaves another.

You remember the story of the poor Scottish king, who again and again was defeated in battle, until he was well-nigh ready to give up his kingdom for lost, when, as he lay in his bed one day, he saw a spider trying to fasten its thread on the wall. The spider tried, and tried, and tried again; something prevented the thread sticking; but the little weaver did not give up; some say it tried twenty times. Bruce got amazingly interested in the spider's determination. He watched and watched its efforts, and when it, at last, succeeded, the young man jumped up with new life running through his veins. "I won't give up," he cried; and from that time he dated the success which afterwards crowned his efforts. The king won his kingdom; and what does the spider gain? "She is in king's palaces," the verse says. That is, it gains an honourable position; and so industry and perseverance in our calling win for us an honourable place among men. Better than that; if we use our industry and perseverance in loving obedience to the service of Christ on earth, we shall have a place in the palace of the great King on high. "For he that persevereth to the end shall be saved."

NEVER PUT OFF.

WHEN'E'R a duty waits for thee,
With sober judgment view it,
And never idly wish it done;
Begin at once, and do it.

For Sloth says falsely, "By-and-by
Is just as well to do it:"
But present strength is surest strength;
Begin at once, and do it.

And find not lions in the way,
Nor faint if thorns bestrew it;
But bravely try, and strength will come,
For God will help thee do it.

LITTLE BENNY'S DEFINITION.

"CHILDREN," I said to a class of little ones, "what is conscience?" I knew it was a hard question for such young minds, but I wished to draw out their thoughts.

They looked at each other, but gave me no answer.

"I think I don't know such a big word as that," said one.

Then I asked if they had never felt something within them, when about to do wrong, say, "Little boy, don't do so; it isn't right!"

Light broke over their faces at once. When the question was put, in a simpler form, to their experience, they understood it. "Now," I repeated, "what is conscience?"

"It's when Jesus whispers into our hearts," spoke out my good little Benny.

Was not this a sweet answer, and a comprehensive one?

"Jesus whispering into our hearts!" Jesus! No abstract principle to be reasoned about, and made the basis for dry philosophical controversy, but a fresh reality, springing from the living fountain.

"Jesus whispering!" Not the voice of many waters, nor thunders of the law, but a gentle, soft, and winning whisper.

"Jesus whispering into our hearts!" Not to the ear of sense, not to the proud, questioning mind, but "into the heart," where dwell the highest affections, the purest motives.

Surely God's truths sometimes find their best interpreters in these "little ones!" God grant my darlings may ever listen to this voice of "Jesus whispering into their hearts," and thus press joyfully on until they meet the blessed One in glory.—S. S. Times.

TREASURY PULPIT.

THE GOD OF PEACE.

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

"Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect."—II Co. xiii. 20.

ONE of the most noticeable features in religious revivals has been the new power of an old gospel. A very commonplace preacher, gifted with no power to stir the passions and move public assemblies, pouring forth no flood of eloquence to carry men along as stones are rolled before a headlong torrent, appears in the pulpit. His manner is plain, and he preaches nothing but the simplest gospel truths. Yet, as I have seen the reeds that fringe the margin of a lake bend before the invisible wind, so is his congregation affected. Without any apparent cause to account for the phenomena, there is a shaking of the dry bones; rough hands wipe tears from eyes unused to weep; and not delicate women only, but strong men are visibly and powerfully affected; sobs interrupt the speaker; truths often heard before, but no more felt than hailstones rattling on a rock, now fall like a shower of arrows; each time the bowstring sounds and a shaft flies, a sinner falls; Christ appears a mighty conqueror, the place of his feet is glorious, and the scene forcibly recalls these words of prayer and prophecy, "Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty, with thy glory and thy majesty"—"Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies, whereby the people fall under thee." All are moved, and not a few converted.

How explain this extraordinary event? A small band of God's hidden ones have been, or are, perchance, at that hour on their knees at a throne of grace—wrestling with God, and pouring out prayer for an out-pouring of his Spirit. In this, more than in the eloquence of the minister, lies the power of preaching. Study brings a man to the pulpit, but it is prayer that brings God there. Thus Paul, who was above the praise of the people, and held himself independent alike of their applause and censure, saying, "It is a small matter for me to be judged of man's judgment, he that judgeth me is God,"—was not above their prayers. Though he insisted on the right of preachers to a sufficient maintenance, he was much more anxious that the people should pray for their ministers than that they should pay them. He could, and that the gospel might not be hindered, did do without that, saying, "These hands have ministered to my necessities;" but he could not want their prayers; and so here he affectionately entreats them, saying, "Pray for us."

And now, recalling the scene by the shores of Tyre, where the sailors, as they heaved their anchor and unfurled their sails, saw Paul, accompanied by the disciples and a crowd of women and children, kneel down on the sand, and part with prayers—or a scene where a father, with the members of his family gathered round his dying bed, propped up on pillows, lifts his emaciated hands, and with labouring breath and looks of love, commends them, "lads" and all, to the angel of the covenant; even so Paul closes his epistle and his intercourse with the Hebrews. He had sought their prayers, and now gives them his own, saying, "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen."

I. Look at the aspect in which God is here presented.

1. As a God of peace.

Were we to draw rash conclusions from the state and condition of this world as to the character of its Maker and Governor, we might come to a different conclusion. "God of peace!" Where is peace? Look either at our world's past history, or at its present condition! Has not every age been filled with wars? and what soil, from the sands of Africa to Polar snows, has not been drenched with human blood? The Indian savage, who flashes his tomahawk, and fills the forests with his war-whoop, or with stealthy steps approaches sleeping tents to murder the aged and drag the young to slavery, has had his counterpart among civilized and Christian nations. Peace! notwithstanding all the boasted progress of science and arts, and even of the gospel, the world is now bristling with arms—the tocsin has not ceased in one country when it begins ringing in another. In our own day, save this sea-girt and happy isle, every land in Europe has shaken to the tramp of armies and sounded to the roar of cannon; and at this moment, mingling with the roar of the Atlantic, we seem to hear the boom of guns borne across the deep, from shores where God's impending vengeance for negro's wrongs at length is falling—teaching men the lesson, "Verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth."

Fancying that peace is not among the nations, and imagining that she may have fled for an asylum to the fanes of religion, we seek her in the house of God. Alas! It is a house divided against itself. The Church herself has been rent asunder into I know not how many factious divisions. Set on fire of hell—fire catching the bad passions that filled her, she has burst into fragments like an exploding shell. Disappointed of finding peace there, do we turn our steps to the domestic circle? We seek her in the family; and, following the steps of the mourners from a father's grave to see them clinging to each other, we are startled by loud discordant angry voices, brothers and sisters are quarrelling about the spoil. There is still one asylum to which peace may have fled. No man ever hated his own flesh, and, like a lonely bird, she may be found nestling in each man's bosom. No; till Christ bring the peace of God, bidding its waves and winds be still, man's heart is agitated by many violent passions: burning with hatred, or devoured by jealousy, or shaken with fears, or racked with remorse, or tortured by desires, it feels but cannot feed, his bosom a nest of scorpions and stung by conscience, the wicked man has no peace. He cannot; for the wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest. "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

Unconverted man is at peace—neither with himself, nor with others, nor with God. Shall we conclude from this view of the world that God is not a God of peace? Why, He had nothing to do with this miserable condition of affairs. He is neither to be judged by it, nor to be blamed for it. In a fatal hour sin was admitted into the world; and if the ship takes a Jonah aboard, she parts with peace; and has nothing to look for but thunders and lightnings, and storms and tempests.

Give God his way, let his will be done in earth as it is done in heaven, and were such a blessed change instantly effected on this world, it would recall a change such as that night saw on Galilee, when, rising in the boat, Jesus looked out on the tumbling sea, to say, "Peace, be still;" and in a moment there was a great calm; and the lake lay around like a glassy mirror, reflecting in its tranquil bosom the stars and peace of heaven. Let only this one commandment, "Love one another as I have loved you," be instantly and universally operative, there never were another cannon cast; nor sword forged; nor quarrel bred; nor blow struck; nor man enslaved; nor shore of earth invaded; nor use made of drum and trumpet but to sound the jubilee of universal peace. Sin banished peace, and God sent his Son to restore it; and when this world is Christ's, and the crowns of earth, like those of heaven, are laid at his feet, then God shall be known as the God, and our world shall become again the abode of peace.

2. God has made peace.

"Fury is not in me, saith the Lord." He has turned from the fierceness of his anger, and made peace between himself and man by the blood of the cross. It is not peace at any price—at the expense of his honour, holiness, justice, law, or truth. God has not overlooked the guilt of sin; he pardons, but does not palliate it.

Peace may be established on a false basis, as has often been done between man and man. Take for example those States of America, where brother now stands armed against brother. Some months ago they might have reared a peace on the foundations of iniquity. Had they given ear to men who grossly perverted God's word, and, regarding slavery as a right and not a wrong, agreed to sacrifice the interests of humanity to those of commerce, and the eternal laws of God to political expediency—they might have had peace instead of war, cementing an unholy union with the blood of slaves. But such a peace, in place of an analogy, would offer a perfect contrast to the peace of the gospel. It preserves God's honour. Not peace at any price, it is peace at such a price as satisfied his law, and fully vindicated God's holiness in the sight of the universe; for by the cross where Jesus hung, mercy and truth met together; by that blessed cross, righteousness and peace embraced each other; there the great God appears as just, "and also the justifier of all those who believe in Jesus." "Let justice be done," said a noble heathen, "though heaven should fall;" but little did he who uttered that glorious sentiment fancy at what expense justice might be done. Here a greater than heaven fell. God spares not his own Son, and by that immense sacrifice established such a peace between himself and this guilty world, that now all sin may be pardoned, and every sinner saved. Believing in him, and at peace with God—at peace with his justice, at peace with his law, at peace with your own conscience, you have no sins to answer for; you have nothing to fear in the hour of death, nor to dread at the day of judgment. Christ has paid your debt; Christ has satisfied for your sins. Reconciled to you by the blood of his Son, God has no quarrel with you now. Richer than banks could make you, with Christ's legacy, "peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you," let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid. That righteousness should satisfy your conscience which has satisfied your God. "Justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ."

II. He brought Christ from the dead.

1. In one sense the glory of his resurrection belongs to Christ himself.

Should we hear of a man sinking in the very day of its attack under a fever that commonly takes ten or twenty days to run its course, and reach the crisis—well in the morning and a cold corpse at night, we should not be more astonished than Pilate was to hear of Christ's death. Like the earth that trembled at the crime, like the graves whose doors opened to show the sheeted dead, like the sun that hid his face, refusing to look upon the scene, this sudden death was contrary to the course of nature. Dead! dead in a few hours where men take days to die! dead, with the two thieves still alive, and writhing on the neighbouring crosses! notwithstanding his drooping head, and glazed eye, and still, unmoving form, it seemed impossible! Besides, when men are dying, they speak low, not loud. You have to bend as we have done over the pillow, to catch the whisper of bloodless lips; but that cry, "It is finished," which sounded loud and clear from the cross, was less like the low faint voice of a dying victim, than the battle shout of a victor—of one who has won the fight, and stands with the foe beneath his feet. Strange he should die so soon! What if it were an attempt to escape the hands of justice! To defeat that and make all sure, a soldier raising a long spear on high, buries the shining steel in his blessed side, to see it, on being withdrawn from the seat of life, followed in a gush of blood and water by the sacred emblems of the world's redemption.

Strange as it seemed, it is possible to explain our Lord's death by natural causes. The very perfection of his nature made him more than other men liable to injury; just as the finer the mechanism, the more easily is the machine deranged. Then think what filled the four and twenty hours that preceded his death—the sad parting with his disciples; the pain of Judas' treachery; the agony of the garden; the exhaustion of the bloody sweat; the long night filled with mockery, and insult, and suffering; the trial; the scourging; the rude usage of a brutal soldiery; his sorrow for weeping women and a fainting mother—suffering these, I can fancy our Lord's strength exhausted, and that he was half dead ere he reached Mount Calvary; as ready to die as a stone—whose foundations have been washed away by summer rains and winter snows—to leave its base at the slightest touch, and roll down to the bottom of the hill.

Yet our Lord's death—so strange and sudden—may be otherwise accounted for. It was in a peculiar sense his own act. We never lay down our lives. Who dies a natural death, has his life taken from him; who commits suicide, throws his away. But in dying, our Lord was like a man who says, I have done my work, completed my task, and I will now go to rest; I have paid the debt, and I will now leave the prison; I have fought the battle and won the victory, and I will now go home. The only thing else I have to give, he might say, is this,—my life, and there it is. Of my own will, by my own free spontaneous act I lay it down. All your wretched tools and cruel tortures, your crown of thorns and your bloody cross, cannot deprive me of life. If I could create bread as fast as it was eaten, could not I create blood as fast as it flows away? It is not you that take away my life; nor God. It is not taken away, but given. I have power to lay down my life. Hence his claim on our love and gratitude. He gave himself for us, dying "the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God."

But he who said, "I have power to lay down my life," also said, "I have power to take it up again." Once on a time when the Jews asked a sign of him, he said, referring to his body, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." It is a strange power some have of going to sleep and waking when they please. They resolve to sleep three, or three times three hours; and as if a trumpet was blown at their ear, they wake at the set time—true to a minute; they have hardly opened their eyes when the clock strikes the hour. Stranger still, many have not only slept, but some have swooned and come out of the trance at the time they fixed on. But however curious these cases seem, there is a spirit within the body, lodged in the brain, to assert the supremacy of mind over matter; and lord of the house, it stirs up the sleeping inmates when the fixed hour has come.

How much more strange for a man, ere he dies, to settle the day and date of his resurrection; and, greatest of miracles, as yon tomb has witnessed, to raise himself. Christ, bowing his head, gives up the ghost. The body the women swathed was cold; cold the feet that Mary kissed; fixed, and glassy, and filmy the eyes his mother looked on, and bloody and mangled the form she received in her arms as they lowered it slowly and tenderly from the cross; and for three days nothing distinguished this from other corpses, but that it assumed no sign of corruption. As perfumes give their odours to the vessel that holds them, it seemed as if his pure soul had imparted somewhat of its virtues to his body; for though dead it suffered no decay—no smell of the charnel house filled that tomb; his pale countenance, as if carved out of marble, was beautiful as ever. The Grave sat by and looked on its captive, but did not dare to touch him; and there he lay like a king asleep in a prison, the grimmest warder standing in reverence of one on whom the door is locked, to be thrown open at his bidding. At length the door is opened, but none enter to wake the sleeper. The angel rolls away the stone and sits on it, with eager eyes watching the great event. All yet is wrapped in gloom, within and without is the deepest silence. No sound breaks the stillness but the distant footfall of the guards, that fly this celestial apparition. Suddenly, the body stirs, of his own accord the dead rises; and, dropping the garments of death, Jesus steps forth on the dewy ground. He has broken the prison, bound the jailor, and spoiled him of his keys; and Faith hears voices as of angels singing among the stars, "O Death, where is thy sting? and O Grave, where is thy victory?"

2. Here our Lord's resurrection is attributed to God.

Nor here only. Here unquestionably. But God is elsewhere represented as standing over the dead body of his Son; and standing between it and the greedy grave, he guards it as a mother would her child's from the ravening wolf!—as Rizpah did her seven sons, hanging on one gibbet, from the birds of the air and the beasts of the field. In words which were addressed to God, and which could only be applied to Christ, the psalm says, "Thou wilt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." But the Bible, which attributes the preservation of Christ's body to Him, also attributes its resurrection. The apostle Paul says, "He hath raised up Jesus again;" and to the day of that grand event, as in some respects throwing the birth at Bethlehem into the shade, the inspired apostle applies these words, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee"—as if he came from Joseph's tomb, more evidently and gloriously God's begotten Son, than from Mary's womb. From that womb he came, a feeble infant, to save the world; but from this tomb he came, a mighty conqueror, having saved it. There he enters the field a combatant, with angels spectators of the fight; but here, borne high on his shield, with angels attending his triumph, wearing the crown of resurrection, declared to be the Son of God, with power he ascends to his Father; and is received by heaven to the cry, "Lift up your heads, ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; that the King of glory may come in." His resurrection is the work of God; the crown of his labours; the token of his acceptance; the fruit of his death. The God of peace has raised him from the dead by the blood of the everlasting covenant—his own blood, as if the blood that washes away our sins, sprinkled on his dead face, restored him to life; sprinkled on the chains of death, dissolved them; sprinkled on the doors of the grave, threw them open! Most precious and potent blood! May it be sprinkled in red showers from God's hand on us! If it gave life to a dead Christ, shall it not impart life to us? Yes. Through its power,—dead with him to sin, crucified with him, and buried with him in the baptism of the Holy Spirit, we have risen to newness of life; and when the last trumpet calls, set free from death as well as sin,—bondmen no more,—we shall rise from watery graves and dusty tombs when corruption puts on incorruption, and mortal immortality. Then shall death be swallowed up in victory. In conclusion,—

1. Look at this aspect of Christ as the Great Shepherd of the sheep.

How many are the elements of his greatness! He is a divine Shepherd. With a shepherd's crook he wears a kingly crown! Unlike other shepherds, who dwell in tents or the lowly cottages of lonely glens, this royal Shepherd dwells in a palace—having angels for his servants, and heaven for his home. Think on the number of teachers, preachers, pastors, ministers of all the Christian Churches in the world, and how many shepherds he has under him! indeed, the greatest of them are his sheep; though leaders, they are but part of the flock, and he the only Shepherd, Bishop, and Overseer of souls. He said, "I have sheep that are not of this fold." And think of the numbers of his flock scattered all over the world! When the last day gathers them all together, and angels' hands have separated them from the goats, the earth has no plain large enough to hold that flock—the ransomed multitude which no man can number. On these grounds well may he be called the Great Shepherd, as on this also that the whole earth is his pasture-ground!—"The world is his, and the fullness thereof."

Nor here, as sometimes happens, is greatness separated from goodness. The last is the best of the two—we would rather be good than great. But both properties, infinite in measure, meet in Christ. He whom Paul calls the Great Shepherd, speaking of himself, says, "I am the Good Shepherd." How tender he is toward weak and feeble Christians! He gathers the lambs in his arms, carries them in his bosom, and gently leads those that are with young. His sheep are not reared for the butcher's knife. They are not given over to hirelings; he himself leads them forth,—conducts them to green pastures and by still waters. So providing for his people that they sing, "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want," his sheep are of such value in his eyes, that if even one should stray and be "ready to perish," he will seek the wanderer till it is found. Home, if I may say so, has no delights for Jesus till he find the lost, and return with it on his shoulders, to call on angels and saints to rejoice with him that the lost is found. Good in these aspects of his character, in this Jesus is especially and emphatically the Good Shepherd, that he laid down his life for the sheep. He sacrificed himself—he suffered, he died for us. Hear the voice of God in this mysterious, awful call, "Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, against the man that is my fellow; and smite the shepherd." The sinless, spotless, well-beloved, eternal Son is standing before his Father—heaven looking on in expecting silence. The sword of justice is now unsheathed. Once before, the angels had seen its flash; then it had emptied many a throne in heaven; and their fallen compeers, shrieking from its wounds, had rushed down into hell headlong, like the swinish herd into the depths of Galilee. Now, the Father sheathes that sword in the bare bosom of his Son. He falls; he groans; he dies,—the just for the unjust; wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and by his stripes we are healed. Standing now as it were by the dead body of the shepherd, can we think of the dignity of the sufferer, the greatness of the ransom, the pangs that wrung this blessed body, the sorrows that wrung this loving heart without exclaiming,—How great was thy mercy toward me, and how great should be my love to thee!

"Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women."

2. Let us glance at Paul's prayer.

"The God of peace that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ, that great shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will; working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ, to whom be glory for ever and ever, Amen." Make you perfect! Could I express for you a better wish, or could you aim at a better object? Perfect! it is a high, but it is not a hopeless aim. In your sins are you bound as by chains of iron and affliction? What chains are too strong for him, who, bringing Jesus from the dead, burst the fetters of the tomb? In the person of his exalted Son, God has set a man on the very throne of the universe—above angels and archangels, seraphim and cherubim, principalities and powers; and is he not able to raise us to humbler thrones? What he has done for Christ is a glorious pledge of what he shall do for all Christ's people. Where the head is, the members, the humblest of them, all of them one day shall be. The oil poured on the high priest's head descended in fragrant streams to the very skirts of his garments, —the parts that swept the dust; and so the grace that was poured on Christ without measure, shall descend to the meanest of his people. All who belong to him, imbued with his Spirit, and sanctified by grace, shall be fitted for heaven and brought to it; even as everything that pertained to Israel was at the great Exodus brought out of Egypt! "Not a hoof was left behind."

We are not perfect; far from it! In imitating Christ how unlike is the fairest copy to the original! Still perfect freedom from sin, perfect obedience to the law, perfect harmony to the mind, perfect conformity to the image of God, are in the bond sealed with blood—in the prayer, "I will that those whom thou hast given me be with me where I am." Let not your souls, therefore, be cast down by past failures. Say with David, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why is my spirit disquieted within me; hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him who is the health of my countenance, and my God." Aim at perfection! Try it again, and again, and again! Every true, earnest, prayerful effort, will raise you higher and still higher on the Rock of Ages. Let every day see some work done; some battle fought; some good victory won. Rise every morning to start anew for heaven; and let every sun that sets, leave you a day's journey nearer home. Do the best you can; live the best you can; get all the good you can; do all the good you can; do it at all times you can; do it to all men you can; do it in all the ways you can. And God working in you by his Spirit, both to will and to do of his good pleasure, you shall rise step by step upward to perfection; till, mounting as on eagle's wings, you arrive at the gates of glory; and in you a perfect heaven receives a perfect saint.

THE SAVING WIFE.

"What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband?"—1 Cor. vii. 16.

BY J. DE LIEFDE, OF AMSTERDAM.

CHAPTER I.

A DISCOURSE IN A TRACK-BOAT.

"But you don't mean to say that I should not care whether my husband goes to the church or to the theatre?" said Mrs. P——, in rather a querulous voice to the Rev. Mr. D——.

Both parties were sitting in the first cabin of the track-boat that was plying between Amsterdam and the town of Hoorn, in North Holland. They had the whole of it for themselves, which, however, was not having very much, for the first cabin of an old Dutch trekschuit is the very opposite of a "grand saloon." Of the two compartments into which that oblong and narrow vessel is divided, it is the hindmost, and by far the smaller. To be able to enter it, you must bend yourself into an angle of about forty-five degrees, and be very contented if you succeed in dropping down on the cushion of the bench without pushing your head against the concave ceiling. From the moment you are so fortunate as to find yourself comfortably seated, you must give up every prospect of rising upon your feet again, unless you might resolve to creep out and to keep company with the man at the helm, where there is scarcely room for four persons to stand. You had better keep inside, especially when the weather is wet and the wind cutting, as was the case when Mrs. P—— and the Rev. Mr. D—— were performing their journey. Being the only first-cabin passengers this time, they could choose their seats opposite each other, having a narrow little green painted and white spotted table between them. They were strangers to each other, but the prospect of a long tedious journey had already, from the beginning of their travelling, made them desirous of some intercourse. Now, in a Dutch trekschuit you are in a somewhat critical position as to conversation. If once you begin a talk you cannot get away from it, however disagreeable it may prove to turn. In steamboats you may leave the cabin any moment you like, but in a trekschuit you are compelled to sit down, even if your next neighbour should prove your greatest enemy. And in stage coaches you may break off the conversation by turning your face to the window and looking into the fields, but in a trekschuit you must face the person who is sitting opposite you, for there is no opportunity for a look out, as the one window is behind your back, and the other behind the back of your fellow traveller. Mrs. P—— having often performed the journey from Amsterdam to Hoorn, was, from experience, quite conscious of this peculiarity of a trekschuit, and, consequently, very happy to infer from the gentleman's black coat and white neckcloth that he was a minister; the more so, since she was a religiously-minded person who took a delight in edifying conversation. She had the better of him, in this respect, for nothing in her dress told the minister what kind of person she was. Availing herself of her advantage she opened the conversation by some general remarks about the weather and the crops, and soon both parties were delighted to find that they perfectly agreed upon the great questions concerning man's calling in this life, and his hope for the future. Mrs. P—— learned that the Rev. Mr. D—— was a believing servant of Christ, preaching the gospel at the Hague, and the Rev. Mr. D—— was glad to learn that Mrs. P—— was the wife of a respectable merchant at Amsterdam, and mother of five children, whom she anxiously tried to train up in the fear of the Lord. The kind, sensible way in which he answered her questions and remarks impressed her with the conviction that he was a scribe well instructed in the kingdom of God, and a man of more than youthful experience in Christian life. This elicited her confidence. She could not help opening her heart and communicating to him the sad cross she had to bear, in consequence of her domestic circumstances. Her husband was not a converted man. He seldom attended worship, and spent the greater portion of his evenings at the theatre, or at the card playing club. Her children were too young as yet to follow their father's example, but she feared that her eldest boy would take a fancy to tread in his footprints. Many a sad and alarming scene had issued between her and her husband, in consequence of this state of things. Scarcely a day had elapsed that they had not had some quarrel, he scolding her as a silly woman and a fanatic, and she preaching him the judgment of a holy and just God, whose face is turned against those who do evil. Mr. D—— heard her sad story with serious concern, and both by the earnestness of his countenance and by a few short exclamations showed her the deep sympathy he felt with her distressing condition. When she, however, had finished her story and expected a word of praise and consolation from him to confirm and countenance her in her conduct hitherto pursued, she was not a little surprised to observe that a gentle smile broke over his face, while he, in a voice of kind heartedness, mixed with a little of sarcasm, said to her,—

"Well, my dear friend, I see you have done all you could by talking to your husband. I think you now might try what you could effect by being silent."

This saying of the minister entirely put her out, and it was in replying that she, in a tone of great disappointment uttered the question already mentioned:—

"But you don't mean to say, sir, that I should not at all care whether my husband goes to the church or to the theatre?"

"By no means," answered the clergyman, "I mean to say that you ought to continue to pray most fervently for your husband's conversion. The present state of his soul ought to be a permanent topic of your conversation with the Lord. But I don't believe it is wise to introduce it into your daily intercourse with your husband."

"But, rev. sir, am I not called upon, as a Christian woman, to warn my husband of the dangerous way he is walking in? The Lord commands us to rebuke the works of darkness, and to exhort sinners in season and out of season. We are but creatures of yesterday, and our life is but like a vapour. Every day death may cut off my husband's breath, as well as mine. Am I not, as a faithful companion, every day to remind him of the perilous state of his soul, that he may turn to the Lord ere it is too late?"

"Dear madam," answered the minister, "you are perfectly right as to the principle that moves you. You love your husband, and you cannot be at peace about him until you are sure that he is safe in the arms of the only Saviour. I therefore fully sympathise with your anxiety, and appreciate it as an evidence of your faithfulness, both with regard to your husband and your Redeemer. Indeed, if I were told that your husband was serving the world, and that you never had spoken to him about his future state, I certainly should most seriously rebuke you. But the reverse is the case now. I find you have spoken to him. You have told him all he was to know, and you can tell him nothing more besides what you have told him already a hundred times over and over again. Now, it appears to me that you might grant him a little time for thinking over the matter in his own mind. You have sown the seed of God's word in his heart. Pray, leave it alone for some time, that the Lord may do his work, now that you have done yours. Look at the farmer when he sows the crops. After having committed the seed to the bosom of the earth he goes home and prayerfully leaves it to the care of Him who giveth the increase. He does not return every day to turn up the clod, and to ascertain the development of the grain. He would spoil the whole process by doing so. There is a time for sowing, madam, and there is another time for growing. Let us not confound these two periods, lest we hinder the work by doing too much and by praying too little.

"But, my dear sir," replied the lady, after a pause, "I am afraid this advice of yours might lead me to a reprehensible apathy concerning my husband's eternal welfare. Certainly, I might satisfy myself by thinking, I have told you enough about it, and you now may take care of yourself; happen what may, I wash my hands in innocence, but does not this sound very much like Cain's saying, when he exclaimed, 'Am I my brother's keeper?'"

"Doubtless," rejoined the minister; "if you for the rest showed him a perfect indifference about his person in your conduct. But if you continue loving him and daily seeking the Lord's face on his behalf, you cannot possibly give him the impression that you don't care whether he worships God or the devil. You must every day rebuke, exhort, warn, entreat, and beseech him to turn away from his present course of life, and to take his place at the feet of Jesus. But you may do all that without much talking to himself. There is an imporant exhortation given to wives in the First Epistle of Peter, which, I am sorry to find, many Christian ladies pay too little attention to. Ye wives, says the apostle in the third chapter, be in subjection to your own husbands, that, if any obey not the word, they also may be won by the WALK of the wives WITHOUT THE WORD, while they behold your chaste walk coupled with fear.* You observe, madam, that the apostle here addresses wives who very much are in a case, such, as I am sorry to learn, you are in at present. Their husbands are unbelieving persons. They have heard the word of God, but they refuse to obey it. Now the apostle does not exhort the wives to continue repeating that refused word over and over again in their ears. They should not give their husbands anything to hear; they should give them something to behold. The application of the gospel to the ears of their husband through the medium of the preacher has proved fruitless. The apostle now wants to try an application to their eyes through the chaste, meek, quiet conduct of their wives. I perceive that this is not one of the easiest commandments of Scripture for some ladies. But, I trust, for you it will not be so very difficult, since you, from experience, must be fully convinced that your words, however numerous and urgent, are not the means to win your husband."

Mrs. P—— listened with earnest attention to the minister's words. She could not help smiling for a moment at his remark about "some ladies," of whom she felt sure he thought she must be one. Nor could she deny that he, perhaps, had hit very near the point. Still, she did not want him to think that she only had made her husband to hear everything and given him nothing to behold.

"Beg your pardon, sir," said she; "but I hope you will believe that, as much as I could, I have always tried to keep up a conduct in the sight of my husband in accordance with my words."

"I am most willing to believe that, madam," replied the minister; "but I am afraid that your conduct, however irreproachable and pure in the sight of Christian beholders, was marred in the sight of your unconverted husband by the somewhat querulous and caviling appearance which you could not help displaying by your constant opposition and repeated disputes. As far as I can judge from the description you give me of his character, he appears to be a person of a liberal, cheerful, jovial disposition. He does not desire to be your tyrant, but he does not want you to be his either. He grants you full liberty to think and to act as you please; but he wants you to grant the same liberty to himself. He unhesitatingly permits you to attend church service where and whenever you like; but he desires that you should permit him to go to the theatre and to his club whenever it pleases him. You have told him that his way is wrong and dangerous. He has told you that yours is foolish and fanatical. Very well, up to this point you have both availed yourselves of your mutual right of expressing your opinion, and he fully granted you the liberty of stating your conviction with the most decided assertions. But here you ought to stop, for here is the boundary of your right and liberty. If you go one step further you trespass upon his right and liberty. Every word of rebuke and warning you add in a tone of dispute and reproach gives you in his sight the appearance of an imperious woman, who tries to encroach upon other people's rights, and to get them all dancing after her fiddle. This cannot fail prejudicing him against the holy cause you plead. He considers what he calls your austerity and rigourism as a fruit of that sort of religion which you try to intrude upon him. His favourite object is what he calls his liberty. Of course it is a false liberty; but he thinks it is the true one. Now you try to deprive him of that treasure, without giving him a better instead. Can you wonder at his thinking that you are trying to lead him into bondage?"

"Beg your pardon, sir," interrupted Mrs. P——, "I surely offer him a better. I never fail when speaking with him to point at that true liberty wherewith the Son of God makes us free indeed."

"Ah, to be sure you do," replied the minister, "but he does not see that that liberty is liberty indeed. What he wants is that you should convince him by practice that your liberty is better than his. You have tried enough by talking, but it has led to no result. You both continue sticking to your own opinions. Now the time comes in for arguing by facts. He wants you to show him that you are free indeed. But you show him the reverse as long as you try to compel him to abandon his opinion and to adopt yours. He never will believe that the building he is to enter by compulsion is the temple of liberty. He wants you to show him that you feel unspeakably happy in that temple. But he cannot possibly believe that you are happy as long as he finds that you are unhappy in his presence."

Mrs. P—— was silent. She felt that there was much truth in the minister's sayings. She recollected how her husband always seemed to lose his cheerfulness when she entered the parlour, and that there was a spirit of coldness and stiffness about their family conversation, which he was always trying to escape by going to the club-house or to the theatre. Tears came into her eyes now that she felt that herself, perhaps, was the cause of that sad state of her domestic life, or, at least, that she might have prevented a great deal of the present misery, by being less of an actor and more of a sufferer. Still she could not clearly perceive how she could follow a different course of conduct without tampering with her most holy principles.

"My dear sir," said she, wiping her eyes with her handkerchief. "I feel that much of what you are saying strikes my conscience. But is it your opinion, then, that I should conceal my convictions altogether, and never speak about the Lord and his righteousness to my husband? Do you mean to say that I should perfectly put up with his manner of thinking and living; never oppose, never show the sad, dismal impression his worldly-mindedness makes upon me, but, on the contrary, manifest an interest in his pleasures and dissipations, and make him as happy as if myself were one of his most congenial companions? I cannot suppose that this can be the purport of your reasoning. Such a course would be quite impossible to me. It would kill me. I would make myself contemptible in my own eyes as a hypocrite, showing a shining face while my heart would be full of sadness and aversion. I should not have one night's rest because of the pangs of my conscience, crying that I was betraying my Lord in order to please my husband."

* Such is the Dutch translation of that text, and such also is the old meaning of the word "conversations" employed in the English version. The words ἀνευ λόγου (without the word) are placed immediately behind ἀναστροφῆς, so as to indicate that the apostle means the silent, quiet conduct of the wives, which often is more eloquent than any mere words can be.

"Not at all! not at all, madam!" exclaimed the minister. "Such conduct would be worse than an open family war. Yea, I presume, as far as I know your husband's character from your description, that by turning so complaisant you would make yourself contemptible even in his eyes. He knows your opinions and convictions too well to be able to expect that you ever would have a taste for his worldly pleasures. But what I mean to say is, that you might try to show him in every respect, not at variance with your conscience, that you love him most cordially, that you take the liveliest interest in his happiness, and desire most sincerely his company. If such a love towards him dwells in your heart, madam, thousands of opportunities may be found, sometimes of an important, sometimes a trifling nature, to show him kindness and goodwill. In this matter nothing is so inventive as cordial, sincere love."

"Oh, I do love him! I truly do love him!" said Mrs. P—, while a deep feeling of affection rising from her heart's very core swelled the tears in her eyes. "He is such an amiable, kind-hearted, gentle person by nature. If he only knew the Lord, I should have the best of husbands."

"Well, then," continued the minister, "the only thing that is required for the purpose is at its place. Allow yourself to be led by that love as far as you possibly can go without impairing your love to your Saviour. Between the sphere in which the converted Christian moves and that in which the unconverted but respectable individual finds his delight, there is a third one, in which both may meet as upon a common platform for mutual intercourse and conversation. It is the sphere of the merely natural life, of which family life occupies such a considerable portion. Your favourite sphere is the church, madam; his is the theatre and the club-house. You cannot follow him there, nor will he follow you where you go. Very well; but you breakfast, you lunch, you dine, you take your tea, you sup together. There is a platform, at least, where both of you can meet in peace. Now, mind the important task you there have to fulfil as his wife and the mother of his children. When he comes down to his breakfast, try to meet him with a cheerful countenance, and put the baby on his knee. Then, of course, you know how he likes his tea best. Speak a good, kind word to him at dinner, and tell him some stories about the children. Get him to take one of the boys on his back, or to sing a tune with the girls. Listen to his jokes, and if they are of an innocent kind—which, I am sure, they are mostly—why should you not show you enjoy them? If he wants to tell you something about his friends, their wives and families, listen to him with kind attention, and show your sympathy either with their joy or with their affliction. Of course they are not your friends, nor are they friends of the Lord. But they are men like you, and they are worth your attention and concern, since God made them and wishes their salvation. Perhaps if they learn from your husband that you rejoiced in their happiness or wept over their losses, they will be set thinking seriously about that religion which caused you to show such a love to persons who are not your friends. I think all this you might do without hurting your conscience, and a great deal more which your love will be much apter to invent than I am able to tell you. But I believe I had better tell you a story out of my own ministerial experience, which may clearly illustrate my theory about the conduct which I mean you ought to pursue. It relates to a Christian woman, a member of my church, who some years ago found herself in the same difficulties which you are in now. The Lord, however, heard her prayers and blessed her wise conduct to that effect, that she at length overcame evil with good, and became a striking illustration of the truth expressed in the apostle's saying: What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? If you have no objection I will tell you the story, leaving it to yourself to draw such lessons from it as you may deem fit for your own instruction."

Mrs. P—, of course, was very anxious to hear the narrative of a fellow-sufferer who had travelled through the same desert she was wandering in still, and had reached the happy land for which she was looking out, day and night, with intense desire.

JOHN ANGELL JAMES.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTER.

PART SECOND.

It is encouraging to the young pastor struggling with the difficulties of a disadvantageous charge, to learn from the biography of Angell James that he preached seven years to empty pews—preached till his heart began to fail him in the prospect of a repetition of the first seven years of adversity. The flood on which he was afterwards borne was so high and continuous that it was difficult to conceive that he had ever occupied any other place than the crest of the wave. That he should have lain stranded so long in Carr's Lane Chapel, is still to his biographer a question of difficult solution. Of the wisdom of his enforced obscurity there can be no doubt. The draper's apprentice, but two years released from the shop, was not ripe for showing forth unto Israel. Meditation, study, prayer, and self-discipline, were the schools through which he had yet to pass to his higher work. Nothing was so needful for him as to be hid from the eyes and kept out of the mouths of men. "He wanted," as Mr. Dale has well said, "more metal, if he was ever to produce any deep, permanent impression on a vigorous and intelligent community." Still, even at the period of his ordination, he had the elements that have often won a brilliant, though ephemeral reputation. He had then, as through life, an ardent, impetuous, glowing heart; a mind, though undisciplined, full of life and activity; a copious, free command of language; a voice which, for sweetness, richness, and pathos, has been rarely equalled, never surpassed, and which then was as absolutely under his control as in his later years. Add to which, his heart was in the ministry. He spake because he believed. Notwithstanding, his congregation, which numbered only sixty-two members at the commencement of his ministry in 1805, continued till 1812 "very small."

A combination of circumstances powerful in determining the position of a congregation, were unfavourable to the progress of Carr's Lane Church. When James entered on his ministry, it had just been rent into two parts, after violent dissensions. The larger division had gone off with the minister, leaving to the remnant the possession of the vacant pulpit and pews. To occupy such a pulpit was to inherit a feud. To fill the empty pews required a pre-established reputation. Men stand aloof from a church that has been a battle-field. They shrink from treading on ashes still warm. The very name of a contentious congregation, no matter the source of its disputes, repels approach. Its minister preaches in vain. He suffers with his people, shares in their common reputation; and not till their strife be forgotten, is the field open for his gathering from the community around him hearts and minds in sympathy with his own. The locality of the Carr's Lane Chapel was, besides, as unfavourable as the reputation of the congregation. No splendid edifice in central square, or crescent, or great thoroughfare, awaited the reception of the young preacher on his entrance into Birmingham. Carr's Lane Chapel had to be searched out amidst the obscure retreats of the town; and when found, was not worth the search. It was not, as it afterwards became, in James's eye, the type of the perfect place of worship. Dissenting chapels had not at that period begun to rival in architecture the church and the cathedral.

An escape for a season from the Carr's Lane locality to a more central position in Birmingham terminated the discouraging period of James's ministry. It then flashed on the community that one had been amongst them whom they knew not. His preaching came upon his fellow-townsmen with the freshness of novelty, and was felt in its sterling truthfulness and life. They had made a new discovery; and such was the value they put upon it, that when James returned to his former locality, it was no longer to preach to empty pews. His seven years' obscurity had not been wasted. Disappointment had not become the excuse for mental inactivity. It had quickened his mind to more vigorous study. His resources during the period had been greatly increased, his whole intellectual nature rendered more robust; and when he took the high position which he eventually reached, it was a position from which he never went back. He retained it with a constancy allowed only to genuine worth and real power. A transition so sudden and decisive was not without its perils to the spiritual character of the preacher. His safeguard was, that before honour had come humility. He had stooped ere he rose, and learned to suffer ere he reigned as the popular favourite. Yet, as his biographer observes, the genial, generous heart, which had not been soured by adversity, was in danger of being too much elated by the noisy excitement and indiscriminating admiration which his eloquence had at last awakened. His was a nature too ardent not to be in danger of mistaking the emotion of the orator for the spiritual affections of the Christian, and the ardour of genius for apostolic consecration and zeal. In his temperament enthusiasm was easily excited, though slowly transformed into a profound and settled principle. A check was needed to restrain the excitement of his new position, and prevent, as his biographer remarks, his becoming a mere rhetorician, with an insatiable craving for popular applause. An alarming illness in 1817 left him so enfeebled, that for nine months he was unable to appear in his own pulpit. That the affliction was not without its fruits of righteousness, may be gathered from his reference in his autobiography to this period of his life, in which he says, "I am deeply humbled to think how little I have benefited by the judgments of God. O my heavenly Father, I am astonished that thou hast not either inflicted upon me still heavier strokes, or ceased to smite at all. I have a thousand times feared lest I should not honour God as I ought in affliction. I am greatly affected by pain,—a poor, timid, cowardly creature. I can never cease to wonder at God's infinite forbearance towards me. I believe my life was spared in answer to prayer. The earnestness of the people in supplication was remarkable. The chief part of my usefulness, both as a preacher and an author, has been since that illness." A still severer stroke followed in the death of his first wife, of whom nearly fifty years afterwards he wrote,— "That he owed, under God, to her gentleness and prudence, to her meekness and good sense, to her sobriety of judgment and instructive propriety, in a great measure, the formation of his own character, and his fair and good start in his ministerial career. She was hailed after our marriage by the congregation as an angel of God ; and there was not a member to whom she was not an object of love, interest, and esteem."

An invitation to preach the annual sermon of the London Missionary Society, in Surrey Chapel, introduced him to the large world of the metropolis, and carried his fame as a preacher to its height. The impression produced by that discourse is said to have been most extraordinary. A modern critic reading it in his closet and applying to it our severer standard of taste, would feel that the preacher had not always distinguished tinsel from solid metal, artificial rhetoric from genuine eloquence, and that he knew not when to say of ornament and figure, it is enough. The congregation gathered on the occasion, by the reputation of the preacher, occupied every inch of room two or three hours before the time. In the front of a gallery, which ran round the chapel, were seated the principal ministers connected with the Society in London and the provinces. There sat Bogue and Winter, Waugh and Haweis, and Wilks—men held in reverence for their age, their wisdom, their personal sanctity, their ministerial power, their arduous and successful labours in the service of Christ and his Church.

The sermon lasted two hours. The preacher's brother sat in the pulpit with the manuscript in his hand, prepared, if there was a moment's hesitation, to suggest the forgotten word ; but, from first to last, the discourse was delivered exactly as it stood on the paper, not an epithet or a preposition was changed. At the close of the first hour the preacher paused for a few minutes, and the people sung a hymn. Such was the excitement of the congregation that, during the temporary interruption, oranges were thrown into the pulpit to refresh the exhausted orator. The hymn finished, he rose again and thundered on for another hour, closing with a peroration anticipative of the homage of all created things to the Redeemer. So great was the effect produced that, notwithstanding the place and the occasion, murmurs of applause broke from the audience. Here and there a dissentient critic put in his caveat against the orator that he buried thought in a heap of ornament. John Elias, the great Welsh preacher—no foe to the wise employment of imagination in the pulpit, who was present that day, exclaimed, when the sermon was over, "I believe the cross was there, but it was so heaped up with flowers I could not see it." Another hearer delivered his opinion in a form still more terse and epigrammatic, "I don't care to dine at a pastry cook's." These were a scarcely appreciable drawback to the burst of enthusiasm with which the discourse was received by the entire congregation ; and which from London spread through the provinces, as its glowing passages were rehearsed, or the story told of the profound impression of its delivery.

From this time James became the favourite missionary advocate. From his Gosport days of intercourse with Morrison he felt the claims of missions, and no man was more successful in presenting these to others, or in drawing forth the large and willing contributions in their support. The May meetings wanted their chief attraction when James was absent from Exeter Hall. There he was always acceptable and always effective. His episcopal friend and neighbour, Dr. Miller, of Birmingham, so competent to judge in a department in which he himself excels, in describing the general powers of James as a public speaker, has strongly said, "No man ever stood on a platform who was more welcome to the auditory. Earnest, grave,—or with a gravity relieved by playfulness only, never by levity—touchingly pathetic ; rising not seldom to lofty eloquence, his language fluent and choice ; every speech presenting the difficult combination of all the polish of the most finished preparation, and all the freshness of extempore address—his face betokening high intelligence, and often lighted with a smile of heaven's own love—he was a speaker not often surpassed. I never saw him sit down without regret that his speech was not longer." And yet, of speech making, James himself says, "It was a business of which, though I have not been unsuccessful in it, I was never very fond."

It were to adopt a false criterion to judge of James's usual ministry by the overwrought effort of a Surrey Chapel missionary sermon. At home, in the usual exercise of his ministry, he was the affectionate, earnest, oftentimes simple and essentially practical preacher. He preached the cross—its atoning blood the sinner's ground of hope, with no vagueness and no uncertain sound ; and, with a faithfulness and fulness then little known, the obedience inseparable from Christian privilege. His writings are the living witnesses of the minute and searching practical character of his evangelical preaching. Though his mind was that of the orator,—and his thoughts naturally took the shape of persuasion rather than of didactic teaching,—his sermons never wanted light as well as impulse. He knew that the truth must be presented to the understanding before the heart could feel it. But he did not forget that the knowledge of the hearers of the gospel is almost always in advance of their lives ; and that the preacher's great business is to "persuade men." In this department the resources of his eloquence were very varied. Some painters, it has been said by his biographer, are only successful with a gloomy sky and a restless sea, others with green fields and running brooks, so some orators can only produce terror, and others only tears. James had both sublimity and tenderness. He could fire enthusiasm, or awaken pity ; he could terrify or soothe at will. "Preach Christ," was his earnest address to a body of students leaving college, "and for Christ's own sake. Exalt Christ, not yourselves. Exhibit Christ in the divinity of his person, the efficacy of his atonement, the prevalence of his intercession, the fulness of his grace, the freeness of his invitations, the perfection of his example ; in all his mediatorial offices and scripture characters ; and as the Alpha and Omega of your whole ministry. Let your sermons be fragrant with the odours of his name. Carry this precious unguent to the pulpit, break the alabaster box, and let the precious perfume fill the house in which you minister. Christ has himself told you the secret of popularity and success, when he said, 'And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me.' With this divine loadstone magnetize your sermons; here lies the attraction. Preach as in full view of all the wonders of Calvary, and let it be as if, while you spoke, you felt the Saviour's grace flowing into and filling your soul, and as if at that moment you were sympathizing with the apostle in his sublime raptures, 'God forbid I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.' His own ministry was the reflection of this exhortation. If subordinate attractions were thrown around it, in this lay its element of power. He was an ambassador for Christ, beseeching men for Christ's sake to be reconciled to God. From his own profound appreciation of the vital truths of the gospel he was quick to discern the rise of the Negative Theology, to read its signs and bear his testimony against its loose generalities, cautious reserve, and ambiguous statements. "Doctrines, my friends," was his note of warning to his flock, "doctrines are of immense consequence, they are the basis of all practical religion, and the morality that is not connected with truth by faith is not the morality of the New Testament. It is the very nature of Christian ethics that they are so many emanations from Christian truths. Christ crucified, therefore, should be the great theme of every minister of religion: that latitudinarianism—and alas! it is becoming but too fashionable in the present day,—which would reduce all sentiments, as to their importance, to a level, and which would banish all distinctive opinions from the pulpit, to make way for mere moral duties and social virtues, is the rankest and most mischievous infidelity. If the truth, as it is in Jesus, be withheld, there can be no Christianity: no, nothing but deism; and to this many of the liberals of the passing age would bring us;—but it must not be."

There was one feature of James' preaching that gave to his ministry amongst his flock a deeply searching character. He did not take for granted, that the divine life once implanted, would transform by its intrinsic energy the whole character. He closely followed in the footsteps of the apostles, in warning renewed converted men against the special sins of their age and position, and summoning them in detail to the discharge of the duties of the Christian life. He was incessantly preaching to particular classes on their peculiar obligations and dangers. His ethical sermons were amongst the ablest and most powerful that he ever delivered.

But it was not alone by his eloquence as a preacher he won and kept, for fifty years, his high position as a minister in Birmingham. His pastoral wisdom and fidelity were as eminent as his powers in the pulpit. Often he bewailed to his colleague and biographer, his inability to sustain a regular and satisfactory system of pastoral visitation, and yet there were few persons in a church of a thousand members, and a congregation of nearly two thousand, of which he could not give a clear account. The weekly meeting held in the lecture-room, was the especial occasion for the pious pastor dealing with the inquirer or the backslider, and pouring out the fulness and tenderness of his heart. Singularly affecting scenes were there from time to time witnessed. On an occasion in which Mr. Dale was present at an early period of his connection with the church, an old man stood before the desk, amongst the long line of new members, at the advanced age of seventy years. For the first time he had been brought to the acknowledgment of the truth. Next to him stood a little girl, not more than thirteen years of age, who, in answer to her mother's prayers, had been early renewed by the Holy Ghost. Not far from her stood a man who had been guilty of gross and reckless sin, but who, recovered to repentance, had been living a new life. On approaching the old man James grasped his hand, and with trembling tones welcomed him to the church. To the young disciple he spoke with the tenderness of a father to a child on the blessedness of early coming to Christ; whilst to the reclaimed sinner he could scarcely give utterance to the joy of his heart. His addresses on these occasions often far surpassed in all the highest qualities of eloquence the most matured and finished of his sermons or public speeches. Under such a ministry and pastorate it is not wonderful the congregation should have grown to the magnitude of two thousand, and become the active centre of numerous benevolent missionary enterprises, a church eminent in faith and its fruits.

Yet the labours of James were not limited to his congregational circle. He was eminently a public spirited Christian, and took his full share in the business of his church, and in the advancement of the great philanthropic objects of his times. He possessed all the qualities by which men acquire authority; free from "crotchets," he had none of the self-will that frustrates maturest counsels, and from incapacity to yield to a friend the slightest concession, gives to an adversary a triumph. When business was to be done his eloquence was remarkable for its vigour, directness, and practical sagacity. To his energy and presiding wisdom, his section of the church owes the formation of the Congregational Union. Whilst many were alarmed at the prospect of an organized union controlling the independence of the churches, he hailed it from the prospect it afforded of increased brotherly love and co-operation, and on the review of its completion, congratulated himself on the part he had taken in gathering together into a body the scattered members of his denomination.

The first proposal for the formation of an Evangelical Alliance was from his pen, under the title of "Proposal for a General Protestant Union," and the whole force of his mind was thrown into the movement. His appeal awoke the response of ten thousand hearts. It was the utterance of a great truth long unexpressed, but deeply felt by hearts one in Christ. At the first Conference in Liverpool, it seemed, to him as if the reign of truth, love, and peace had begun. With the most intense anxiety he awaited the decision of the question of the basis of the union, trembling lest it might prove the rock on which they should split; and when at length the basis passed the ordeal of examination and was adopted by the whole assembly without prolonged discussion or disposition to captiousness or theological hair-splitting, his heart was lifted up in wonder, love, and silent prayer. The conference was a signal triumph of truth, charity, and Evangelical Protestantism. Twenty denominations agreeing on a doctrinal basis! It was, henceforth, more than a possibility that there could be union without compromise; it was an accomplished fact.

That in addition to his public labours James should have accomplished so much as an author, can be accounted for only from the readiness of his talents, the energy of his efforts, and the severe economy of his time. The edition of his collected works now being issued under the editorship of his son, is the worthiest and noblest monument that human hands can raise to his memory. Thousands will thank God through eternity for their guidance in the way of life by the author of "The Anxious Inquirer." A sketch from his home life unveils the secret of his multiplied literary labours. "He diligently redeemed," says his son, "his time. Meals were despatched in his house in less time than I ever saw them gone through elsewhere. Though a stout man all his movements were quick; he walked and wrote fast, and he dressed with unusual rapidity. My stepmother was as active as he was, and never kept him waiting for her at a meal, or when going out with him; and she remarked with great pleasure that Bonaparte gave the same praise to Josephine. He was generally in his study soon after seven, and I believe spent in devotion the hour before breakfast, which in winter and summer he took at eight. He never sat more than half an hour after dinner (at two or half past), and not a minute after breakfast or tea. After supper (at nine) he usually read an amusing book, and I think he did so also at the end of the morning. He wrote his letters generally in the afternoon, and grumbled if he had to take up his pen after supper. Up to supper time nothing seemed ever to incapacitate him from working, or to dissipate his mind. He could breakfast out, and when he returned fall to work as usual. When he reached home on an afternoon after travelling all day, he had tea as quickly as it could be got, and then went to his study, and generally on such occasions was later than usual at supper. He never gave up working unless physically unable to sit up, and made nothing of a headache or other ailment which would have laid aside most men." We are surprised to learn from his son, that from his numerous and widely circulated works he received little more than £100 a-year,—his principle being to sell them at such prices that the purchaser had the best of the bargain, as old Sir Oliver Cromwell insisted on selling his land. The money he received for the "Anxious Inquirer" he made a point of disposing for religious purposes.

But James did not escape the inevitable penalty of labour beyond strength. While his broad, massive, physical frame, energetic elocution, and voice as of many waters, betokened no yielding to the pressure of continued exhausting work, his nervous system was slowly being undermined. As they looked on his still vigorous frame, his friends could hardly accept the excuse of nervous depression for his declining all public engagements away from home. Yet for nearly ten years he was compelled to limit himself to his congregational duties, and to refuse all applications to preach out of Birmingham. No one would have thought, looking on his broad chest and firmly compacted frame, and listening to his powerful voice, that a shadow of nervous tremour could have troubled him. Yet for many years he scarcely ever slept on a Saturday night, so uncontrollable were the apprehensions with which he looked forward to the services of the Sunday. Twice or thrice his dread became so excessive that he was compelled to leave important services at the last moment on the hands of his brethren. During these years the restless, hurrying life of the popular preacher was exchanged for the more quiet life of the faithful pastor, and his growth in all the highest elements of wisdom and power was marked and rapid. At the same period a heavy cloud hung over his heart and home. The sufferings of his daughter, who had been an invalid from childhood, had greatly increased, and he was called to mourn the removal of his second wife, of whom, in the prospect of marriage, he had said, "Though sought for by many, she was reserved for me." Her energy of character and sanctified wisdom were his strength and support through eighteen years.

At this period so vivid was his own conviction that he had only a few months or weeks to live, that he penned a letter to his Church and congregation to be opened and read after his death, in which occurs those affecting introductory sentences: "Having a strong persuasion, from certain symptoms in my constitution which it might not be possible nor important to describe, that I am approaching the conclusion, not only of my labours, but also of my life, and deeming it probable that my last illness may be of such a nature as to give me little opportunity to express my views, and hopes, and counsels, in prospect of dissolution, I have determined thus to commit them to paper, in order that they might be read to you after my decease, when the circumstance of my removal to the eternal world, united to the calmness with which I now give utterance to my dying testimony, will tend by the blessing of God deeply to impress your minds." Though he survived this period nearly twenty years, the conviction remained that he might be overshadowed at any moment by the presence of death and eternity. If dazzled at any period by his popularity as a preacher, now he was weighed down by the tremendous responsibilities of the ministerial office; and in the near anticipation of his own appearing at the judgment-seat of Christ, he watched for souls as one who should give account. If during these years there was less of the activity of his earlier life, he had lost none of his interest in public affairs, or his ardent sympathy with every great Christian enterprise; nor was the warmth of his affection for those he loved abated, though the distractions of human life seemed latterly to have lost their power to trouble him. Year after year, however, his physical weakness and sufferings increased. He dreaded pain, he dreaded a lingering old age of suspended usefulness; and he was delivered from both. On the Sabbath preceding his death he preached on the "Common Salvation," prefacing his discourse with the solemn declaration, that if he knew he was preaching for the last time, he would choose no subject more in harmony with his own feelings. On the Tuesday after symptoms appeared which awakened for the first time the serious apprehensions of his family. On the following day his biographer entering his study, found him feeble, but free from pain, bending over a book of pictures, with one of his grand-daughters on each knee, and talking to them with great cheerfulness about the wonderful things on which they were looking. The grey head and furrowed but happy countenance between those two childish eager faces, made a picture not to be effaced from his memory. When the little children had kissed him and run away, he began talking solemnly, but not sadly, about his consciousness of increasing weakness. Gradually his thoughts moved towards the highest regions of saintly contemplation, "and I was so impressed," says Mr. Dale, "with the unusual glow and brightness of his faith and hope, that I said to him, 'Mr. James, you have an extraordinary measure of happiness and joy in God to-day; I remember that when I first came to college your sermons seemed to indicate that you were almost permanently under the shadow of religious despondency, and I cannot help thinking of the contrast.' He smiled, and said, 'Yes, I used to be clouded sometimes; and now I am afraid that my joy only rises from the hope and prospect of release; I want to slip away and be gone.'" His desire was on the eve of realization. The chariot wheels were at the threshold. On Friday the symptoms which had so greatly alarmed the family returned with increased violence; yet, so far from supposing that his end had really come, he would not permit either his invalid daughter or his son to remain after his medical attendant had left him. About six in the morning a sudden change took place. In all haste his son and medical attendant were sent for, but they only arrived in time to receive one look of love and word of recognition, before he sank into unconsciousness, and quietly and painlessly passed away.

Amidst the suspended business of that great mart of industry, which for fifty-three years had been warned and instructed by his faithful and eloquent ministry, and amidst the tears of assembled thousands, his remains were committed to the tomb, his congregation, as the coffin was lowered, raising the hymn of Christian hope:—

"Unveil thy bosom, faithful tomb!
Take this new treasure to thy trust,
And give these sacred relics room
A while to slumber in the dust."

THE CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN.

PART I.

THERE may be few of our readers to whom the name of the United Brethren, or Moravians, will not bring associations of devoted missionary labour abroad, and earnest, self-denying piety at home, for in these respects, "their praise is in all the Churches." But their old romantic history of trials and deliverances, as the first protesting Church of Christ, is, we fear, comparatively little known, and a brief sketch of this may, we believe, convey to many interest and information.

The gospel appears to have been first introduced into Bohemia during the ninth century, by two ecclesiastics sent as missionaries from Thessalonica. Their labours were successful, both in Bohemia and Moravia, and in these countries, hopeful Christian communities were rapidly formed. Being united to the Greek Church, they did not acknowledge the supremacy of the pope, and were from the beginning free from the peculiar errors and abuses of Romanism. Cyril,—one of their early teachers,—is supposed to have been the translator of the Scriptures into the Slavonian language, a translation in use to this day.

Their times of trial soon began. About the year 930, the Christian Duke or Prince of Bohemia was murdered by his heathen brother, Boleslaus, who usurped the throne, and proved a cruel tyrant, especially towards his Christian subjects, whom he persecuted in every way. The emperor Otho I. interfered, compelling Boleslaus to desist, and to acknowledge his sovereignty, but taking advantage of this to bring the people under subjection to the see of Rome. They resisted and remonstrated, but could only obtain the indulgence from Pope John XIII. of having divine worship performed in the native language. Even this was soon disputed and withdrawn. We may give the first and last paragraphs of a letter from Pope Gregory VII. in 1079, to Wratelslaus, king of Bohemia, as a specimen of the language held by the popes of Rome, then and long afterwards:—

"Gregory, bishop, and servant of the servants of God, sends greeting and benediction to the Bohemian prince Wratelslaus. Your highness desires that we would give permission to your people to conduct their Church service according to the old Slavonian ritual. But know, dear son, that we by no means grant your request; for, having frequently searched the Holy Scriptures, we have there discovered that it has pleased Almighty God to direct his worship to be conducted in hidden language.

* * * * *

Therefore, what your people ignorantly require, can in no wise be granted unto them, and we now forbid it, by the power of God and his holy apostle Peter, and exhort you, for the honour of Almighty God, that you oppose such folly by every possible means, in conformity to our command.

"GIVEN AT ROME IN 1079."

A long period of spiritual declension followed after this, and the light of divine truth must have been burning very low, when it was mercifully revived among the Bohemians by the arrival of many Waldensian Christians, who, driven by cruel persecution from their own homes in France and Italy, sought refuge—near the close of the twelfth century—in Bohemia and Moravia. Those who received them with Christian compassion and hospitality, had cause to say that they entertained angels unawares. These faithful and deeply tried witnesses for Christ soon strengthened the faith and hope of their weaker brethren, pointing out the errors into which they had fallen, and the clear gospel truths which they were in danger of losing sight of. The united Churches were enabled to make a new stand against the tide of superstition and corruption around them, and not only grew in grace themselves, but, we are told, sent missionaries to England, Hungary, &c. Is not a missionary spirit ever one of the most hopeful tokens of a reviving Church?

All this was done, however, with caution, and in a condition of comparative obscurity. About the close of the thirteenth century, the attention of the Roman authorities was unhappily attracted, by the imprudence, we are told, of two Bohemian preachers, and a severe persecution was the consequence. Celibacy for the clergy, the use of Latin in public worship, and refusing the communion cup to the people, were enjoined under severe penalties. Many reluctantly submitted, but many were found faithful, and preferred to endure trial in every form rather than deny the truth of Jesus. Numbers of these were driven into exile (and in this way carried light to other dark places), others were imprisoned, plundered, even put to death, like our own persecuted forefathers; and like them, their meetings for worship were held in the wildest retreats of nature, or when they ventured to assemble in larger numbers, it was under arms. Yet, here and there, bold witnesses for truth were raised up, even in high places. John Millitsch, court chaplain at Prague, was a faithful preacher, and a most popular one. His discourses were attended by crowds, and these, together with his writings, were instrumental to the awakening and conversion of many. He became, as might be expected, an object of papal hatred, especially after a visit to Rome, where he had not shrunk from denouncing the glaring errors and immoralities of the clergy. On returning to Prague, he was thrown into prison, but this produced such a sensation among the people, that his enemies were afraid of the consequences, and he was soon released. He took a journey afterwards through Moravia, Silesia, and Poland, doubtless everywhere "confirming the Churches." The pope sent final orders that he was to be punished with the utmost severity, as an incorrigible heretic. But the Lord was pleased to spare his servant the last trial of faith, and, just at this crisis, by natural illness, Millitsch departed in peace.

Another remarkable preacher, Matthias Janowski, was much in favour with the Emperor Charles IV., and prevailed on him to promote religious reformation. Some overtures to this effect having been made to Rome, the pope, enraged, demanded that Janowski should be banished. His exile, however, did not last long, and he was permitted to end his days in retirement at home. He is said on his deathbed to have spoken, in what seemed the language of prophecy, of the future trials of his native Church, and yet the rise of a peaceful, despised people from among them, against whom the efforts of the enemy should be directed in vain; adding, that only one of those then present should see that day. One of his hearers considered this prophecy fulfilled, when, at a very advanced age, he lived to witness and join in the formation of the Church of the Brethren.

Then came the days of John Huss and Jerome of Prague, whose history is too well known to need repetition here. The object of what has been already said, is to show for how long before that time there had been true and faithful witnesses for Christ in the land of Bohemia and Moravia. These were animated with new hope and courage, when the Master raised up for them such a leader as Huss; and deep and bitter in proportion was their disappointment and indignation at his most unjust and cruel fate. A spirited remonstrance was sent to the Council of Constance, in the name of the Bohemian nobility, complaining of the insult offered to the whole nation, in the sentence executed on one so universally respected and admired for his talents as well as piety. The only reply was a circular, commanding all adherents of the Romish Church to join in efforts for the "extermination of heretics."

A terrible persecution followed. The followers of Huss were "hunted upon the mountains like beasts of prey," and on being apprehended, were thrown into dungeons, sold as slaves, or exposed to death in its most dreadful forms. Not fewer than sixteen hundred are said to have been thrust alive down the shafts of the mines near Kuttenberg. Others, like their leader, were committed to the flames. There is an affecting record of one of their pastors, named Wenceslaus, who was placed on a pile of wood, along with several of his people and four boys under eleven years of age. All were offered life at the last moment, on condition of abjuring their heretical opinions. Wenceslaus, in the name of the rest, replied that they would endure death a hundred times instead of once, rather than deny the truth as revealed in Scripture. The pile was then lighted, and the pastor—clasping the children in his arms—joined with them all in a hymn of praise, till their voices were silenced by the suffocating flames. It is easy to read and write of such things; but which of us, in these modern days, would be strengthened to endure them?

Human forbearance could endure no longer, and an outraged people rose to arms, in defence of their rights as men and Christians. They found a worthy leader in John de Trocnaw, one of those gifted and daring spirits who figure ever and anon on the page of history, raised up by Providence for some special work in times of trouble. He was a Bohemian noble, and is best known by his surname of Ziska, or the one-eyed, given in consequence of his having lost an eye in battle with the Turks. An army of forty thousand were soon under his command, and he fixed their head-quarters on a rugged mountain, nearly isolated by the windings of the river Moldau, and capable of being strongly fortified at the point of junction with the mainland, so as to form an almost impregnable camp. The hill was named Tabor (a tent), and the followers of Ziska are generally mentioned in history as the Taborites. Marvellous things are related of the contest which followed during the next three years, and the victories gained by the desperate courage of the Bohemian patriots, over all the superior numbers and discipline of the Imperial armies. But the conflict was marked by all the horrors so peculiarly characteristic of civil and religious wars, and on either side cruelties were inflicted as well as endured, such as it were painful to dwell upon.

In one of their engagements Ziska was wounded by an arrow in his only remaining eye, which was quite destroyed, and thus he became totally blind. On his recovery from the consequent illness, his friends with amazement heard him talk of setting out with the army as before. They reasoned and remonstrated with him in vain. It is said that in the midst of the argument a tumult arose in the camp, and the blind warrior smiled to hear that the soldiers were declaring they would throw down their arms unless their old general was restored to them. His greatest victories were gained after this. Two powerful armies were to advance against him from the east and west, expecting to crush between them "this handful of vexatious heretics." But the battle of Kamnitz proved a decided victory for the Hussites, who fought with the combined energy of patriots and martyrs. After singing a hymn all together, they drew their swords, and on a signal being given by their blind general waving his above his head, rushed forwards with an impetuosity which nothing could resist. A panic seized the army of Sigismund, they fled in disorder, and two thousand perished in attempting to cross the river Igla, where the bridge had become blocked up.

Even popish writers of this period acknowledge the marvellous bravery and success of the Hussites, defeating with such inferior numbers, and often the rudest weapons, such as threshing flails, the well armed and disciplined ranks of their enemies. One says: "The Bohemians have proved themselves a brave people; though the Emperor Sigismund led nearly half Europe in arms against them, he was not able to reduce them." Cardinal Julian, the pope's legate, himself present at two engagements, on seeing the boldest nobles and generals give way, is said to have burst into tears and exclaimed, "Alas! it is not the enemy, but our sins which have put us to flight." Melancthon, in after days, considered that the angels of God must have accompanied the Reformers, and terrified and dispersed their opponents.

Ziska, after the battle of Kamnitz, availed himself of comparative rest to carry on the reformation of religion among his countrymen, renouncing the papal authority, and abolishing the worst superstitions of Rome. Yet this does not seem to have been done in any arbitrary manner; though a stern soldier, he was not a fanatical bigot. He and his army have been compared in various points to that of Oliver Cromwell, and like him, Ziska steadily refused the offered crown of his father-land. We must not judge of his character and actions by the ideas of our modern days. He seems to have been a sincere, though what we would call a rough Christian. He died not, as he doubtless expected and probably desired, on the battle-field, but from an attack of the plague, at the Castle of Priscow, on his way to hear proposals of peace offered by the emperor. His body was interred in the church of Czarlow, where a monument bears this inscription:—

HERE LIES
JOHN ZISKA,
WHO, HAVING DEFENDED HIS COUNTRY
AGAINST THE ENCROACHMENTS OF PAPAL TYRANNY, RESTS IN THIS HALLOWED PLACE, IN DESPITE OF THE POPE.

The struggle for religious liberty was continued for a number of years after the death of Ziska, but we need not enter into its details. The Romish Church endeavoured to accomplish by artifice what could not be gained by force, and succeeded in weakening the Reformers, by dividing them into parties. One of these, called the Calixtines, or "Cup Christians," were willing to compromise on certain conditions, especially that of the cup in the communion service being granted to the laity. The other party, or Taborites, were dissatisfied with the conditions granted by the Council of Basle, and convinced of the insincerity of all the pope's promises. The two factions actually came to war with one another, in which the Calixtines were victorious.

Meanwhile those truly animated by holy and spiritual motives, beheld with deep grief the state of matters among themselves, and felt that it was not by war and tumult the cause and kingdom of the Prince of Peace could be made to prosper. They earnestly entreated Rokyzan, leader of the Calixtines, to make greater efforts after true and spiritual reformation. But all they could obtain was permission, through his influence, from the Bohemian king, George Podiebrad, to retire to the lordship of Lititz, on the confines of Silesia and Moravia, a portion of the country which had been much desolated during the long war, and there to colonize, and worship God according to their consciences, in peace and obscurity.

Here, accordingly, in 1453, the genuine followers of Huss, few in number but strong in faith, retired; and in the words of a Moravian historian, "from this small remnant originated a branch of the Christian Church, which, in ancient and modern times, and under every vicissitude of repose or persecution, has, by the blessing of God, firmly adhered to the doctrine of Christ crucified; and, considering its slender means, has not been behind others in zeal and perseverance in propagating the truth as it is in Jesus." The first settlers were soon joined by believers from other parts of the country, including some men of rank and ability, and having agreed on various fundamental principles as a bond of mutual union, they assumed the name which they have ever since retained, the Unitas Fratrum, or, Church of the United Brethren.

Thus, sixty years at least before Luther's famous document had been posted on the cathedral wall at Wittemberg, the foundations were laid of what justly claims to be the oldest of the Protestant Churches. For the title of Protestant does not belong to the Waldenses, who claim descent from the primitive Christians, and never owned the authority of Rome. c. c.

"I AM CHIEF!"

CHARGE NO other man with guilt !
I alone his blood have spilt ;
Every crime against the Lamb
Charge on me. Lo ! here I am
Self-convicted—self-confessed,
Chief, alone. Discharge the rest.

Olivet ! 'twas I that slept—
Slept when watch-hour should be kept ;
I alone—'twas not the three.
Spare me, O Gethsemane !
Though thy sod with bloodlike sweat
For my wicked sloth was wet.

Who 'gainst Peter bringeth blame ?
Enter there another name.
He but thrice—I stood beside,
And a thousand times denied—
His sin washed in bitter tears ;
Mine persisted in for years.

Say'st thou—doubting what I am—
Judas sold the Paschal Lamb ?
Yes ! for silver—but they bought
Jesus Christ of me for nought.
'Tis no Jew his life assails,
'Tis no Roman drives the nails ?

These are sins, not spikes ; and those,
Those are crimes, not thorns. His woes,
Mine iniquities. That spear
In my heart was forged ! And here
Pilate, Herod, both were born ;
Cross, and spike, and spear, and thorn.

Shamed, I owned them every one.
That black cloud that veils the sun—
(Veils the Father, too, in wrath),
From my soul its blackness hath,
Leaves my soul to light and bliss.
All have gone from mine to his.

Joy, peace, righteousness divine,
All have come from his to mine.
Him in my stead, me in his,
God accepts. The sonship is Mine ; and he—oh ! past belief—
He, not I, appears the chief.

"PLEASING OTHERS."

"How far," inquires a young minister, "am I justified in attempting to please others ?"

1. Not by unworthy compliances. Your calling is the noblest in the world. You are your Master's ambassador. Lord Amherst, when representing England in China in 1790, refused to perform the Ko-Tor, or Chinese form of obeisance to the emperor, on the ground that this would be derogatory to the dignity of his own prince. So it is derogatory to Christ's dignity for his servants to yield any menial obeisances to the customs or men of the world. Particularly should this be observed in the pulpit. The world-conforming, or truth-compromising preacher dishonours his Master and ensnares many souls.

2. Yet be careful never to show personal hardness. It is true you must not judge of this by the animosity of some whom you address. This follows all earnest presentations of the truth. "If I am faithful," said Mr. Whitfield, "you will either fall out with me or with yourselves." This is necessary, but let it not come from personal pretension. A hard man can do good only at a distance, and often he hardens others, turning doubt into despair.

3. There are certain positive ways of pleasing others to edification, among which we may notice the following:—

Showing to all men the respect due to each.

Exercising the social affections under God's grace.

Not laying undue stress on minor points, and treating greater ones with tender solemnity.

Recollecting not to be a self-seeker in society, or to be desiring position or display, BUT THAT THE MAN WHO WANTS YOU IS THE MAN YOU WANT.—Bishop's Recorder.

WANDERINGS OVER BIBLE LANDS AND SEAS.

TABOR AND THE SEA OF GALILEE.

EARLY in the morning, on Friday, June 27th, we left the Latin Convent at Nazareth to resume our tent-life. We had quitted no place in the Holy Land with more longing to linger there. But if we had stayed a year instead of a day, we must still have left with regret; and unless a visit can be prolonged into a residence, a few extra days, perhaps, scarcely add much to the force of recollections. The vividness of the first impression wears off, and there is not time to replace it by the familiarity of daily associations, so that what is lost in freshness, is scarcely compensated by what is gained in acquaintance with detail. At all events we tried to console ourselves with considerations of this kind, as we wound our way over the hills which separate from the world the mountain cradle of the life which has transformed the face of the world, and renewed the depths of every Christian's life.

It was very early in the morning when we started. The sun had scarcely risen. The long shadows of the hills lay across the valleys; the air was breezy and cool; our horses, especially the little nimble white horse I rode, were fresh and eager after their day of comparative rest, and paced briskly over the downs, and valleys, and wooded hills.

For the hills on that morning ride from Nazareth to Tabor might really be called wooded, especially as we approached Tabor. Not that the hill sides were clothed with those rich masses of wood which, in the moist atmosphere of England, often makes the distant hills look purple, and soft as the plumage of a dove; but our path lay under the frequent shadow of oaks of various kinds, and terebinth, and luxuriant thorn-trees. Many green and glossy shrubs grew as brushwood in the intervals, and the ground beneath them was often strewn with wild flowers which scented the morning air; thyme, pink convolvulus, a large blue thistle-like flower, and a deep blue prickly star. It was not a forest certainly, but it often recalled the scenery at the outskirts of an English park; trees and evergreen shrubs with shining leaves, standing apart, with full liberty for the development of each, and branches feathering to the ground; with flowers and green, flowering shrubs between and among them.

The oaks increased in size as we approached Tabor, and grew closer to each other, yet still you could not so much say the hill was clothed with wood as thickly sprinkled with trees, clustered in park-like groups, or scattered here and there as on the edge of a felled copse. The path up the hill was very steep and rocky, in many parts rather perilous, winding among the rocks and the roots of the trees. In some places we had to climb rough staircases of rock, as on the hill road from Jaffa to Jerusalem; while in others we rode along green glades and terraces, shaded with oak and terebinth, and sprinkled with syringa and other flowering shrubs. As we approached the summit, the bridle path widened into a carriage road, which had been hewn in the solid rock. There were grooves of chariot wheels deeply worn in this road, certainly not traversed by chariots for many centuries, probably not, at the latest, since Roman times. It led to a massive gateway; and on the summit of Tabor, to my great surprise, we found ourselves among the extensive ruins of ancient fortifications.

No place in the Holy Land more contradicted my previous image of it than Tabor. From childhood, I suppose, most of us have pictured it as a solitary mountain, on whose green pastures the flocks peacefully graze, whose brow rises quiet and lonely to the sky. Mountains in our northern climates give the idea of calm solitude, above the din and turmoil of the lower world. Even if not peaked with wild rocks or crowned with snow, the last idea one connects with a mountain-top is that of a city. Yet the summit of Tabor must evidently have been, not a mere fortress or military station, but a city. We had become accustomed to look on the low rounded hills of southern Palestine as pedestals for towns or villages, and we had admired the regal site of Samaria on its isolated hill; but Tabor is not a hill, but a mountain, eighteen hundred feet above the sea, and rising more than thirteen hundred feet above the land immediately surrounding it. The walls have been very massive, and the fortifications very strong, as an engineer officer in our party assured us. A deep fosse surrounds the wall on the least precipitous side of the mountain. Along the walls, at intervals, were the ruins of towers. One of these had pointed arches in the doors and windows, and had, probably, been built or repaired in crusading times. Others seemed far more ancient; and some of the gigantic stones in the walls appeared to be of Jewish or Phœnician workmanship. Underneath the walls and towers we explored a very large reservoir or water-tank, lined with cement; several cisterns, smaller, but still of considerable size, shaped like bottles, with the long narrow neck upwards; and some magazines apparently intended for corn or various military stores. Broken pottery lay around in these subterranean reservoirs, and great evergreen oaks grew from the interstices of the massive stones which their gigantic roots had here and there displaced, and threw their broad broken shadows over the deserted chambers. Altogether, with the trees, and verdure, and large-leaved plants which sprang out of the crevices of the broken masonry, it reminded us of a ruined castle on the Rhine, such as Rhemfels. But the ruins on Tabor are not those of a castle but of a city, and the date of the latest is probably about that of the earliest of those fastnesses of robber or crusader on the Rhine. In one part we came on the remains of a church, lately partially repaired by the Greeks as a place of pilgrimage, and, perhaps, previously repaired by the Crusaders from the earlier Greeks.

The peculiar feature of the ruins, however, is that they enclose a large space of green level ground, on which there is no trace of buildings of any kind. It must have been a strongly fortified town encircling a spacious park. This green and wooded platform is considerably lower than the edges of the hill, whose height is increased by the ruins of the fortifications. The summit of the mountain seemed to us to form something like a volcanic crater, whose edges were walled; although Tabor is not volcanic, but a limestone spur of the hills of Galilee.

We supposed it must have been a place of refuge, to which, in times of war or danger, the inhabitants of the surrounding villages fled for protection, encamping in the parklike space within the city with their cattle. An impregnable place of refuge it must have been in the days of arrows and slings, commanded or even approached by no neighbouring height, and containing such ample space for stores, and even—if needed—for the tillage of crops.

Our saddle bags were opened under the shade of the oaks, and we sat as long as we could venture to linger among the trees and ruins; the thick foliage, the long grass and wild flowers stirring and rustling in the breeze around us, and the whole of northern and southern Palestine at our feet in successive landscapes, as we moved from point to point along the edge of the hill, and rested on the massive stones of the more ancient fortifications. In winding round the mountain on our way up we had caught various glimpses of the plains below, of the villages of Endor and Nain, and over Esdraelon to Jordan and the Mediterranean. On the summit we kept chiefly to the side which commanded the north, and saw from the hills of Galilee across the high table-land above Tiberias, to the Sea of Galilee, the gleam of whose waters just caught the eye in the distance, sunk in their deep basin below the plain. Beyond rose the long back of Hermon, from that point not rising in one grand distinctive summit, but stretching in a long undulating line, pale with distance, but quite clear, and streaked—not crested—with silvery lines of snow. Hermon from Tabor was not a sight we could easily leave; yet the unexplored country beyond us, the hills and lake of Galilee were, if possible, more interesting than these. We traced one or two streams across that hot brown plain by their border of verdure, and occasional clusters of olives, and we could see too plainly how considerable was the distance yet to be traversed that day, to admit of our lingering more than a few hours.

We descended the hill by a rocky road, over part of which we thought it safer to walk, leaving our gentle sure-footed little horses to follow.

Barak and his brave ten thousand were on foot when they assembled on this mountain, and poured down its rocky sides upon Jezreel, sweeping the cavalry and chariots of the Canaanites across the plain to Kishon and the sea. Cavalry would certainly have availed little on those broken wooded steepes. It was inspiring to think how the war cries of the little Israelitish army must have resounded from these rocks as they rushed on, irresistible with the prophecies of Deborah, and the arm of the Lord.

But there was one event commonly associated with Tabor, which would indeed pale the interest of all others if it occurred here. Can it be that on some secluded terrace of this wooded hill, the glory of the Son of God for a time broke through the veil, and the garments "white as no fuller on earth can white them," and the face "shining as the sun," once beamed forth here through the night on the three wonder-stricken apostles?

At first sight the existence of this ancient fortress or fortified town on the summit of Tabor, seems so to contradict the natural impression of the narrative, as to preclude the possibility of this mountain having been—as tradition makes it—the scene of the Transfiguration. There are and were so many solitary and even desert hills in and near Galilee, that one cannot easily conceive the close neighbourhood of such a stronghold as this to have been the spot chosen for a manifestation, so jealously veiled from the eyes, and at first guarded from the knowledge of all but the three. Yet Tabor is a mountain—not a mere ordinary hill—and on its rocky sides, doubtless, many a place absolutely secluded might always have been found, especially at night, when it is most probable the event happened. St. Peter's expression, "the holy Mount," implies nothing. The Presence consecrated the place. Many think Hermon the most probable scene, chiefly influenced, it would seem, by the far greater majesty of the scenery of Hermon, its sublime mountain solitudes, and the constant presence on its lofty clefts, of the snow, to which the glistening transfigured garments are compared.

But when narratives so circumstantial and simple as those of the three Gospels avoid every detail which could lead to a positive identification of the place, is it not probable that this indefiniteness is deliberate and designed? All topographical details which could give vividness and reality to the incidents, are in the New Testament so carefully specified, and at the same time all curious indications which might lead to a superstitious identification of certain precise spots, are systematically omitted, that there is no point more frequently pressed on one's attention in the Holy Land than this: that Christianity, whilst as a history of facts capable of standing the strictest tests of geography, as a revelation of truths and of a divine life, vouchsafes no assistance to the spirit of superstitious pilgrimage.

At Jerusalem, you can feel with certainty that your feet are treading the footpath to Bethany, that you are wandering along the olive shaded valley where the garden of Gethsemane was, that you are standing on the very same sacred temple precincts where the blind and lame came to Jesus and were healed. But on what spot of that valley the forehead of our Lord was bowed in agony, or on what part of the hilly ground close to the walls of the city fell the precious drops of His redeeming blood, no human being knows.

Again, at Nazareth you can roam about the breezy, thyme-scented hills, and be absolutely sure you are gazing on the scenery of the early life of our Lord ; but where the angel met Mary, or where the lowly house of the carpenter stood, no researches can discover.

And with regard to the Transfiguration, might we not still more expect this to be the case ? Among all the incidents of Gospel history, none have less of a local character than this. The scenery is of heaven rather than of earth. It is a fragment of the eternal light breaking in on the darkness of time ; and whether the apostles had been rapt, like Paul, into the third heaven to behold it, or had seen it on this earth, would seem of comparatively little moment. It is the unseen world becoming for a brief interval seen, and proving that the unseen is not necessarily invisible. The persons in the scene are gathered from the depths of the invisible world, "whether in the body or out of the body we cannot tell." The scenery was not Tabor or Hermon, or any sweep of earthly landscape, or snowy heights of mountain solitude ; but night and an overshadowing cloud. That cloud wrapped those within it as effectually from earth as if it had been millions of miles of planetary distance in the furthest heavens. Beyond it was the sleeping world, invisible, and night. Within it were three messengers from the dead, and the Son of God, and day ;—the day of heaven beaming from the face of Jesus as the Sun, and glistening on his raiment whiter than snow ; and from the cloud a voice, "This is my beloved Son, hear him." The light, and the voice, and the persons were of heaven, not of earth. It is only on the next day, when they went down the hill, that earth meets us again, with its perplexities and necessities, in the questioning Scribes, the wondering crowd which ran to meet the Saviour, the possessed dumb child he healed, and the poor, bewildered, agonized father, whose tearful, fearful prayer he heard. Locality is, indeed, of less importance to a vivid conception of the narrative of the Transfiguration than to that of any other in the New Testament. Whether the cloud of glory rested on Hermon or on Tabor, or on the holy city whose foundations are precious stones and her gates pearl, would make no alteration in the scene. Those who were eye-witnesses of that majesty and listeners to that voice were blind and deaf for the time to all earthly sights and sounds ; as we shall be when once more that glory is unveiled, and the momentary radiance of the Transfiguration shall fade into the permanent light of the glorious Epiphany of the Son of God.

Through the afternoon, after descending Tabor, we rode across the sultry table-land, longing for water, for on Tabor we had not come on any spring. The country becomes volcanic in character from the base of Tabor eastward to Tiberias. In many parts the plain was thickly strewn with large, black, rounded stones. At an hour or two from the base of Tabor we reached a village, with a large rocky threshing-floor, where men were working. We hoped to have found water here, but the villagers directed us further on to their well, which, they said, was at some distance. Whether we missed this well of theirs or not, I cannot tell ; but the first water we reached was a spring at the bottom of a black, volcanic, ravine cliff, in the plain, which had so bitter, bituminous a taste, that neither we nor our horses could drink of it. We scrambled out of the ravine, therefore, as soon as possible, and made all haste across the rest of the table-land, which lay between us and the basin of Tiberias. When we arrived at the edge of this reach of the deep volcanic ghor or Jordan valley, the lake lay rippling and sparkling, a broad expanse of refreshing waters, some hundred feet below us. We had difficulty in restraining the eagerness of our thirsty horses, as they hurried down the stony hill to this paradise of waters. I forgot at the moment that this lake was indeed fresh, and not salt and bitter like the Dead Sea, and was mournfully anticipating the disappointment which awaited the poor, eager horses, when to my delight, on reaching the brink of the lake, they rushed into the water, and plunged their heads into it, and drank with most unquestionable enjoyment.

The luxury of this sea—these exhaustless miles of fresh and wholesome water, good for drinking or bathing—after husbanding a cupful of the same precious liquid in our hot pitchers all the day, is not easily described. No wonder so many cities flourished on its shores.

We descended to the lake close to the walls of Tiberias, which leant with the concussion of the earthquake which laid it waste in 1837. Our thirsty horses had left us little leisure to linger over our first view of the lake, as it burst on us from the edge of the hill,—once a busy scene of life and labour and traffic, bright with cities and boats, now a lonely mountain lake—reflected in its unbroken waters the white walls of only one poor tottering town, and bearing on its bosom only one poor crazy boat. The road to the Baths, where our tents were pitched, lay close to the lake, over shingly beaches ; with black volcanic stones and ruins of the old Roman Tiberias, strewn here and there on our right, over the little level space between the water and the hills, or rather the steep sides of the plain.

Our encampment was close to the Hot Spring, on the shingle between the Bath House and the lake ; and here we were to be at home for two whole days and three nights, from this Friday evening till Monday morning. The thought was rest and delight indeed.

The heat on those June days was intense, of that sultry, steady, tropical kind which we had experienced at the Dead Sea; and, with the exception of one morning's ride, the hardest amongst us could do little else than rest, and look, and stroll after sunset along the beach. Nor did we desire much else. The sites of the cities around the Lake of Tiberias are so much disputed that its interest lies in the general character of the scenery far more than in especial spots; and since we could not visit every nook and corner as we had wished, the next best thing was to have leisure to drink in the scenery and associations of the lake in one characteristic part of it, which we did. By day we rested in the room belonging to the Baths, built by Ibrahim Pasha, the large windows of which, when we could venture to open the Venetians, give us a full view of the lake. Our tents would have been quite unendurable during the heat of the day. Indeed, the lake itself was the only pleasant place during the hottest hours, and in it the gentlemen of our party spent much of their time.

Beyond the Baths the hot sulphurous springs, which, since the days of Herod, have made this place famous, trickled over the pebbles into the lake, throwing out a strong sulphurous smell.

On Saturday morning (June 28th), we breakfasted outside our tents before the sun rose, and watched the grey and then the glow of dawn spread over the hills "on the other side;" the hills among which the demoniac once roamed, and where the cave tombs, where he abode, still honeycomb the ravines. We were told we must on no account venture to cross to those hills, on account of the savage predatory habits of the Bedouins who infest them. The solitary boat which floats on the lake, did not appear during our stay; but, if it had been within reach, we were warned by no means to attempt a voyage in it, because in the sudden storms of wind which burst on this inland sea, as of old, she becomes unmanageable by the unskilful boatmen, and has been detained for days on the opposite shores, involving serious peril from the robber-hordes.

Our horses were ready very early, and we started for an exploration of the shores. Crossing the shingly beach again, and passing the ruins of the old city, we rode under the walls of Tiberias, and then skirted the hills which, beyond it, descend precipitously into the lake, on a road hewn in their rocky sides,—a Roman road probably, we thought, for since Roman days, since New Testament days, since the fall of Herod's dynasty, what roadmakers have been here? What cities are there now, since Chorazin and Bethsaida fell into nameless heaps, between which any such communication is needed? The poor Jews of Tiberias have no merchandise to convey along these shores; and, except a peasant's mule, laden with corn from the plain of Gennesaret, or a stray Bedouin horseman, who scorns or dreads all highways, what feet now tread these paths, so carefully and laboriously cut out of the black volcanic cliffs into a road, in some places wide enough for two chariots to pass? Therefore, we concluded we were, in this rock-hewn road, on the sure track of Him who went about this lake doing good, from Capernaum to Bethsaida and Chorazin; and the thought made us ride in silence.

Beyond those cliffs the hills retreat, and the shores of the lake widen into an extensive fertile plain, watered by many streams. This, we were told, was Gennesaret; and before we reached it the road diverged a little, leaving room for a height of volcanic rock between us and the lake, crowned with the black ruins of a building, with a few huts near it, called, in accents scarcely changed since Mary Magdalene dwelt there, Mejdol. On these rocky shores she wandered distracted by the terrible reality of the demoniac voices, wilder than the wildest dreams of madness, and yet, alas! no dreams. On these shores, probably, she first heard the voice which hushed the tempest in her soul, with its unfailing "Peace, be still!" And hither, we may suppose, she returned after the resurrection, the first witness of the risen Lord, with his "Mary" awaiting the response of "Raboni" in her heart for ever.

The locality of the plain of Gennesaret is disputed: some authorities placing it on this plain near Tiberias, and others on the low fertile lands near the flowing of the Jordan into the lake on the north. The scenery of either would correspond with that of the Galilean parable of the sower and the seed, which naturally, not having seen the other, we now associate with the rich plain we crossed on that morning's ride.

Here were the hills sweeping down the "stony ground" into the fertile soil of the plain. Here was the way-side, now indeed little trodden; and here were the fowls of the air. Birds abound round the shores of the lake, not merely the doves and wood-pigeons which coo and murmur in the groves throughout Palestine, but birds of various kinds, and among others, birds of prey; we had seen eagles hovering and wheeling over the bare cliffs. Thorns and prickly bushes abound everywhere in Palestine. And here certainly was abundance of the good ground which could bring forth some forty, some sixty, some an hundred fold.

Along this fruitful plain we rode for a long time between the lake and the cultivated land, pacing leisurely over the sandy beaches which border this part of the lake, the little waves rippling up and bathing our horses' feet, and shrubberies of oleanders in full flower leaning towards us on the other side. Every now and then the beaches widened into little sandy coves, through which little pebbly brooks trickled into the lake; and once or twice we had to wade through the mouths of deeper streams.

There was something indescribably happy in thus leisurely riding along the shores of that sacred lake, as we thought what voice the music of its soft ripples had once accompanied, and whose feet its waves had bathed. At the end of this reach of the lake, this bay of rich, low, level land, we came to a ruinous khan, called Khan Minyeh.

The best kept of khans have a dreary deserted look to European eyes, unconsciously comparing them with inns and their welcomes. A quadrangle of bare roughly built sheds around a desolate court-yard, constitute their highest attractions; but Khan Minyeh was a ruined khan, and around it, as so often in this land of the "desolation of many generations," were scattered ruins of an earlier date. We left our horses near it and climbed a hill just above, which commanded a fine view of the lake. We were told that the ruins on its brow were those of Capernaum; but be this as it may, they were almost certainly the ruins of a city in whose streets the Saviour taught, under whose roofs he rested, and at whose gates he healed the sick.

At the time we were there we thought ourselves actually on the site of the city which was so habitually the resting-place of our Lord when near the Sea of Galilee, that it is called his own city.

The lake lay before us in nearly its whole extent from south to north, point stretching beyond point into pale distance. The shores were for the most part steep, but not mountainous, and the outline of the hills not much varied. There was scarcely anything with sufficient form left in it to be called ruins. Indeed, we might have fancied the black unshapen stones strewn around us to have been rather the débris of some volcanic convulsion than the remains of human dwellings. In one place, however, there was a deep pit or broken cistern, and near it lay a large stone with a circle engraven on it, like a millstone or press of some kind. The thin grass was dried to an amber brown with the intense summer heat, and the dry stalks and withered ears waved languidly in the breeze.

Yet here, we thought, had been the home of Jairus, where the only child had died, and had been recalled again to life by the voice which called the dead from Hades with such tender, quiet words as those with which the mother would have waked her from sleep, "Talitha (little maiden, a term of endearment), I say unto thee, Arise." And in the streets once standing here the trembling woman had touched the hem of his garment and had been healed.

Here the centurion, whose servant was dear unto him, had lived, and the nobleman, courtier perhaps of Herod, who found his fever-stricken son healed by the distant word he had not heard; and here, in consequence of that miracle, sprang up at least one believing household.

And here the city was once at sunset emptied of its inhabitants, empty as it is now, for every house sent forth all its inmates, "sick and whole," thronging to the gate where Jesus stood and healed all who had need of healing. Fancy the tears and smiles and broken words of gratitude and joy as the multitude returned to homes from which, for the time at least, all suffering and pain were banished. Pain—but not sin! The words which once sounded over those waves as a faithful warning, "Thou, Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven shall be cast down to hell, for if the mighty works done in thee had been done in Sodom it would have remained," were unheeded, and they have become a wail of doom which echoes from every point and hill-side of these deserted and lonely shores. They were no solitude then. The white columns of temples and palaces and synagogues, and the sails of countless boats, gleamed over land and sea, and were reflected in these still waters. Busy, trading cities, baths which were the luxurious resorts of Herod's court, stimulated the energies of husbandman, fisherman, and merchant. And those plains below us, if they were indeed the corn-fields through which the disciples walked and plucked the ears of corn, were no unfrequented paths. Our Lord came that the world through him might be saved, and wherever men thronged most thickly lay his path. The busy, peopled, cultivated shores of the Lake of Geneva might perhaps give us some idea of what the Lake of Tiberias was.

Yet always as now the desert places must on these shores have trenched close on the peopled cities. The barren black volcanic hills which in many places rise precipitously from the lake, must always have been solitary and uncultivated.

One of our party rode further and saw the ruins of the white columns of a temple, contrasting strangely with the black stones of most of the ruinous heaps in this district. In some of the hills were quarries of white marble, which, no doubt, rang in New Testament days with the blows of the workmen. But we were warned not to venture further in the heat of the day, and therefore slowly retraced our steps by sandy coves and shingly beaches, gathering the beautiful rose-coloured flowers of the oleanders among their fresh green leaves—fresh as if no sun could scorch them;—traversing again the rock-hewn road on the cliff, and passing Tiberias to our tents by the baths.

All that day we could do little but rest and bathe. The bathroom behind the hall, which contained the divan which we appropriated, was built by Ibrahim Pasha. It had a stone roof supported on handsome marble columns, taken from the ruins of the old Roman Tiberias, close at hand. Here all the men bathed together. Opening into this was a little room with a bath intended, we were told, to wash the feet in, when the bathers came from the soil-covered floor of the great bath. It was a vivid illustration of the words, "He that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet."

In the evening when the sun was set, we ventured out for a little stroll towards the Roman ruins on one side, and across the hot springs on the other, round a little quiet creek through which they flow. But the heat even then and throughout the night was very great. It was long before the black volcanic rocks would cool in that hollow furnace of the Jordan valley, which at Tiberias is 300 feet below the level of the Mediterranean.

The next day (Sunday) was one of especial enjoyment. The heat and the day combined to make rest desirable, and no further explorations of the regions round about could have been more interesting than simply sitting still and watching the changes of light and shade over lake and hill, with the Bible in our hands.

We sat on the divan in the bath house, which had windows on three sides with Venetian blinds, these we kept open on the shady side, thus changing the view as the sun went round.

On the north we looked towards Tiberias, whose white walls and towers leant from the point they fortify towards the lake, and were reflected in it. On the right of these stretched the broad sweep of sparkling sea, with long smooth lines crossing it, here and there marking the currents, and bounded by the hilly shores, distance beyond distance, in some places separated from the water by a narrow strip of sand, whilst beyond and above all towered the distant range of Lebanon and Hermon streaked with snow. Between us and Tiberias the narrow beach was strewn with large black stones, the relics of the Roman town, mingled with the rocks swept down from the steep cliffs which hemmed it in.

On the south the shores curved more rapidly, enclosing the waters in a smaller circle. The little shingly creek through which the hot springs trickled from their source in the abrupt cliff a few yards behind the baths was bounded by a cluster of ruinous Turkish-looking buildings, whose domes were relieved against the paler hills on the "other side."

Immediately opposite us the hills seemed to rise abruptly from the lake with no intervening strip of sand; and although they were said to be five miles distant, it was difficult to believe it, so distinctly were every bright projecting point and brake relieved against each other on the sky, and so plainly were each dark ravine and cleft defined. All day they glowed in the intense heat as in the blaze of an open furnace, and the hot golden tints were reflected far into the still lake,—each fiery peak and purple cleft as clear there as above; the reflection only divided from the reality by a long broad line of intensely blue water in the distance, at the base of the cliffs. All through the sultry noon, lake and hilly shores lay before us in one dazzling haze of fiery light.

Then a light breeze sprang up, and came towards us from the east, marking its path across the lake by a line of ripple, and at last breaking the little waves on the pebbles at our feet with a cool music.

When the sun had set, we crept out of our shelter, and strolled again over the shingly beach, picking up a few rounded pebbles, or tiny fresh-water shells, and watching the countless fish dart about under the clear water, or spring from it. Then we sat down on some of the black stones strewn over the beach, enjoying the breeze, with all the gospel narratives we had been reading about the Sea of Galilee and its coasts in our hearts. And henceforth the old familiar names rise before us new and vivid pictures.

On this shingle or near it the apostles' nets had stretched to dry.

At the point where we were encamped, the beach sloped so abruptly into the lake that a few steps into the water would take any one out of his depth. It must have been in just such a place that Peter's boat was thrust out a little from the land. A few feet would have been enough to place the boat beyond the reach of the eager crowd, so that every syllable of those "words of everlasting life" might have been distinctly audible to every one of the multitude compressed on this narrow beach between the cliffs and the lake.

It would be impossible to gather a great multitude on these shores now. Cities, ships—all are gone! No tolls to be gathered now on these deserted shores;—no fishing boats ply among the countless fish in the lake. Now and then a couple of wild Bedouin horsemen would pass by us, straying from their haunts on the other side, which are so perilously near as to make a guard necessary for us at night. Now and then, a pair of white veiled women came with pitchers to the hot springs, or a family of depressed looking Jews would rest in the shade of the baths on their way to Tiberias, which is one of their sacred cities. But the silence and desolation of these shores are oppressive. It is remarkable that Tiberias, a city not once mentioned in the gospels as the scene of our Lord's teaching or miracles, is the only one left on the lake.

But the time of deepest enjoyment to us was the late evening, when no stray traveller could venture out, and nothing was heard but the trickling of the hot springs over the shingle, and the cool plashing of the little waves on the beach.

Then we could imagine the sudden rush of the storm down the ravines of those steep shores on the lake, the helpless tossing of the fishing-boat on the convulsed and foaming waters, the majestic tread of a human form on the billows, the calm words of command from a human voice instantly hushing the winds and smoothing the waves into such a calm as that around us now.

That human form we felt is in heaven now, that divine presence is around us still, that human voice we shall indeed hear. And as we sat on the brink of the lake, which had so long been to us like an allegory of life, and bathed our hands in the cool waves, all the quiet night seemed full of the words which once floated across these waters, "Be of good cheer, it is I, be not afraid;" and all our hearts seemed full of the response which broke once here from the apostles' lips, "Truly this is the Son of God."

Yet one scene was perhaps more present with us than any other throughout that Sunday,—and especially at each of the three sunrises we saw over the lake,—the scene which almost more vividly and familiarly than any other brings before us our risen Saviour, the first fruits in whose likeness all that sleep in Him shall be raised.

It was the time when Jesus showed himself again to the disciples by the Sea of Tiberias,—that last supplementary chapter of St. John's Gospel, which seems to lead us beyond the grave to the shores of life on "the other side," and yet whose chief delight it is that its scene was here on this actual, familiar, untransformed earth, on one of these very sandy or shingly beaches. We could not but recall continually the solitary figure seen dimly from the boat after the night of toil and disappointment in the grey of morning; the voice recognised at last by its power in the repetition of the old miracle; old, yet new in the significant variety of the safe landing of the unbroken net with all its contents at the feet of Jesus; the simple meal which the Master provided from his stores, not from theirs; and afterwards, more than all, the familiar converse as the little band, "when they had dined," walked along this shore.

Yes, along this shore; with the quiet music of these waters rippling against the beach, and the golden outlines of the opposite hills reflected on the lake in the early morning, that little band walked on, conversing as they went; and before them the risen Lord, the One who had died was alive again, and would die no more, speaking, as he walked, to Peter in few and quiet words which went to the depths of the heart. The past threefold denial, recalled by the threefold question, but only recalled to stamp a deeper consecration on the service of the future. This was the scene which, more than any other, seemed before us.

The fire of charcoal smouldering on this beach to welcome the weary fishermen; the fishes laid thereon, and the flat unleavened cakes (such as were often prepared for us) baked on the ashes; the Lord himself taking the bread and fish and giving them to the disciples; and after the simple meal the quiet conversation as they walked along the shore,—and then the gleams of allegoric meaning which flash through all these homely details, lifting the heart to the heavenly shore; and the net which, "when it is full," the angels shall come forth and lay at the feet of Jesus, no more treading the stormy sea, or tossed in the frail boat, but standing in majesty on the eternal shore. And afterwards the "feast,"—not a morning meal then, but a "supper," an evening feast when the long day of toil is over; and when the "Lovest thou me?" shall be exchanged for the "In that thou didst it unto me;" and the "Feed my sheep" for "Well done, good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful in a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Thus if through the night the Sea of Galilee seems to echo with the heart-calming assurance, "It is I, be not afraid," its shores at morning seem no less to resound with the heart-stirring question, "Lovest thou me?"

And for all the nights and mornings of life, what sweeter and stronger words can cheer and brace the heart than these, spoken by the same voice, to heart after heart, age after age?

THE FOURFOLD USE OF SCRIPTURE.

A SERMON ADDRESSED TO THE YOUNG.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM ARNOT.

"All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness."—2 TIM. III. 16.

THE Bible is its own best witness; like the sun in the heavens, it is seen by its own light. Those who love it most, understand it best; and those who understand it best, love it most. Here, the Bible—like Christ whom it reveals—bears witness of itself, and its witness is true. Two things regarding it we learn from this text: its Author, and its Use. Paul tells Timothy, and through him tells us, that the Scripture comes from God, and is profitable to men. The first of these two subjects I shall touch but slightly, the second I shall try to explain and apply more at length.

I. The Author of the Bible. "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God." He who made men at first in his own image, did not forsake them when they fell by sin. The world after the fall became a dark place, but a light was sent to shine in the darkness. Before man was created, "God said, Let there be light, and there was light;" and after man sinned, that Divine Word came again to make all things new.

While the Scripture is divine in its source and character, it is human in the channel through which it came and the form in which it appears. "Holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Our Father in heaven did not reveal his will by thunder in the clouds, or fiery letters in the sky. He came to visit us, not in the earthquake and the storm, but in "a still small voice." In the language of men, and through a brother's lips, the mind of the Spirit has been made known. Through letters on a printed page, and by the senses of the body, the Father of our spirits holds converse with the spirits he has made and redeemed. His own way is best, He hath done all things well.

II. The Use of the Bible. "All Scripture is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." As some of these English words have slightly changed their meaning in process of time since the Bible was translated, I shall express for you the same things in different terms, that, by aid of both sets of words, you may more surely gather the whole meaning of the text. All Scripture is profitable for Teaching, for Convicting, for Right-setting, for Upbringing in righteousness. Let us now examine them one by one in their order.

1. Teaching. The first use of Scripture is to teach us the truth. "Doctrine" means teaching; not so much the teacher's act, as the lesson which he conveys. It signifies the thing taught rather than the method of teaching it.

In this material world, while the work of creation was going on, darkness was upon the face of the deep. To heal that ailment, God made a great light and set it in the heavens. In like manner spiritual darkness was upon the face of the deep, in which human souls had sunk by sin. Human beings, blinded by their own guilt, knew neither themselves nor God. They understood neither the sin that reigned in their nature, nor the holiness that they had lost. Like the born blind, they understood neither the darkness nor the light.

You may see proof of this ignorance in every land that has not the Bible. Alike the heathen who have never gotten it, and the Papists who have thrown it away, are wallowing in the mire of idolatry. They make images and bow before them; they cry in their distress to the work of their own hands. "The world by wisdom knew not God." Nor is it once and done with it; the teaching must be repeated in each generation. A father may be enlightened and renewed; but his child, if neglected, will be ignorant and erring. The child of a Christian parent in this country, if he were left to himself, would grow up as ignorant of God and goodness as the child of a heathen parent in the heart of Africa. Every child is ignorant until he is taught, and it is from the Scriptures only that we can teach him the truth which he needs most to know. We owe it to the Bible that we are not bowing down before idols of wood and stone to-day.

From the Scripture we learn that God made and furnished the world as a habitation for man; that when man fell by sin, a Saviour was promised; that in the fullness of time the promised Saviour came. We learn that the Son of God took our nature and dwelt among us; that he was holy, harmless, and undefiled in his life; that he gave himself a sacrifice, the just for the unjust; and is now our friend at the throne of God. We learn that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin, and that he receives all who come to him; that our Father runs to meet a returning prodigal, and, without upbraiding, takes the lost child back to his bosom and his home.

Eternity is very near us, although a thick veil hides it from our view. If we were obliged to remain for ever on this side, we would not greatly care to know what lay beyond. But we shall not remain always here; we shall not remain long here. We shall one day go through from time to eternity. The way lies through the dark valley and the cold grave. Every one of us must ere long go through that lonesome passage, and we have no promise of a day's warning before we go. It is very dreadful to be on this side close to the partition wall, and expecting soon to be called through, while we know not what may await us on the other side. We would be very glad if a window were opened in that wall, that we might know beforehand what we shall meet when we enter in. Such a window in heaven is the Scripture. God from the eternity within has rent the veil, and permitted us to see all that we now need to know of the world to come. The Bible is that opening, and through it comes a marvellous light. Through that window in heaven we see that the judgment is set, and the books are opened—that we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; but we see also the mercy-seat. We discover that a multitude of ransomed sinners are rejoicing before the throne; we learn that they have not been admitted to a happy heaven for any goodness of their own, but that they were freely forgiven through the blood of Christ. We even hear them through the opening singing a joyful hymn, and from its burden we discover that they were only great sinners, and that they are now before the throne of God in white because Jesus is a great Saviour. We learn, too, that there is yet room in the mansions of the Father's house; that Jesus grieves when sinful creatures neglect his mercy; and is glad when they come to him in haste like doves to their windows, and in numbers like the dew-drops of morning. Oh, it is very good to learn what is going on within the veil, and what awaits us in eternity—to learn before we leave this life how we may be admitted into the life eternal. Thanks be to God for his word, and for the Saviour whom the word reveals. From the Bible we have learned that those who are Christ's before they go shall enter into rest; it will be our own fault if we do not now give ourselves to Christ.

2. Convicting. The true meaning of the word reproof is to bring guilt home to one's own conscience. We all know what is the meaning of proof in a criminal trial,—it is the evidence of guilt, and the syllable re suggests that the proof of guilt comes again or against the culprit. Thus the word as a whole intimates that the proof meets the evil-doer in the face, and brings the guilt home to him, so that he cannot escape. The second use of the Scripture, then, is to convict a criminal by bringing out, and bringing home, the evidence of his guilt. The first use of it is to teach, so that we may know God's truth; the second use of it is to convince, so that we may feel our own sin. As Nathan first told David the story of the poor man's lamb and the rich man's tyranny, and thereafter said to David, "Thou art the man," so the Bible first enlightens the mind, and then pierces the conscience. The Scripture, as the source of knowledge, is like a window for looking through; the Scripture, as the convincer of sin, is like a mirror for looking in. Through the window you may behold the glory of God; but in the mirror you see yourself. There you perceive his holiness; here you discover your own guilt.

I think we have found here one chief reason why so many people dislike the Bible. When they look into it they see their own likeness too truly taken for their taste. There is a difference between your likeness painted on canvas by an artist, and your likeness staring at you from the surface of a looking-glass. The one flatters you; the other does not. The painter strives to fill the more beautiful expressions of your countenance, and hide the discontent, the jealousy, the pride, and other evil workings of the heart which show themselves on the features; the laws of light, which are the laws of God, mark your very self upon the mirror, as you are at the moment. Further, you select the time when you shall sit to a painter; you do not go to him when you are pale with recent passion, or haggard by uncured disease. You put away everything that is unpleasant, and put on all your beauty ; and the picture, when finished, is pleasant to look upon. But that dreadful glass,—if there be envy ranking in your heart, it flashes the hateful passion back in your face ; if consumption is wasting your vitals, while yet you are determined to lead a merry life, it holds up the sentence of death before you, and puts in the background of its picture the gloomy grave. When a youth is dying, and yet determined that he will not die, he finds it pleasanter to look at the likeness which an artist painted a year ago, than to look into the mirror which stands in his bedroom to-day.

The same cause that makes the painting on the canvas more agreeable than the reflection from the glass, makes the flattering estimate of our character by a neighbour taste more sweetly than the terrible truth of God's word. The one says, You are a good-hearted fellow ; if you are not all right at the judgment seat, many may be afraid. The other says, "All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God ;" "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked ;" "If thou, Lord, shouldest mark iniquity, O Lord, who shall stand ?" "The soul that sinneth it shall die." You may have looked with pleasing interest on the picture of a plague-stricken city,—a picture of the diseased and the dead ; but you cannot, without agony, glance towards a mirror, if the mark of deadly disease be fixed in your own face. It is comparatively easy to look on the likeness of another's danger ; the startling thing is to see your own. The picture of death disease looking at you from a mirror owes all its terror to the conviction that it is the picture of yourself. It is this that makes the Bible dreadful to a guilty conscience.

There is indeed a way of looking into a mirror so that you will see your neighbour and not yourself. If you stand near one edge, and look sideways, you will see the person who stands at the other edge, but your own image will not meet your view. It is when you come right before it, and look right in, that you really see yourself. There are two different ways of reading the Bible. It is possible to glance sidelong over its pages day by day without being alarmed about your own sin ; it is when alone and with prayer,—in godly simplicity and in the light of the Spirit, you place yourself right before it, that you truly get the sight of your own uncleanness. Then the cry bursts from a breaking heart, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me ?"

At some stage of his progress the Bible becomes a dreadful place to him who sincerely searches it. There the searcher sees the gate of hell ; and he thanks God for ever for the dread discovery, for it made him flee the faster to the open gate of heaven.

3. Right-setting. Nothing more is necessary than to explain the meaning of the word. It is the dictionary and not the commentary that is needed here. The English word "correction" employed in the text, meant at first, as you may see from its structure, to set a wrong thing right. We must forget for the present the common modern meaning of the word, bodily punishment for a fault. To apply the rod to a fool's back may or may not be successful in bringing him from evil to good in his practice ; but the word in our text does not refer to personal chastisement at all. It is in the original a very expressive compound term, meaning to set up the fallen, and to set right the wrong.

(1.) The Bible is useful in setting up those who have fallen down. Bear in mind that this use of the Scripture comes in next after the conviction of sin. The Scripture would not be profitable to us, if it merely revealed our guilt, and cast us down into despair. To cast us down does us no good, unless we are lifted up again. A state of dark despair is in itself no better than a state of bold rebellion. But the design of the word of God is, after taking away the thought of our own righteousness, and so letting us fall, to give us hope in the righteousness of Christ that we may rise again. We are found at first dwelling in a house which has been built upon the sand, and thinking that all is well. In mercy to us the word of God becomes the flood to beat upon that house, so that it falls. But when the Scriptures like a flood have laid our house in ruins, they next place us for safety in a house that is built upon a rock. Expressly it is written regarding Jesus (Luke ii. 34), "This child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel." At the sight of Christ crucified, set forth in the word, a sinner convicted falls from all hope in himself ; but by faith's look out of the depths on the same Christ crucified, the sinner believing gets hold for hope on the risen Saviour, as an anchor of his soul sure and steadfast. Listen to those who have peace and joy in believing ; they will tell you that they were not always thus ; they will tell you that they were in the bottom of a miry pit before their goings were established on the rock, and a new song put in their mouths (Ps. xl.). As the Scripture reveals your own sin to bring you low in conviction, it also reveals Christ's offered mercy to raise you high in blessed hope.

(2.) The Bible is useful also in setting right those who are wrong. To be truly convinced of sin is not to be saved from sin. Conviction is a step on the way to salvation, but it is not salvation. To know that you are lost by your own sin is one thing ; and to be in Christ, saved by his righteousness, is another. You must come through the first in order to reach the second. Setting the fallen and broken spirit right is somewhat like setting a broken limb right. If the bones of your limb were all out of joint, and if the doctor should examine it and explain to you the nature of the injury, and how it was enough to make you lame for life ; if, moreover, when he had given you this explanation he should rise to go away, you would feel that he might as well not have come at all ; you would plead with him to stay and set the displaced members right. When the Physician of the soul, by his word and Spirit, shows you how thoroughly out of joint your spirit is, he does not leave you in your lameness. He employs the same word to set your broken spirit right. The word which makes known the disease heals the diseased member. The word which breaks the soul off from its false self-righteousness lets the soul in, like an engrafted branch, into the righteousness of Christ for life and fruitfulness.

A sinner, alarmed about his guilt, and striving to make amends for it to God, is like a disjointed limb trying to heal itself without being set in its right place by the surgeon's hand. The sinner, conscious of guilt and dreading punishment, strives to do better, so as to please God. But his conscience tells him that even his efforts to be good are only new sins. He thinks that God will not receive him, unless he first succeed in making himself worthy. All his trials end in disappointment. He is like the prodigal son, trying to make as much of the swine's husks as will both support his life for the time, and repay all his father's property which he had wasted. Alas, he cannot gather as much as will keep himself from starving, far less lay up a fund to pay his debt. This method will not do. His condition every day is growing worse. At last a new light beamed into his soul. I cannot make myself worthy to be received by my father; but I shall go to my father unworthy; he will receive me as I am. He will forgive me freely, fully; and the free pardon will both make me obedient, and him glorious for his grace. He said, "I will arise and go to my father;" he arose and went. His erring, twisted, crooked spirit was set on the right way; and, as the displaced bone in the body, when it is put back into the right place, takes to it kindly, and quickly grows strong, so when a sinner convinced of sin and fearing judgment, has been led gently by the word, and let into the love of Christ, he takes kindly to the place that fits him, and feels that nothing now can again wrench him away. Hear him singing that exulting apostolic anthem: "I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. viii. 38, 39).

4. Upbringing in righteousness is the last of the uses to which the Scripture is applied. To set the convicted sinner into Christ for life is like the birth of the new creature; and to train him up in righteousness is like the growth of the living child, upward to the stature of a perfect man. The fourth use follows the third, therefore, as the growth follows the birth. "Grow in grace" is the divine command to the children of the kingdom, and in the Scripture lies the bread of life for the nourishment of the new-born.

The same word which is the instrument of conversion at first, becomes the means of advancing holiness afterwards. When ministers preach the word to a mixed assembly, the same truth in the same language may be profitable both for giving life to the dead, and for increasing the strength of the living. Those who are dead in sin, may hear and live; those who are alive unto God, may grow in grace and in the knowledge of the Saviour.

Looking upon the Scriptures as the bread and the water of life, which our Father in heaven has supplied to his people in this world's wilderness, that law of the Lord comes into play, "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst." There is enough of the spiritual bread falling like manna out of heaven, if there were hungry souls to seek and use it; there is enough of the living water springing from the smitten rock, if there were thirsty souls in the wilderness to be satisfied from the stream. Young friends, the daily prayerful, self-applying use of the Scriptures is the true means of spiritual health and strength. But forced food is not nourishing, either to body or spirit. When we go to the word of God, as we go to our daily bread, we shall find it sweet to the taste and nourishing to the system.

Two lessons still remain in the text; let us open them a little as lessons at the close.

1. All Scripture is needed and bestowed for the accomplishment of these grand objects. Popery offers a daring insult to the wisdom of God, when it covers up his word, and cautiously doles out here and there only little portions to the people, lest it should do harm. O blind guides, ye know not what ye do. Is that God's word that you keep under lock and key? Open and let it go; let it run and be glorified; spread it like light, and air, and water, as pure, as plentiful, as free! "He every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." Let no man dare to stand with a drawn sword over the rock, and warn the parched Israelites away, on the false profession that it belongs to him to receive it all, and give a little now and a little then to the needy, as he shall judge suitable. No; let the thirsty come to the fountain. For them it has been opened; for them it has been kept flowing. A whole Bible for the whole world, then at length the desert shall become a garden.

2. The Scripture is profitable. Although the present generation prides itself on the sharpness of its wit, many great mistakes are made amongst us as to profit and loss in the business of life. Such a trade is very profitable; such a man made many thousands by it in a few years; send your young people into that trade. Well, that merchant gained a great piece of the world, you say; but tell me, Did he lose his soul? If his soul was not saved, there is a loss in the whole transaction when the balance is struck,—a loss which cannot be counted in the currency of time. There is no sin in merchandize; there is no sin in gaining money by merchandize; but in every business where the ledger takes the place of the Bible, there will be bankruptcy soon. Keep the business in its own place, and go to the Bible for Christ; give Christ your heart in youth; invest your all in his hands. The transaction will be greatly profitable. A soul saved is a soul won. You will win your own soul. The Scripture is a profitable book, for it puts you on the way of winning your soul.

STUDIES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND CHARACTER.

ROBERT HALL.

FIVE miles from Cambridge is the village of Shelford. "A more beautiful place," says one who resided in it, now a good many years ago, "I never saw. It is the garden of Cambridgeshire." Here, about the beginning of the century, lived the Rev. Thomas Thomason, who in course of time became famous as an Indian missionary, but who at that period acted as curate to Mr. Simeon of Trinity. Mr. Simeon himself also had a room on the ground-floor of his assistant's house; and as one door of that room opened into Mr. Thomason's study, and another into "a delightful pleasure garden," there were inducements enough presented to draw the city minister now and then into the country. While these two good men were thus enjoying to the full all the advantages of their retreat, the news reached them one day that the pastor of the Baptist congregation in Cambridge had also settled down in the village; and the tidings, we can well believe, were not received by them either with indifference or dissatisfaction, for the person so designated was ROBERT HALL, and his name and character were by that time sufficiently well known to ensure that his society would be reckoned an acquisition by earnest Christians of all denominations. Hall and Thomason became by-and-by intimate friends,—and on the Sabbath mornings the Church of England clergyman and the Baptist minister were often to be seen riding down in company to the city to engage in the duties of their respective cures.

There was a sad cause for the removal of Hall to Shelford. From his earliest years he was the subject of a malady which entailed distressing consequences upon him. One of these was a severe pain in the back, under which his whole physical nature was sometimes utterly prostrated. This was the case in an unusual degree in the early months of the year 1803. The agony was then so intense and so continuous that he could get no refreshing sleep, and his spirits became deeply depressed. In these circumstances he tried change, and had even some thoughts of resigning his charge. But he was finally dissuaded from giving up his official duties, and was recommended, instead, to reside some distance from his church, and try the effect of horse exercise. This is how he came to the little village where Thomason lived. But, alas! the prescription did not turn out to be perfectly efficacious. The cloud that was over his soul deepened and darkened. His mind became unhinged. Reason tottered upon her throne; and for two months, beginning with November 1804, the most eloquent preacher then in England was an inmate of an asylum for the insane. It was, one might well say, a mysterious providence—but no one was more thoroughly persuaded than the subject of it himself that the visitation was meant in mercy. Many years before, in 1778, when he was but a boy of fourteen, he had been admitted a member of his father's church, giving on that occasion such "a very distinct account of his being the subject of divine grace," that the officers had no difficulty in recognising him as one who had the seal of the Spirit. But his own decided persuasion was that, however vivid his convictions of religious truth and of the necessity of a consistent course of evangelical obedience had formerly been, and however correct his doctrinal sentiments during the last four or five years, yet that he did not undergo a thorough transformation of character, a complete renewal of his heart and affections, until the melancholy seizure to which we have just alluded. "And be this," says his biographer, "as it may, there can be no question that from this period he seemed more to live under the prevailing recollection of his entire dependence upon God, that his habits were more devotional than they had ever before been, his spiritual exercises more fervent and more elevated." God has many ways of instructing his own children, of subduing them completely to himself, and certainly we have few more striking illustrations of the fact that there are "diversities of operations" than in the manner in which Robert Hall was brought into the kingdom, or, at the least, was led into a deeper and more experimental acquaintance with its mysteries. That bright and subtle intellect had for a season to be prostrated before it could be wholly consecrated to the service of Jesus Christ.

Hall was born May 2d, 1764, at Arnsby, a village about eight miles from Leicester. His father was pastor of the Baptist church in the place, and a man apparently of great natural ability. "He appeared," says his celebrated son, "to the greatest advantage upon subjects where the faculties of most men fail them; for the natural element of his mind was greatness." Hall's mother also was, in her way, equally remarkable. She was a woman, we are told, of "sterling sense and distinguished piety." If talent, then, is hereditary, we have here enough to account, so to speak, for the intellectual eminence of the subject of this sketch. His education was very much more thorough and liberal than that of most others in his circumstances. After spending some time at a village school, he was placed under the care of Mr. Ryland at Northampton, where he made great progress, among other things, in Greek and Latin. From thence he was transferred to the Bristol Academy, for the training of young men for the Baptist ministry; and having evidenced there the possession of unusual capacity, he was sent, "on Dr. Ward's foundation," to King's College, Aberdeen. At the university he remained for four years, taking his degree of Master of Arts in the spring of 1784, and acquiring, in addition to an enlarged acquaintance with the classics, a very thorough knowledge of mental philosophy. The result of the whole was, that he became, what few of our great popular preachers have been, a scholar, in the strict and technical sense of the word! "He set to work," for example, says Dr. Gregory of him while he resided in Cambridge,—“he set to work upon the best treatises on the Greek metres then extant. He next read the Iliad and Odyssey twice over critically, proceeded with equal care through nearly all the tragedies of Sophocles and Euripides, and thence extended his classical reading in all directions." This supplies one illustration of the extent of his attainments and the range of his reading; and it would be easy to give many others from the story of his life. But it is not his career as a man of learning that we are here specially called to study, and we only notice particularly the fact of his high education at all because it explains the character of his pulpit eloquence, which was distinguished above that of almost any other preacher that could be mentioned by a rare combination of simplicity and finish, of great popular acceptability on the one hand, and of a cultivation and polish on the other, which could only have been looked for from a fine and subtle intellect developed and exercised in the highest possible degree.

While Mr. Hall was still a student at Aberdeen, he was invited to become the pastor, along with Dr. Evans, of the church at Broadmead, Bristol. With much diffidence he accepted the call, and entered upon the full duties of his charge in the summer of 1785. His power as a preacher was recognised immediately. The place where he officiated was often crowded to excess, and many of the most distinguished men in the city, including several clergymen, were his occasional auditors. Difficulties, however, by-and-by appeared, to render his position uncomfortable. A serious misunderstanding arose between his colleague and himself, and doubts began to be entertained with respect to his perfect orthodoxy. After an incumbency of five years, therefore, he became not indisposed to move to another sphere. A favourable opening was not long in presenting itself; and in 1790 we find him established as Mr. Robinson's successor at Cambridge. Here he remained for fifteen years, having succeeded in transforming a society that was rapidly sinking under the influence of cold or disputatious speculators into a flourishing church and congregation, bringing forth the fruits of righteousness. In 1805 a recurrence of the same malady, to which allusion has already been made, made it expedient that he should resign his cure, and for some time he lived in complete retirement, first among his relatives at Arnsby, and afterwards at Enderly, a village five miles from Leicester. In these places he gradually regained his bodily health, with great mental tranquillity and a renewed capacity for usefulness in the Church. And being able to work, he was not, now especially, the man to remain idle. He began to preach in the neighbouring villages, and also occasionally in a small chapel in Leicester, which had once been occupied by the famous Dr. Carey of Serampore. Gradually his efforts became more and more concentrated on this little place. The Church grew under his fostering care, and at last he accepted a call from it to settle down as its stated minister. This was the unobtrusive beginning of a long and eventful pastorate. He lived and laboured in Leicester from 1808 to 1826. During that time his fame continued to increase. The congregation more than quadrupled in his hand; the place of worship where it met was twice enlarged; and when he made his last move back again to Broadmead, he was ministering each Sabbath to at least a thousand people. He was in the sixty-second year of his age when he took up his abode once more in Bristol, and he was still spared to do much good service for his Master in the sphere of his first labours. But the time allowed to him was not long. Five years was the duration of his early ministry, and five years was to be the duration of his last. He died on the 21st of February 1831, leaving the Church that he had adorned to lament his comparatively early removal to a higher sphere.

One may learn much from the history of Mr. Hall's theological opinions. Even after he had become a minister of the gospel, his views of the truth seem to have been to a considerable extent dark and defective, and such sound and sober men of his own communion as Fuller and Ryland were full of anxiety about him. The latter appeared at one time to believe that he was far gone in Socinianism, and there was undoubtedly some ground for the belief. The period was, in many of its aspects, a perilous one. The French Revolution had given a violent shock to old institutions, and the old creeds also seemed tottering to their fall. Free thinking prevailed to an extent that it had never done before; and for those who could not make up their minds to plunge into the abyss of infidelity, there was a via media, a half-way house, presided over by the father of English Unitarianism, the famous Dr. Priestley. In these circumstances, a young man of great talent, and of a speculative turn of mind, ran some risk of being carried away by the stream; and Hall was certainly for a time on the brink of the vortex. It was his suspected "liberality" of sentiment which procured for him the call to Cambridge. Mr. Robinson, his predecessor there, had fallen away from the truth entirely, that his last act as a preacher was to officiate in Dr. Priestley's pulpit in Birmingham; and, although his people had not gone with him unanimously in his defection, he had yet infused his spirit into them to such an extent that, upon his death, they were not prepared to accept as their pastor any one whose orthodoxy was stiff or uncompromising. The young and eloquent minister of Broadmead, who dealt in his preaching a good deal in generalities, and who excused himself for not meddling with the great cardinal doctrines of Christianity by saying that his colleague, Dr. Evans, rendered them sufficiently prominent, seemed just the man to suit them; and having secured him, the members of this broad and wide minded Church, congratulated one another that their new pastor, a man of splendid talents, was almost as liberal and unshackled as themselves. Singular to say, however, his settlement over such a congregation had the reverse effect of that which might have been expected. The sight of their laxity produced a reaction in his mind; while it is not unlikely that if he had remained among a peculiarly narrow and straight-laced people, he would have continued as "liberal" as his Cambridge friends could desire. All that was true and reverent in his nature revolted at the flippant infidelity which met him among individuals in his new charge. Hence, from the period of his leaving Bristol, we mark in him a growing instead of a waning love of orthodoxy. As an illustration, an anecdote may be given. One day he passed, as he was in the habit of doing sometimes (for on various accounts he greatly admired him), a panegyric on Dr. Priestley. A gentleman happened to be present who held the doctor's sentiments, and drawing an inference from the language used which was scarcely legitimate, he tapped Mr. Hall on the shoulder with an indelicate freedom from which he recoiled, and said, "Ah, sir! we shall have you among us soon, I see." Mr. Hall, startled and offended by the rude tone of exultation in which this was uttered, hastily replied, "Me amongst you, sir! why, if that were ever the case, I should deserve to be tied to the tail of the great red dragon, and whipped round the nethermost regions to all eternity!" At this point in his history, it is clear that he must have got beyond all risk of denying the divinity of Jesus Christ; but even at so late a period as 1799, he was still at sea upon other points of fundamental importance. In that year, however, a severe fever which brought him, in his own apprehension and that of his friends, to the brink of the grave, gave him an opportunity of experiencing the support yielded by the doctrines of the cross in the near view of death and judgment. The impression produced then was not only salutary but lasting; and it again prompted him to the investigation of one or two points, with regard to which he had long felt himself floating in uncertainty. One of these points was the personality of the Holy Spirit. Up to this time he had actually doubted that. But now, "he was struck with the fact, that whenever in private prayer he was in the most deeply devotional frame, most overwhelmed with the sense that he was nothing, and God was all in all, he always felt himself inclined to adopt a trinitarian doxology. This circumstance recurring frequently, and more frequently meditated upon in a time of honest and anxious inquiry, issued at length in a persuasion that the Holy Spirit is really and truly God, and not an emanation; and in 1800 he publicly included the personality of the Holy Spirit in his statements of the doctrine of spiritual influence." Probably he had even then much to learn. Three or four years later, he received that terrible baptism of suffering and humiliation, out of which he emerged, as he himself constantly asserted, a new man; and we may be sure he was taught something then. At any rate, whether the change wrought then added any new articles to his creed or not, it made him, we cannot doubt, see what truth he had in a new light, and feel and preach it with a new power. "Long had he been admitted by the intelligent to be a great man; now he was regarded by pious men of every persuasion as a good man, rejoicing to consecrate his best faculties to the specific objects of the Christian ministry."

Jonathan Edwards, the great preacher of America, gave his strength and mind so entirely to the pulpit, that, except in the way of dealing with individual awakened souls, he had no private intercourse with his people at all. In this respect there was a striking difference between him and Robert Hall. For some years after the settlement of the latter at Cambridge, he made it a rule to pay a pastoral visit to every member of his church once a quarter. These were not calls, but visits, and usually paid on evenings, that he might meet the whole assembled family. Among the lower classes, to make them quite at their ease, he would sit down with them to supper; and that this might involve them in no extra expense, he took care that they should all know that he preferred a basin of milk. This practice he appears to have maintained to a greater or less extent wherever he went. Even in his last charge, when he had become so infirm as to require the use of a carriage in his visitations, he spent three evenings in the week in social intercourse with his people. A habit like this necessarily endeared him exceedingly to those of whom he had the oversight; and gave, we can fancy, an additional momentum to that commanding eloquence with which, on the Sabbath, he sought to commend to them the truth of God.

Of that eloquence, we could have wished to have given some specimens. His most famous sermons were those on "Modern Infidelity," "The Death of the Princess Charlotte," "The Advantages of Knowledge to the Lower Classes," and "Sentiments Proper to the Present Crisis;" and from these it would be easy to select passages than which there is nothing finer in the English language. One paragraph only, we shall make room for. It is the peroration of the last of the discourses just mentioned—a discourse preached October 19, 1803, on the occasion of a General Fast held with reference to the threatening aspect of European affairs.

"The extent of your resources," says he, addressing those that were about to fight the battle of freedom and of humanity; "the extent of your resources, under God, is equal to the justice of your cause. But should Providence determine otherwise, should you fall in this struggle, should the nation fall, you will have the satisfaction (the purest allotted to man) of having performed your part; your names will be enrolled with the most illustrious dead, while posterity, to the end of time, as often as they revolve the events of this period (and they will incessantly revolve them) will turn to you a reverential eye, while they mourn over the freedom which is entombed in your sepulchre. I cannot but imagine the virtuous heroes, legislators, and patriots of every age and country, are bending from their elevated seats to witness this contest, as if they were incapable, till it be brought to a favourable issue, of enjoying their eternal repose. Enjoy that repose, illustrious immortals! Your mantle fell when you ascended; and thousands, inflamed with your spirit, and impatient to tread in your steps, are ready to swear by Him that sitteth upon the throne, and liveth for ever and ever, they will protect freedom in her last asylum, and never desert that cause which you sustained by your labours, and cemented with your blood. And thou, sole Ruler among the children of men, to whom the shields of the earth belong, gird on thy sword, thou Most Mighty: go forth with our hosts in the day of battle! Impart, in addition to their hereditary valour, that confidence of success which springs from thy presence. Pour into their hearts the spirit of departed heroes: inspire them with thine own; and, while led by thine hand, and fighting under thy banners, open thou their eyes to behold in every valley, and in every plain, what the prophet beheld by the same illumination—chariots of fire, and horses of fire."

The discourse is, of course, more of an oration than a sermon, and there is a style of allusion and accommodation in it to which we may reasonably object; but as a piece of lofty and impassioned eloquence it has few equals, and the manner in which it concludes—taking the preceding paragraph along with the one quoted—must, like a swelling torrent, have swept everything before it. A man, with such a gift of oratory, must have been raised up in that day to serve, by means of it, some great and special object. And there is no difficulty in discerning what that was. In the critical age in which he lived, when the nations of Europe were convulsed to their centre, and speculation laid its free hand upon the most sacred mysteries of revelation, it was needful that Christianity should have its champion to meet the enemy on his own ground; and Robert Hall was, we believe, as directly fulfilling his mission when he preached his sermon on "Modern Infidelity," as Luther was when he nailed his Theses to the church door of Wittemberg.

The personal character of Mr. Hall, as refined and purified by the influences of religion, appears to have been a very beautiful one. "Mr. Hall," says one who knew him intimately, "seemed to me very remarkable for being always in earnest... He was artless as a child. A sort of infantine simplicity was conspicuous in many parts of his conduct. With his extraordinary capacity, and a propension for abstract and refined thinking, it was curious and remarkable to observe the interest that he took in the present object. He threw himself entirely into whatever might be the topic of conversation, and seemed altogether engrossed with what pressed on the sense and solicited immediate attention." There is a touching illustration given of this view of his character, by Dr. Gregory in his Life. It has been said that during the last years of his life at Bristol, he was in the habit of spending some evenings each week in social intercourse with his people. On these occasions some of the members of his own family occasionally accompanied him; and if it did not happen that the conversation was particularly lively, these last were apt to complain that the evening had been dull. To this Hall would reply, "I don't think so. It was very pleasant. I enjoyed it. I ENJOY EVERYTHING." "Think of this, ye despisers," says a writer in the British Critic. "Here was a man whose powers seemed almost adapted for converse with disembodied spirits—whose thoughts were frequently wandering through eternity—a man, too, whose life was a constant wrestling against bodily anguish, whose corporeal structure was 'an apparatus of torment,' and who yet was able to seek and to find delight among the humbler recreations of society, and to exclaim, in the gratitude and fulness of his heart, 'I enjoy everything.'" Byron, when his temples were throbbing with the self-inflicted pains of a vicious life, cried out, 'There is nothing but misery in this world, I think.' If this contrast does not speak to the hearts and understandings of men, the voice of wisdom would be heard in vain from the jaws of the sepulchre itself."

The last service in which Mr. Hall took a part was the Church meeting at Broadmead, on the 9th of February 1831; and the prayer which he offered on that occasion was observed and felt to be exceedingly spiritual and solemn. Next day he was laid upon the bed from which he was never again to rise. "I have not an anxious thought," he said then, "either for life or death. What I dread most are dark days; but I have had none yet, and I hope I shall not have any. I fear pain more than death. If I could die easily, I think I would rather go than stay; for I have seen enough of the world, and I have a humble hope." He did suffer dreadfully during the succeeding ten days; but he had only so long to wait for his release. On the 21st of the same month, as has already been said, God took him to be for ever with himself in that place where there is no more pain; and the last words he was heard to utter on earth were, "Come, Lord Jesus—come—quickly."

N. L. W.

"IT SHALL WITHER IN ALL THE LEAVES OF HER SPRING."

THESE touching words of Scripture were brought to my mind with great force last week, whilst travelling by railway between Callander and Stirling. One beech tree after another caught my eye, brown, scorched, and blasted, their mournful aspect presenting a sad contrast to the fresh verdure of the surrounding oaks and birches.

A few weeks ago there was a night of keen frost, accompanied by a blighting east wind, and the silky young beech leaves, so peculiarly delicate and tender at their first unfolding, had suffered far more than their hardier neighbours. Their beauty is all gone for this summer. Withered and unsightly they must remain, till the genial breath of another spring time stirs their sap again, and they clothe themselves in new verdure.

"She shall wither in all the leaves of her spring."—words which must have occurred to some of my readers at a sight too common in this land,—the premature blight and decay which falls on so many in the first freshness of their youth, and carries them off to an untimely grave. But not in this view let us at present apply them.

In an even more solemn and sorrowful sense, alas! how applicable are they to multitudes!

I remember one, who in early youth, became the subject of divine grace, and who for some years thrived and flourished, full of hope and promise, as a devoted young Christian. But a blight came. It seems mysterious how any true lover of the Lord Jesus could allow her affections to be engaged by one not only an unbeliever, but well-nigh a downright scoffer. But so it was, and to the amazement of all her friends, and in spite of the remonstrances of many of them, she married him.

Ah! then, "she withered in all the leaves of her spring." Her spiritual being withered. How could it thrive in the ungenial atmosphere into which she had brought it? "What communion has light with darkness? What fellowship has Christ with Belial?" She had cast in her lot with one who would not bow the knee in prayer with her, nor read the word of life, nor take sweet counsel with her, nor go into the house of God in her company.

She had wilfully violated her Lord's command,—"Be ye not unequally yoked;" and so she had brought a thick cloud between her soul and him. How could she thrive, with the cold frosts of worldliness, and the blighting east wind of infidelity breathing upon her night and day?

But in her case the blight came upon "all the leaves of her spring," and perhaps it was a token of covenant love and faithfulness that it did so. It fell upon her happiness, her children, her means. Nothing about her prospered. In every conceivable way, into the details of which I may not enter, she was smitten, withered, and blasted. Long lost sight of in a distant land, I hope, but I cannot tell, that all that has come upon her, has led her to return to her first husband, and find the rest in His house which she has never found in the house of him for whose sake she has brought all these things on herself. But whilst the substance of the holy seed is no doubt in her, so that she shall certainly again, in the genial climate of heaven, develop her spiritual being, and send forth fresh boughs like a plant, her life here is not what it might have been, what it ought to have been, what it would have been, had she remained faithful to her Lord and Saviour.

This true, but, perhaps, extreme case, illustrates what is too often the secret cause of the sudden withering of the spiritual life of young believers. Oh, it is an awfully solemn and important subject, all the more so, because the mischief is often done before it is suspected. Settle it with yourselves, dear young Christians, as a principle fixed and determined, never to give yourselves to one who is not a joint-heir with you of the grace of life. "Purpose," like Mercy in the Pilgrim's Progress, "never to have a clog for your soul." Seek a partner who will be a helper of your faith, a fellow-traveller in the straight way, a help-meet "only in the Lord;" or better, far better, none at all. And if your heart has not been kept with all diligence, and its affections have got entangled round one, who, you know, however amiable, has not the grace of God, "cut off the right hand, pluck out the right eye." Present pain, however great, is better than bleeding all your life long from an inward wound, or being altogether stopped in your pilgrimage by the hindering clog.

Unfaithfulness to the "one husband to whom we are betrothed, even Christ," in whatever way that want of loyalty may be shown, brings a blight over the soul. The vine in Ezekiel, to which our motto refers, bent her roots toward another than him to whom she had sworn fealty, and shot forth her branches toward him, that he might water it by the furrows of her plantation. But because of this breach of covenant, "Thus saith the Lord God, Shall it prosper? Shall he not pull up the roots thereof, and cut off the fruit thereof that it wither? It shall wither in all the leaves of her spring, . . . yea, behold, being planted shall it prosper? Shall it not utterly wither when the east wind toucheth it? It shall wither in the furrows where it grew."

Secret departures of the heart toward some other thing, no matter what it is, nor however lawful in its proper place—covetousness of any kind, whatever be the object desired, is idolatry. And the heart cleaving to idols, is let alone by God; is it any wonder, then, that the spiritual life should wither and decay? "Little children, keep yourselves from idols." "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch and is withered." "Thus saith the Lord, Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord. For he shall be like the heath in the desert and shall not see when good cometh, but shall inhabit the parched places of the wilderness, in a salt land and not inhabited. Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is. For he shall be like a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river, and shall not see when heat cometh, but her leaf shall be green, and shall not be careful in the year of drought, neither shall cease from yielding fruit."

"Whatever passes as a cloud between,
The mental eye of faith and things unseen,
Causing that brighter world to disappear
Or seem less lovely, or its hope less dear;
This is our world, our idol though it bear Affection's impress or devotion's air."

"It shall wither in all the leaves of her spring." This was the fate which befell the barren fig tree. The fruit forms on the fig tree before the leaves, so that by the time the leaves appear, if there is to be fruit at all, it ought to be formed then. It was early in the season, when Jesus examined it. "The time of figs was not yet." The crop, therefore, had certainly not been gathered, and there could be no doubt of its barrenness. So under the blighting words that fell from the lips of Emmanuel, "presently the fig tree withered away."

Solemn history, and solemn thought, that many a green and leafy professor withers away from the same cause. Many who set out in youth with a fair promise, never come to anything in Christ's Church after all—barren and unfruitful they "presently wither away." Some thus give evidence that they were never rooted in Christ, and some, for want of use, seem to lose even the grace which they seemed to have. Sloth and lukewarmness are the secret cause of many a withering soul. Here is the way in which grace received is to be exercised, "Giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity. For if these things be in you and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. But he that lacketh these things is blind and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins."

Yes, withering faith, and love, and zeal betray prevailing unbelief, and cold indifference to Him "who loved us and gave himself for us." Young Christian, live near the cross, and under the fresh and constant droppings of the blood of forgiveness—"the blood that cleanseth from all sin,"—if you would have your soul ever green and flourishing."

I have seen others, alas, not a few! to whom these solemn words applied in another deeply mournful sense. I knew one well in his childhood, a most lively, bright, engaging boy. As the saying is, the making of much good was in him; the promise of much good was fair upon him. After the lapse of some years, I met him again, still quite a youth. As I looked at him, I thought "the same, and yet not the same as he was." The blight was already on him, he had begun to wither. The traces of sensual indulgence were beginning to show themselves in the clouded eye, the relaxed mouth, the general aspect of the still beautiful young face. And now, yet in his early manhood, he stands apart from his fellows, utterly blasted and withered in mind and body, and rapidly sinking into a drunkard's dishonoured and premature grave. Withered, indeed, in all the leaves of his spring!

Oh, "flee youthful lusts which war against the soul!" Beware of the beginnings of evil!—of the very first step which would lead you to go in the same direction as those "who walk after their own ungodly lusts." Of these Jude speaks as "trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit; twice dead, plucked up by the roots."

"Walk after the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh;" and "they that walk after the Spirit do mind the things of the Spirit." They "delight in the law of God," not in the wills of the flesh; and he "whose delight is in the law of God, and who meditates in it day and night, shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water; his leaf also shall not wither, and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper." c.

"I AM LIKE A GREEN FIR-TREE,—FROM ME IS THY FRUIT FOUND."

How ready am I to forget this truth! When I see all my own righteousnesses to be only as filthy rags, and my spiritual strength and vigour fading as doth a leaf, and my iniquities like the wind carrying me away, ah! then, poor fool that I am, I give up all for lost, and, ready to sink, cry out, Lord help me! What effectual help it is when the Lord gives this word as answer,—“Oh, thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?” “I am like a green fir-tree,—from me is thy fruit found.” “I am the Lord. I change not.” “Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.” My leaf neither fades nor falls. My “righteousness is an everlasting righteousness,” and “Thy righteousnesses are of me, saith the Lord God.” “Abide in me and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye except ye abide in me.” Let these words of mine abide in you, and let your heart rest upon them. “Thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thy help found,” and this is the name whereby the righteous, the evergreen Branch raised up for thy succour, shall be called, “Jehovah, thy righteousness.”—Oh, my soul, surely thy grateful reply must be, “In the Lord have I righteousness and strength. “I will make mention of thy righteousness: even of thine only.” “The Lord is my strength and my song, and is become my salvation.” “Open to me the gates of righteousness. I will go into them and will praise the Lord.”

Be not afraid, O weak and sinful and empty soul, to find out your own absolute nothingness, if thereby you art led to value and to cleave to precious Christ, as all your salvation and all your desire. So shall you, even when heart and flesh are fainting and failing, be able in your turn to take up similar language and say, “I am like a green olive tree in the house of my God: I trust in the mercy of God for ever and ever” (Ps. lii. 8). c.

THE SAVING WIFE.

BY J. DE LIEFDE, OF AMSTERDAM.

CHAPTER II.

THE SHOEMAKER AND HIS OBJECTIONABLE LIBRARY.

IN one of the main thoroughfares of the Hague—thus the minister commenced his story—there lived some ten years ago a shoemaker of the name of R——, who was as much liked by his customers for his strong and neat boots, as by his friends for his frank and jovial conversation. His wife, a very clever, tidy, and active woman, was very much of the same temper as himself, and always showed a face as smiling and glossy as the brightly scoured brazier's wares that adorned the white tiled walls of her kitchen. In as far as regarded their outward circumstances, they had ample reason to keep up this appearance of contentment and joyousness, for it would seem as if Mr. R—— understood the secret of coining florins out of a calf's skin, and of turning pitched thread into gold wire. His children also were everything a father can desire for this world. They were clever, active, cheerful, irreproachable as to their moral conduct, and kind-hearted to each other, so that very seldom was his interference required to keep them in peace and love. It was a treat, indeed, in as far as regards merely social enjoyment, to spend an evening with that happy, hospitable, and cheerful family. If you were in a rather peevish mood, Mr. R——'s jokes were sure to bring you back to your usual temper. Or should your depressed spirit anticipate some unknown threatening calamity, nothing was more likely to help you to the most sanguine hopes than Mrs. R——'s pleasant stories illustrating the foolishness of holding up the umbrella before the rain has begun to fall.

Yet, notwithstanding all this appearance of happiness, the true peace that passeth all understanding was a stranger in the family. It is true, Mr. and Mrs. R—— with their children regularly attended service every Sunday morning, but they were as regularly to be found every Sunday evening at the theatre, or in the dancing saloon, or in the wood to enjoy the concert. Often, too, they would engage a fly for the whole of the Sunday afternoon, to take an excursion to Scheveninger, or to some other village in the neighbourhood, where they were sure to meet gay company. Now, I need not tell you that they could allow their Sabbath to come to a close so contradictory to its beginning, without any feeling of inconsistency—for in this respect they did nothing but what nearly everybody in our unhappy country is accustomed to do. Besides, they seldom heard anything in the morning sermon that could rouse their conscience during their evening pleasure. They always attended the service of such preachers as were most congenial to their taste,* and you know enough of the state of our Church to be able to perceive that they always had plenty of choice. So after having drunk their "water and milk" in the morning, they could freely take to their wine in the evening. They knew no better than that they, all of them, would go to heaven, provided they did not commit a murder or pick their neighbour's pockets; and since Mrs. R—— was not conscious of being guilty of any such outrages, she trusted that she would arrive at heaven's gate, even if a sudden death should compel her to take her starting-point from the theatre on Sunday evening. The conception which she had of "the goodness of God" was quite boundless, so much so, that she gladly believed that God had provided plenty of forgiving grace—of course through Christ in some way or other—if there should be anything amiss in her conduct; for that she was not quite perfect she fully admitted, and she was glad to know that Christ, eighteen hundred years ago, had attained such an over-abundance of perfection as to enable him to make up full weight for her shortcomings. But that there was such a thing as a hell or a burning furnace, as some Methodists were pleased to cry, she never could or would believe. God, she thought, was too good, too kind towards his creatures, to permit the existence of such a terrible place in his glorious creation.

Yet, notwithstanding this smooth theory about God, heaven, and eternity, there was a worm gnawing at the bottom of Mrs. R——'s heart. She sometimes would feel its painful bites when death showed itself to her at a distance, by taking away one of her nearest relatives or friends, or when some sudden indisposition reminded her of her own mortality. She then experienced that the tranquillizing system of theology she used to advocate in her sunny days was not sufficient to quiet her mind when the king of terrors threatened to spread his dark wings over her head. We know by experience, madam, how sadly man gropes round in the dark as long as he has no other light to walk by but the lamp of his own reason. By its fascinating glare he sees, he thinks, a smooth path before him leading through delectable grounds to paradise. The slightest breeze, however, that whispers from the grave blows it out, and he finds himself in an awful perplexity. Then the torch of conscience, no longer outshone by the dazzling glitterings of proud reason, begins to illuminate the scenery round about, and the frightened wanderer discovers deserts and abysses instead of gardens and pleasure-grounds. No sooner, however, has he succeeded in lighting his lamp again than he again proceeds cheerfully, persuading himself that what he saw just now was only the effect of a deranged imagination. Mrs. R——, kind-hearted and good-natured as she was, shared the awful self-deception which is common to our fallen race. Thinking that her heart was full of love to all men—for she declared she wished everybody to be as happy as herself—she did not know that that same heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. She perceived not that what she called love was only an amiable form of self-love, which was ready instantly to assume a hateful form when it was counteracted in its desires or humbled in its pride. She was not aware that that same love of hers to all men was connected with a sad indifference with regard to God, who, during the week scarcely found a place in her thoughts, because they were wholly engaged in the cares and pleasures of her daily life. All this was hid from her notice behind the deceitful veil of her self-satisfaction and self-complacency. But self-deception, however skilful, can never fold that veil so tightly as to leave no hole for truth to peep through. Mrs. R——, confidently as she expressed herself about the future glory of all men, yet could not help secretly acknowledging that there might be something wrong at the bottom; and this might account for the strange inconsistency which was often manifest in her profession. For that same person who thought so highly of the love of God, and asserted that there could not possibly be such a place as hell, yet never had the courage to declare that she was sure of her future happiness after death.

* Since in the large Dutch towns the Protestant Church is not parochially organized, the band of ministers preaches in the various churches, shifting about. Every Saturday a list of the services is stuck up at the booksellers' doorposts, informing the public as to the place where every one of the ministers is to preach the next Sunday. The church-going people thus are enabled to pick out their favourite, or, if he should happen to preach in a rather remote quarter of the city, such a one as comes nearest to him in their estimation.

Now, her husband had, from the time of their marriage, during a series of some twenty years, invariably shared her opinions; so that religion, while kept up merely as an out-door performance, had never disturbed their domestic peace within. Once upon a time, however, a change was observed in Mr. R——'s ideas and conduct, which gradually became more conspicuous. His wife, who was bent upon the whole household regularly going to church every Sunday forenoon (for, she said, it is a becoming habit, and the minister always tells us that we should be better than we are), became a little alarmed when observing that he now and then would tell them to go without him, till at length he got into the habit of staying away from church altogether, and keeping at home to amuse himself with reading a novel or a play, or with trying his flute, to which he had taken a fancy. The fact was that Mr. R——, being a little more of a philosopher and a logical thinker than his wife, had some time ago turned his attention to the absurdity of that inconsistency which, as I told you, characterized his and his wife's profession. He acknowledged that if there was no hell, or no future punishment of transgressions at all, he ought to be perfectly at peace, and know no such a thing as fear or uneasiness when thinking of his future state after death. He felt, however, that there was such a thing in his heart, and he was determined to get rid of it, now that he observed that he was growing older, and was to perform the "great journey" ere long. On examining the origin of that feeling of anxiety with regard to his future condition, he discovered that it was closely connected with his belief in a personal God. He concluded that if God was a person—a rational, self-willing, and self-acting being—he must be a Judge, rewarding his friends and punishing his enemies. So he turned to inquiring whether his belief in a personal God was well founded. Now, there was amongst his customers a gentleman whom he always had thought a great deal of on account of his sagacity, learning, and calmness of temper. From some of his expressions uttered in the course of their conversation, he had observed that the Baron von T—— did not believe that God was a person, but only an all-moving power. This had led him to enter into more detailed intercourse with the baron on that subject. The arguments which the baron advanced, and the syllogisms he drew, seemed so overpowering that the bootmaker could say nothing against them. He was not aware, poor man! that the power of persuasion lay not in the baron's eloquence, but in the inclination of his own God-shunning heart. He did not keep in mind that our deceitful hearts are prone to believe what we are prone to desire; and his heart desired that there should be no personal God, in order to get rid of the Judge as soon as possible. The baron then provided him with a great many books which, all of them, breathed the same pantheistic doctrine. Mr. R—— put them in a row on a shelf along the wall of his counting-house, and soon had studied them so thoroughly that he became fully initiated in that God-dishonouring and soul-destroying system. He now thought himself at peace. He now had found "his own way," as he would express himself. And this way was that above the entrance of which the inscription was to be read: "Let us eat, and drink; for to-morrow we die." There was room left on his shelf still; for the baron's books, though numerous, were not sufficient to occupy the whole of it; but Mr. R—— filled up the empty space with novels and plays, and henceforth scarcely an evening elapsed which he did not spend either at the opera or in the club-house.

Now, Mrs. R—— was not quite at her ease when noticing this change in her husband's opinions and conduct. Though herself an advocate of what she called "liberal and large-hearted principles," yet she thought that now he was going too far. She was from her childhood accustomed to saying grace silently at every meal, and though she mostly performed this ceremony as a mere matter of course, yet she sometimes would connect some edifying notion with it; at least, she often would appeal to it to persuade herself that she was a Christian and not a heathen. When she observed that her husband began forsaking this "comely habit," she found that either she must be a fool in his eyes, or that he was a profane person in hers. When she on Sunday morning, returning home from church, her little Bible with gold clasp in her hand, found him comfortably seated in his arm-chair playing his flute or reading a novel, she could not but conclude that either he or she had spent their time wrongly. So she became aware that a serious discrepancy had arisen between them, which, of course, could not fail to affect their domestic life and the education of their family. For some time she dreaded frankly to require of him an explanation of his altered behaviour, but at last some opportunity turned up which led her fully to enter upon the matter. She was quite alarmed to find that he boldly rejected everything she had revered hitherto as sacred and true. Much of what he said seemed to her to be most extraordinary, but much, too, she felt unable to refute. Of course, her stock of Christian knowledge was so poor that she was quite perplexed by the sophistical reasonings, many of which her husband read to her from the books he took from his library. Still some instinctive, better feeling made her shrink back from the whole of it. She told him most decidedly that she never could go so far as that. "We must have somebody to pray to," she said, "and we must have somebody to rely upon when we are in trouble. I shall never be able to die happy in the expectation of being absorbed by some universal power, as a drop flows away into the ocean. My good father was such a worthy person when alive, I hope to see him again in a better world. But according to your notion, he is no person at all now, but merely a particle of a great general power. No, never! I shall never believe such a thing of my good father. He was too amiable a person for that, and he has trained me up too well to allow me to think so unbecomingly of him and of our good Lord in heaven. You yourself are a person now; but for that I should not have married you. But if you are to turn a mere power, I don't know what to make of you; I never married you in that expectation."

Such were Mrs. R——'s arguments, and her husband would reply to them by a silent smile or by taking his flute and playing a tune. She, however, felt very sad about this state of things. She perceived that they had entered a critical period in their matrimonial life; that she either was to abandon all she had believed, revered, and adored hitherto, or to put herself in a decided opposition to her husband. Her consciousness of this alternative set her thinking seriously about her own condition as to religion. She felt that she knew too little of it to be able to encounter her husband's attacks upon the Bible. "He has a strong power in his books," she said to herself. "I must read the Bible to know a little more about it. I wish he never had got those books. I am sure the whole mischief lies with his library. But I will read the Bible now, and I shall soon find it out."

So Mrs. R—— began reading her Bible for the first time in her life, and for the first time she sent up a silent ejaculation to God to give her some light in a dark matter.

CHAPTER III.

HOW THE SHOEMAKER'S WIFE TRIED TO CHANGE HER HUSBAND'S LIBRARY, BUT COULD NOT CHANGE HIS HEART.

You know, madam (thus continued the minister), that the great bulk of our Protestant people, though formally professing that the Bible is God's word, yet never, or very seldom read it. With the spirit of neology and indifference which, since the beginning of this century, has invaded our poor country and filled the heads of our people to a large extent with such bare and wretched notions about religion, as Mrs. R—— was from her childhood trained up in; the good old custom of our fathers of beginning and closing the day with family prayer and Scripture-reading has been discarded in most houses, and the blessed book of books is only kept as a piece of Sunday ornament in the hands of church-going women. So you cannot be surprised when I tell you that Mrs. R——, when giving herself to intensely reading that holy book, found herself carried into a sphere of thoughts and facts in which she felt a perfect stranger. Still the contents of this wonderful book excited an interest which increased with every page. She read it under the influence of some instinctive and traditional conviction, which she always had maintained, that all she was reading now was true and trustworthy. She soon became aware that the image of God, as pictured in this book, widely differed from the representation she had made of him hitherto. What especially struck her forcibly was, the deeply earnest tone in which the Bible spoke of God's justice and holiness. She was reading about a God who, merciful and tender-hearted as he was, yet was able to destroy a whole generation of men with a deluge, and to burn up cities with fire from heaven. She learned that this book most decidedly declared that there was such a thing as a hell and everlasting pain; that it was not only possible that man should be lost for ever, but that there were such lost men indeed, and that it was true that God had provided a means of salvation from such an imminent danger, but that this salvation could only be brought about at the price of His own beloved Son's blood. All this failed not to leave deep impressions upon her mind, and though the new notions which she now imbibed were too much cramped by her old opinions to produce in her conception anything more than a confused mixture of truth and error, yet this much she felt, that life was connected with responsibilities for the present and dangers for the future, infinitely more serious than she ever had been in the habit of supposing. Gradually her anxiety about her own state, and that of her family after death, increased, and in the measure of this increase the contrast between her and her husband became more conspicuous. While he was growing in merriment and carelessness she sunk deeper and deeper into a state of uneasiness and depression. Her aversion to his light-minded and all-denying opinions strengthened every day. It became a perfect torture to her to hear him talk about religion and man's destiny, and she opposed him continually with the most decided contradiction, appealing to as many texts from Scripture as she could recollect from her recent reading. These weapons, however, proved ineffective, for he frankly told her that he believed not a word of all that was written in that book. To be convinced of error he required arguments taken from nature and human reason. She appealed to the feelings of her heart, but he granted these no place in their dispute since he called them traditional prejudices. She then would call him an unreasonable, self-conceited man, who thought himself to have the monopoly of wisdom, and he would return the compliment by pointing his forefinger to his head, and saying that there was something wrong in her upper storey. So their family conversation became very painful and disgusting. Their domestic peace was gone. He henceforth was out every evening, spending his leisure hours in the club or at the theatre. And she, poor thing, not yet knowing the true fountain of consolation, tried to dispel her grief either by playing at cards with her children at home, or by taking them to some place of amusement. As to them they showed, on the whole, an inclination towards siding with her. Their young tender hearts sympathized with her religion (such as it was) more than with their father's cold philosophy. And this, at least, was some consolation for their poor loving mother.

The merciful and wise Saviour of the lost leads the blind in a way which they know not. He looked down with compassion on the perplexity in which this woman was, now that she knew enough of truth to tremble, and too little to be consoled. The Bible is a correct teacher, but man, as long as he reads it only by the light of his own human reason, can never discover the beautiful harmony of its truths. He may understand something of what he reads there about man, for the spirit of man knoweth the things of man. But the spirit of man knows not the things of God. It is only the Spirit of God that searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God, and until the Spirit of God opens the eyes of the reader, man will never perceive how the things of God, as held out in Scripture, can harmonize with the things of man. There are many, especially such as from their childhood are trained up under the breath of the gospel, who, when reading the Bible, find the heavenly Dove alighted upon their shoulder and whispering his divine teaching into their ears without their noticing the exact moment when, for the first time, they were blessed with this privilege. But there are many others who, in the providential leading of God, require some striking event in their life to be roused from a state of ignorance and deep slumber, the removal of which is indispensable for the free access of the great Guide, who leadeth into all truth. This was Mrs. R——'s case. The perusal of the Bible had shaped her mind into some frame of seriousness such as she had not known before. She took this change for the thing which she saw Scripture denoted as conversion or regeneration. She began pleasing herself with observing that she was much more earnestly minded now than formerly, and this self-satisfaction was not a little enhanced by the fact of the obvious contrast between her piety and the ungodliness of her husband. She thought she was on the right way now, since she was not on his. But she did not know that there are many ways that lead from the gate of heaven, and only one that leads to it. She did not perceive that error, whether laughing or weeping, whether with or without a Bible in its hand, always keeps erring. But her merciful Saviour knew that He was the Way, and he resolved to bring her to Himself, that he might give her that Spirit who only opens the heart for God's word and God's word for the heart.

One summer afternoon Mrs R—— was on her return from a neighbouring village, where she had paid a visit to a friend. She hastened her steps as thick clouds gathered in the sky, and a heavy thunderstorm appeared to be in prospect. Her speed proved fruitless. She was scarcely half way home when tremendous thunder-peals began rattling above her head. Flashes of lightning pierced the glooming firmament, and torrents of rain fell which, in a few moments, turned the smooth highway into a pool. A labourer's cottage stood a few yards from the way, peeping through a little grove. Mrs. R—— fled to it in full speed, and pushing open the door, found herself at once in a little parlour which seemed to be the only room the inhabitants could avail themselves of. At least it appeared to serve for a dwelling, a dining, and a bed-room. Between the fire-place and the window a woman of apparently thirty years was seated behind a green painted table, cleaning vegetables. Two girls of six and eight were sitting on stools at her feet playing with a doll. At the other side of the fire-place was a bed in a recess in the wall, in which a sick person was lying. The appearance of the whole showed, at the first glimpse, that this was not the abode of prosperity and abundance. Yet it was characterised by a spirit of order and cleanliness which bespoke Mrs. R——'s respect and confidence.

"Beg your pardon, my good woman," said she to the person behind the table, while shaking the rain from her gown. "I must apologize for rushing in so abruptly, but you will kindly permit me to remain till this fearful storm is over."

"Gladly, ma'am," replied the woman in a kind voice, at once rising from her seat, and placing a chair in the middle of the apartment. "Sit down, ma'am, and take your rest. Your feet are wet, I'm sure. Let me give you a foot-stove, ma'am."

"No, thank you. Don't trouble—"

"No trouble at all, ma'am." And before Mrs. R—— could finish her sentence the woman laid her hand upon the stove, put a piece of glowing peat coal into the little fire-pot, and stooping down shoved it under Mrs. R——'s feet.

"What a tremendous storm," she continued, resuming her place behind the table, and taking up the beans she had thrown aside. "I am glad you could take shelter in time, ma'am. I hope you are not wet."

"Not at all," replied Mrs. R——, "only my outer dress is a little damp."

"Give the lady a warm cup of coffee," said a feeble voice, interrupted with coughing, coming out of the bed.

"No, thank you, I really don't want it," answered Mrs. R——, and it was only by virtue of her strongest protest that she could detain the kind woman from stirring the fire and getting the kettle boiling.

"I am sorry to find that you are sick, my good friend," said she, addressing the invalid. "I hope your illness is not of a serious character."

"Consumption, ma'am," answered the sick man. "I have been laid up for nearly half a year. I don't believe there is any hope of recovery."

"Indeed!" replied Mrs. R——, in a voice of deep sympathy.

"Yes, ma'am," said the woman, "we are in painful circumstances. My husband, we have every reason to fear, will not be long with us."

"Don't say fear," said the invalid. "Our Father is about to take me home, and now I long to get there."

"Yes, you are right, my dear," said the woman. "But I only said so with regard to our present position in this life. For the rest, you are right, we have every reason to rejoice."

"To rejoice?" said Mrs. R——, in a voice of surprise. "How can you rejoice in such circumstances?"

"Because I am going to heaven, ma'am," answered the sick one.

The tone in which he spoke was so calm and deliberate, and so indicative of perfect assurance, that Mrs. R—— folded her hands from astonishment, and turning her face towards the woman, looked at her with an expression on her countenance that seemed to ask, "Did anybody ever hear the like?" When, however, she observed the gentle, joyful smile with which the woman, while nodding her head, seemed to confirm her husband's words, she again turned to the invalid, and pushing her chair a little nearer to his bed, better to understand his words, she said, in a voice of deep concern,—

"It is a grand thing to be able to say so when in the sight of death and eternity, my good friend. There are but few who would have the courage to take such words on their lips in such circumstances."

"Alas! too true," replied the sick one. "It is because few know the only Saviour of lost sinners. But I hope, ma'am, you are one of them," added he in a kind, serious voice.

"Well, I think I know the Lord Jesus Christ," answered Mrs. R——; "and I believe that he is a Saviour of sinners; but still, I should not venture to say that I am going to heaven, as you do. But I suppose you always have been a pious person from your childhood, and you have always been preparing yourself for heaven."

"No, no; far from it!" exclaimed the invalid. "I am a great, great sinner, ma'am. I was walking with both my feet on the way to hell for years, and had the Lord cut off my life's breath in those days, I certainly should have arrived at the eternal furnace. But he had no delight in my perdition, and in his infinite grace he remembered my poor immortal soul; and he has shown me mercy by opening my eyes, and by turning me to the only Redeemer ere it was too late."

"Yes, ma'am," said the woman, "the Lord has done great things with my husband, by discovering him to himself as a lost sinner, so that he sought for salvation at the feet of Jesus. Not that he had made himself guilty of great crimes or public misconduct; for he was always a quiet, honest, and sober person in society, and he regularly would go to church every Sunday, and read his Bible every morning and evening. But he did not see, ma'am, that he was an enemy of God for all that, and so he lived without Christ in his heart. But the Lord has opened his eyes to make him see that he was a barren thistle and a candle without light, and has led him to come to the only root of life, and to be kindled at the everlasting Sun of Righteousness."

These words of the woman still more increased Mrs. R——'s wonder. She was silent, and repeated them in her thoughts. "Always a quiet, honest, sober man," she said to herself; "regularly going to church and reading his Bible; and yet, notwithstanding all that, an enemy of God! How is that possible? What, then, am I?"

"My good friends," said she, after a pause, "are you not using too strong expressions now? Do you really mean to say that you were an enemy of God while you were living so irreproachably, and professing religion so faithfully? Was not your laudable conduct much more an evidence of the contrary?"

"So I thought, ma'am," answered the invalid, "till the veil of self-deception was taken from my eyes. I began noticing that with all my stock of self-righteousness and religion, I had no true peace, and was constantly trembling at the prospect of dying and appearing before God. This discovery alarmed me, and I took to inquiring into the cause of it. I earnestly prayed the Lord to show it me. I read the Gospel again with this special object in view. I conversed with some friends about the matter. But I could not find it out. One day, however, when passing along the road, I saw a poor man sitting on a trunk of a tree, who seemed to be in great distress. Upon inquiring what the cause of his sadness was, I learned that he owed his landlord a month's rent, and was to be turned out with his family the next day, if he did not pay his ten shillings that same evening. The poor man's condition touched my heart; and as I then was in prosperous circumstances, I told him to call upon me after sunset, promising him a gift to the required amount. Suddenly the poor man's countenance changed; joy beamed from his eyes; he jumped up cheerfully, and clasping my hand in his, he said, 'Thank you, my kind benefactor. You scarcely can conceive what a great benefit you are bestowing upon me. My landlord is such a stern person! But let him come now. I don't tremble for him any more.' These words struck me forcibly. Going home, I could not cease thinking over them. I observed the striking similarity between that man's case and my spiritual condition. How suddenly, I thought, was that man's fear changed into joy! And how? Only by faith in me—only by believing that his debt was paid now; for he took my promise as equal to the fact. At once a light broke in upon my soul. 'Oh, how this poor beggar puts me to shame!' exclaimed I. 'He believes me at once, and he rejoices. And I have received such better promises from such a better Benefactor—yea, assurances signed with his own blood—and I continue trembling! His faithful word tells me that he has shed his blood for the remission of my sins if I will but believe in him—that he has paid all my debts—that he has fulfilled everything the holy law of a just Judge required of me. And yet I still continue trying to pay off my debts by my own righteousness, and to purchase heaven by my own godliness! Oh, what an insult this is, done to the perfect work and all-sufficient sacrifice of that divine and all-accomplished Redeemer! Instead of sinking down at his feet in unspeakable joy, because he has saved every one that will take his salvation, I have been all the while trying to save myself, by storing up a treasure of prayers and psalms, of church-going and Bible-reading, of self-perfection and outward holiness! Oh, what a proud, self-conceited wretch I am,—thinking that by any thought or deed of my own I might contribute something towards clearing off that eternal debt, for the cancelling of which nothing short of the precious blood of God's own beloved and spotless Son was required and sufficient! No wonder that I never could come to peace. I have always refused to let the only Prince of Peace come into my heart. I am a Christian, but without Christ; a sacrificer, but without a sacrifice; a merchant about to do great bargains, but without a farthing in my bag. Oh, what an enemy of God and his righteousness I am—refusing to be saved by grace—refusing to receive the gift of God freely, as a poor miserable beggar, just as that poor man received my alms, and rejoiced!'

The sick one here stopped his animated speech, during which he, in the enthusiasm of his heart, had raised himself to a sitting attitude, the better to enhance the expression of his soul's most intimate convictions by the look of his bright eyes and the gesture of his hand. It was a most impressive sight to witness the natural and simple, but most vivid and fervent eloquence, with which that common labourer, in the dialect of his class, poured out the continuous stream of thoughts that sprung up from his heart's deepest wells. He spoke evidently inspired by that Spirit which prepareth praise to God in the mouths of the babes, and would rouse the stones to speak if man would keep silent. His exertion, however, quite exhausted him, and sinking back on his pillow, he fell into a fit of coughing, which for the present put an end to any further conversation. Meanwhile, the storm went off, and the sky cleared up again. Mrs. R— took leave of the good people who so hospitably had granted her a shelter, and dropping a couple of silver coins into the hand of one of the girls, left the cottage, deeply struck with what she had so unexpectedly been privileged to witness.

The seed which now was sown in her heart, struck deep roots, and, under the fertilizing breath of the Holy Spirit, soon grew up to bear its fruits. For a long time she had been caring for salvation, but she now understood that it only was possible by grace. "Just to believe," she said to herself, "just to sit down at the feet of the Saviour, and to receive him with all the affections of a grateful and loving heart—that's salvation." And she did accordingly. She knelt down in the closet and spoke to Jesus. She told him that she had nothing to give to him, but a poor, empty heart, and a long, endless list of sins; but that she believed he had to give her a heart overflowing with love and compassion, and a righteousness brought about for her as deep as the ocean, and as high as the heavens. She told him that she gave herself to him, just as she was, but that she took him just as he was, at the same time—as a loving, gracious, all-sufficient, and never-forsaking Saviour of lost sinners. She said to him, "Now I am thine, and thou art mine, for time and eternity, and nothing shall ever separate me from thy love."

Thus she spoke to Jesus. And she found that this was salvation indeed. For a peace surpassing all understanding streamed in upon her soul, and she rose from her knees as a bride rises, when she has received the never-to-be-forgotten smile of her bridegroom.

The chasm that hitherto had been existing between her and her husband now yawned as widely as ever. Since Christ had become to her a living Saviour now, a person in whose blood she was washed from her sins, in whose resurrection she saw her own resurrection guaranteed, in whose personal love to herself she felt unspeakably rich, and in whose communion she desired to spend so many a sweet hour of the day and of her night watches—nothing was more disgusting and horrible to her feeling than a philosophy which denied every personal relationship between God and man, and looked at the Bible as a book of fables, and at Go!p's beautiful creation as a dead mechanism. She perceived that nothing could be more dishonouring to a loving Saviour and a living Creator of the wonders of heaven and earth, than such a system, and could not help considering her husband as an enemy of God and of his Christ. Now, in this judgment she was quite right, but she too little kept in mind that she herself also had been an enemy of God, and that her Saviour had for so many years borne her enmity with patience and long-suffering. Newly converted persons, when observing the great contrast between the unconverted and themselves, often indulge a spirit of indignation, which makes them overlook that they are indignant at what they were pleased with not long since. For, though Mrs. R—— never had gone so far as to systematically deny the personal existence of God, yet practically she had for years treated that God as if he were no living person at all. She had shared the benefits universally brought about by his atonement, without being reconciled to him, and she had enjoyed the blessings of his creation, without glorifying him. Had she humbly kept this in mind, she would have borne her husband's unbelief as God had borne hers, with a spirit of tender compassion and prayerful patience, remembering that herself had been erring, and blind, and destitute of knowledge. But the pride of her old nature, though through her happy change broken before God, yet was not quite broken before men. She was to learn now that her conversion was not the end, but the commencement of her sanctification; that her sin was pardoned, but not yet extirpated; that she was quickened to begin the warfare, but that she had not yet won the victory. She had given herself as a lost sheep into the hands of the only good and faithful shepherd. But she was to experience now that she had still to unlearn many a bad custom and evil habit, of the existence of which she, until now, had been unconscious. She had experienced the joy of becoming the property of Christ now. Another and higher joy was in store for her—that of becoming his image.

The first object of offence which her holy zeal was standing out against, was her husband's abominable library.

"Truly, my dear," said she, one day when she found him in his counting-house, reading a profane pamphlet, "truly, it won't do having such wicked, God-dishonouring books in our house. They are written by the devil and his companions, to blaspheme the living God and his anointed One. The wrath of the Lord will come upon our house if you don't throw them away."

"Very well, I'll wait upon it," answered he, with a sarcastic smile, without turning his eyes from the page he was reading.

"Oh, you reckless sinner!" exclaimed she. "How dare you take such words upon your wicked lips! Where would you be, if the Lord struck you down this very moment by a flash of lightning!"

"I think I should be turned to ashes," replied he, coldly exchanging his attitude.

"What a pest you have there on that shelf!" continued she, in a tone of high indignation. "Nothing but theatre and play-books, and wicked, God-reviling, and soul-destroying publications. I tremble at the idea that one of our children some day may take one of them in its hands. I should prefer to see them handling arsenic. That danger would only threaten their bodies, but this is deadly poison for their souls."

Mr. R—— was silent. He bit his under-lip to quell the anger that was fast rising within.

"I'm sure," continued she, "I'll take those books some day and throw them out of the window."

Here Mr. R—— laid down the pamphlet he was reading, and, with an angry look, staring his wife in the face, said, in a cool but threatening voice,—

"Very well, you may try; but you may be sure you'll go after them."

With these words he took his hat and left the house. Mrs. R—— kept looking at the shelf, as if pondering whether she would carry out her threatening or not. Then bursting out into tears, she sank down upon a chair, and lifting her heart to her Saviour, entreated him to give her light in these dark circumstances. And her faithful Shepherd heard her heart's prayer. He again led her in a way that she knew not.

THE SICK NURSE.

THERE are few of our readers who have not read that most interesting work, The Missing Link; the perusal of which has stirred up many to "go and do likewise." It was from the interest excited by this book that the benevolent scheme about to be described took its rise; and it is hoped that a few particulars concerning the sick nurse among the poor may be not only acceptable to the readers of the Family Treasury, but may be the means of inducing some to help by their contributions so desirable a means of doing good to the sick and suffering poor.

About the time that The Missing Link was first published, a new Territorial Church was being organized at the Cowgate-head (Edinburgh), and some friends who were desirous of assisting the clergyman proposed to raise funds to set agoing and support a "Bible woman" in that crowded and destitute district. It was, however, found that there was an agency of this kind at work there already, and, just at the time when this plan was under consideration, the clergyman (the Rev. T. Smith) was much impressed by the destitute condition of a sick family he had been visiting. There were three or four females lying ill of fever, and from the dread of its being infectious, not one of the neighbours would go near them. When he entered the room he could hardly breathe, but, when he endeavoured to open the window to let in fresh air, one of the poor sufferers begged him not to do so, as they had no fire, no one to kindle it, and no one even to give them a drink of water. Of course aid was procured when paid for, and this incident was the means of suggesting the idea of employing an active, kind, Christian woman as sick nurse among the poor in this locality. The Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society have a dispensary and training-school in the Cowgate, and it was thought advisable to place the nurse under the orders of the medical superintendent, who resides in the mission premises, thus securing the advantage of efficient direction and superintendence. Subscriptions were accordingly collected, a suitable person able and willing for the work was found, and, now that nearly a year has elapsed since this scheme was set agoing, it may be pronounced a most successful experiment.

We will avail ourselves of a short report, printed for circulation among the subscribers, for some particulars about the nurse and her work among the poor, although it is not easy to select cases for publication, as even among those whose squalid poverty might lead one to suppose that the finer feelings were lost, there has been found a keen appreciation of the quiet tact and good feeling that prevents the nurse from speaking unnecessarily about what she sees in their houses.

Amongst her first employments was the simple duty of calling on some of the patients after the doctor had visited them, to see that the remedies prescribed were administered, as in more than one instance it was discovered that owing to the persons who should have taken this charge being intoxicated, the medicine had never been given.

Sometimes she sits up at night with the patient, when those belonging to the family are too much fatigued with their day's labour to do so, or when, as is alas! too often the case, intemperate habits render them unfitted to take charge. In general, she goes daily from house to house, sometimes making as many as fifteen visits in a day, cleaning the rooms, cooking the food, or kindling the fire, taking a change of linens, and carrying away the soiled garments for the purpose of washing them in the public wash-house.

To aid in this very essential part of her work, there has been an endeavour made to provide a sufficient supply of bed-clothes and linens to enable her to lend out such articles as are requisite, reclaiming them when the patient has recovered. This is a necessary precaution in situations where too often the intemperate habits of those among whom she labours lead them to pawn or sell articles of clothing bestowed on them. Some of the cases described by her are most touching, and even when she meets with what is unpleasant, perhaps even revolting, she seems to go fearlessly and cheerfully on her way, and has already been the means of bringing more than one hardened, careless being to attend the Sabbath evening services, and to take an interest in the things of eternal life. One very destitute case was that of an Irish girl, who was found by Mr. Burns Thomson, the medical officer of the society, in such a state of filth that not one of the neighbours would assist her, and he himself felt reluctant to ask the nurse if she would go and see what could be done. Without any hesitation she went, washed the poor creature, and made her as comfortable as she could, putting clean garments on her, those taken off having actually to be burned, from the state they were in. Some time after this she met with a mark of the esteem her kind aid had excited, from an Irish woman who keeps a pawnbroker's shop, who offered to sell some article of dress the nurse wished to buy for a patient, at a lower rate than its value, on account of what she had done for the sick Irish girl. In one instance she was attending a woman dying of consumption,—no other female in the house, and the only other inmate, an old man, father of the patient. The nurse generally has a little Bible in her pocket, and when sitting up at night reads to herself, and occasionally offers to read a few verses to the sick person. Upon this occasion the verses read led to a conversation between the invalid and the nurse on a sermon she had heard on the preceeding Sabbath, when the old man remarked that "he had not been in a church for thirty years." "Well, it's time you were beginning," was the answer; "why should not you come up on Sabbath night?" To the surprise of his daughter, the old man at once assented, and came to the meeting held for people in their working clothes in the Cowgate; and when the nurse went next day to attend to the sick woman, she found him much impressed and interested by what he had heard. From that time he has continued to attend regularly, coming out even during the severe snow storm of last winter. Another interesting case was that of a poor woman who was dangerously ill after her confinement, and with whom the nurse was desired to remain all night. Of course, quiet and freedom from harassment were most desirable, but first the husband came home intoxicated, and soon after a daughter returned, rude and noisy, and the nurse had to exert some authority over her, to induce her to be quiet, saying she was sent there by the doctor for that purpose. In many other cases besides this the advantage of being able to refer to "the doctor" has been experienced, both as to the power it gives of enforcing quietness on the disorderly inmates, and also for the purpose of inducing the patients to attend to the religious instruction given by Mr. B. Thomson and his medical missionary students. In this instance the girl had been insolent and defiant, even to the medical men, but during the night the nurse took an opportunity of speaking seriously to her on the sinful nature of the life she was leading, she became softened, and said, that had she been spoken to in such a way before, she might never have been so bad as she was. She was persuaded to come to the Sabbath evening meeting, has continued to attend regularly; some employment was found for her, and her mother speaks favourably of her altered behaviour at home.

Another case in which the services of the sick-nurse were most acceptable, was that of a Highland girl who had been servant in a hotel, and who had fallen into a consumption. She was in lodgings, perfectly friendless and confined to bed. The nurse attended her regularly, frequently sitting up all night with her; her state of mind was at first careless and indifferent, but a blessing was given to the efforts of the medical missionary who attended her, as well as to the simple, earnest words of her kind nurse, and she died in peace and humble trust in the Redeemer.

In an extract from a letter of Mr. Burns Thomson, quoted in the report already referred to, he says, "Amongst all her cases she has the opportunity of doing the work of a Female Medical Missionary, especially among the chronic cases, and she rejoices to embrace it. Many of our cases we are anxious to bring to the meeting and to the church, and to keep up our friendly intercourse with them for their souls' good, and in this purely mission work she engages largely and cheerfully."

It is both pleasing and encouraging to find how much gratitude is shown by many to whom the nurse has performed these acts of kindness, and how quickly she gets access to their hearts. Her own account of some of her experience among her poor neighbours is both touching and graphic. Her expressive Scotch language cannot well be conveyed by writing; but no doubt that, added to her frank, homely kindness of manner, goes far towards making the people feel that she is what they call, "just ane o' oursel's," and enables her to speak to them with more effect than could be done by one of a higher class. Much of her influence she ascribes to having "a kindrife way with them." And truly does this expressive word point out the surest means of doing good either to the souls or bodies of our fellow-creatures. One anecdote more, to show how ready the nurse is to take every opportunity offered, to oblige or to instruct those she comes in contact with. Upon one occasion, when crossing the Bruntsfield Links, a very poor old woman accosted her, and begged her help to place a bag of bones she was carrying on her shoulders. They were near one of the stone-seats, and at the nurse's suggestion, they went towards it to rest, she assisting the old woman with her burden. Some one had laid down on the seat a tract, called "The Artillery Boy; or, Grasping the Promises"—laying a stone on it to keep the wind from blowing it away. The old Irishwoman took it up, and expressed some desire to know what it was, as she could not read. The nurse offered to read it to her while they rested, and it was listened to with much interest. Not only so; but seeing two acquaintances passing, the old woman called out to them to come and hear "what fine things this woman was reading." The tract was re-read accordingly; and a conversation ensued, in which those poor creatures expressed some curiosity to know if that was what was called a tract—evidently fearing to trust to what she had been told was pernicious. The nurse evaded the question by answering that it was God's truth they had been listening to, and that his promises and offers of salvation were addressed to the poorest and most ignorant. None of them could read, but all expressed their interest in what they had heard; and who can tell but that a seed may have been sown that day, that shall yet bear fruit to life eternal? *

"I HAVE GONE ASTRAY LIKE A LOST SHEEP,— SEEK THY SERVANT."

O BLESSED Shepherd of the sheep,
Within thy bosom laid,
I've travelled over roughest roads,
Untroubled—undismayed;
My utter weakness seemed like strength
Upon thy strong arm stayed.

How tenderly and kindly once
My footsteps thou didst guide,
I feared no danger nor distress
When thou wert by my side,
And sweet to me was thy command
Still with thee to abide.

By pastures green and waters still
Thou brought'st me forth to feed,
My hung'ring soul still followed close
Wherever thou didst lead,
And found, in living upon thee,
That thou wert meat indeed.

But now in darkness and distress
My outcast spirit lies,
My groping hands to thee I stretch,
And raise my tear-dimmed eyes.
Far off! and feeble! Saviour, hear
Thy prisoner's burdened sighs.

My wand'ring feet have turned aside
From following after thee;
Oh, wilt thou not, my Shepherd Lord,
Come following after me?
Strengthen my feeble knees again,
And bid my blind eyes see.

Within the pastures of thy word
In vain I seek for food,
On blessed hours and seasons past,
With longing thoughts I brood.
I know—I see—but cannot taste,
O Lord, that thou art good.

Shame and confusion, I confess,
Belong of right to me,
But mercies and forgivenesses
Are ever found with thee.

* Contributions for the salary of the sick-nurse may be sent either to Mrs. Sym, 87 George Square, Edinburgh, or to Miss H. Wilson, Woodville, Edinburgh.

In Him, where sin and pardon met,
Let us once more agree.

My weary, thirsting, fainting soul,
Oh wilt thou now restore,
Renewed, revived, thy wondrous grace
More deeply I'll adore,
And bound in closer bonds to thee,
Forsake thee nevermore. c.

NOTES ON

GALATIANS II. 19, 20.
ROMANS VII. 4.
COLOSSIANS III. 1.

ROMANS VI. 3-14.
ROMANS VI. 9.
ACTS II. 24.

THESE texts are grouped together as the subject of a few remarks, because the study of one of them leads naturally to the study of all, and a just or erroneous view of one is commonly connected with a similarly just or erroneous view of all. They lead us also to the consideration of the scheme of the gospel; and a clear discovery of their meaning throws light on many passages of Scripture.

It is not uncommon to hear the words of Paul in Gal. ii. 20, "I am crucified with Christ," explained as of sanctification, and as if the text were similar in meaning to other texts in which a figurative use is made of the word crucify, particularly Gal. v. 24, "And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." But to adopt this interpretation is to be carried away by the mere sound of the words, or rather of a single word. That a word is figuratively used in one text is surely no reason for supposing it to be figuratively used, and in the very same way, in another. The word crucify in Gal. v. 24 evidently relates to that part of sanctification which is elsewhere called mortifying the deeds of the body (Rom. viii. 13), and mortifying our members which are upon the earth (Col. iii. 5). And when this is duly considered, it will be found impossible to maintain that there is a resemblance in signification between this text and Gal. ii. 20; or that, when Paul says, "I am crucified with Christ," he speaks, exclusively or primarily, of sanctification, common as it is so to regard his words. The figure of crucifixion, employed with reference to sanctification, must, from the very nature of it, relate to one part of sanctification in particular, namely mortification, as it certainly does in Gal. v. 24. But when Paul says, "I am crucified with Christ," the words, "with Christ," forbid this explanation of the words, "I am crucified." They cannot mean, I mortify the deeds of the body, nor even the deeds of the body are mortified in me: the whole statement cannot mean, I am conformed to Christ in this, for in Christ there was nothing of this at all. And to make the words "with Christ" signify in a mere general way a connection with him upon which this mortification of evil lusts in us depends, is to empty them of their own proper meaning, in order to sustain an interpretation of the words, "I am crucified," which rests upon no evidence whatever.

Let us take the words, "I am crucified with Christ," as relating primarily to justification, not to sanctification, and every word appears rich in meaning, whilst the statement beautifully accords with the context both preceding and following. Paul speaks of his interest in the death of Christ, and the words are appropriate to every believer. "I am crucified with Christ," he says; that is, I have paid the penalty of the law in the death of Christ upon the cross, who died as my substitute and representative; and so he goes on to say, "Nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God who loved me, and gave himself for me." The believer is crucified with Christ; he has paid the utmost penalty of the law in that death of Christ for him; the law's claim against him is discharged; but he lives, for Christ, who was delivered for our offences, was raised again for our justification; he lives, freed from guilt, and accepted as righteous; and the new life imparted to him from Christ is a life of holiness, and of conformity to Christ himself. The text is not without relation to the subject of sanctification; but its relation to that subject is very different from what is imagined, when sanctification is regarded as more prominent in it than the doctrine of justification, or of atonement.

The exposition which has just been given of Gal. ii. 20, is strongly confirmed by consideration of the preceding verse, "For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God," and by a comparison of both with verses in Rom. vi. and vii. "I am dead to the law," says the apostle; that is, as one who has endured its utmost penalty, and against whom it has no claim any longer, and can now pronounce no sentence of death. "There is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." The apostle, in Gal. ii. 19, not merely states a fact that he is dead to the law, but he directs attention to the manner in which this death to the law took place; "I through the law am dead to the law." The statement corresponds with that of the next verse, "I am crucified with Christ," as what follows, "that I might live unto God," corresponds with the further statement in that verse, "nevertheless I live." And how could the apostle's death to the law be through the law itself? It is but a part of the truth, and not the first or chief part of it, although often taken for it all, that the law prepares the way in the soul for the gospel, killing that that the gospel may make alive, showing a man his guilt and helplessness, that he may renounce all vain endeavours of self-righteousness, and put his trust in Christ. All this follows, and follows in its proper place, if the first place is assigned to the doctrine of the death of Christ in satisfaction of the law of God. I through the law that put Christ to death am dead to the law : it has ceased to claim the penalty of death from me, because it has already exacted that penalty for me from him.

To be more assured of this meaning, let us compare this text, Gal. ii. 19, with Rom. vii. 4,—“Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ, that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that ye should bring forth fruit unto God.” This bringing forth fruit unto God corresponds with the living unto God of which the apostle speaks in Gal. ii. 19, and particularly in the holiness and new obedience of the new life ; and this death to the law by the body of Christ corresponds with and explains the death to the law through the law. The believer is dead to the law through the law itself in its exaction of its penalty of the body of Christ, in the sufferings and death of Christ.

Does not the exposition thus given of these verses of Galatians receive confirmation from what the apostle Paul elsewhere says of being dead with Christ, and risen with Christ? for example, in Col. ii. 20, and iii. 1, where also the same relation of sanctification to justification appears: “If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.” To be crucified with Christ and nevertheless to live, seems to correspond more nearly with being dead with Christ and risen with Christ, than with crucifying the flesh and its affections and lusts.

Or let us turn to the sixth chapter of the epistle to the Romans. In the third verse we find that all who are baptized into Christ are baptized into the death of Christ, and in the next verse that “we are buried with him by baptism into death ; that, like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life,” a text, of the relation of which to baptism it is not necessary here to say anything, but that it rather tells us what baptism signifies than what baptism does. But in this verse death and life are spoken of much in the same way as in the texts which have been already under our consideration. Here again we have the believer’s interest or participation in the death of Christ, and in the resurrection and life of Christ ; the believer crucified with Christ, yet living as risen with Christ, walking in newness of life—living unto God. And so in the verses following. “For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection : knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin : for he that is dead is freed from sin.” Without going into any very close examination of these verses, it may surely be affirmed that they exhibit to us the doctrines of atonement, justification, and sanctification, in the same relation in which we have seen them in Gal. ii. 19, 20, and in Col. iii. 1. And to the same effect the apostle proceeds in language, if possible, still more illustrative of the meaning of these texts, and capable of elucidation by them. “Now, if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him : knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more, sin hath no more dominion over him. For, in that he died, he died unto sin once, but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. Likewise, reckon ye also yourselves to be dead unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord.” Here we have again the believer’s death with Christ and life with Christ, which death is accomplished, and which life is eternal. Moreover, Christ is said to have died unto sin and to live unto God, and believers are called upon likewise to reckon themselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through him. All this cannot relate to sanctification, and the only explanation of the apostle’s language is by the doctrine of atonement and of justification. Christ died unto sin, not in mortification of sinful lusts or in relinquishment of sinful ways, but in the endurance of the penalty due to our sins who believe in his name, when he died through the law, as it is written, “the strength of sin is the law ;” but even thus are believers to reckon themselves to be dead indeed unto sin, and as Christ rose from the dead, the justified head and representative of his people, so are they to reckon themselves alive from the dead through him, alive unto God, to glorify God not merely by the holiness and new obedience of their lives, but by the very fact of their living, and to enjoy God, and all this for ever.

That these verses are correctly explained in this way, which confirms the exposition already given of the other texts noticed, is made still more apparent when we read on and find the apostle connecting again the doctrine of sanctification with the doctrine of atonement and justification here declared. “Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal bodies, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin, but yield yourselves unto God as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God : for sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under the law, but under grace.” On which it is perhaps only necessary to remark that the very form in which this exhortation to sanctification begins, shows that it is quite different in meaning and purpose from the exhortation immediately preceding. And is not the connection obvious and beautiful? Christ “died unto sin once,” “he liveth unto God.” “LIKEWISE reckon ye yourselves dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ your Lord. Let not sin THEREFORE reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof.”

In this passage of Scripture there occurs a statement, often misunderstood, attention to which may perhaps be conducive to a clearer view of the meaning of the whole. “Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more, DEATH HATH NO MORE DOMINION OVER HIM.” What is the meaning of this last clause? Is it merely a repetition of the preceding one, he dieth no more?

This is not easily to be imagined. And the statement here made by Paul readily recalls another, which was made by Peter on the day of Pentecost, that God raised up Jesus from the dead, "having loosed the pains of death, BECAUSE IT WAS NOT POSSIBLE THAT HE SHOULD BE HOLDEN OF IT" (Acts ii. 24). It was not possible, we hear it said, because he is God. But if this reason thus stated simply by itself were sufficient to prove the impossibility of Christ's being holden of death, would it not equally prove that he could not have died? Nay! Christ submitted himself to the law, he was "made under the law" to redeem them that were under the law, and so he became subject to death, not to an usurped dominion, according to the arbitrary gloss which many put on Paul's words in Rom. vi. 9, but to a lawful dominion; but he could not be holden of death, because he satisfied the law's utmost demands, nay, magnified the law and made it honourable, and here the doctrine of the divinity of Christ comes in as part of the whole doctrine of his person, which is essential to this doctrine of his mediatorial work. He could not be holden of death; the law which had put him to death now relinquished its claim for ever, not only as to him but as to his people; death hath no dominion over him, and there is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus. Believers are called to reckon themselves to be dead unto sin in his death, and alive unto God with him who lives for ever. And this is the great gospel argument for sanctification, continually urged in the Bible, and felt as an argument of power by all who know the constraint of the love of Christ, and who can truly say, "We love God, because he first loved us; we love Christ because he loved us and gave himself for us." M.

MOTHERS' PRAYERS.

It is because of the fact, unexplained and unauthorized, that fathers withdraw themselves from much of the responsibility, that mothers have to be the more faithful. And they need encouragement, and if it can be given, they need help also.

Maternal Associations are coming more and more into vogue. Every thoughtful Christian ought to be glad of it. In these circles of prayer the cases of individual families in turn are remembered, and all the multitudinous perplexities of a mother's life are discussed. The female character has one element in it, fixed as nature can make it. Mothers must have sympathy, conference, and companionship. Comparison of views, which experience has suggested, has more to do with their processes of reasoning, than logic. They go better when they go in a body.

I used to observe this when a school-teacher, years ago. Out from the windows at the recess I have looked many a time to watch the scholars rushing to the hollows in the autumnal field, where the early ice had formed over night. The boys with a whoop and halloo, dashed on and over the narrow sheets, daring the danger of a wetting. But the girls almost always timidly took hold of hands, and walked slowly across till they were sure the slippery spot would bear. And without doubt they were the wisest of the two.

That is natural for the sex, and beautiful also. And the most touching sight in the world to me is to see mothers take each other by the hand for counsel and mutual confirmation, in reference to these holiest of all cares in their homes.

And there is a power in this thing, too, which cannot be over-estimated. A student in college, whose home was in the town, used to come up to the halls in the evening, for a "good time" with his fellows. Tuesdays he was always dull, and gloomy, and taciturn. We used to rally him over it, but to no purpose. The allusions to it the rather seemed to deepen his gloom. He generally went away early. Now, he has said in my hearing, over and over again since, that as he left the house, his mother would say to him, "We have our meeting to-night, my son;" and sometimes she would add, "It is our turn to-night; they will pray for my children, and for you among them." And this was what subdued him. He could not cover from his eyes the vision of those faithful parents, wrestling at the throne of grace for his conversion all through the hour. He has assured me that many a time he went to his own room, and prayed in the very agony of his heart that his soul might not be lost. He is now a minister of the gospel, and the turning point of his life was, when on his solemn way home one evening, he paused before the humble dwelling in which the association was held, and just behind that closely-drawn curtain were those who would pray him into the kingdom. He there resolved to give himself to God.

But after all, the great work is to be done by each mother alone. Encouragement she may get, and hints of incalculable help from those who meet with her for joint conference and supplication. After all this, she must return to her own little circle of duty by herself. The children must be taught to pray, and example is the way in which their lesson can be given the most effectually.

One mother there has been in this world, who has gone to her rest now, who did this duty faithfully. I suppose that we shall find, by-and-by, that many, many have shown as much fidelity as she. But I could tell you the name of this one.

She used to take her children with her into her chamber, whenever an hour from the busy day could be found. There she would read a Bible-story with them or to them, sometimes about Samuel, and David, and Joseph—but more often about Jesus, and Mary, and Lydia, and Timothy. Then she would question, and converse, and explain, till the mind had taught the truth it needed, and the conscience had felt it. She kneeled then by the chair, and the child knelt likewise. Sometimes she prayed for him, oftener with him. He was taught to repeat, as his own request to an unseen God, the petitions, short and simple, she uttered. And so years passed on, and there is no forgetting, even now, the power of those seasons. She respected her covenant with her Saviour. She talked of it, and urged it, and lived in it, so firmly, that her words were carved in the slab over her grave. "My covenant-keeping God."

Children are taught to "say" prayers too exclusively. They should be encouraged to compose their own petitions as early as possible. These may be in the form of sententious, pithy utterances, at the end of their set forms. Add one new one frequently—a prayer for some particular grace which is wanting, or against some particular sin which is besetting—"Give me a better temper;" "Guard me from being so heedless;" "Keep me from all untruth;" "Help me love study more." Any thing like this is legitimate, only clothe it in simple words, and teach the child the connection between his prayer and his own effort. Make him understand that one must not ask God to make him amiable, unless he tries to check his own temper. He must remember his prayer, and try to improve.

Now, these are the "mother's prayers," about which we hear so much in the stories. You see how simple they are. But you cannot overrate their influence. Sailors on the sea, soldiers in the field, prisoners in the penitentiaries, and even maniacs in the asylums, are vulnerable to their remembrance. There is a story of a heathen king who ordered that the garments his wife had worn, should become, when she died, the models for female attire throughout his kingdom. Believe me, there are better heritages than this to leave among a Christian people. A mantle of holy influence, a crown of piety, a circlet of devotion, these are worthier patterns; and it is not always, by any means, that the queens in our communities are the ones to bequeath them.

In the preface to one of our exquisite Sunday-school songs, there is told the story of a lad who worked for the support of his widowed mother, and brought home every night the hard earnings he had gained. One day it was very rainy and dark, and the three mile walk was severe on the tired boy. But when he neared the home he loved, weary under the big bundle he bore, that feeble but faithful parent met him with a kiss and a word of pity, "God bless you, my dear child; it is hard for you; but hereafter I will always set a light in the window for you." Years passed on, and yet that clear gleam from the pane met him every night as he drew nearer. And then he went to sea. No news came or went. And at last he returned, but his mother was dead. "Yet tell him," were her last words, "I am going to heaven, a better home than this; and there, if I can, I will set a light in the window for him."

Oh these lights in the window! Oh for more faith to fill them, more zeal to trim them, more love to set them! I have a pocket-Bible at home, which my mother gave me twenty years ago. On the fly-leaf, with my name, are written these lines:

"Number thy lamps of love, and tell me now
How many canst thou relight at the stars,
And blush not at their burning. Only one."

I know well what that one is; I have seen it many a dark day. It has long ago become to me my "light in the window" overhead.

Christian mothers, remember these little words I have been most humbly trying to say to you. We look over the edge of our pulpits into yours; and we think you have the best ones. And more than all, we know that it is your faithfulness which sends workers into ours.

Your mission is a mighty one. In one of the eastern lands, the nurses are wont to bring forth the new-born infant into the sunlight, that from the earliest hour there may seem to be a flash in his eye. Oh! how much worthier is your office—to hold up your children under the Sun of Righteousness, till thereafter there may be a light in their hearts.

"HIMSELF HE CANNOT SAVE."

BY LUCY LARCOM.

Oh, scoffer! He who from the cross
Looked down thy dark abyss of loss,
And knew his pain alone could win
Such souls as thine from gulfs of sin,—
His death-groan mournful echo gave:
"Myself I cannot save."

Words breathed in scorn, yet understood
By him to bear a sense of good;
The secret of the glorious strife
Between the powers of death and life,— Love's deepest truth, self-sacrifice,
Hid in that mockery lies.

And he must understand it so
Who would relieve a brother's woe;
He cannot shun his own distress,—
He hastes with Christ-like earnestness,
Although the way be through his grave:
Himself he cannot save.

Some happy souls may pass along
The heavenward road with smile and song,
Through guileless infancy and youth,
Linked in with followers of the truth;
And their unconsciousness of ill
But makes them lovelier still.

Their peaceful path is not for all:
Each must obey his separate call;
And he is of himself abhorred
Who flies the summons of the Lord:
Sailing from danger unto ease,
He sinks in unknown seas.

None longs so for yon vales of peace
 As he whom war gives no release.
 But ah ! the captive souls not there !
 He knows no rest they may not share ;
 For them all hardships he must brave :
 Himself he cannot save.

Ay, through all pain and loneliness,
 Where men are perilled, he must press
 To rescue, crying, " Woe is me,
 Resisting not the wrong I see !
 If none uphold me, I must go Single against the foe !"

And not the warrior-heart alone
 The scoffer's word for truth has known.
 The mourner, weeping out the night
 For aliens from the one true Light ;
 The watcher by the bed of pain,
 Who knows her watch in vain ;

He who has felt his heaviest cross
 Far lighter than another's loss ;
 He who can ask and bear the blow
 That shelters any soul from woe,
 Sees why that death on Calvary
 Life's beacon-light must be.

Ring, mournful echo, through the world !
 Float, banner of the cross, unfurled
 To show the servant who would prove
 His Master's joy of suffering love,
 That, while thy folds above him wave,
 Himself he cannot save !

DEAD OR WOUNDED!

THE late Dr. Miller, of Princeton—as all his students will remember—abounded in anecdotes, which he related to his classes from year to year, to illustrate the points made in his lectures. One of them occurs to us just now as specially applicable to the new converts who have recently come into the churches within the bounds of our circulation ?

A celebrated southern judge was in his earlier years sceptical as to the truth of the Bible, and especially as to the reality of experimental religion. He had a favourite servant, who accompanied him in his travels round his circuit. As they passed from court-house to court-house, they frequently conversed on the subject of religion, the servant, Harry, venturing at times to remonstrate with his master against his infidelity. As the judge had confidence in Harry's honesty and sincerity, he asked him a great many questions, as to how he felt, and what he thought on various points. Amongst other things, Harry told his master that he was often very sorely tempted and tried by the devil. The judge asked Harry to explain to him how it happened that the devil attacked him (Harry) who was so pious a man, so sorely, whilst he allowed himself—who was an infidel and a sinner—to pass unnoticed and untempted.

Harry asked, "Are you right sure, master, that he does let you pass without troubling you ?"

"Certainly I am," replied the judge; "I have to dealings with him at all. I do not even so much as know that there is any such being in existence as the devil. If there is any such being, he never troubles me."

"Well," said Harry, "I know that there is a devil, and that he tries me sorely at times."

A day or two afterwards, when the judge had gotten through his docket, he concluded to go on a hunt for wild ducks on one of the streams which lay across his road homeward. Harry accompanied him. As they approached the river, they espied a flock of ducks quietly floating on its surface. The judge stealthily crept up the bank and fired upon them, killing two or three, and wounding as many others. He at once threw down his gun, and made strenuous efforts—with the aid of clubs and stones—to secure the wounded ducks, whilst he permitted the dead ones to float on, for the time unnoticed by him. Harry—as he sat on the seat of the carriage—watched his master's movements with deep interest, and when he returned, said to him:—

"Massa, whilst you was a splashin' in de water after dem wounded ducks, and lettin' de dead ones float on, it jist come into my mind why it is dat de debil troubles me so much whilst he lets you alone. You are like de dead ducks; he's sure he's got you safe. I'm like de wounded ones, tryin' to get away from him, and he's afraid I'll do it, so he makes all de fuss after me, and jist lets you float on down de stream. He knows he can git you any time; but he knows it now or never wid me. If you were to begin to flutter a little and show signs like you were a goin' to git away from him, he would make jist as big a splashin' after you as he does after me."

The illustration struck the learned judge with great force, and led him to re-investigate the grounds of his scepticism; and, through Harry's instrumentality, he was finally brought to sit with him at the feet of Jesus, to learn of him.

The illustration is a homely one, but it sets forth a great truth in the experience of those who set out in the Christian course. They must expect to be assailed by Satan as they never were before. If he fails of success in causing their fall by the use of one form of temptation, he will try another. He has tried so long, and had so much to do with men, that he is now an adept in devising means to ruin them, and make them as miserable and degraded as himself. Young Christians, therefore, should not think it strange concerning the fiery trials which are to try them, though some strange thing had happened to them, when they are assailed in new, and to them, hitherto unknown methods of assault. As long as the devil feels that sinners are safe, and that he is sure to get them at last, he allows them to float on quietly upon an unruffled current; but the moment they attempt to throw off his yoke, and to assert their independence of him, they must expect his wrath to wax exceeding hot, and his assaults to fall thick and fast upon their heads. Let them not be ignorant of his devices. He goes about "as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour."—Presbyterian Herald.

AN EVENING WITH CHRIST.

It was about the time of the Passover. The soft airs of the vernal equinox began to breathe from the plains of Sharon, laden with the aroma of the young vines, and of the opening roses. On the silent city falls the moonlight, making Moriah's templed top to tower like a mountain of silver above the green vale of the Kedron. A few lone women are grinding their evening meal in the doorways here and there; a Pharisee that has lingered long at his vespers (a papist before the Papacy), is hastening homewards; a belated fisherman from the Jordan is driving his beast toward the city gates to get outside them, ere they are bolted for the night. The Roman sentinel on the Temple wall calls the watch-word, All's well. The evening glides on. Through the silent street—gathering his robe up close about him to conceal his face, and keeping out of the moonlight, a ruler of the Jews passes stealthily along. Into a retired court—out of the aristocratic quarter—and hard by where God's poor are crowded close together, the ruler knocks at a lowly door. A plain, serene personage puts forth his hand to take the ruler's jewelled fingers, and a rich turban bows low to the floor in reverence. "Rabbi!" says the Pharisee to the meek Nazarene in his coarse raiment,—“Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him.”

Without waiting for any further preliminaries, without wasting time in idle talk, the omniscient teacher proves his divine wisdom by the solemn declaration, “Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.” Surprise steals over the ruler's face, as he fixes his keen Jewish eyes on the Master. “How can a man be born when he is old? can he enter the second time into his mother's womb and be born?” The poor pitiful idea of a second bodily birth enters into the mind of Nicodemus. He cannot get hold of the spiritual new birth. It is an enigma. Christ patiently explains it to his anxious inquirer. He reveals to the listening ruler that in order to be saved a man must be radically changed; that he must get a new heart, or in other words, a new controlling disposition in his soul. There must be not only a change of conduct, but a change of that which lies behind, and controls all daily conduct. A new heart was the one essential. Not a new organism, not a new mental faculty thrust in; but a new principle laid as a founda- tion in the moral nature of the soul, to produce godly acts and godly exercises. Nicodemus was enjoined to do something more than to reform his life—more than to substitute sweet charities for loud liturgies in the market place—more than to bestow his goods to feed the pauper at his gate. A new habit was to be implanted within him by the Holy Ghost—a habit of loving God and keeping his commandments. This change of the will and the affections the theologian would call REGENERATION. Jesus describes it as being “born of water and of the Spirit.”

Here is another puzzle to the Pharisee. He does not seize the idea of the Spirit's agency. But Christ explains to him that many other powerful agencies are mysterious and invisible. There, for example, is the night-wind. As it sweeps on its viewless path, the old olives on the ridge of Olivet bend to its fury, and the “sound thereof” wakes the startled sleepers in their beds; but no man can tell “whence it cometh, or whither it goeth.” So is it with the hidden power of the Spirit. It is a mighty agency, all unseen, but felt. In this too it is like the wind, that it sweeps away the evil vapours of sin, and purifies the soul. Of such a change—so deep, so thorough, so vital, so beneficent—God is the author. His Spirit works on the awakened and the inquiring heart. The heart thus awakened, however active it may be in uttering its cry of penitence or its call for pardon, however active in renouncing favourite sins, or in mortifying self-righteousness, can never be renewed until God does the blessed work. For lest Judea's ruler should feed his proud heart with the supposition that he could regenerate himself, Jesus cautions him against the fatal mistake by telling him that the new-born are not “born of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.”

Into the ruler's mind the impression must have been carried that in this new birth the sinner is both active and passive too. He is a living, breathing, choosing, free agent. As such he comes to Christ. But he never would have come “unless the Father drew him.” As a free agent he prays the prayer of faith. Yet that faith is the “gift of God.” As a free agent he asks for pardon. It is the province of God only to forgive sin. As a free agent he approaches the cross of Calvary. When there, the Holy Spirit confers the gift of regeneration, and the man is renewed. The heart thus wrought upon by the divine power turns to God. And this self-conscious turning of the renewed heart to the service and the love of Christ is true conversion. The combined operation—by which God makes a man willing to repent and believe, and the man thus made willing does actually turn to him—is what our Saviour taught to Nicodemus as the being “born again.”

The Pharisee listens to it all. We may imagine that the turban was laid aside, and the eager face bent to catch the words of life from the lips of the Nazarene. Evening wears on toward midnight, ere Nicodemus puts on his sandals to depart. He rises to go away, a wiser man. He goes away to remember the solemn and weighty teachings—not to forget. He goes away convinced, but not yet converted. He goes away saved out of Pharisaism, though not yet saved into Christianity. Already is the hand of Christ upon his heart; and when we afterwards see him rising up in the Sanhedrim to demand a fair treatment of the persecuted Saviour, and at last bringing sweet spices to embalm the mangled form just rescued from the cross, we only see the glorious outcome of that evening with Jesus Christ.

Perhaps some reader of this sketch is now sitting where Nicodemus sat that night—on the seat of honest inquiry. He has sat there long already, but delay has not improved his guilty heart. He knows the theory of salvation, but the practical steps he does not get hold of. My friend! you may perish in that very seat. You may sink to the pit from the place of the inquirer, if you make it too the place of the palterer, and the trifler with the Holy Spirit. What you want is—action. You have waited long enough. Go straightway to Christ. Lay hold of the first duty to which conscience calls, and do it. Begin at once to serve God. If your will rebels, pray God to subdue your stubborn will. If Satan hinder, “resist the devil; he will flee from you.” If business beguile you, set your face like a flint to the one great business of securing the salvation of your soul. The very attempt to serve God will bring out the wickedness and the weakness of your heart, as no other process possibly can. But try it. Every attempt will bring you nearer to Christ. Persevere! Like Bunyan’s pilgrim, you will find that the way to heaven “lies through this very valley.” Struggle on! And when you can perform one solitary act, however humble, from no other motive than the glory of God—when you can renounce a single sin from no other motive than honouring the Saviour, then have you experienced the new birth; then will your feet be safely planted in that straight path that leads to life eternal.—Rev. Theodore L. Cuyler.

WALKING IN LIGHT.

WHEN we seek with loving heart,
Each to act a child-like part,
Daily duty, daily care,
For our Lord to do or bear;—

All his pleasure to fulfil,
Do or suffer all his will,— Serve him here with earnest love,
Till we dwell with him above,—

When the ransomed look before,
View by faith the heavenly shore,
Catch the echoes of the song
They shall join in there, ere long,—

Then, of small account appear
All our mortal toils or tears;

Homeward hasting day by day,
What are trials by the way?

He—the great High Priest—draws nigh,
Brings for every want, supply;
Healing oil, and cheering wine—
Living water, bread divine.

Then together all rejoice,
Singing praise with heart and voice,
Finding ere our work be done,
Present heaven on earth begun.

Often by our Saviour blest
With a sweet Sabbath rest,
Every burden we can bear
To his heart, and leave it there.

And arising, onward haste,
When that blessed hour is past
Ready, with uplifted hands,
For the Master’s next commands.

Ready, at his midnight call,
Joyfully to part from all—
Then, with him, the festal door
Enter, to go out no more.

THE DUTY FOR US.

WEARILY the Christian pilgrim surveys the Church about him. As he looks on his own heart, he sees there so much that is sinful, that he wonders how he can himself be saved. As he looks upon others, harder influences come into play. Each heresy—each inconsistency—assumes to him exaggerated proportions. “Lord, can he who holds this or that doctrine—who yields to this or that sin—can he be saved?”

Nor is this inquiry always unamiable. We see an error, and, often from love to our fellow men, we hasten to denounce it as soul-destroying. From the error we come to the errorist. We draw the pall of death over all Rome, until at last it covers Fenelon and Pascal. These sentences we pronounce punitively, until at last it would seem as if it were our duty to utter a gospel, not of salvation, but of condemnation.

That this is right as to doctrine, there can be no doubt. But our Lord has told us when we go to apply these tests to individuals, to apply them first to ourselves. “Enter ye at the strait gate.” Two ways does this come home to us. The first is in applying to ourselves the doctrine—art thou in Christ? for there is no other way by which man can be saved. The second is by applying this test to those to whom we are appointed to speak. It is not—is A. in the way of salvation? or is B. but ART THOU?

THE SAVING WIFE.

BY J. DE LIEFDE, OF AMSTERDAM.

CHAPTER IV.

HOW THE SHOEMAKER'S WIFE SUCCEEDED IN CHANGING HER HUSBAND'S HEART, AND HOW THEREUPON HIS LIBRARY CHANGED ALSO.

THE state of things in Mr. R——'s household now became most alarming. It was next to an open war. He began systematically shunning his wife's presence; would often order his breakfast to be served up in his counting-house, apart from the family; took his dinner at the club, and came home late at night. Matters thus went on for some weeks, during which Mrs. R—— spent many a sleepless night, wetting her pillow with her tears. Her only consolation was prayer and her Bible. Her state of mind, however, was often such as to refuse to be consoled. It was in those days that my predecessor, the Rev. Mr. W——, received and accepted a call to the Hague, as a minister. Of course he did not know Mrs. R——; but she soon heard of him, and became one of his constant hearers. Every Sunday she was sitting under the word of the gospel he was preaching; but he did not know that there was one among his audience who bore such a heavy cross.

One day Mrs. R—— received a lesson from a very strange preacher. It was a poor, wretched Jew, who certainly was not aware that he was imparting a precious treasure to a poor suffering soul. She was returning from a visit to a neighbouring village, when, at half a mile's distance from the city, she saw the poor Israelite driving a young heifer towards the town. He was leading the animal by a rope attached to its horns, but the beast seemed rather indisposed to follow him. Every now and then it would bound backward, and turning round, canter away in the opposite direction. The Jew firmly kept hold of the rope, and allowed himself to be drawn along with the stubborn animal, scampering backward till it kept standing. Then he would tap it on its back, speak a few kind words to it, and prevail upon it gently to turn again and to follow him a few steps. Suddenly again the obstinate beast began roaring and jumping about, and its patient leader again saw himself compelled to follow its irregular caprices. Whatever happened, however, he never allowed the rope to slip out of his hands. He seemed to have made up his mind to keep hold of the animal, even if it would run away with him to the other end of the world. It was a most ridiculous sight, and Mrs. R—— could not help laughing heartily at the queer, out-of-the-way capers which the poor fellow was compelled to cut every now and then. Ten, fifteen times successively he was dragged back and forward, sometimes galloping in full speed, sometimes standing still, while the beast stared at him with such stupid, malicious looks, as only stubborn heifers can cast at wretched cattle-drivers. Still, she observed that after all, what with indulging the animal's caprices, and tapping it on its neck, and pulling it gently along, he got the better of it, and at length succeeded in leading it into the city, where the stupid beast seemed to feel that now it was among fashionable people, and ought to behave politely.

Now, when the ludicrous impression had subsided, Mrs. R——, having returned to her usual mood of earnestness, could not forbear reflecting upon what she had witnessed. "Indeed," she said to herself, "my unbelieving husband is very much like that stubborn heifer. Rightly Asaph asserts that man in his natural ignorance is as a beast before God (Ps. lxxiii. 22); and David compares him to a horse or a mule, which have no understanding, whose mouths must be held in with bit and bridle. As that heifer resisted its leader in going into the town, so my husband stubbornly refuses to enter the city of salvation. But that Jew put me to shame. However preposterous the animal was, he did not lose his patience. He did not pull or jerk it with angry violence, nor throw away the rope in wrathful despair. No; he kept the rope, and yielded to the animal's bad temper, and spoke gently to it, and kept faithfully by it, till he had overcome the evil with good. Ah! and am I not bound to my husband with the strings of love, with the ties of marriage? Alas, how impatiently have I thrown away the rope, and allowed him to stray about, far from me and his children! God has placed me as a helpmeet by his side; and if he has opened my eyes to see the right way, surely it was not that I should leave him to himself, blind and ignorant as he is, to run unguided into the bottomless abyss. Oh, if I had yielded a little more, and patiently borne his follies, and spoken gently to him, how much, perhaps, of the misery that now is turning our house into a hell, might have been prevented!"

Thus Mrs. R—— spoke to herself, and a feeling of deep shame filled her mind. She remembered how she herself had been wildly straying about in her opposition to God, and how her merciful Saviour constantly had kept the leading-strings of love in his hand, gently to draw her into his sheepfold. She returned home deeply distressed, and locked herself up in her closet, to humble herself before her God.

The next day it was advertised that an evangelist was to hold a Scripture-reading meeting in a large school-room in a neighbouring street. He was one of those preachers who, by birth belonging to the lower class, but through faith imparted with higher light, are possessed of the talent of explaining the simple truths of the gospel, in a style perhaps less fit for the pulpit, but all the more adapted to the conception of the common people. The images which he would use to illustrate spiritual things were sometimes a little singular, but seldom failed to bring the truths they exemplified home to the hearts of the hearers. Mrs. R—, of course, was among his audience that evening. He spoke from the miraculous draught of fishes, in Luke v., and having arrived at that significant saying of the Lord to Peter, "Henceforth thou shalt catch men," he drew the attention of his hearers to the requisites of a faithful and able fishing. Among other things he said: "Now mark, my dear friends, that fishing is essentially connected with deception. The fisher's object is nothing short of trying to lay hold of the fish by deceiving it. Take angling, for instance. A skilful angler never holds out the bare hook under the fish's nose, saying, Bite. He knows quite well that the fish would take him for a fool. The animal, if possessed with the gift of speech, which, as you know, fishes are least of all possessed of, would reply, 'No, by no means; the hook is sharp, and would hurt me; and besides, you would pull me up and draw me out of my element into another world in which I am a perfect stranger, and for which I have got no organs to live and to breathe.' Now, what is the angler to do? He wants the fish, and cordially desires to get it out. He takes a piece of bread or a little worm, and puts it round the hook, so as to conceal it entirely, and then gently sinking it into the water, gets the fish thinking that it is a real dainty. Yet the hook is within, mark ye; but the fish does not know it till it has bitten. Up he pulls, and the animal is at once transplanted from one world into another. Now, observe what the angler teaches you. Of course there is a great disparity between his fishing and yours. His object is the destruction of the fish; yours is salvation. He likes the fish from a principle of selfishness; your principle is love. He transplants the fish from life into death; your desire is to transplant the lost sinner from eternal death into eternal life, through the medium of the gospel tackle. But there is, on the other hand, a great similarity between the skilful natural and the able spiritual fisher, as to the way and manner of fishing. There are many truths in the gospel which are hard and sharp, like an angler's hook, to the feeling and understanding of the unconverted. There are other truths, too, which, being of a softer and tenderer kind, are more congenial to the taste and wants of the natural man. They are just like a soft piece of dough, or a supple worm. Now, when dealing with unconverted people, pray the Lord to give you wisdom adroitly to put the truth before them. Observe that there are two chances of losing the fish. You may put the bare hook before him, without any dough or worm. Or you may put a piece of dough and a worm before him, without a hook. In both cases you'll be sure to catch no fish. Some Christians, when dealing with unconverted people, only tell them that they are lost and wicked, and that they go to hell if they don't repent. Now, this is sinking the hook without the dough. Others only speak of the goodness of God and the mercifulness of the Saviour, avoiding any allusion whatever to God's justice and man's condemnable state. This is sinking the dough without the hook. Put both together, and you will do your work well. But then, mark ye, put them so together as to hold the dough foremost, and the hook behind. Lead the unconverted man to a loving, merciful Saviour, and get him to understand from the wounds of the crucified One, and from the blood which flows for the remission of sins, what a wicked, lost, and damnable sinner he must be. Above all, keep in mind that you yourselves—that is to say, your own conduct and behaviour—are the bait which ought to entice the fish to bite. If you constantly meet the unconverted one with a frown, how can you expect him to believe that your Master can smile with the smile of love? If you always look at him as a lost and condemned one, how can you expect him to believe that he is saveable? If you, from a stern sort of home-made sanctity, refuse to eat and to drink in his presence, can you wonder that he thinks your master is John the Baptist and not Christ? Observe that the sharpness of the hook is in the gospel, but that it ought not to be in you. Be kindly affectioned to your fellow-sinner, though not yet your fellow-believer, even though he should commit great follies in your presence. Rebuke his sins; show him that you suffer while witnessing them, but show him at the same time that you hope for him still, because you love him as Christ loved you when you were yet a sinner."

Thus spoke the evangelist in his simplicity, and it was quite sufficient for Mrs. R—. She went home in tears. She now perfectly understood her fault. And she did not close the day without fervently imploring the Lord to make her a bait unto salvation for her unhappy husband.

The next morning after breakfast, while her husband was away to his business, the first piece of work she took up was going into his counting-house and cleaning it from the ceiling down to the floor. His library too got a share of the purifying process. She brushed the books, and put them in tidy order on the shelves. It was almost an Augean stable, for she had not put a hand to it for months. The appearance of the place was quite changed from that of a lumber-room into a comfortable little parlour. Mr. R— came home in the afternoon. He was much astonished. "Who has done this?" asked he.

"I have done it," answered she kindly. "I thought it was time to prevent you from being buried alive in the dust."

For the first time Mrs. R—— observed a smile of contentedness on her husband's face.

The next morning, while Mr. R—— was yet in his bedroom, she sent up her boy to tell him that breakfast was ready, and that mother hoped he would come down to unite them. He came quite surprised. Everything was most comfortably arranged, and with a smile on her face she said, "Come now, sit down and let us have a cheerful hour together."

So she put his arm-chair before him, and he sat down like a happy king on his throne. Silent prayer was offered up as formerly, to which he made no objection. The conversation then went over topics of business, customers, and other indifferent subjects, in which Mrs. R—— took part with as much liveliness as himself. He was so pleased that he kissed her and their daughter before he went to his shop.

The next day he sat in his counting-house playing his flute. She happened to pass by, and kept standing to listen to his performance. He saw her through the window and stopped playing, thinking that she wanted to speak to him.

"Go on," said she with a smile while opening the door. "That's a beautiful tune indeed. I like it very much. Please play it to me again."

She seated herself on a chair, and he, not a little satisfied with this unexpected audience, put his best foot foremost, and blew his highest tune.

"Now," said she, when he had finished his debut and she had applauded accordingly, "now, could you not give us a treat to-night after tea, my dear. Jane will accompany you with the piano. That would be delightful."

He gladly consented, and the first time since long she had the pleasure of having him in their family circle all the evening. By such and sundry means Mrs. R—— at length succeeded in regaining her husband to herself and his family. She was so inventive in making his home comfortable that he far preferred it to the club and the theatre. Only on Sunday evening he continued to frequent the opera. "Let us both worship in our own way," he would say. "You go to your church in the morning, and I to mine in the evening."

"But, my dear," she once said, "do you really mean to say that the theatre is a kind of church?"

"Yes, surely I do," answered he. "There is very little difference between the one and the other. Both in the pulpit and on the stage the persons who speak are actors. Preaching is but playing a comedy in a serious kind of performance. Your parsons ascend their pulpits, and try, by the means of intonation and gesticulation, to make some pleasing or frightening impressions upon the people. As to the matter they treat, I am sure most of them don't believe a bit of it, and those who do believe it are either fools or silly fellows. Their chief object is creating effect through eloquence, in order to draw crowded audiences and to be admired. You only need observe how beautifully they choose their words, and how elegantly they move their eyes and hands. It is all perfectly conformable to art. But art it is and not nature. Now, the same is the case on the stage. Only the matter is different, and, to my taste, more worthy. If stage-playing is to be performed at all, I think it is more seemly to apply it to subjects which everybody knows to be fictitious, than to things which the people suppose to be true and holy. Most people go to church to be edified, and to the theatre to amuse themselves. I do the reverse. I sometimes go to church to amuse myself with the skilful eloquence of the orator, but I go to the theatre to be edified. Great moral truths are taught on the stage which have a bearing on practical life."

Mrs. R—— was silent. She could not help acknowledging that there was some truth in his reasoning. She was fully convinced that the great bulk of the neologian and rationalistic preachers denied the greater portion of that same Bible they were preaching from, and that their paramount care was not about what to say, but how to say it. You know, madam, that now-a-days the pulpit is too much degraded into a platform for exhibiting rhetorical and oratorical talent. It cannot be otherwise where neology takes the place of the gospel. A neologian preacher cannot but preach himself instead of Christ, for the Christ he believes in is too poor to make his mouth run over from the fulness of his heart. Consequently art must be resorted to to make up for what is wanting of truth. Mrs. R—— was fully aware of this sad condition of our pulpit eloquence. She herself refused to hear the great bulk of the ministers for that same reason. She knew, however, that there were a few preachers who formed an exception to that distressing rule, and of these she liked my predecessor, the late Mr. W——, most. He was a man who with all his heart believed the word of God from its first page to its last. Though not an orator in the scientific sense of the word, yet he was a fine speaker. His was the natural eloquence of a warm, loving heart, which sometimes sacrifices a little of the form to get more room for the contents, and exhibits less flowers, because they have ripened into fruits. This made him particularly attractive to the unlearned and simple people who flocked round his pulpit in crowded audiences. But few of the higher and wealthy class were to be found among them. It was not deemed fashionable to be a regular attendant at his services. And this accounted for Mr. R——'s never having heard him, though he sometimes would take a fancy to spending a Sunday morning in walking to the different churches, and stopping a few minutes in each of them.

"You are right," said Mrs. R——; "there is, alas! too much of stage-playing in the pulpit. But there are also some faithful preachers of the truth, about whom I am sure you would not pronounce such a verdict if hearing them. I wish you would go with me some Sunday to hear Mr. W——. I assure you you would at least esteem that good man."

"Mr. W——!" exclaimed the shoemaker. "That Methodist preacher! Never! I would rather go to the market-place to look at the polichinel of the puppet show."

"Dear, dear!" answered Mrs. R—— with a mixed expression of sadness and kindness in her face, "don't speak so. You don't know the man, but if you knew him I'm sure you would love him. But," added she, gently stroking his hair from his forehead, "I hope you will go and hear him some time. Won't you?"

"Well, we'll see," answered he, taking up his flute; and while Mrs. R—— returned to her parlour he said to himself, "At any rate he must be a clever fellow if it is he who has turned you round so admirably well."

You perceive, madam, that now the domestic intercourse in Mr. R——'s house was restored, the conversation between him and his wife sometimes must touch religious topics. She avoided it as much as she could, but often she could not; when, for instance, he would utter dangerous opinions before his children, which she, for conscience' sake, could not allow to pass without protest on her part. These were very painful moments for her, in which she would fervently ejaculate to her Saviour for proper direction. She then contented herself with stating in a meek but earnest way that she could not believe that his views of the matter were correct, since the Bible told the contrary; but that she hoped that papa would some time soon acknowledge his mistake, and come to an agreement with the word of the Lord. He sometimes would allow the discussion to be settled there, but sometimes too he would get animated and attack the Bible in his usual way. She then, however, kept silent, avoiding anything like controversy, but showing by an expression of patient distress how much she suffered in her heart because of the blindness of his. Now, there is something irresistible in the passive resistance of love. Mr. R—— could not long continue his animosity when he observed the dignity of her solemn silence. He could not help feeling that she was nobler than he, and, to extricate himself out of his humiliating position, would quickly retreat by turning the conversation to some topic of less controversial kind.

One day, when being alone with him in his counting-house—(a little unpleasant controversy had taken place that morning at breakfast)—she gently laid her hand on his shoulder while he was smoking a cigar in a dolce far niente, and looking into his eyes with a supplicating smile, she said—

"Pray, my dear, don't you agree with me we had better avoid discussions of that sort in the presence of our children? They are so young. Their tender hearts are so liable to receive wrong impressions when witnessing differences between their parents. There is a serious difference of opinion between you and me, but I hope and trust the Lord will bring us to unity again. I am willing to converse with you about your opinions as often as you desire, but pray let it be in private between ourselves. It is such a painful position for our dear children to stand between their father and mother, not knowing which to choose."

"Well, I think you are right," answered he; "I don't like it either; but we have not always our thoughts and words at our command, and often I am in the midst of the controversy before I am aware of it. Still, I will try to keep aloof from such matters when they are present. But as to the unity you referred to, I am afraid we shall never come to that unless you turn round to my side. But you will not, for you even refuse to listen to my reading the most striking passages from my books to you."

"Well, my dear," answered she, "I will listen to them, but then will you also read my Bible with me?"

"Yes, I will. In fact, I thought the other day I must read it; for I must acknowledge there are some very beautiful, poetical, sublime passages among the quotations you favour us with every now and then."

The first evening Mrs. R—— was sitting down with her husband to listen to his reading a passage from one of the French encyclopædists, she remembered the Jew allowing himself to be drawn backward from the town by the stubborn heifer. "I'll go along with my husband a little now," thought she, "but, Lord, grant that he may come to a stand still, that I may speak gently to him, and lead him on again to thy gates!"

"Now what do you say to that?" asked Mr. R——, when he had finished his reading.

"I must say," answered she, "that it is a clever piece of human dialectic, and written in very beautiful language. I can perceive how you can admire it. But what a pity it is that such excellent talents should be in the service of a spirit which denies the most incontestable truths of history and religion. There are many reasonings in it, though, which surpass my brains. I am but a simple woman, and not learned enough to follow all those subtle deductions. But thus much I understand, that if that writer's theory is true, we are without God and without hope in the world. He leaves us no other prospect but to be resolved in some infinite power, as a drop melts away in the ocean. But such a prospect is most horrible to me. Every member of my body, and every throb of my heart tells me that I am wonderfully framed by a wise and mighty Creator, who must have destined me for something better than to be absorbed by a fog, or to disappear like a vapour. God's word, on the contrary, and my own daily experience of the kindness and tender mercies of his love, tell me that I, his reconciled child in Christ, am on the way towards a new, glorious world, which will appear on that great day of the resurrection, when a loving Father and Saviour will receive me with unspeakable joy. And this joyful hope of mine rests not on human reasonings merely, or subtle deductions, but on facts, which have taken place on this very earth of ours, by the light of that same sun, which is shining upon us now. Now can you expect me to give up all that for the objections of a mortal man, who tries to persuade me that I am born as a living and loving person in order to end as a dead lifeless thing? I am assured, my dear, you yourself will not be able to console your heart with this hopeless doctrine, when lying on your deathbed, and about to part with all you loved and cherished in your life. But let us not enter into controversies about this matter now. The next time we shall have a bit of my Bible,—shan't we? And so after having read your and my books for some time, let us see what the effect will be upon our minds."

In this way Mrs. R—— spoke to her husband, and he willingly agreed to her proposal. She expected everything from her heart's prayers for his conversion and from God's word. "I am sure," she said to herself, that some day soon "that single Book will sweep away his whole shelf."

And that so fervently-longed for day came sooner even than she had expected. Mr. R—— had already for some time been deeply struck by the lovely change in his wife's conduct. He could not help experiencing its beneficial and softening effect upon his own mind. The constant spirit of love, humility, meekness, and dignity she manifested during the day, involuntarily compelled his esteem and admiration. He saw her always happy, quiet, calm, and contented, tracing all the good she did to her Saviour's love, and all that was amiss to her own deficiency. He could not help secretly acknowledging that she was happier than he, and he would sometimes wish that he were like her. He thought there must be something worth inquiring about at least in a doctrine which produced such wonderful results. This all the more led him to agree with her upon reading the Bible. Of course, his objections to many of its stories were numerous, but he found that many of her explanations were more satisfactory than he had expected they would be. At least the more she read to him, the more frequently the thought would rise in his heart, "If all this were true indeed, it would be a very beautiful and satisfactory doctrine." There were many passages, however, which she acknowledged she was not able to explain, though she confessed her strongest conviction that they must be fully explicable. "I wish," she then used to say, "you would hear Mr. W——. He puts it all so clear before us. I am sure, if he were here, he would answer all your questions to your perfect satisfaction. Indeed, I wish you would go and hear him."

Now while Mrs. R—— in this way was preaching to her husband, another preacher turned up, certainly sent by the Lord, in order to bring more forcibly home to his heart what his wife could not carry further than to his ears and understanding. That preacher's name was Death. One day he showed himself to Mr. R—— at a distance, and the poor man shivered under the thrilling sermon he preached to him. A serious attack of low fever carried him to the brink of the grave. As a heroine his faithful wife, with a prayer in her heart, and the medicine in her hand, day and night wrestled for his recovery. The Lord heard her prayers, and blessed the medicine. He was restored to health, but never to his former strength. A weakness of the lungs remained, which kept the solemn sermon he had been hearing from death's pulpit, in remembrance.

Still he again took up his usual infidel opinions, but he took them up now with a restless heart. His wife was exceedingly sad to find that he continued the same as he ever was, but she knew not that inwardly he had already broken with all he had been before. She knew not that every Sunday morning ten minutes after she had left the house to go to Mr. W——'s church, he likewise walked out, and taking the same direction, would put himself among the standing crowd, next to the entrance. Yes, there he stood, attentively listening to the same gospel word which she was enjoying seated on her chair not far from the pulpit. As he was a tall man, he could, peeping over the heads of the crowd, sometimes see her bonnet, but she never saw him, not surmising that he was standing far behind her, uniting with her in prayer and psalm. Being near to the door, he of course always could leave the church before she could come out, and so she always found him at home when she came in. This state of things continued for several weeks. The fish had bitten the hook, but his pride and false shame still kept him refusing to be pulled out. Mrs. R——, however, sometimes seemed to discover a little of it. It was obvious that some unaccountable change had taken place with him. His spirit of controversy seemed to have entirely left him. He sometimes would cast in some feeble doubts or objections, but he would allow them to be removed as quickly as he had introduced them. He also ceased to insist upon her reading his books with him; in fact, it seemed that he did not read them any more himself, for she never found any of them on his table; they seemed immovably to keep their place on the shelf. On the other hand, he gladly continued reading the Bible with her, and he took one for himself into his counting-house, which she often found open on his table. All this struck Mrs. R—— with joyful surprise. She could not make out how it came, but her loving and praying soul exultantly indulged the secret hope that something from the Lord was going on in her husband's heart.

Soon the day came when the riddle was to be solved. It was a cold Sunday morning. Mrs. R—— went to church as usual, and her husband followed her at a distance. She seated herself on her chair, and the pew-keeper, as usual, put a fire-stove under her feet, in which a large glowing peat-coal was contained. No sooner, however, had the minister commenced his sermon than she took ill. It was a bad sulphuric peat-coal she had got, the vapour of which threatened to make her faint away. She felt that she was sick; and to prevent disturbance, she rose quickly, and, pale as a corpse, made her way to the door, staggering through the receding crowd. Picture to yourself her surprise when, on reaching the door, she saw her husband, who, on noticing her, at once took her arm and led her out. The fresh open air immediately caused her blood to flow briskly again, and when entering their house she felt, a little headache excepted, quite recovered,—

“But you at Mr. W——’s!” exclaimed she in a voice of joyful surprise.

“Yes,” answered he with a smile, while a slight blush flushed up his face. “He is an admirable preacher, a worthy man; indeed, one can see that all he says comes from the heart. He himself is as true as the truth he proclaims.”

“But then, my dear, have you heard him before?”

“Surely I have. I have heard him regularly every Sunday for upwards of six months.”

You perceive that Mr. R—— could not keep his secret any longer now. He told his wife all that had been going on within him during the last time. “And now,” he concluded, “I feel as if I must give myself to a living Jesus. I believe he liveth. He is the living Son of the living God. He is the only Saviour of lost sinners, whose sins he has borne, whose penalty he has suffered, and whom he will raise from the dead on his great glorious day. Oh, I am fully assured there is no salvation for me but in him alone. But my poor, disobedient, rebellious heart would ever tell me that I am too great a sinner to be permitted to go to him. You know, and who knows it better than you, my poor beloved wife, who have suffered so much from my wickedness,—you know how shamefully and stubbornly I have dishonoured and reviled Him. Oh, I scarcely have the courage to hope that there is room in his grace, even for such a wicked malefactor as I am.”

Tears came into Mr. R——’s eyes, and covering his face with his hands, he sat down in the full distress of a contrite spirit. His wife was speechless, both from joy and affection.

“Oh, praised be God,” she burst out, “praised be my dear beloved Saviour, who has opened your eyes to see the truth, and your heart to crave his love. Let him come in now, my beloved husband, and open your heart as widely as you can, for he desires to fill it with all the fulness of his grace. Throw away those doubts; you distress him by them. He is your Saviour, and he loved you even at the moment you were his greatest enemy. He knew all about you, and he had mercy upon you. So he has led you by the cords of his unspeakable love; and here you are now at his feet, vanquished by the power of his almighty word. You were strong in your strength, but his love is stronger still. Come, it is all forgotten and forgiven now. Come, he longeth for you. He standeth with outstretched arms to receive you to his bosom.”

In this way Mrs. R—— spoke to her husband, and her words were like the balm of Gilead in a sore wound. What a Sunday it was they now were spending! It was a feast in Mr. R——’s house, and a feast it was in heaven. That same evening a couple, who for a long time had been severed by the devices of the evil one, were found side by side kneeling at the footstool of Him who is the only source of salvation, and of true imperishable love.

Mr. R——’s house henceforth was turned from a wilderness into a paradise. Peace, and joy, and godliness filled it with their sweet fragrance. The next day, after the above mentioned Sunday, Mr. R—— called his wife into his counting-house. The window which showed into a backyard, was raised. The shelf containing his library was lying with one end upon the window-frame, and with the other upon the back of a chair. Outside, on the floor of the yard just under the window, stood a large empty box.

“Come away,” said he, beckoning his wife. “Now, do your work. Take this end of the shelf, and shove that wicked stuff out of the window; and,” added he, kissing her, while a tear mingled with a smile on his face, “don’t be afraid; you’ll not go after them now.”

Mrs. R—— lifted up the shelf, and down rushed the books into the box.

“We’ll get a poor fellow to tear them to pieces,” said he, “and what he can get for the waste-paper let him buy a Bible for it.”

The next day the shelf again was filled with books, but of a very different kind. The first was a Bible, and the last a neatly bound copy of the Pilgrim’s Progress. An additional shelf was put on, filled with parcels of tracts, of which Mr. R—— often slipped a copy into the hand of a customer, who, in the course of conversation, showed no disinclination to read something that might perhaps “do him good.”

And now, madam,—thus finished the Rev. Mr. D—— his conversation with Mrs. P——, I have told you how a pious, godly woman was instrumental in saving her unbelieving husband. I shall be happy if this story has imparted to you some instruction and consolation. Nobody can tell what true love is able to effect, if combined with a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price. There is great power often in speaking when everybody is silent. But there is often greater power still in being silent when everybody would have spoken. The great secret how to bring sinners to Christ, lies not always in speaking of the Saviour, but in manifesting in our own persons what it is to be saved by him indeed.

CHILDREN'S TREASURY.

WAITING FOR JESUS.

FROM heavy sleep little Paul Clifford suddenly awoke, and staring with great wondering eyes upon unfamiliar walls, started impetuously up in bed, but sank back with a quick, sharp cry of pain. A gentle face bent over him.

"What is it, dear?"

"Where am I?" said Paul, faintly, "and what is the matter?"

"Ah, you can't remember, poor little child! You have had a terrible fall, and it hurt you very much, but we hope to make you all well in a little while. Don't think any more about it now, but try to go to sleep again."

Paul shuddered. "Oh, I remember now—those cruel, crud doctors—how they screwed my leg, and put fire on my back. Father wouldn't have let them do it if he had been here," and the child's breast heaved painfully.

"They tried to be kind," said the nurse, with a tear in her eye, "but I know it was very hard to bear. But now see, darling, the worst is over; they have set your leg, and tried to do something for your poor little back, and now you have only to lie very still, and get well as fast as you can. Come," said she, as his face grew calmer, "we will have a very nice time together. Shall I read till you go to sleep?"

"I can't sleep any more now, please," said little Paul, wearily.

"Then I will shake up your pillows so you can look around and see all the pleasant little children."

Very tenderly she raised his head, but not so carefully but that he felt that strange sensation of fire on his back, and groaned, although he bit his proud, young lips, and tried to smile his thanks to the sweet-faced lady. Very languidly at first did he raise his heavy lids; but he soon became more interested, for this is what he saw: A long, cheerful room, lined on two sides with little cots with snowy coverlids, and soft white pillows, and in a pretty sacque of pink or blue, like a bird in each fair little nest, was sitting or lying a patient little child. They were all so very young. One was not more than two years old, and the greatest veteran in the company had not counted more than eight or nine birthdays. But every one already knew what it was to suffer pain, and around some of the small mouths there were sweet, patient lines, very touching to see in such baby faces.

Paul looked earnestly from one to the other. He noticed the little girl opposite, singing softly and contentedly to her wooden doll, pressed close to her white, thin cheek—he saw the clear-eyed little boy next to her, peering eagerly into the mechanism of a toy steam-engine, entirely unmindful of the helpless arm tied up in a sling,—and another child, a little further on, turning over a picture book, and almost forgetting his poor paralyzed feet, upon which he would never walk again.

"Yes," sighed Paul to himself, "they seem happy enough, but they must have been here a great while, and forgotten how splendid everything is out in the sunshine, but I,—only yesterday I could run faster than any boy on the street, and now—" the tears gathered in his eyes.

"I am very sorry for you, little boy," said a sweet voice, and turning, he found it came from his next neighbour, whose cot was only a few feet from his own.

The speaker was a little girl, with very fair hair, and a skin so transparent that he could trace the delicate blue veins on her temples, and as he looked at her innocent face he wondered to find himself thinking of the fair white lilies he had once seen when he peered through the fence of some rare city garden.

Paul felt himself greatly comforted, he scarcely knew why, by the look and words of sympathy, and a quick, impulsive friendship sprang up between the little fellow-sufferers. It was not long before Paul was telling her all his story—how "mother died, and father and he went to live with Aunt Margaret, who was poor, and had ever so many children, and was sometimes very cross. Then father, dear father went off to the wars, and told him that as soon as he was old enough he should be a soldier too. Ever since father sailed he had been longing for him, and whenever any of the soldiers went away he always wanted to see them, because they were going where father was, and so one day when he climbed a tree, to see a procession go past, poor Ben Butler, who was half foolish, would creep on to the same limb. It began to crack, and he thought poor Benny wouldn't know enough to save himself, so he tried to jump to another branch, but missed, and fell down,—down, on the hard pavement, and didn't know any more till the doctors—" his voice quivered.

"Never mind," said Susy, "don't tell any more," and they mingled their tears.

Then Susy, in her turn, told him "she had already been there two years, and never expected to be well, but knew that she should live in that little cot till she died."

"But you don't seem to care at all," said Paul, looking wonderingly at her smiling face.

"No," said Susy, "I am very happy. Very few sick children have such nice clean beds, and such pleasant nurses to take care of them. Do you know this is S—hospital, and the nurses are ladies—some of them very rich—who come here just because they love God, and want to do something to please him."

"And do they stay here all their lives to take care of sick children?"

"That's just as they please," said Susy. "Some of them stay a few months, and some of them a good many years, and besides taking care of us they have a great many sick men and women in the other rooms."

"I should think God would love them very much," said Paul, looking affectionately after the nurse flitting noiselessly, in her soft, dark dress, from one little cot to another. "But, Susy," he began, after a long pause, "I suppose girls can keep still easier than boys, but I'm sure I could never smile again if I thought I must stay here all my life. O Susy, have you forgotten how splendid it is to run and jump? It would just break my heart if I didn't think I should get well very soon, and go to be a soldier with father. How can you smile so, Susy?"

"I'm waiting for Jesus," said Susy, softly.

"What can you mean?"

"Why," said Susy, "the nurse reads to us every day from the Bible, and once she told us about Jesus passing amidst all the sick people, and making them well, and I said, 'O nurse, if he only would pass by here, and touch every little cot,' and then she told me that Jesus would come to every little child that asked for him, and if it was best he would make us well, and leave us on earth, or perhaps, if he loved us very much, he would take us with him to heaven. So," said Susy, with a strange, sweet smile, "I'm waiting for him every day."

"And you really think he'll come?"

"I know it," said Susy, simply.

Paul looked doubtful, and sinking back upon his pillow wearily closed his great sad eyes.

The days passed on, and little Paul grew no better, although he had learned from Susy to be very patient for Christ's sake. One bright May morning he woke hearing the doctors talking around his bed. They had decided that perhaps one more operation might save his life. "Will you bear it like a hero, my dear little fellow?" said one kindly.

"I'll try, sir," said Paul, steadily, "for you know I'm to be a soldier one of these days."

"To be sure," said the doctor, kindly. "To-morrow, then, and they passed on.

Susy, with her violet eyes full of tears, said again and again: "Dear Paul, poor dear Paul," but he wanted to be brave, and was afraid he should cry if he looked at her. So he lay very still, with closed eyes, while the sweet Sabbath music stole in from the chapel, where some of the poor sick men and women were worshipping God. With all his bravery he could not help shuddering to think of the cruel suffering on the morrow, and thinking how sweet it would be for Jesus to come, as Susy had said. With a piteous little prayer trembling on his lips, he fell into a half slumber, and dreamed that he did indeed see the beautiful Saviour coming down between the long lines of little cots, straight towards his own bed. Paul hid his face from the brightness, but he knew when Jesus touched him, for the pain slipped away softly, and with a glad cry he opened his eyes. Alas! the old pain came leaping back—ran over his poor back, and shivered down his tired little limbs. With a heavy sigh he looked around the room. It was flooded with glad sunshine, and one bright beam rested on the sweet picture of Jesus blessing little children, and saying, "Suffer them to come unto me." Paul grew calmer while he looked at it. He wanted to tell Susy that he was almost sure Jesus would come some time, but he was so very tired, his eyes again closed wearily, nor did they open till in the twilight he heard the children singing,—

"I know I'm weak and sinful,
But Jesus can forgive."

"Oh, yes," said Paul, starting anxiously, as he caught the name. "I almost forgot, Jesus is coming," and he tried to bolster up his little thin hand so it would stay up in the air.

"What are you doing?" said Susy.

"You see," said Paul, in a drowsy, wandering voice. "I'm afraid Jesus might pass by in the night, when I was asleep, and I want to keep my hand up so he can find me, and know I'm the boy who has been waiting —" his voice died away.

"Dear Paul, he is gone to sleep," said Susy.

Paul slept late the next morning. "I cannot bear to wake him," said one kind nurse to another. "Poor little fellow! he must suffer so much to-day, and it will break his heart when he finds he can never be a soldier, for they say he will always be lame." But Susy, looking eagerly to the bed, and seeing the little hand lying quietly by his side, said, with a glad hopeful smile,

"I shouldn't wonder if Jesus put it there."

And Susy was right, for Jesus had indeed passed by, and finding little Paul waiting for him, and loving him very much, had lifted the tired lamb to his bosom.

CHILDREN'S WORK.

BY THE REV. JAMES BOLTON, KILBURN.

"And said unto him, Hearst thou what these say? And Jesus saith unto them, Yea; have ye never read, Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise?"—MATT. XXI. 16

In this chapter we have children doing honour to Jesus, and Jesus doing honour to children. The example of these children is a bright one for all children to follow. And the words of Jesus are a great encouragement to them to try and follow it.

Let us ponder the story.

The Lord was entering Jerusalem for the last time; for now the day of his sorrow and suffering for us was at hand. "A little while" now, and he would be hanging on the cross, bleeding, dying, crying out for the anguish of our sins. He knew it, and spoke about it to his disciples. Perhaps, if he might have chosen, he would have gone into the city in the quietest way possible, for when we have a burthen on our spirits, we don't care to be stared at and surrounded with throngs. But there was a prophecy in Zechariah (ix. 9), which declared that he would come unto her as a "king," so he must put his own feelings aside. In the same prophecy it was said that he should be seen sitting on an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass. This, too, must be fulfilled; so when he was at the Mount of Olives, he sent two of his disciples to a certain village, where they should find "an ass tied, and a colt with her." They were to loose them, and bring them. He could see them standing there, though miles of distance or a solid hill was between him and them;—just as, no matter how far off heaven is from earth, and no matter within what thick walls we hide ourselves, his eye is on us every moment.

If the owner of the animals made any objection to their removing them, they were simply to say, "The Lord hath need of them," and they would at once surrender them. Mark that! "The Lord hath need of them." What! need of an ass and its colt? need of two dumb creatures? Yes, it was even so. They could do something for him, and something which nothing else could do. And so with children like yourselves, the Lord has need of you. You can do something for him which grown-up people cannot,—“out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise.”

The disciples returned with the ass and her colt; then they laid their clothes on the colt's back for a saddle, and mounted Jesus on him; and though he had never before had a man across him, and would naturally have been restless or obstinate, yet he appears to have been as gentle and docile as if he had been broken in for years. Did he then know that he was carrying his Creator?

And now a vast multitude of those who had heard his matchless teaching, and witnessed his miracles, assembled to escort Jesus to the capital. They hardly knew why, but they felt as if they must give him this public welcome; so they spread their garments for the colt to tread upon—as I recollect we spread our gowns for the queen to tread upon from her carriage to the Senate House, when we were under-graduates in Cambridge. Others plucked branches off the green trees, and strewed them on the dusty road. And whether they marched in front, or behind, or close around him, they all rent the air with the shout, "Hosanna to the Son of David! Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, Hosanna in the highest."

Who ever saw a crowd in London or elsewhere, and there were no children in it? And there were children in this crowd—children are excellent judges of kind hearts. Quicker than their elders, they can glance into a face and discover whether it is the window of a kind heart. And could they glance into Jesus' face, and fail to trace there tenderness, and whatever children delight in? And when they did this, they also joined in the ringing acclamations. Though they were "babes and sucklings," they could add their mite of praise to the general anthem; and it was sweeter in Jesus' ears for those children's notes in it.

As your favourite hymn says,—

"When his salvation bringing,
To Zion Jesus came,
The children all stood singing
Hosannas to his name.
Nor did their zeal offend him,
But as he rode along,
He bade them still attend him,
And smiled to hear their song."

Nor was this all. It seems that when Jesus had passed into the Temple, and was healing the blind and the lame there, these dear children could not be silent there. If their parents were, they could not be; if their ministers were, they could not be; they had not learned their "Hosannah" to forget it so soon. As they beheld him doing "these wonderful things there," they filled the Temple with a sound which its old roofs had never echoed before. Again and again, and yet again, they sang "Hosannah to the Son of David!"

Now, what should the chief priests and scribes have done? Ought they not to have applauded these children, and said, "Tune your tongues to your loudest, warmest halleluiahs! He is worthy of them, and we will unite with you." But when persons are failing to do what is right themselves, especially if they are envious, they cannot bear to have others doing better,—it is a reproof to them—it worries them; and so we are not surprised to read that these precious chief priests and scribes approached Jesus with the demand that he should rebuke the children band. "It was so improper, so out of place, so disturbing, so uncalled for. They were sore displeased, and said unto him, Hearst thou what these say?" And how did Jesus answer them? He opened the Bible; he instantly fetched an arrow from that divine quiver; he unsheathed the glittering sword with which he had fought Satan in the wilderness. "Yea, have ye never read" (ye whose professed business it is to study the Scriptures), "have ye never read, 'out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise.'" He shut their mouths. He stilled the enemy and the avenger with that short text.

But what does it mean? what was there in it which applied to these children's conduct? This is the point. If we look at the psalm itself, where Jesus had "read" it, we find that the text is a part of a magnificent description of God's glory. The earth is eloquent of it; and "thou hast set it above the heavens." And this is a ray of it, that "he ordains strength out of the mouth of babes and sucklings," "to still the enemy and the avenger."

Now, to "ordain strength" out of the mouth of babes and sucklings, is to order that what is feeble shall do God good service, shall perfect his praise. As St. Paul has it, "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are: that no flesh should boast in his presence." Is it not so? Does he not employ drops of rain to do what Niagara could not do; the warblings of robins and nightingales to do what claps of thunder cannot do; the pebbles on the shore to do what a rampart of granite cannot do? Does he not use the bee to do what no chemist could do; the coral insect to do what no architect could do; the worms to do what no gardener could do? Could Jacob have done in Egypt what his boy Joseph did; or Saul have done what the stripling David did? In each of these cases God "ordains strength" out of the mouth of babes and sucklings. Or if you dwell on that second form of it, as our Lord quoted it, "Thou hast perfected praise out of the mouth of babes and sucklings." Then you would observe how frequently small things are those which perfect anything. For instance, it is the bloom on the plum which perfects it; the scent in a flower; the cut of the nostril, or the dimples in a countenance; the short strings in a harp; the delicate finishing touches in a picture. What perfects a fireside circle but the children links; what perfects a cathedral choir but the children's notes; and what perfects God's praise but the praises of babes and sucklings?

But surely this is a most comforting and cheering truth for children. They are apt to fancy that they can do nothing for God; that they must leave it to the "chief priests and scribes," or till they are of age; and it was the fashion for "their tutors and governors" to foster this idea in them. But what says God; "your praises perfect my praise." Without them, it would lack something which completes its harmony, and power, and acceptableness. When I listen to it, I listen to the children's share in it; when I smell it, I smell the children's breath in it; when I gaze upon it, I gaze upon the children's buds in it.

So that settles it. God sanctions your youthful efforts, and rejoices in them, and requires them. This was what Jesus meant. "These children's praises are not to be rebuked; on the contrary, God predicted them, authorizes them, expects them, and so do I."

And if this is so, my young friends, then it is evident that you have a work to do for God and Jesus. That they bid you set about it will justify you in it, and receive it at your hands, as your mother or father would a nosegay which you had gathered in the fields for them, or a present on their birthdays, which you had bought them with your own earnings. This work of yours, however you may undervalue it, will contribute to perfect God's praise.

First, you have such a work within yourselves. Your own soul is an Eden which you are to dress and to keep for God, and the serpent is creeping about in it. What watchfulness and industry you need to exercise!—for, unlike Eden, there are more weeds, and thorns, and briars in it, than lilies, and roses, and honeysuckles; tares spring of themselves in it. Wheat has to be sown and watered. The fences have to be repaired; the gates have to be guarded. No cherubim will do that for you.

And yet, it may be, that you are idle in this work! You are imagining that we have to do it for you. God indeed, will help you, but you must perfect his help by helping yourself. You must embrace Jesus; pray for the Holy Ghost; obey God's commandments; refuse to yield to temptation; "work out your own salvation with fear and trembling."

Secondly, you have a work for God and Jesus in your own families.

There is she who bore you, and nursed you, and hovered over your cradle with such love; there is he who is toiling daily for your support;—these are to be loved, and venerated, and waited on. There are your brothers and sisters to be amused, and helped, and enlivened; there are the servants to be cared for; there are visitors to be entertained. A Christian child may be an angel in a family, or a tree like that spoken of in the Book of Revelation, "which produces twelve manner of fruits"—something to suit everybody.

Then, thirdly, you have a work for God and Jesus in your school. When will children remember that they have more to do at school than increase their own stock of English and French, of geography and arithmetic. These are but the ears which they glean for themselves. Their business is to assist the reapers in tying the sheaves, and to allure their companions to glean too. The master or mistress have half their load lifted if their pupils are considerate; and the wildest elephant is pretty sure to be tamed when two steady elephants take him between them.

Then, fourthly, you have a work for God and Jesus in your neighbourhood.

I have a vine which was planted against an ornamental arch, to run up it, and cover it, and hang its clusters here and there, and then it had accomplished its purpose; but it was not content with this. Having done it, and having vigour to spare, it has thrown out two branches of thirty feet in length, so as to reach into the adjacent yards, and now they are trained there, and afford a plentiful supply of autumn grapes to my neighbours. I don't grudge them this bountifulness of my vine; I admire it; I feed it with a double stock of manure on purpose that it may be able to furnish these, its outlying clusters, with golden juice.

And, my dear young friends, does not God intend that we shall be blessings to our neighbours; to the poor in the winter pinches; to the grey-headed cottager, when he or she cannot hobble to church any more; to the bedridden girl, whose cheek flushes at the sight of a plate of strawberries, or a bunch of spring violets, to the delicate infant who crows at a change of arms, or a penny toy—to every one to whom we can speak a word of Jesus. “I was naked, and ye clothed me,”—when, Lord!—“Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.”

Finally, you have a work for God and Jesus amongst the heathen.

They do not worship God; they do not know Jesus; they bow down to blocks of wood and stone; they are cruel, vicious, miserable. Oh, the dreadful scenes which the veil of space conceals from us! We have occasional peeps at them through the missionaries in Africa, India, China, and they stir our pity to its depths. Now, nothing will benefit them but the gospel—“the lamp of life,” which is lightening us.

And our societies are labouring to supply them with that lamp. But they must have money to support the missionaries who carry it to the heathen. And children's contributions may go to perfect the contributions of our congregations. God won't refuse them any more than he would not refuse these children's hosannahs. “Suffer them to cast their pence into my treasury,” he will say, “and forbid them not.”

Our annual children's contributions, when combined together, pay the salaries of a dozen missionaries, and educate nearly a hundred Negro and Hindu boys and girls. They have been instrumental in perfecting God's praise in many a savage village; God has ordained strength out of them.

“By many an ancient river,
By many a palmy plain.”

And the freed captives, now walking and leaping, and magnifying God, are a proof of it. And will not you associate yourself with such a noble enterprise as this? If you will, then provide yourself with a missionary magazine and a missionary box; the magazine to cause the missionary fountain to rise in you, and the box to catch its shining showers as they fall. None of you, who would do what you can to hasten Christ's kingdom, should be without those.

And now, I beseech you, be stronger than you have been in all your work. Realize that you have God's express commission to be about it; that it is not a trifle with him whether you, a child, are about it or not. He has consigned the perfecting of his praise to the mouth of babes and sucklings. And another life lesson for you is, that children have a work for God which only children can do.

A CHILD'S FAITH.

“I'll come! I'll come!” A little girl of eight years was speaking,—not to us, but to some one we could not see.

We were sitting by her bedside, gazing upon a scene which only parents can appreciate. We knew, though we could not see him, that an angel was there, waiting till the silver cord should be loosed, which bound the precious treasure to our hearts and our home on earth.

Perhaps he had whispered to her that he was commissioned to take her back to Him who had lent her to us, and this might have been her reply.

“Where will you come?” asked her mother.

She opened her eyes, gazed around, but made no answer.

“Will you come to Jesus?”

“Where is he?”

“In heaven.”

“Oh, yes, I've prayed to him;” and so she had.

A few minutes before, she had crossed her little hands on her breast, and looking up to heaven, her countenance radiant with the light which seemed to be streaming on it from thence, she said, “O Lord Jesus Christ, make me like thee, and take me to dwell with thee when I die.”

With the same confiding love with which she had often made requests to her father, which she knew he would delight to grant, she gave this holy desire wings, and sent it up to her Father in heaven, and quietly her soul rested in the belief that this great matter was all settled. And this was true. Before she lay on that bed of sickness, she had mourned over her sins, and sought forgiveness through Christ, and now, with faith and confidence, she had committed her soul to him and she knew he would keep it.

She turned gently on her side, placed one little hand under her head, clasped a little handkerchief with the other, and laid it on her breast, gazed for an instant fondly on those she had so dearly loved on earth, whispered their names,—then closed her eyes, and the angel took her in his bosom; and as he bore away from us one of the fairest flowers of earth, we could almost hear her sweet voice singing, as she vanished from our sight, the song which had been on her lips for months,—

“Do not detain me, for I am going
To where the streamlets are ever flowing!
I'm a pilgrim, and I'm a stranger,
I can tarry, I can tarry but a night.”

SKIPPING AND SKIMMING.

Two bad habits increasing among the young folks,—some of them, at least. “Why, is it bad to skip or to skim?” you ask, perhaps. That depends upon how and what you skip and skim.

I find there is a great deal of skipping and skimming in the way the children read their books in these days, and that is bad. It is a loose, careless, hasty way of reading, which snatches up only the story, and hardly that, leaving out all the instruction, thought, purpose of the book, and making pretty much all of it a confused jumble.

“We have so many books.” Yes, some of you have, and it is almost a pity, I sometimes think, for you do not value them as the few I used to have in my childhood. These few were not only read with great attention the first time, but they were read and re-read, put away, brought back and read again, and the consequence was, they made an impression. I feel their power to this day. The true way to read is first to select, or to have selected for you, a book that is worth reading; then read it carefully, thoughtfully, attentively. Read it to remember it, and read it accurately.

Let me tell you about a little boy. His auntie gave him some cards with the kings and queens of England pictured on them. Then, as he was inquisitive to know who they all were, she used to tell him the history of their different reigns, and the good and the bad things they did. Her stories interested the little boy, and he listened very attentively. As he was playing with his cards one day, his papa took one up and asked him whose face that was on the card. The little boy told him, and moreover gave a good account of that king's reign. His papa was much surprised, and asked him about another; and so he went on, and gave a correct little story of them all. Papa was very much pleased, and the next day gave his little son three large volumes of English history. The child could not read yet,—he was only three years old; but he was so attentive.

When he was eight years old, this same little boy read a book, which, forty years after, he quoted accurately from by memory, when writing a lecture to be delivered before a body of learned men; nor had he ever seen the book since. How carefully he must have read it! How clear it must have been in his mind! No skipping or skimming there, I reckon; no confused jumble. That little boy became a distinguished teacher, the famous Dr. Arnold of Rugby school. This is the kind of reading and hearing which makes good memories and stores up useful information.

THE OLD MILLER'S LESSON.

It was noon recess at the little "Brookside school," and the boys had taken their dinner-baskets down to "the old mill," according to custom. It was the pleasantest spot they could find those hot summer noons. The cool splash of the water was refreshing to hear as it flowed over the milldam stones, while a little down the stream was a broad gray rock, overhung by the bank, and shaded by trees, which was their favourite resort, as it was always a comfortable spot, even on August days. The old miller stopped the rumble of his huge wheels at the noon-time hour, and was always ready to take his lunch when the boys came down. He loved their bright, young faces, and they in turn revered his grey hairs. He settled all their little disputes, helped them in their little troubles, and many were the words of earthly and heavenly wisdom they learned from his lips.

"Uncle Roger," said Benny that summer day, "how I wish I could find a mine of gold about this old creek. I read, the other day, of a mine somebody found, by pulling up a little bush he caught hold of to help him up a bank. There was the shining yellow ore sticking to the bottom, among the dirt and pebbles."

"That shrub had a rich soil to grow from, hadn't it, Benny?"

"I should think it had," said Mark; "I would like to find a shrub growing in such soil."

"And yet, I'll warrant," said Uncle Roger, it was a poor dwarfed shrub, for gold isn't the right soil for trees to grow in, any more than for boys. Did you ever know, lads, that it is the poor, hard-working boys of our country, that make the most of our great men! They haven't money to waste in dissipation, and they are obliged to exercise most of the day in the pure, fresh air. So they grow up strong in body and in mind. In our favoured country any one can get an education who has a mind to, and the harder he works for it, the more good it will do him. Mind-power is better than money-power, any day, boys. Don't fret because you can't fill your pockets with yellow earth, when you have such a good chance to fill your heads with true gold.

"There is another kind of riches, more important still, which we can all have, if we will only choose it. It is the love of God and the forgiveness of all our sins, which Jesus Christ died to procure for us. Without this, we shall be very poor in this life, even with millions of money, and in the next life, most wretched beggars. You know the rich man the Bible tells us of, begged even for a drop of water to cool his tongue, and could not get it.

"Now, boys, say over this little text, each one, and then run along to school, for the master's first bell has rung.

"How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven."—Child at Home.

AUNT KATIE'S BREAKFAST PARTY.

The wind was blowing furiously, one stormy April morning, and the snow flying in all directions, playing "hide and go seek" about the corners of the fences and between the great drifts; the last time you would think of expecting company, to be sure, and yet,—such a merry breakfast party as Aunt Katie had! How did it happen, and who, do you think, came first?

Little Mr. Sparrow (not the sparrow who killed dear Cock Robin), with his mate! They had come to their summer home, expecting pleasant weather, and being caught in the severe storm, were right glad to accept the unexpected invitation to breakfast. Then came aunts and cousins and other friends; the chick-a-dee, and a few robins, until there were thirty-seven in all!

Such a twittering as they made to each other as they ate, talking over family affairs, I suppose, and telling each other how nice their breakfast tasted, but I did not hear one cross word, nor one unkind remark of any absent one! And then they sang so sweetly, although the wind ruffled their feathers and sometimes blew them over in the snow; and their little feet were so cold, with no shoes or stockings. Not one word of complaining, though they had to stand much of the time on one foot, while the other was snuggled up under their warm feathers; but just as happy they seemed, and just as thankful, as if the June sun was shining, and the June roses and dandelions blooming about them.

A beautiful sight it was to see them on the feathery snow; a cheery sound were the sweet notes of that bird concert, and a pleasant lesson did Aunt Katie learn, which she hopes never to forget;—to be grateful for the common blessings, for even crumbs of comfort which fall to us in life, and to be cheerful when things seem dark and unpleasant. Will not my little friends try to remember the lesson too?—Ibid.

THE SQUIRREL'S LETTER.

"Oh, dear! I am so tired of this study, study, study, all the time," said a little boy as he leaned lazily on a desk by the window, and looked out on the ground covered with snow; "if I only had not this lesson to learn now, I might be out with my sled, having such fun; but papa will expect me to say it to him when he comes home, and so I must study. I wonder what's the use of learning, any way," and then he drummed on his chair with his feet, and played with the leaves of his book, and looked listlessly around the room, while all the time the clock on the mantel-piece was ticking, ticking away the seconds, and the hands were moving around towards the hour when his father would be at home to hear his lesson.

Caspar, for that was the little boy's name, did not go to school, and so he had more time to play than most little boys, but still he thought it very hard that every morning, when nine o'clock came, he was obliged to leave his play, and go to his father's study to learn his lessons. He had a nice little desk there, placed by the window, so that he had plenty of light, and there was a bright fire always burning in the room, which shone on the book-cases filled with books, and made everything look very cheerful indeed. But yet Caspar would not be happy—he wanted to play all the time.

His father was generally in the room with him, engaged in preparing his sermon for the week, for he was a clergyman, but this morning he had been called away to visit a sick parishioner, and so Caspar had felt at liberty to fret aloud as much as he pleased, for he thought no one would hear him. He was mistaken, however, for his cousin Sarah, who was spending a few weeks with his mother, was reading by the other window, hid from him by the curtain, and heard all he said. She was sorry to hear Caspar talk so about his lessons, but she thought it would do no good to reason with him then about it, for he would only talk to her, and perhaps lose more time from his studies than if she said nothing.

Presently a little squirrel ran along the garden fence, and stopped quite near the window.

"There," exclaimed Caspar, "that little squirrel is not tormented with any lessons, and he is as happy as he can be. Oh dear! I wish I was a squirrel; no, I don't wish that either, but I wish I could play as much as a squirrel can."

Caspar might have gone on with a great many more such silly speeches, but just then he heard the front gate open, and saw his father walking up the path. He caught up his book in great haste, and began to study in good earnest, but he could not recall the time he had wasted. When his father came in, he was not ready to say his lessons, and the consequence was that he had to stay in all the afternoon to learn them, so he had no time to play that day.

The next morning when he took his seat at his desk, he saw laid on his books a neatly folded piece of paper directed to him. He opened it, and read as follows:—

"MY DEAR FRIEND,—

"You will be surprised, I know, to find that this is written by the little squirrel whom you saw on the fence yesterday, and if it is not written as well as you can write, I hope you will excuse it, for you know squirrels are not very well used to handling a pen, and it has taken me a long time to write this. I heard your complaints yesterday, as you sat at your desk in the morning, and again when it was almost dark I went by the window, and saw you still sitting there, and I knew that you had gained nothing by idleness, as indeed who ever did, and I thought perhaps you would learn a lesson from the story of my misfortunes, which have all been caused by idleness. This is the first winter of my life, and oh, it might have been such a comfortable one, if I had only taken my mother's advice, and prepared for it! But now, instead of being able to stay quietly in my nest, where it is warm and comfortable, I have to go out every day in the cold to seek for something to eat. Last summer the trees were loaded with nuts, and my mother and a great many other wise squirrels said very often, that they were so glad, for there would be so many for them to store away for the winter. And when the frost came and the nuts were ripe and began to fall, how industriously they all worked to fill their holes in the trees where they lived. My mother chose a nice place for me to live, close by her in the old chestnut tree in the grove near your house. And she taught me how to carry the nuts in my teeth to store away, for she told me that soon the snow would come and cover up all the nuts which were lying on the ground, and I could get nothing to eat if I did not fill my nest with nuts then. I did carry a few nuts as she advised me to do, but I found it very hard work, and I soon got tired. I thought it would be a long time before the snow would come, so every day, after I had eaten all that I wanted, I used to play, jumping from branch to branch of the trees in the grove, and running along the fences and through the holes in the stone wall.

Those were very merry days, and I was happy then, though I am so miserable now. But I should be happy now, if I had not been so idle. My brothers followed my mother's advice, and worked hard every day to lay in their winter's store, but I only laughed at them, and never gathered a single nut more than I wanted to eat.

"One day you came to the grove with a little girl, and you had a long pole with which you knocked down the nuts. Oh, how they rattled on the ground, and you both seemed very happy, for I heard you laughing as you filled your baskets with the nuts which you had knocked to the ground. My brothers were afraid that you would take all that were on the tree, and then we would have none. But my mother told them not to fear, for you would not find nearly all that you knocked from the tree, and then we could get all you left, and it would be much easier than picking them from the tree. And sure enough, after you had gone, there were nuts enough left on the ground to fill our nests. My mother and brothers went to work to gather them, but I said, 'What's the use of putting them in my nest; I can always find them here.' 'Not when the snow comes,' said my mother. But I did not believe anything about the snow, so I let the nuts remain under the tree, and every day I ate as many of them as I wanted. A few mornings after your visit to the woods, there was a slight snow-storm, but the snow soon melted, and I was able to get my nuts. So then I thought I knew more than my mother, and I said: 'There, you see I can still get all I want.' But now the snow has come, and it is very deep, so that I cannot dig through it to the ground, it almost freezes my feet to try, and I have nothing to eat. Oh, if I had only worked at the right time! My mother and brothers are now curled up in their nests, fast asleep, and I might be too, only I am too hungry to sleep. I cannot find a nut, and what shall I do? I thought that you might be just as sorry by-and-by as I am, if you should play all the time, so I have written my story for you. One day last summer, when the window was open, I heard your father say something to you about laying up a store of knowledge, and I thought that might be like laying up a store of nuts, and if it is, you had better be about it now, for may be the time will come when you will want it quite as badly as I do my nuts. But I am very tired and cold, and so I must stop. If you want to do me a kindness, put something on the fence for me to eat, for I am your starved friend,

"THE SQUIRREL."

Caspar was very much amused at this letter, and he could not imagine where it came from. "Papa," he exclaimed, as his father entered the room, "see what a funny letter I have got; from a squirrel too; who can have written it?"

"Why, don't it say," said his father, as he glanced over the letter, "from your starved friend, the squirrel?"

"Oh, yes! but papa, you know squirrels cannot write; it is not your hand-writing, or I should think you had written it; besides, you were not here yesterday morning. Oh, I know now, cousin Sarah is the squirrel, for the copy which she set me one day is written just like this. May I go and ask her?" And getting his father's permission, off he ran. In a few moments he came back looking rather disappointed. "Cousin Sarah will not tell me whether she wrote it or not," said he; "she only laughs, and says, 'Do I look like a squirrel?' At any rate I believe she wrote it."

"Well, my boy, it is a very good letter," replied his father; "and I hope you will profit by it. He is a pretty wise squirrel, and he can give very good advice, and I hope you will never be as idle as you were yesterday. But remember that the more knowledge you get, the more useful you can be to others; and that God has given you a mind to improve for him, and if you let it run to waste, you sin against him and dishonour him.

Caspar looked very serious while his father talked so solemnly to him, and that morning at least his lessons were quickly learned and well said.—Kitty's Victory and other stories.

STUMBLING-BLOCKS.

THERE had been a very solemn preacher in Tommy's family for a long time. For four years, his little sister, only one year older than himself, had been lying in the box bed in the kitchen pining away of an incurable disease, and in sore and constant pain.

Sometimes in the evening, her little skeleton form wrapped in a blanket and laid on her mother's knee—she joined for a short time the circle round the cheerful fire. But soon weary of the family chat, and sick with pain, she had to be carried back to her corner again.

She dearly loved Tommy, and it was wonderful how much she contrived to help him in many ways.

He came to her in all his difficulties, and with his most troublesome lessons; and she was always ready to supply him, out of her treasury, with pencils, and scraps of paper, and bits of string.

When he came at night from the Sabbath school, he brought her the first reading of his new library book, and she was eager to know what the verse and hymn were for the next evening. In these and in many similar little kindly ways, this brother and sister were closely knit together in love. It was no wonder then, when the hard frost of winter came and suddenly extinguished poor Jeanie's frail and flickering life, that Tommy was deeply impressed.

When he took his last look of the poor, worn out body of his loving little sister, and thought of her long sufferings and touching last words, "Oh, what would I have done now without the Lord Jesus?" Tommy must have remembered that he too, would die, and that there was no reason why the summons should not come for him as early as for Jeanie.

Was the Lord Jesus his friend?

Were his sins washed away in the blood of Christ?

Had he given him the new nature without which none can enter the kingdom of heaven ?

Solemn questions which rose up in the little boy's mind, greatly disturbing and agitating it. Questions the right answering of which may fix a person's eternal state. Not answered, but handed over to a more convenient season, and so, perhaps, never answered on this side the grave. Wrongly answered, and so wrapping the soul in a false peace and deeper sleep, not again to be broken till the sleep of death overtakes it. Truly answered, and so stirring up the soul to ask till it receives, to seek till it finds, to knock till the door is opened to it.

Tommy was not alone in his anxiety about his soul, for many in the neighbourhood at that time were awakened by the Spirit of God to seek the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and amongst the rest a number of boys, his companions. These gathered together and held meetings for prayer and reading the Bible. Tommy was a regular attendant at these meetings, and when he came home from them he always sought a place for secret prayer. The family was large and the two rooms small enough for so many, so that retirement was not easy to get, as it seldom is in similar dwellings. But there was a little closet off the inner room, into which Tommy crept, and there he poured out his heart unto God.

His parents and brothers used to overhear the little boy's earnest pleadings with God for himself and for them, and they could not but observe his anxiety of mind and his eagerness to read the word of God. But whilst his mother's heart, still sore with the recent loss of her little girl, was much touched by her son's earnest desire to enter into the kingdom of heaven, and she helped him so far as was in her power, his brother Ned, a few years older than himself, began to persecute and oppose the little seeker in every way he could think of.

Mark the characteristic of Ned which was given by his mother, as the reason why he scoffed and laughed at poor Tommy's troubles. "He was a great hand for novels—early and late, when he had a minute's time, he was aye at them." The great realities of a present life and coming eternity make little impression on the minds of those who feed continually on fiction and dwell in an unreal world. Tommy's desires for pardon of his sins and a new heart, were idle things in Ned's eyes. He laughed them to scorn. But no doubt they touched his conscience, and there was the secret of his bitter enmity. He must have felt in his heart that his brother was right and he was wrong, and his pleasure in his favourite occupation was thereby marred. At all events he took much pains on Satan's side to hinder the good work in his brother's soul. He listened to his prayers behind the closet door and then made a mock of them. He seemed to make it his business to turn Tommy into ridicule, and to lay stumbling blocks in the way of his seeking after God—and for the present he seems to have succeeded. Like many others, over whom a feeble fellow-creature's laugh has had more power than the awful thoughts of coming death, judgment, and eternity, Tommy was not able to stand his brother's scoffs and jeers. He "has gone back." He stopped his praying and reading the Bible, and in the meantime seems to have lost his anxieties. But he is not happy. He was far happier when Ned was doing his worst. He has fallen into that snare which the fear of man brings. I hope God will mercifully break the snare and bring him out again, but I cannot tell. It's a terrible thing for a soul to lose its convictions, to stop short before coming to Christ, to whom the Holy Spirit by these convictions is seeking to bring it. I am very anxious about Tommy, but hopeful too.

But what has Ned done ? All that he could to murder his brother's soul. If any one should read these lines, who is ever tempted to laugh at or hinder another who is in soul concern and seeking salvation, remember Christ's words, "Whoso shall offend or stumble one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea." "It must needs be that offences come, but woe unto him by whom they come." And let those who are in danger, from the fear of man, of being frightened or laughed out of the way of life, remember Christ's words to them : "Fear not them who can kill the body, but after that have no more that they can do, but rather fear Him, who is able to cast both soul and body into hell, yea I say unto you, Fear Him." Let Him be your fear, and let Him be your dread, and you need have no other fear. a.

THE DREAM OF "GOLDEN HAIR."

SHE was weeping, 'neath the apple trees—the little Golden Hair,

"Oh, what is it ?" chirped the wondering birds, aloft in crimson air.

"For she will not heed the clover, yearning red-mouthed to be kissed, Nor the sunset folding round her loving arms of tender mist."

Then the courtier wind came whispering, "Oh, fairest of the fair,

Can it be that sorrow dares to touch the heart of Golden Hair !"

"Oh, I'm tired, very tired," sobbed the grieving little child,

"And I wish I were an angel, in whose sweet eyes God has smiled ;

For whene'er he does God's bidding, in his harp grow golden strings,

And the angels on the crystal sea, make room for his bright wings.

But my playmates laugh to see me try to be so meek and mild,

And they call me bitter, mocking names ; I'm tired !" sobbed the child.

Then the evening wind was sorrowful, and sighing went his way;
 And the robins chirped "Dear Golden Hair," but knew no more to say.
 But the maiden lifting tearful eyes to heaven's glowing floor,
 Caught a gleam of white wings drifting through the sunset's half-shut door,
 And as still she gazed, a happy cloud brimmed o'er with golden spray,
 And two angel-forms came floating down the tender, shining way.

And one called unto the other, though she lost the heavenly name,
 And he said, "Oh, fairest brother, with thy shining wings aflame,
 It is sweet to pass from glory unto glory ever higher,
 And to reach the seraphs throbbing hearts athrill with holy fire,
 But I yearn but once, for Jesus' sake, to suffer grief and shame, Ah! what joy to show my glorious King how much I love his name!"

Then with streaming eyes, upon her knees fell little Golden Hair,
 While the lovely vision floated down the waves of twilight air;
 All that passed in that sweet hour, only God and angels heard,
 But thereafter with a loving heart, she bore each mocking word;
 Suff'ring joyfully for Jesus, till the child-soul grew so fair,
 That the angels on the crystal sea made room for Golden Hair.

BOASTING.

THOMAS WALES liked nothing better than a sharp jack-knife and a piece of soft pine wood. He was often seen perched upon the fence near his father's barn, whittling away, apparently at the height of enjoyment. It would seem a foolish manner of spending time, if all he had done had been to sharpen sticks and make shavings for the wind to blow away, but he was always contriving some little machine—a wind-mill, water-wheel, or the like, or making a kite-frame, box-trap, or something else, and this was very well.

But Thomas had one great fault. He was far from perfect in other respects, it is true, but his greatest failing was boasting, or, as the boys sometimes call it, bragging, and it frequently led him to say what was false. Everything that he did or said was beyond what anybody else could do or say, and everything he had was better than anybody else owned. So he used to tell great stories about his jack-knife—where it came from—what it cost—what he could do with it—"No boy ever had so sharp a knife. It will cut off twice as big a pine stick at one stroke as any of you can cut with your knives," he said.

One day a boy came to school with a new knife. As usual, Thomas sneered at "the dull thing," and challenged the owner to "try knives." The boys gathered around to pass judgment. The new knife was tried first and it worked finely; it went through the wood as they said, "like a razor." Now it was Thomas's turn. He caught up a large stick with a look that seemed to say, "See me!" and with a strong, quick stroke, drove the blade into it, when it broke short off close to the handle. The boys shouted, and Thomas got out of sight as soon as possible. The snapping of that blade humbled his pride. He cared little for the loss of the knife, but to be brought down so before the boys was hard indeed.

This proved one of the best lessons of his life. His father had noticed his fault, and had told him that it was owing to wicked pride in his heart, and that it would often lead him into the sin of lying, when he wished to make up a story. When Thomas came home that night he related what had happened, and his father spoke to him so kindly and wisely of this sin, and of the danger into which an unbridled tongue would surely lead its owner, that he never forgot it. He laid the handle and broken blade away, and whenever afterward he was tempted to tell great stories, he would think of the broken knife, and of a verse which his father gave him to learn: "Even so the tongue is a little member and boasteth great things. Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth" (James iii. 5).

Did you ever think that a boasting, untruthful tongue is always the servant of a proud, wicked heart? And is that the kind of tongue which will speak words pleasing to Jesus?

"YOU PROMISED."

A LITTLE boy, after having performed his allotted task, comes to his father for the promised reward. His father is busy, and puts him off first with this excuse and then with that, and finally speaks in a way that almost silences his loved child. The little fellow looking up to his father, the tears starting in his eyes, replies, "But father, you promised."

The father cannot refuse that plea.

So our heavenly Father will hear his children, if they will do his work and plead his promises.

TREASURY PULPIT.

"THY CALF, O SAMARIA, HATH CAST THEE OFF."

HOSEA VIII &

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

HE walked in the ways of Jeroboam, son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.—Howbeit, from the ways of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, he departed not.—He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, and walked in the ways of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin." So, ringing changes on "Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin," runs the guilty history of successive kings in Israel. Some men live in their good deeds; and like a beautiful insect, or a delicate moss preserved in a mass of golden, aromatic amber, they seem to lie embalmed in the memory of their worth. Others live in their sins. So did this Jeroboam, the son of Nebat; his sins were the salt wherewith he was salted. His history is most instructive. It teaches us the folly of those who count it a matter of indifference what is the religious character of a ruler, whether supreme or subordinate. It shows us how one master mind can tell on the minds of others; and how a man's soul leaves its impress, like a thing stamped in wax or struck in iron, on the soul of a nation, long years after the body that it animated is mouldered into dust. The truth is, that no man or woman, however poor their circumstances or mean their lot, are without their influence; like an electric spark passing from link to link, that runs down the chain of successive generations. It is well to remember that a man's life is as immortal as his soul. For example: have you family worship? I congratulate you if you have. Why have you it? Your father had it; his father had it before him; and so in a sense, and in part, at least, you owe the best ornament and the palladium of a household to some remote ancestor of whom you know nothing at all. Men thus live after they are dead. Your example, outliving your memory, and more enduring than your monument, may prove like the circle that rises round the sinking stone, and, growing wider and wider, embraces a larger and larger sphere, till it dies in gentle wavelets on the distant beach. It reaches a distant shore; your example a distant time.

Take care, then, how you live,—warned by the story of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, to whose case my text alludes. Other things are hereditary besides consumption, and lunacy, and various maladies our flesh is heir to. As an example of that, Jeroboam's sin descended to his children. It was transmitted like an heirloom from father to son; it stuck like the malaria of an infectious malady to the walls of his palace; and from these spread by infection to the most distant cottages of the land. His sin is set before us in the text, and before I apply these words to ourselves, let me

I. More fully explain the expression, "Thy calf, O Samaria," or, O Israel, "hath cast thee off."

Jeroboam was a servant of Solomon. One day—for what purpose and on what errand I don't know—he left Jerusalem; and when he had reached a lonely part of the road, was met by Ahijah the Shilonite. Suddenly the prophet seized him, laying hold of a garment that he happened to wear that day for the first time. While Jeroboam's surprise, and reverence for the man of God perhaps prevented him offering any resistance, Ahijah rent it in twelve pieces. Of these he gave Jeroboam ten, saying to the astonished warrior, "Thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, Behold, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee; because that they have forsaken me, and have worshipped Ashtoreth, and Chemosh, and Milcom, and have not walked in the ways of my servant David—and I will take thee, and thou shalt reign according to all that thy soul desireth, and shalt be king over Israel; and it shall be if thou wilt obey and hearken unto all that I command thee, and keep my statutes, and my commandments, I will be with thee and make thee a sure house." Having said so, the prophet vanished. Well, time rolled on, bringing many changes with it; and among others, Solomon died, and Rehoboam, his son, occupied—not filled—Solomon's throne. He had a wise man for his father; but was himself a fool. To support the splendour of his father's reign, the people had been ground down by heavy taxes; and, tired of paying them, they now went, on a change of government, to Rehoboam to say, "Your father made our yoke heavy; make it lighter." They desired, and indeed demanded a reform. Disaffection was abroad; a storm was brewing in the political atmosphere; and now the crisis had come that required a calm head, and a clear eye, and an iron hand at the helm of the state. But a blind pilot is at the wheel. Rehoboam is not the man for such a time. Turning his back on his father's grey-haired counsellors, he surrounds himself with rash, inexperienced youths; and listening to their imperious advice, returns the people this insolent answer, "My father made your yoke heavy, I will make it heavier; my little finger shall be heavier than my father's loins. He chastised you with whips, I will chastise you with scorpions." Madman! he flung a flaming torch into a magazine of combustibles. No wonder at the result! Lashed into fury by this insolent refusal of their most reasonable desires, the nation rose in rebellion, crying, "To your tents, O Israel; David, see to thy house!" They burst asunder the bands of authority; and leaving only two tribes to stand by the house of David, the other ten broke away; and bore Jeroboam to the throne of Israel on the grand resistless wave of a popular revolution. The hour, and the man had come; Ahijah's prophecy was fulfilled.

The great English dramatist says,—

"Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown."

So Jeroboam found—soon found. He was hardly seated on his throne, when a political difficulty arose,—and that a serious one. The Mosaic law required every male to go up three times each year to Jerusalem. An astute and sagacious politician, Jeroboam foresaw how this custom might be attended with very dangerous results. He thus reasoned, If the people go up three times a-year to Jerusalem,—the place, not only of the temple, but of Rehoboam's palace and family,—when the blush of my popularity is over, and the fervour of their zeal abates, then, as a river returns to its ancient bed, this fickle multitude may return to their first love; they will desert me, and once more attach themselves to a house and dynasty around which so many noble and patriotic associations are clustered.

This was a serious difficulty; and Jeroboam was not the man to meet it aright. A stranger to the faith which is the best anchor by which either Church or State can ride out a storm, he yielded to that "fear of man which bringeth a snare." He did what, no doubt, the world would think a clever thing. Setting up one calf in Bethel, and another in Dan, in opposition to, and in imitation of the cherubim, he issued this edict: "Let him that sacrificeth, kiss the calves." He hoped thus to succeed in arresting the tide of worshippers that would otherwise have set towards Jerusalem. He did succeed. Fatal success! The ruin of his house and government, it was followed by results which should teach our statesmen—whether they manage affairs at home or abroad—that no policy in the end shall thrive which traverses the word of God; and that that never can be politically right, which is morally and religiously wrong. Jeroboam learned this to his cost. The clever policy by which he was to escape a difficulty which he could and ought to have met in faith on the providence of God, not only failed, but ruined his house; and brought down God's heaviest judgments on an unhappy land. Hardly had his son taken his father's place when Baasha rose, and hurled him from the throne; and with that thirst of blood which to this day marks the oriental spirit, slew every man, woman, and child belonging to the royal family. There was not a living creature spared that had a drop of Jeroboam's blood in his veins. And then, amid the silence that reigned over this scene of ruthless massacre, the voice of Providence was heard, saying, "Thy calf, O Jeroboam, hath cast thee off."

What the "calf" did to the monarch, it did to the people—here called Samaria—who, following the steps of their king, apostatized from God, and turned their backs on his temple. Judgment succeeded judgment. One trouble breaking on the back of another—the land had no rest. The commonwealth sank beneath the weight of its idolatry; and, as I have seen a rock so rent and scattered by some vehement explosion, that not a fragment of it could be found, so was the kingdom of Israel rent asunder; and though they have been sought east, west, north, and south, all the wide world over, there is no proved remnant of the ten tribes now to be found on the earth. A broken, bleeding band, they left the land of Israel to go into banishment,—to be lost for ages, or for ever; and over the two idols that they left behind without a solitary worshipper at their shrine, God in providence might be heard saying, "Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off."

II. Let us now make a practical use of the words we have explained; and by way of warning and instruction I observe,—

1. That the sentiments and spirit of my text are illustrated by the case of those who put riches in the place of God.

You have seen a piece of iron drawn to a magnet; now what the magnet is to iron, gold is to many men. It seems to exert an omnipotent, at least an irresistible attraction over them. Let the news go forth of the discovery of a country where the veins of the mountains are filled with gold, and the streams dance over golden sands—the glad tidings of salvation never made such a stir. The land is distant, its soil poor, its climate inhospitable, its inhabitants a race of savages—it does not matter. Sudden farewells are spoken, families are broken up, and the tenderest ties are rudely rent asunder; the roads are crowded with eager emigrants; and under press of sail ships race on the high seas, striving which first shall touch the golden strand. Men that would have pronounced the hardships they are to suffer intolerable at home, pour themselves in crowds upon the scene; they toil, and scheme, and dream of gold; and in the lust, the thirst, the appetite for gold, humanity, virtue, and piety are drowned—as in a roaring vortex. But why go to the gold-fields of California and Australia to seek in such distant regions an illustration of my remark? It may be found nearer home. Are there none of us,—none in this city,—are there not many in this as in every other city, whose ambition is to be rich, who are hasting to be rich? theirs the old cry, the complaint of the greedy grave that, though often gorged with the banquets of battle-field and pestilence, still opens its great black jaws to cry, Give, give, give.

The thirst for gold, like the drunkard's, is insatiable, —the more it is indulged, the more the flame is fed, the fiercer it burns. Determined to be rich, men have no time for prayer-meetings; they have hardly time for closet-prayer; and as to money, they have none to spare; or but a mite, as they call it, for the poor heathen abroad, or poorer heathen at home. No doubt they pity the lone widow, this ragged child, that orphan boy, and touched by the hunger that looks out of their hollow eyes, they would give; but ah! they must save money, —grow wealthy; die as rich as that man, or accumulate a fortune as great as this. Year by year they must save a certain sum—come what may, and go without bread or education who may, they must hoard up wealth. The bigger the stream that runs into yonder lake, lying so beautiful and peaceful in the bosom of the shaggy mountains, the bigger the stream that runs out of it to water the plains, and, like the path of a Christian, wend its bright and blissful way on to its parent sea; but in sad contrast with that, the more money they get, the less they give; in proportion as their wealth increases their charities diminish. Have we not met it; mourned over it; and seen how a man, setting his heart on gold, and hasting to be rich, resembles a vessel with a narrow, contracted neck, out of which water flows less freely when it is full than when it is half empty? As there is a law in physics that can explain that fact, there is a law in morals to explain this. So long as a man has no hope of becoming rich; so long as in enough of bread to eat, of raiment to put on, of health and strength to do his work and fight his honest way on in the world, he has all man really needs, he does not set his heart on riches; he is a noble, unselfish, generous, large-hearted, and, for his circumstances, open-handed man. But by success in business, or otherwise, let a fortune come within his reach, and he clutches at it—grasps it; his eye and ear close; his heart contracts, and petrifies. Strange to say, plenty in such cases but feeds penuriousness; and the ambition of riches opens a door to the meanest avarice.

To what good all this? How often do we see riches, like a covey of wild fowl, take wing and fly away! Have not I seen a man who hasted to be rich and made gold his god live to become a bankrupt, and die a beggar! —buried among the ruins of his grandest schemes. "I have put a nail into the wheel of fortune," was the boastful exclamation of one such man. God in heaven heard it; put his hand upon the wheel; and, flying round, it hurled the boaster in the dust. But grant that some seem to have got the secret how to put a nail into the wheel of fortune; what then? Money is a good thing. But I respect no man merely because he has wealth. I keep my respect for him who uses it for a noble purpose; and heartily subscribe to the saying, "A good name is to be chosen rather than great riches, and loving favour rather than silver or gold."

Money, no doubt, is power; but power that has a well defined limit. Money will buy you plenty, but not peace; money will furnish your table with luxuries, but not you with an appetite to enjoy them; money will surround your sick-bed with physicians, but not restore health to your sickly frame; it will encompass you with a cloud of flatterers, but never procure you one true friend; it will bribe into silence the tongues of accusing men, but not an accusing conscience; it will pay some debts, but not one, the least of your debts to the law of God; it will relieve many fears, but not those of guilt—the terrors that crown the brows of Death. He stands as grim and terrible by the dying bed of wealth as by the pallet of the poorest beggar whom the rich man drives from his door. And when death, seizing him by the throat, has flung the worldling on his back, and lying on the edge of the grave, he finds all that he has toiled and sinned for is nothing, as his grasp relaxes and the world slips away, and he falls back, shrieking, into a lost eternity, this voice seems to come sounding from the throne of God, "Thy calf hath cast thee off."

2. The spirit and sentiment of my text are illustrated by those who live for fame—for the favour not of God but of men.

The fragrant rose and the stinging nettle, though very different plants, grow in the same soil. Even so, though love of money and the love of fame are very different passions, both are "of the earth, earthy;" the latter, parent as it has been of many a brave and noble deed, being not less than the former a thing of earth. And how does all history, sacred and profane, ancient and modern, show on what a precarious footing he stands who is a popular idol; what a capricious divinity he worships who courts the applause of men!

Look, for example, at our Saviour, who had his day of popularity, and was crowned with unsought honours. Yesterday the streets were thronged with thousands who, as they attend Jesus' steps, rend the air with shouts of, Hosannah! hosannah to the Son of David! To-day the wind has shifted. Through the streets of Jerusalem rolls the same crowd; the voices are the same; the object of their cry the same; but while yesterday it was Hosannah! to-day it is Crucify him! crucify him! Away with that fellow to the cross! The stage and actors are the same; but how different the scene! Yesterday it was a brilliant triumph; to-day it is a bloody tragedy.

From David's Son turn now to David. Look at that gallant, modest youth—his cheek flushed with the fight, and blushing a deeper crimson under the gaze of so many admiring eyes. Old men load him with praises; the youth of Israel regard him with a generous admiration; while a fair crowd of blooming maidens, with harps in hand and flowery garlands on their heads, sing, as they dance around him, "Saul hath slain his thousands, but David his tens of thousands." Look now at yon old man—time has silvered his noble head; tears fill his eyes, and roll down his cheeks; an exile from Jerusalem, he is attended only by a small band, who go to share the misfortunes of their dis-crowned and dishonoured master. It is the same man who, years before, had a popularity that roused the envy of a king. Why do they drive David from his throne, and home, and capital? What evil has he done? Evil! He has done none. He is the same man; but they are not the same people. He has done nothing to forfeit the favour of that giddy throng, or blot out the memory of the glorious day when, meeting his giant foe in single fight, he slew the Philistine, and saved the State. Well was it for David, that dark and cloudy day, that he had never made fame and the public favour his ruling passion; and had steered his course through life, not by the shifting lights of earth, but by the pole-star of God's holy word! Well was it that no bearded prophet came out on the fugitive, to stand in his path, and point to a people who had flung him out, to say, David, thy calf hath cast thee off!

I have known a patriot who had done good service to the State, hissed by those who once cheered him to the echo. I have seen a preacher, once followed by admiring crowds who hung upon his lips, stand up amid cold and empty benches; and, when his locks were gray, and his hands palsied, address himself to a scattered few. It was well for such men that they sought their people's profit—not their praise! Well, when the laurels man had bound around their young brows were dropping into dust and decay, that their eye had been fixed on a crown immortal in the heavens—well that an ungodly world could not reproach them, asking, Where is now thy God? and, above all, well that God himself, pointing to the empty benches, or the hissing crowd, did not say, Thy calf hath cast thee off! Calm, serene amid the vicissitudes of this changing world, is the soul that has its centre, and finds its rest in God.

3. The sentiment and spirit of my text are illustrated also by the case of those who seek their happiness in the pleasures of sin. Look at yon unhappy, more than unhappy—guilty drunkard; though, to the shame of a country and government that surrounds him with manifold temptations, he is sometimes as much sinned against as sinning. With beggary hung upon his back, palsy in his shaking hand, and in his downcast head and averted looks a sense of shame and degradation—how unlike what once he was! Where is now the merry song? where the clever jest? where the bright and ready wit that, flashing over the festive scene, was followed by thunders of applause? Gone! Despised by those who, for the sake of his dangerous accomplishments, once courted his society, and driven forth of his drunken haunts by men who had been building up their accursed fortunes out of the wreck of that poor wretch's body, soul, peace, character, home, or all that is dear and precious upon earth, his calf hath cast him off. Or look at yon fallen woman drinking the dregs of her bitter, damning cup! Flattered, betrayed, seduced, and cast away as a loathsome thing by the villain-hand that plucked the flower—plucked the rose and left the thorn,—see her not left even a place to die in! driven forth lest her moans should disturb their hellish orgies—list to the groans of a body racked with pain, of a soul tortured with dreadful memories, and already suffering the torments of hell. I never stood in a cold, unfurnished garret where some such poor wretch, like a dying dog, had dragged herself quietly to die; I never saw the bloated, degraded, ragged drunkard driven from the door where he had wasted the wages that should have gone to bless wife, and children, and make a happy home, but the voice of God seemed to sound out these words, "Thy calf hath cast thee off." May such cases teach us, may the Holy Spirit teach us that "the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel;" that "the way of transgressors is hard!"

Turn from these scenes, and let me now introduce you to a chamber where we have been summoned to see a youth that lies a-dying, after having run a course of vice; early, fiercely, madly run it. He has gone down the dance of pleasure; and danced it out. The lights quenched, the music ceased, the actors gone, he is left alone upon the stage. Another fire than that of guilty passions is burning in his veins; his heart is beating a quick march to the grave. Laughed at in the distance, death with grim and ghastly aspect is now standing by his side; and his infidelity, a rotten plank, bends under the weight of that hour—is breaking beneath his feet! To my dying day I never can forget either how he flung out his arms to get a hold of Christ, or the cries of that ghastly man as he was swept off into eternity. Lost or saved, I cannot tell; but the silence of the poor sceptic's chamber seemed to be broken by a voice that said, "Thy calf hath cast thee off."

I have shown how riches will cast you off; how the world will cast you off; how pleasure will fling you from her polluted arms over into the pit; let me now tell you of One who will not—will never cast you off. May I prevail on one and another to come; and cast themselves into his arms; and close this hour with his offered mercy. A great statesman, abandoned in his old age by his sovereign, lay dying one day in England; and it is recorded of him that he said, If I had served my God as faithfully as I have served my king, he had not cast me off now. How true, blessed God! Thou wilt never abandon any who put their trust in thee. "They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, that cannot be moved." I have seen an earthly master cast off an old, faithful servant. When his hair was grey, and his back was bent, and his arm was withered, and his once stalwart, iron frame was worn out in service, he has been thrown on the parish, or the cold charity of the world. Blessed Jesus! thou never didst cast off any old servant, or old soldier of thine! Not masters only, but mothers even may cast it off! She can "forget her sucking child that she should not have compassion on the fruit of her womb." But this mother—true, loving mother, who fondles her infant, presses him to her bosom, teaches the laughing boy to walk, kisses away his tears, hastes to raise him when he falls, sings him to sleep, watches by his cradle-couch, is ready to dash into the burning house, or leap into the boiling flood to save him, is but thy dim, imperfect image! On thee how justly may we bestow the chaplet that David wove to the memory of Jonathan, saying, "Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women."

Let sinners, then, come to Jesus! Come here; come now. He will never cast you off—no, though you were the greatest sinner that ever sinned on earth, he will heal your backslidings and love you freely. Be it that you are grown grey in sin, that there is robbery, even blood upon your hand, that there is not a crime man can commit you have not done, it matters not! Come to Jesus—lay your sins on Jesus. You shall be forgiven; and your welcome will be that of the returning prodigal who, ere he had time to say, "Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight," was folded in his father's arms; and felt the tears from a father's eyes dropping on his haggard cheek. Hear what Jesus says to the penitent who weeps out his sorrows on his loving bosom, "I will never leave thee." Your mother may leave you, the wife of your bosom may leave you, wealth, health, earthly friends, these all may leave you, the whole world may leave you, but "I will never leave you, nor forsake you." Leave us! He is never nearer than when all others leave us. Hear him, "The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee." Let dying chambers witness how true to such promises is the believers' God. "He is not a man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent—hath he said, and shall he not do it—hath he spoken, and shall it not come to pass?" Look here—a Christian is dying; striking the last blows of a long, hard-fought battle; the sword is about to drop from his hand—the crown is descending on his head. Stand aside and give him air! Lay your hand on his heart; it is fluttering like a dying bird! Hush! he speaks; bend over him and lay your ear to his lips. The voice is weak, but in that dread hour how strong the faith that with life's failing breath thus whispers, "My heart and my flesh faint and fail, but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for evermore."

"A GOOD MAN—A VERY GOOD MAN INDEED."

BY J. DE LIEPDE, OF AMSTERDAM.

CHAPTER I.

WHICH MAKES THE READER ACQUAINTED WITH A BAKER, WHO DID NOT KNOW THAT THERE WAS BETTER BREAD STILL THAN HE SOLD IN HIS SHOP.

"So you are going to take a trip to the village of —?" said my friend. "Don't neglect, then, to pay a visit to the church-yard. It lies about a quarter of an hour's walk to the east, but you will find your trouble more than repaid. It is the finest spot in the whole district."

As I was going to — merely for a holiday, no business engagement prevented me from acting on my friend's advice. And good advice it proved. I was quite surprised when I found myself in a little paradise. The place was tastefully laid out—as a garden, but as a garden for the dead, who rest from their labour, and slumber till the morning of the resurrection. The poetry of death was most aptly combined here with the poetry of life. Grave simplicity reminded me of the one; cheerful variety of the other. The cold grey slabs, here and there interchanged with an elegant tomb or a mossy mound, constrained a feeling of deep earnestness, which, however, was cheered into quiet, joyful hope by the impression of the bright green shrubs and the lovely flower beds.

I walked up the main path, which led to a little grove of brown beeches, stopping every now and then to read the inscriptions on the slabs, till I arrived at a grave at which a well-dressed gentleman was standing, apparently absorbed in serious thought. It was a fresh grave; no grass covered its surface, and the colour of the earth, slopingly heaped up in the form of a roof, indicated that the sun had not long been shining on this resting-place of death. I stood by the side of the stranger, who slightly raised his eyes, as if to ascertain whether any special motive had led me to the spot. My countenance, of course, indicated nothing of the kind. So he resumed his former attitude, and looking down at the grave, continued his silent meditation. He appeared to be a man of middle age. The high colour of his cheeks for a moment made me suspect that he might be a fast liver; but the expression of composure and manly calmness that adorned his features, as speedily dispelled this suspicion. Indeed, there was something in the man's countenance that attracted me so much, as to make me desirous of forming his acquaintance, and ere I could help it, I broke the silence.

"It seems, sir, that you feel a deep concern about this grave."

"Yes, I do," he answered, with emotion. "A good man lies buried here, sir; a very good man indeed."

The particular stress which he laid upon the word very, and the tone of pious reverence in which he pronounced it, made me surmise that he understood the word good in a deeper sense than it uses to be taken in the phraseology of common life.

"That's an important epitaph you give him," said I. "I am afraid there are comparatively but few lying here about, upon whose tombs it can be written in truth. And has he always been a good man?" asked I, with the express intention of eliciting a further explanation of what he meant by "goodness."

"Always good?" repeated he in a voice of wonder, and fixing his clear blue eyes upon me, as if to inquire whether I was serious. "Who is always good? Yes, who is good, but God?"

"You are right," answered I quickly, to remove the slight frown that darkened his brow. "We all of us are evil by nature; but if God through his Spirit takes possession of our heart, he turns our evil to good."

"Just so," replied he, relaxing his features. "We now understand each other. But, at the same time, you know the answer to your question. A time was when this man was not good, because the Spirit of God did not dwell in him. But it pleased the Lord to open his heart, and to enter it with all the riches of his divine love, and then a change took place with him, the more wonderful the less it had been expected. He was a striking evidence of the almighty power of Christ over man's natural perversity and stubborn rebellion."

"Indeed!" quoth I. "May I ask you how the happy change was brought about?"

"Let us sit down on this bench," said he, "and I will tell you the story, which perhaps will contribute something towards confirming your belief that God's word is a hammer mighty to break a rock, and, at the same time, a lovely dew, that can turn a barren wilderness into a paradise."

"This man," thus he continued, pointing to the grave, after we had seated ourselves; "this man was a baker, residing in yonder village. As to his daily conduct and social qualities, he was an ornament to the place. His company was as much desired as his bread was liked, by all the inhabitants. Gifted by nature with an uncommonly clear intellect, and an extraordinary talent of judging on matters of daily concern, he had, by much reading, acquired a large stock of general information, so that he not only was taken into counsel in every matter of importance, but also entrusted with the care of the chief interests of the village. He was the burgomaster's right hand, and the first elder of the church. But with all these excellences, he was one of those 'wise and prudent,' from whom the Lord says that the things of the heavenly kingdom are hid. Elate upon his own understanding, he boldly refused to believe anything but what he could comprehend with his human reason. He professed an unlimited reverence for the Bible, whose contents he was fully acquainted with; but he understood the art of reasoning in such a way about it, as to persuade every one that its miracles had been the simple productions of the most intelligible processes of nature; that Christ was merely the most perfect genius amongst the geniuses of our race; that his sufferings and death were only the proof of his perfect self-control in the most difficult circumstances of life; and that the salvation he had brought about, consisted only in his having left us a pure doctrine and a spotless example, by the copying of which in our life, we are to fit ourselves for our heavenly destination. You perceive that to such a philosopher no doctrine was more absurd than that of the divinity of our Saviour, of the atoning power of his blood, and of salvation by grace. The clergyman of the village being a weak man, who cared much more for the flowers in the garden behind his manse than for the plants that were growing on his spiritual field, our baker ruled the whole church; and the effect of his influence was sadly manifest in the spirit of coldness and indifference to religion that prevailed throughout the community. Outwardly the strictest morality was observed, for the baker was a notoriously known antagonist to every disorderly and immoral person; but in the houses there was no fear of God, and in the hearts there was no peace. The villagers spent their leisure hours chiefly at the card-table in their houses, or in the tap-room of the 'Golden Plough,' or in rambling about, if the weather did not shut them up in their parlours. Our baker himself was often to be found at the 'Golden Plough,' the landlord of which was his special friend. He never, however, indulged himself so much as to be the worse of liquor. He visited the place even from principle, in order to show the people how to enjoy the liquor cheerfully, without drinking too much. He specially went there regularly every Sunday evening; and you may easily conceive that the landlord was not a little pleased with this habit of his friend, for our baker's cheerful company and lively conversation filled his tap-room with customers, and his purse with cash. So matters continued for years. The whole population, together with the baker, were asleep in a deep slumber, and nobody was conscious that he was sleeping on the brink of a bottomless abyss. There was everything in the village man could desire for this world. There was prosperity, pleasure, order, knowledge; but there was no God, no Christ, no true peace, no hope for eternity.

"Thus the murderer of men from the beginning had bound this unhappy population under his fearful spell. But the merciful Saviour of sinners had, in his grace, resolved to break its hallucination, and by the sharp edge of his sword to cut asunder the fetters which tied so many souls to the dust of death."

"Our baker had a cousin, who was a student of divinity at the university of Utrecht. He was very fond of that young man, for Mr. G—— was learned, clever, eloquent, and a scholar. He used to spend his holidays with the baker, who always looked forward to his visit as to a festival; for the student quite agreed with him on points of doctrine, and, from his richer knowledge, every year imparted so many new thoughts and theories to him, as to enable him to enrapture the whole village for a twelvemonth with the treasures of his wisdom. He had such an unlimited respect for our young divine, that he often frankly acknowledged—and the acknowledgment said a great deal—that he only knew one person under heaven who was his master in reasoning and arguing, and this wonderful person was Mr. G——. 'But, then, of course,' he would add, 'Mr. G—— is a scholar; he understands Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and I am but a simple baker!'

"The Lord, however, knowing that the baker exercised great influence upon the villagers, and that Mr. G—— exercised great influence upon the baker, began his saving work with this young man. He opened the student's eyes and heart for his divine glory; and shortly after having taken orders, Mr. G—— was found at the feet of Jesus, rejoicing in his redemption, as a sinner saved by grace. Now, one of the first effects of the Lord's rescuing love in a lost sinner's heart is the desire to rescue others, and especially those with whom we are united by ties of natural affection, and whom we know to be on the same dangerous way which we, by grace, have abandoned. Mr. G——, now the Rev. Mr. G——, as usual, spent his first holidays after his conversion with his cousin the baker; but matters now took a course quite different from what the baker hitherto had been accustomed to. Instead of approbation on the part of Mr. G——, there was disapproval. Instead of admiration on the part of the baker, there was contempt. They found that they now differed upon every point they had formerly most agreed upon. Mr. G—— began with God; the baker with man. Mr. G—— required faith; the baker intellect and reason. Mr. G—— appealed to the Bible; the baker to common sense. In short, it was a constant dispute; and, for the first time in his life, the baker was glad when Mr. G—— packed his portmanteau and drove off on the stage coach.

"Mr. G—— returned to his residence with a sad heart. He had met with a more stubborn resistance on the part of his cousin than he had hoped or even expected. He hoped, however, that the conversation they now had had, though more combative than he had wished, might leave some serious impression upon his cousin's mind. One thing seemed to him a favourable symptom in his cousin's spiritual disease, the animosity with which he defended his own opinions, and the anger with which he rejected those of the young minister. He was not lukewarm; he was frigidly cold towards the truth, and red-hot for error; but he was both sincerely. 'His master is bad,' thought Mr. G——; 'but he is a good servant, and if ever he turns to Christ, he will be a good soldier in his army.'

"A year elapsed, in which Mr. G—— had often remembered the baker's soul at a throne of grace. Often, too, had he written to him, reminding him of the great truths of salvation, but had never received an answer. His usual holidays turned up again, and he again resolved to spend a portion of them with his cousin. He was kindly received, but soon found, to his great distress, that matters were still worse than last year. Already on the first evening, the baker, in the heat of the controversy, got so angry that he left the room, boiling over with indignation. In vain Mr. G——, avoiding the angry spirit of debate, tried to get his cousin to discuss the points in question with calmness, and in the spirit of meekness. His very composure seemed all the more to stimulate his cousin's passion. The baker's wife, who was a meek, kind-hearted woman, would often gently rebuke her husband for this want of self-control, when alone.

"Well, you are right," he would reply; 'I should keep my temper better. But I find it impossible. I know I am right, and he is wrong; but I cannot argue it. He, of course, has the better of me as to language, for he is a scholar and a preacher, and I am but a simple baker. Nevertheless he pleads a foolish cause,—I am sure of that; and his whole power merely consists in his talent of reasoning,—for he is a clever fellow, and able to argue that black is white. But I shall silence him one day, for I have got my five senses as well as he, and I am not such a fool as to agree that a crooked line is straight.'

"But, my dear," his wife would then rejoin, 'if the matter is so simple, I wonder you don't just calmly and deliberately put it before him. I cannot see how you can bend his crooked line a bit straighter by stamping with your foot on the floor, or by knocking the table with your fist.'

"Ah, well," he would reply, 'that's all very true, but then, you see, he suddenly throws in a question which at once puts me out, as I am not always able quickly to find the exact answer, and then, finding that he tries to bring me into a scrape by sophistical tricks, I lose patience, and anger gets the better of me. Only take our discussion of last night. Is there a more simple truth than this, that we shall be judged according to our deeds, and that, consequently, we are to be saved by our works, and not by grace? But what did he say to that? He at once put the question to me, by what works the thief was saved who was hanging on the cross by Christ's side. Now, wasn't that a palpably sophistical turn? Of course, I was not at once prepared to give the exact answer, and I replied by asking him, in an angry voice, whether he took me for such a wretch as that thief was? And what was his answer? "I will not decide whether you are better or not," he said, "but I cordially wish you to arrive at the same place where that wretched thief is now, and I believe there is no other way for you to go there than the way he took."'

"Well," replied the baker's wife, 'but that was not such a bad wish after all. I really could not see why you answered that kind word of his by cuffing the table in bad temper.'

"Well, don't you see?' rejoined the baker, 'he put me on one line with the greatest scoundrels and biggest rascals in the world; and I said to him, that, thank God, matters had not yet gone so badly with me, as to make me deserving to be hanged. But then, mark ye what question he again put to me. He asked me why the thief had deserved to be hanged? Of course I answered because he had broken the law, and had thereby become liable to the punishment of death. "Quite so," he replied, "but have you not likewise broken the law of God, and has not the eternal Judge pronounced the verdict of death over that breach?" Now, there I found myself again in a trap, which he so cunningly had laid down to catch me. I tell you, there is no use reasoning with those refined scholars. They always have ten words ready to start before you have found one. They are just like smooth serpents. The moment you think you have caught hold of their tail, they slip through your fingers, and, ere you are aware of it, they wind themselves round your neck, and squeeze your throat that you pant for breath like a fish for water.'

" 'If I'm not mistaken,' the baker's wife replied, 'our cousin did not deny the value of good works, but he said that, in order to be able to perform works which are truly good, man must be saved by grace first.'

" 'Yes, so he said,' rejoined the baker; 'but that's altogether absurd to my understanding. For salvation is the end we all aim at, and it is salvation I have been working for all my life long. But if, after all, it is to be obtained by grace, and if a thief may get it as easily as an honest man like me, or an honest woman like you, then I have been a fool all my life, and I have laboured in vain; and, in fact, good works are of no value at all. I'll never believe that. But those cunning scholars, by their subtle reasoning, would at last make you believe that you must go to the fire to take a bath, and to the water to warm yourself. For I must confess, that when hearing our cousin speak, it all sounds in my ears as pure logic, against which nothing reasonable can be said. But then, when I look at the results it leads to, and find that the conclusion of the whole is, that I and you and all of us are walking in a foolish way, leading to a place where none of us wants to be, I cannot suppress my anger because of the absurd idea, and the arrogant pretension of that young fellow, that the whole population of this village are wrong and that he alone is right.'

"In this way the baker would give vent to his resentment, when speaking with his wife about their cousin, Mr. G—. The young minister found that this year he was still less successful in his evangelizing efforts than the year before. Not to exasperate his cousin too much he soon stopped conversing with him about religious topics altogether, and shortening his stay as much as he could without giving offence, he soon again packed his portmanteau, and returned home, even sadder in his heart than when he came, and fervently praying the Lord that he might bring about by his divine power what evidently was far beyond the power of the love and eloquence of man.

CHAPTER II.

THE BAKER FINDS THE BEST BREAD, AND BEGINS TO SELL IT FREELY TO EVERYBODY.

"MR. G— now had recourse to tracts, religious pamphlets, and printed sermons, of which he from time to time sent copies by post to his cousin. Soon, however, to his great distress, he found that these were returned by the same channel, uncut. So every opportunity of approaching his cousin's heart seemed lost, and he gave up all hope of becoming an instrument for the good of that man's soul. Now it was in those days that John Angell James' excellent little book, 'The Anxious Inquirer,' was published in our language. You remember its first edition was bound in a green paper cover, which gave it, among the common people, the name of 'The little green book.' Mr. G— read this clear, simple, and popular exposition of the fundamental principles of salvation with exceeding delight—and who of the Lord's people in this country did not?—and no sooner had he finished its perusal than the wish rose in his heart, 'Oh, could I get my cousin to read it!' He mused about the best way to get the book put into his hand. He saw, however, no other way but the post. He once more resolved to try this channel of communication. 'At any rate,' he thought, 'if he sends it back, only the postage will be lost.' He wrapped the little book in paper, put the address upon it, and, lifting up his soul to Him who only can open the iron door of man's heart, sent the little messenger of peace, like a green olive branch, to the rebellious captive—his cousin.

"Now, when the little herald of salvation entered the baker's house, he himself was out for a walk. His wife took the little book from the postman's hand, and unthinkingly tore off the wrapping. The title struck her. She looked into the book and felt so interested by what she was reading that she almost unconsciously took a knife and cut it up at several places. She was then called into the shop by a customer, and, laying the book open upon the table, left the parlour. It so happened that the customer who had disturbed her in her perusal was one of the most talkative gossips in the village, who kept her chatting so long, that meanwhile her husband returned, and, passing through the shop, entered the parlour, and seated himself at the table, to rest from the fatigue of his walk on that sultry afternoon. It had been most exquisite weather all the day, and he had greatly enjoyed his walk in the country, which was clad like a bride, in the splendid spring garment which its wonderful Creator, with one beckoning of his almighty finger, had woven round its frame. Our baker had not been insensible to the sublime eloquence with which nature around him preached the glories of its Maker. But the effect which it produced upon him this time was rather different from the impression which beautiful scenery had used to make upon his mind. He felt that there was a great and sad contrast between the world within and that without. Ever since his last conversation with the young minister he had felt unhappy, and sometimes wretched. He was ashamed of the weakness he had betrayed by his want of self-control, yet he would not confess to himself that it was a weakness, for he secretly perceived that this confession would at the same time imply an acknowledgment of the weakness of the cause he had been pleading. What made him most miserable in his own feeling was the discovery which he could not conceal from himself, that he had been beaten by his cousin at every point of discussion, and that however frequently he might think their conversation over and over again, he could not discover any flaw in his cousin's reasoning. For, as to the charge of sophistry and subtlety he had cast at his adversary, he was too honest not to confess to himself that this was but a poor pretext to cover his own defeat. Now, had he been an unprincipled man, not caring for truth and character at all, he would have continued to enjoy his prosperity in business, the respect paid him in society, and his pleasure in the comforts of life as contentedly as ever. But he was naturally averse to anything like deception, and to self-deception above all. He could not brook the idea of perhaps being in a false position, of walking in a way which, perhaps, might lead him to the reverse of what he aimed at. And that this, perhaps, was his case now, he was disturbed to suspect. 'If my way were the true one, indeed,' he would often say to himself, 'I could have silenced him; at least I should have done so. There must be something wrong about me. But what is it? I wish I knew what it is.' Thus his life's harmony was broken and his soul's rest was gone. This made him quite miserable, and being too proud and too blind yet to throw himself at the feet of a merciful Saviour, he would give vent to his inward strife by indulging a spirit of crossness and moroseness, which often surprised his wife and friends, and of which his cousin the minister experienced the effect every time he saw a tract or a pamphlet returned by post.

"Now, on the afternoon referred to, our baker was sitting at the table in his parlour, recollecting the beauties of nature he had been witnessing, and trying to dispel the feeling of his inward contrast with this scenery of love and peace, by whistling a tune. Unawares his eye fell upon the little book that was lying open before him, and mechanically he took it up and began reading. He read—and he read—and he could not stop reading. The sun set, and he had not yet finished his perusal. He called for a light. A light! His wife and his servants were quite surprised, for he never used to require a light, as the setting of the sun always used to be to him the signal for going to the 'Golden Plough.' A light was brought, and he continued his reading. He had just finished the book when supper was served up. He parted as usual, but he was silent. He went to bed, but, in the middle of the night, he rose and walked up and down the room. His wife, awakened by his movements, asked him what was the matter. He told her that he could not sleep, and besought her to get up and to speak to him.

"What do you want me to speak about?" asked she, springing from her bed in alarm.

"Speak to me about Jesus," said he, in a voice of despair. "Oh, I am miserable, I am wretched. Tell me what our cousin spoke about Jesus and salvation."

"The poor woman did not know what he was about, but, obeying his desire, repeated some of Mr. G——'s sayings in as far as she could recollect them. She found that this had a surprisingly soothing effect upon his mind.

"Oh," he exclaimed, 'that's it! That's the truth! That's beautiful! That's bread to my soul. Only by that we can live.'

"At length it seemed he came to peace for a while. He requested her to kneel down with him, and he uttered a few incoherent sentences of prayer. It was a short series of abrupt ejaculations rather, in which he threw himself down into the dust, and cried for mercy.

"Meanwhile Mr. G——'s holidays again came on. He seriously hesitated whether he should follow his usual custom this time, and pay his cousin a visit. Love, however, prevailed over inclination. 'For my pleasure,' he thought, 'I need not go to the baker, but perhaps I still may be useful to him. Our last conversation was anything but a holiday's recreation to me; but still he continued hospitable to the end, and did not forbid me to come back.'

"So Mr. G—— took a ticket for the stage coach, and one afternoon found himself on his way to this village again. It was about nine o'clock in the evening when the coach reached the village of B——, which was the last stage, nine miles from the baker's residence. The last passenger there went out, and Mr. G—— found himself alone in the jolting conveyance. He now could give free course to his thoughts. 'How will I be received?' asked he. 'Will my cousin be frightened at seeing me? At any rate, I shall try to approach him as kindly as I can. I shall not begin talking about religious matters unless he compels me to do so. Oh, I feel I am in great need of the Lord's guidance now.'

"He folded his hands, and speaking to his God, imploring his Spirit for himself and for the baker, he drove into the village which was the end of his journey.

"His carpet-bag in his hand, he proceeded to the baker's house, and gently knocked at the door. His cousin opened it in person.

"Ah, my dear cousin! Is it you? Step in, sir. Be welcome. I thought you must turn up soon. Now I hope you'll make a long stay.'

"With these words the baker led him into his parlour. His wife was just preparing supper, and, as usual, received her cousin with a hearty kiss. During the meal only family concerns were questioned and answered. Hitherto all went on in peace. But Mr. G——'s heart throbbed agitatingly every moment the conversation seemed to take a more important turn.

"At length the supper was finished, and the family matters exhausted.

"And how are matters going on in your Church?" asked the baker. 'Have you to encounter much opposition still?'

"Now, Lord, stand by me!" ejaculated Mr. G—— mentally. 'Give me thy words to speak!'

"Alas!" answered he, 'I still find that there are many amongst my hearers whose eyes are closed against the light of the blessed gospel; but I hope the hidden work of the Spirit will gradually lead their hearts to the truth as it is in Jesus. We are by nature such strangers to the things of God, that it is no wonder if we require some time to understand their first and most simple rudiments.'

"The baker was silent, but there was something in his countenance that encouraged Mr. G—— to go on in this way.

"'It is a hard thing for man,' he continued, 'to admit that he is a lost sinner before God.'

"He stopped. The baker continued silent. Mr. G—— felt uneasy. He was accustomed here to receive a refractory reply. Was his cousin, perhaps, resolved not to say a word if he should begin to touch religious topics, and thus to compel him to turn to other subjects from want of reply! 'In that case,' he thought, 'I'll put the fire so near to you that you must jump out of your fortress.'

"'Man is too proud of his own righteousness,' he continued, 'to admit that he, in spite of all his so called virtues, has deserved the eternal condemnation. This causes him to deny that the Lord Jesus Christ hung on the cross in his stead, for by acknowledging that he would be compelled to admit that he ought to have hung there everlastingly. But we know that the Son of God took upon himself our nature, in order to be able to bear our sins in his precious body, and to be slain for our iniquities; and whatever man's aversion to this fact may be, a fact it is nevertheless, and so it will stand unto eternity. Not by our, but by His work only can we enter the heavenly gates. Not our righteousness, but His blood only can take away our sins and condemnation.'

"Here Mr. G—— stopped again. 'It is a hopeless case this,' he thought; 'my cousin has completely stopped his ears, and I am not such a fool as to allow myself to talk on till dawn, as if singing a tune in a deaf and dumb institution.'

"Had he been able to observe the expression of sympathy and delight that was beaming from the baker's face, he certainly would have continued his exposition of the way of salvation with increasing ardour. But the candle which was standing on the table and formed the only light, shone so dimly, that the countenances both of the hearers and of the speaker were only imperfectly discernible.

"'Go on,' said the baker in a tone that indicated the cordial pleasure he took in the minister's words, — 'go on, my dear cousin, I pray you.'

"'Why, do you really want me to continue?' asked Mr. G—— in a voice of joyful amazement.

"'Surely I do,' answered the baker, 'for all you have said is sheer truth, and as precious to my soul as bread is to the hungry.'

"'Is it possible!' exclaimed Mr. G——, springing from his seat, and with folded hands placing himself before his cousin. 'Is it possible, my dear cousin! and has such a great thing from the Lord happened here in your house and heart?'

"'Yes, oh yes,' replied the baker, while tears started from his eyes. 'I have found Jesus as my Saviour from sin, death, and condemnation. I now know in whom I believe, my dear friend and brother. I now know that I was blind, but God in his infinite mercy has opened my eyes.'

"Mr. G—— sank down upon his seat again, and alternately looking at the baker and his wife, whose eyes beamed love and joy, allowed free course to the feelings of his heart. The baker, of course, now must become the speaker, and tell him how, since that remarkable night after his perusal of the 'little green book,' he had found no rest and peace till he had through faith found the remission of his sins at the cross of an all-sufficient Saviour; and how since then he had commenced a new life, of which Christ's righteousness was the foundation and his glory the end. I need not tell you that that evening in the baker's house closed amid joyful praises and thanksgivings to God, and that the early morning sun found the two friends, now brothers in the Lord, still engaged in relating to each other the unspeakable riches of peace, strength, and joy, which they had found in Him who was their God, their hope, and their perfect consolation.

"That Christ, however, who said to his disciples, 'Peace I leave with you,' was the same who said, 'I am not come to bring peace on earth, but a sword.' The baker's change soon became known all over the village, for the Lord gave him grace to confess his faith without disguise, and immediately a separation ensued, just as if a sword had cut the population into two unequal parts. The Lord had some children among the people of the village, who now came out more boldly, since the power of his arm had become so wonderfully manifest by the conversion of such a notoriously known enemy. They, of course, exultantly joined him; but their number was very small in comparison with the great bulk of their neighbours, who either turned away from them in dead indifference, or turned against them in fierce opposition. Amongst the latter was the landlord of the 'Golden Plough.' He now became as obstinate an enemy to the baker as formerly he had been his intimate friend; and no wonder, for not only did he miss the baker henceforth amongst his customers, but he found also that the Sunday evening company in his tap-room began gradually to decrease. The baker, though now considered by many as a fanatical Methodist, yet continued a person of influence in the village. It was evident on many occasions that his ability and sagacity in all matters of daily concern had lost nothing by the change of his religious opinions. On the contrary, it was found that his care for the true welfare of the people was still more intent than before. His counsels were as judicious as ever, but given in a tone of greater kindness and humility. And where formerly he sometimes would have refused to afford his personal assistance, there he was now always found ready to help, except in matters which were leading to unseemly practices, such as the desecration of the Lord's day, or the filling of the tap-room of the 'Golden Plough.'

"All this gained to our friend the enhanced respect and confidence of the great bulk of the villagers, and his influence even extended itself over many who disapproved of his theological principles. His respectable position in society as a well-to-do citizen may also have aided in gaining for him the esteem of the people. However that may be, the Sunday school which he opened—it was the first ever seen in the village—was soon attended by a large number of children. A Bible reading meeting, which he instituted on Sunday evening, attracted many a one who formerly used to frequent the 'Golden Plough.' Indeed, it became more and more unfashionable to visit that tavern on Sunday, the conscience of the people giving testimony to the baker's conduct as being better than that of those who used to interchange the church with the tap-room. Even on week-days this effect of the baker's example was visible, from the thinness of the company at the 'Golden Plough' Inn, when the baker was holding his prayer meeting in the barn behind his house. Thus, during a course of two or three years, the moral aspect of the place had entirely altered. Many a sinner was brought to repentance and faith in Christ, and in many a house the sound of a psalm was heard, in which formerly the dice used to rattle on the table, or the gin-bottle to go round from hand to hand.

THE FIRST ASSYRIAN MISSION.

THE Jewish Church was not, in the modern sense of the expression, a missionary Church. It would, indeed, be a great mistake to say that all its lights were turned inward, and its gates shut continually against proselytes. The reverse was the case. The Hebrew system was as a torch lifted up amid thick darkness, for the guidance of the neighbouring nations, and the stranger would not have been kept out of the sacred enclosure if he had sought admission into it in the right way. But while this is true, there was certainly no "Society" in ancient Jerusalem for the propagation of the faith in the lands of the Gentiles; and we read of no such scenes in the Old Testament as were witnessed in Paul's days in the Christian Church at Antioch, when the foreign missionary went out on his evangelistic tours through the Roman empire, or returned to cheer the hearts of his brethren with the tidings of his success. On at least one occasion, however, we have under the old economy a something which looks very like one of our own missionary enterprises, and which was doubtless meant, in several important respects, to be typical of what was afterwards to be.

Many years after the united tribes of Israel had been broken up into two independent States, and after the northernmost of the two had been reduced to an extremely low condition through the wickedness of its people, a prophet of the Lord was employed to promote, if possible, a revival of religion. Probably some success followed his efforts, for the king, stirred up by his preaching, made a desperate effort to drive back his enemies, and succeeded so far as to recover the ancient frontier of his now contracted dominion. This must have given the man of God a vantage-ground in Israel; and as no country more needed at that moment a divine teacher, we might fairly have expected that he would have been allowed to continue in this desirable and necessary home missionary work. But as Philip was snatched away suddenly from his revival labours in Samaria to waylay the Ethiopian eunuch, so the prophet of Gath-hepher was moved with equal suddenness to an entirely different part of the great field. He was called unexpectedly to enter on a foreign mission, and that in a sphere most thoroughly unlooked for: "Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and cry against it; for their wickedness is come up before me." The call in the circumstances was an extraordinary one. 1. It was a call to preach in a land which not only lay beyond the bounds of Palestine, but which was inhabited by Gentiles, by heathen. 2. It was to a city that is called, and well deserved the epithet of great—great in extent, being sixty miles in circuit—great in strength, its walls being 100 feet high, and so broad that three chariots could drive abreast upon them—great in population, containing, it is supposed, two millions of souls—great in wealth, "there was no end of its stores"—great in influence, being the capital of Assyria, the then mistress of the world. 3. The call, further, was to preach in a city which was not less remarkable for its wickedness. It was a bloody city, all full of lies and robbery, and its idolatry was pre-eminently wild and extravagant. 4. To crown all, the proposed mission was to a place which was in extremest peril; for its wickedness had gone up before God, and we well know what that means.

When the Lord indicated to his servant, who had hitherto laboured only among the Galilean hills, that it was his will that he should proceed upon such an expedition, we can scarcely wonder that he hesitated to undertake it. It was self-denying work; for it required him to leave home and country. It was dangerous work; for if his message was regarded as insulting, his life would pay the penalty. It would probably be fruitless work; for all the chances were against such a people being subdued by his simple preaching. And, at the very best, it was certain to be a work in which he—the prophet—would gain no credit. But, on the other hand, if he had had faith as a grain of mustard-seed, and been possessed by such a spirit as animated Paul, he would have reasoned in a very different way. Is not this how he might have looked at the matter? "The dangers and difficulties in the enterprise cannot be disguised; but, First, It is a most blessed Catholic service this to which I am called. The God of all the families of the earth is not to confine his regard to but one people. He desires to bless other nations as well. Secondly, It is an honourable service. Hitherto my sphere has been but narrow. I have been ministering to a small and uninfluential people. Now I am called to what is the largest and most influential sphere in the world. Thirdly, It is an unspeakably important service; for if my mission is successful, and the king of Nineveh and his people repent and turn to Jehovah, who can tell what consequences will follow, both to the world at large and to the Church. And fourthly, In any case, it is a necessary service. Here is a great city in imminent danger. It is living in wickedness, and the cry of it has gone up to heaven. The sword of vengeance is hanging over it, as by a single hair. I must go to warn them of their peril, and point out to them the only way of escape."

This last would have been the breathing of the missionary spirit, which, however, Jonah did not feel till he had gone through a terrible experience,—till he had been, as it seemed to him, in the very belly of hell. When he was thus prepared for the work, we follow him into the city with wondering interest and admiration. He is the first God-sent missionary to the heathen—the type and forerunner of the Apostle to the Gentiles. Both wielded the same weapon,—the almighty word. Both had before them a mountain, apparently insuperable to overcome. But the success in each case is a standing illustration of the fact, that however disproportionate may seem the means to the end, the Church has within it an influence before which all the powers of the world will in the long run be laid prostrate.

"What cannot God do? Think not that he needs to wait for us. He can accomplish the greatest deeds by the meanest instrumentality. One man, if God willed it, might be the means of the conversion of a nation; nay, a continent should shake beneath the tramping of one man. There is no palace so high that this one man's voice should not reach it, and there is no den of infamy so deep that his cry should not be heard therein. All we need is that God should 'make bare his arm;' and who can withstand his might?"

STUDIES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND CHARACTER.

MAJOR-GENERAL PROLE.

THE name at the head of this paper has no recognised niche in the temple of Christian Biography, and we must therefore bespeak the reader's interest, by beginning with a few words of explanation. In the library of an old Indian officer,* we had come more than once upon a book which seemed greatly valued. It often lay on the reading table, its pages were profusely pencil marked, and the fly leaves at the beginning were written over with notes and illustrations. Although, then, the title was not particularly arresting—the volume was called "Memoirs of a Deist,"—we could scarcely help, under these circumstances, being attracted to it; and, assisted by the comments and explanations of our friend, who had himself served under General Prole in the east, we have had little difficulty in coming to the conclusion, that, if this venerable name is wholly unknown among us, it well merits a better fate.

"Bengal," writes the Christian soldier to whom we are indebted for an introduction to the subject of this sketch, "Bengal, from the prologue battle of Plassy in 1757, till the consummating conquest of Delhi in 1803, was—to the shame of its conquerors be it said—a kingdom of disgrace and darkness. The servants of the honourable Company were left to wander in the heathen wilderness, without either priest or temple of the true God. An entrance was denied to the eager, devoted missionary band. The obscene temples of the Hindus were patronized by the Christian Government, and its revenues enriched with their spoils. It was during this awful eclipse of the Sun of righteousness that General Prole entered on the scene, an ardent, gifted, self-reliant, infidel young soldier; and the conflict through which he passed, and his conversion, may perhaps be considered as a prefiguration of the contest between light and darkness which has since been taking place in our Indian dominions, and of the bright and glorious future which, we humbly hope, is yet to dawn upon that benighted land.

The account given by him of the experience through which he came, is in itself exceedingly remarkable, so much so, that John Newton, to whom it was submitted before publication, writes thus regarding it: "I think your book will be one of the most important, and, if the Lord pleases to give his blessing, may be one of the most useful publications of the age (1800). I know no book that displays such an exhibition of the heart of man, or (scarcely excepting my own Narrative), such an instance of the wonderful rich grace of the mercy of God to a chief sinner."

General Prole was born about the year 1756 or 1757, apparently in London. His father had been an officer in the navy, but his parents both died while he was very young, and he was left under the care of an uncle, who had spent the best part of his life in China, in the Civil Service of the East India Company. He himself, also, was destined by his guardian for the same service, but his predilections were so strong in favour of the military profession, that his uncle at length gave up his own plans, and procured for him a cadetship. India—the goal of his hopes, the El-Dorado of his visions—was reached on the 12th of September 1776, and he expected at once to enter on a life such as he fancied the stern Romans led when they advanced on their upward course to imperial supremacy. "I remembered with pleasure," says he, "what I had read at school concerning the supper conversations of the ancients; of the

* Lieutenant Colonel Vetch.

Grecian and Roman generals who amused and improved themselves and their officers by the discussion of military topics, by analyzing different orders of battle, and considering the conduct of other great commanders before them. I hoped to find something of this kind, but I soon discovered that I was looking for what had no actual existence. I was astonished and disappointed beyond measure to find the manners of Indian society approach nearer to those of my school-days, than to anything else I had ever experienced. I found, in short, that the manners of a gentleman were quite different things in England and in India; and that in the latter, nothing could pass for such, which was not blasphemous, or lewd, or vicious, or predatory; that is to say, the public being the common object of plunder." For a time he had not even the opportunities he longed for, of learning practically the art of war, but in 1778, a detachment of troops was sent from Bombay to the Malabar coast for some military purpose, and with considerable difficulty, he got himself transferred into it, that he might take a part in the expected fighting; and this was but one of several instances in which he showed, after a similar manner, his enthusiastic interest in the profession of his choice. But we have not the means of following him throughout his long career in India. All that we know further of his exterior life is this, that he fought through the war of the Carnatic, and was concerned in many other affairs of less importance, that he returned to this country a colonel about the year 1813, and that he died in England in 1834 or 1835. "I was under his command," says the friend already quoted, "during the last year or two of his Indian career. He was a most zealous and conscientious commanding officer in every respect. Indeed, I may say he carried it almost to an extreme; for, according to his principles, no allowance was to be made, in matters of duty, for human frailties; and he was himself so well aware of his uncompromising spirit, that he used to say that whenever he had to publish a reprimand in orders, he was sure to find it had been too severe, unless he had prayed for direction before penning it. He used himself to act as chaplain to the European soldiers at the out station where we were, assembling them in a vacant hospital on the Sabbath, and reading to them the Church of England service, and a sermon. Let me only add, that he was not in any respect a fanciful visionary. That formed no part of his character. His was strictly a mathematical mind."

With regard to the spiritual experience of General Proie, of which his narrative takes chief account, there was something singular about it almost from the first. His uncle paid an outward respect to the Bible and the ordinances of religion, but his spirit and behaviour in common life struck his young ward as being exceedingly inconsistent, and he was not, accordingly, very favourably impressed as a child with a Christian profession. But what little religion he had in his boyhood was banished when he went to school—the impiety, lewdness, and blasphemy, which were almost universal there, soon producing the same things from his heart, and driving all religious thoughts from his mind. At the same time, through the study of the classics, he became an enthusiastic admirer of the heroes of ancient Greece and Rome. In this spirit he read Pope's "Homer" so often, and with so much pleasure, that he could repeat whole books from memory; and it became his ambition to realize, in a manner, those glorious scenes which afforded him such pleasure in the mere contemplation. In a word, he grew to be a complete heathen, being a speculative admirer of all the virtues except humility, or the consciousness of unworthiness, and despising it for no other reason than that it was little accounted of by the heroes whom he worshipped. On leaving school he went to reside with a pious family whose example was influential enough to bring him back for a moment to a better state of mind. The grace of God, he even says, expanded his heart then to receive delight in religious sentiments; but the glow was all from the heart and the imagination, his head or judgment had little or no share in it, and although it had a good effect for the time in purifying his heart and conduct, it was soon driven away by more engrossing thoughts and occupations. The first thing that brought him down from the elevation that he seemed to reach was a romantic fit of love; that was succeeded by a plunge into the dissipations of fast life in London; and when the time arrived for his departure for India, he had got back very nearly to his old level, "Pope's Essay on Man" being adopted as his rule of faith in matters of religion. "Already," says he, "it (the Essay) appeared to me more rational and manly than the Bible. The two following lines convinced me that this great poet and philosopher was a staunch deist:—

'Slave to no sect, who takes no private road,
But looks through nature up to nature's God.'

This appeared to me to be the perfection of right reason and sound philosophy, and therefore I concluded that the few closing lines, in which he slightly mentions faith, were nothing more than an unwilling tribute, paid from necessity, to the prejudices and superstitions of the vulgar." With principles like these, the young cadet embarked for the East. He had, we may well say, not much to lose. But he tells us that if he had had any religious sense left, it could not but have been extinguished by the conversation and manners of the ship. There was no chaplain on board, and, consequently, no public worship. He himself was now too philosophical to pray in private, for he had come to the conclusion that as God knew much better than we do what is necessary for us, prayer to him is a kind of presumption and impiety, as well as absurdity. The result was, therefore, that, as he expresses it, he began "in good earnest to live as if there was no God in the world," and when the shores of Hindostan were reached, there was landed upon them one who bade fair to maintain to its fullest extent the character of the Company, as it then existed, for open unbelief and enmity to the gospel. He was not prepared to run a course of drunkenness and sensuality. There still remained with him, as we have seen, so much of the old Roman spirit as made him desire above all things distinction as a soldier, and repeating often to himself a favourite text from his Bible :—

"Who noble ends by noble means attains,
Or, falling, smiles in exile or in chains,
Like great Aurelius let him reign, or bleed
Like Socrates, that man is great indeed."

Repeating often to himself this favourite text, he had pictured to himself a life in which virtue would be loved for virtue's sake, and the times of the stoics or the times of chivalry be again restored. But with all that, he was at one with his brethren in both services in his relations to Christianity—and he was soon to learn that without it his fine fancies were just so many webs of gossamer, utterly unfit to preserve him from falling into the slough in which most of them were content to wallow. "By degrees," is his melancholy confession, "I lost much of my dislike to the manners of this new world, and as our common centre of gravity lay much nearer to them than to me, I became by degrees drawn into close contact with them. . . . I often lamented the dreadful necessity (as I called it) which drove me to do what, in my cooler moments I much condemned and despised, though not from religious motives. I often reflected with inexpressible regret upon my romantic love in England, which, wild as it had been, was honourable and beautiful when compared with these degrading connections. I wished that it was in my power to marry or to subdue my corrupt propensities altogether, which, if I could effect it, would be a noble effort and triumph of philosophy. But my increasing knowledge of the world soon drove away this notion. . . . Souls which are restrained from vice merely by pride and shame, resemble lakes which are contained and kept up to a certain height by banks of earth only. For pride and shame, that is to say, the hope and fear of the world's applause and censure can only act as a bank to the natural corruption of the human soul through ignorance of the depravity of the world around us; and therefore a little experience,—that is, a little communication through some weak part, soon brings down the waters of the lake of the mind to the common level! But religion is a reservoir in a solid rock, which lasts for ever, in spite of rats, and winds, and waters!" This last reflection was made as the fruit of painful experience. General Prole had landed in India a deist, but proud in his morality. He had not been many years a resident in it, when his life became as vile as his doctrine; and one consequence of this was, that his hatred of the truth as revealed in the Bible grew to be more intense and extravagant than it had ever been. Among various whims (as he calls them) which entered his mind in the depths to which he had sunk, was to reperuse the Scriptures, expecting much amusement in doing so, from the shrewd remarks and ingenious discoveries which he conceived he should certainly make in analyzing such a "mountain of superstition." He did accordingly begin the task, but after reading a very small portion of the sacred volume, it appeared to him so contrary to reason, justice, humanity, and even to common sense, that he did not hesitate to pronounce it a gross imposture, a palpable and impious forgery! and his righteous indignation being roused by this conviction being brought home to him, he seized the Book in a rage, threw it on the ground, and kicked it ignominiously out of the house!

All the while, however, God had his eye upon this man, and used at last his very vices to scourge him back to Himself. As has happened with others, in like circumstances, when his bodily powers became exhausted by abuse, his imagination only grew the more active and exuberant, and the Nemesis of remorse first appeared to him in dreams. These, he tells us, became so unspeakably dreadful that he one morning sprang out of bed, and from downright terror attempted (for the first time during several years) to pray for protection. "I was burning in the fires of hell, and possessed and tormented by a legion of evil spirits. In vain I called upon my former speculative love of glory, honour, and romantic virtue to my aid. These vain idols were gone; they were weak as water; they were distant as stars; they were as chaff carried before the wind. . . . From such misery as I experienced, I could find no remedy but death in some form; and as, in spite of my supposed philosophy, I was still too much of a coward in infidelity to venture to commit an action which seemed so final and irretrievable as suicide, I therefore resolved from that day to contend with double diligence and perseverance against my corruptions, and rather to die a thousand times in any other way, or by inches through my incessant and cruel torments, than ever again admit, or entertain for a moment, imaginations which I found by terrible experience to be so dangerous, so subtle, so penetrating, and so difficult to be effaced from the memory. In consequence of this incessant and fiery warfare within me, my existence was become a dream of horror, a dreadful burden, a curse as it were full of bitterness and wrath." Unspeakably miserable, however, as was his life at this time, he was able afterwards most clearly to see the grace of God in it. "How infinitely merciful," he reflects, "were all these chastisements! Had they not been inflicted, and in such an exquisite manner and degree, I should certainly have been lost for ever."

There now began a fierce and prolonged struggle,—the nature and varying fortunes of which very many will be well able to understand. Conscience, whose voice had been drowned, was at length speaking out with a force and importunity which could not be disregarded, and its victim (as we may well call him) made superhuman efforts to correct what was amiss in his conduct, and thus satisfy its demands. But he found it a Herculean task. Though he tried every means he could think of—business, study, incessant watchfulness, and the virtue he had formerly despised, great humility—he was far from succeeding as he wished in cleansing his heart and hands.

“Habits are soon acquired; but if we strive
To leave them off, ’tis being slayed alive.”

So he found it; and so will every man find it who thinks to make himself holy by his own strength,—to work out his salvation by his own efforts,—to lift himself out of the fearful pit without the aid of God’s almighty grace. The invisible hand of the Spirit, however, was now insensibly leading him towards the light. His endeavours after personal purity gave a wholesome direction to his thoughts and speculations. He began to examine, in a singular enough way certainly, the foundations of morality and religion; and by a process which we should find it somewhat difficult to render intelligible to our readers, he reasoned out to his own entire satisfaction the truth of evangelical Christianity. It was in the Fort of Dussore, which had been taken from Tippoo Sultan during the war in the Carnatic, that those studies were seriously begun which issued in such an unexpected result. First he framed what he conceived to be a perfect code of morals; next he rose to the conviction that there must be rewards and punishments, and consequently a judgment; then from an examination of the character of Jesus Christ in the light of his discoveries, he rose one step in his creed from pure deism to a kind of unitarianism; and thus he passed on from one point to another, until he not only became convinced of the truth of the gospel as an abstract fact, but, taught, as he was all through these investigations, of the Spirit, he became, in the highest sense, a believer in the light and a new man. The description which he gives of his feelings and conduct when he had been brought to see that the religion he had despised was the very truth of God, and that it had a vital personal interest for him, is one of the most remarkable of its kind we have ever read.

“When bed-time came,” he writes, “I desired to pray for pardon, peace, and protection; but when I attempted to kneel, I was opposed by I know-not-what spirit of dismal sullen pride, mixed with horror and despair, which painted me to myself in such colours that I feared to present myself, a wretch fit only for hell, before the Divine Presence. Yet feeling that it was absolutely necessary, and that there was no time to be lost, I, as it were by main force, bent my stubborn knees to the earth, not free from a wicked shame lest I should be detected in that humble posture, and raising my hands, remained for some time in that state, without daring to raise my eyes or thoughts to heaven, which appeared to me a presumptuous and vain effort. But at length a fresh agony of horror and terror forced open my mouth in broken ejaculations for mercy! Yet when I attempted to utter the words, Saviour! Jesus Christ! I could not produce them. I was again opposed by a suggestion that I did not believe in Him; that He knew this; that it was all mere pretence, extorted by fear; and that He would reject my impious hypocrisy! At last I exclaimed to this effect, ‘I do desire to believe in thee, O Lord; I see the glory of this belief; I feel the beauty of thy redemption,—the necessity of it! Oh, make me to believe; have mercy upon me, miserable sinner! Oh, save my soul from the powers of darkness!’ After some time passed in this manner struggling against the desperate assaults of infidelity, guilt, and despair, I became more composed and calm, and resigned myself into the hands of my God and Saviour with some degree of faith and hope. Yet I could not sleep; for a continual succession of gloomy ideas, heightened by the solitude and romantic wildness of the place, kept me waking. A tiger also that infested the hill, and broke the silence of the night with his hoarse voice (which resembled the action of a large saw on a bar of iron), appeared to my perturbed mind the messenger of the Prince of darkness, whose vengeance he seemed to denounce against me (as he stopped at the foot of the wall under my window) as a traitor and deserter!’”

The place where these soul exercises, so interesting in their relation to the history of spiritual religion in India, occurred, was a small hill fort, taken from Tippoo Sultan, called Ram-Ghurry; and the time, ever memorable it ought to be held, was the 2d or 3d of March, 1792. While all Europe was being convulsed by the events which succeeded the first French Revolution, there thus happened, among the mountains of distant Hindostan, a revolution of another kind, which, while it was of immediate and incalculable importance to the subject of it, we rejoice to regard as pointing also to future times, when the same influences by which it was brought about shall change the whole face and aspect of the Eastern world.

Up till this point in his spiritual history, General Prole had had no Bible. The copy he had once cast out of his house in a rage would now have been esteemed by him as more precious than rubies; but it had fallen into better hands, or rotted on the dunghill; and when he became anxious to possess the treasure it was not to be had. Immediately after his conversion he was moved to Bangalore, and there he made diligent inquiry after the word of life,—but it seemed nowhere to be found. Other books there may have been in plenty, but no one was known to possess a copy of the book of books. At last, however, God mercifully, and he says, almost miraculously provided him with what he sought; and this gift then became his great and almost his only study; and the more he read, the more he was comforted, encouraged, and instructed by its precious truths.

Of course there soon appeared in General Prole another instinct of the new nature,—the desire to bring others to that Saviour whom he had himself learned to value. He therefore gave up, so far, his recluse habits, and began to dine abroad sometimes, “always taking care to return thanks aloud before all the company." This novel proceeding, we are told, excited great surprise and amusement; and "No wonder," says Prole, "for neither they nor I had ever seen such a thing done before, at least, since the period of my arrival in India." His conduct, however, as he expected, provoked inquiry; and he was always ready to answer for himself, and give a reason of the hope that was in him. But he soon found that the prejudices of his companions against the gospel were, humanly speaking, insurmountable. "I only found," says he, "that some pitied me and advised me to abandon these follies, or I should be lost and ruined; that others despised and laughed at me as a crazy, weak-minded creature; and that others thought me likely to be a more serious disturber of the peace of society,—in short, a proud, presumptuous, conceited enthusiast." We may very well assure ourselves, however, that the labours of such a man were not lost. He was a handful of leaven; and the fact that, in our own day, so much of the mass is leavened, must be due, in part at least, to the influence and example of such as he was.

We must draw this sketch to a close; and we cannot do so in a better way than by quoting the description which he himself gives of his joy, when, for the first time after his great change, he was permitted to enter into the sanctuary of the Lord.

"When the march of the Carnatic detachment from Madras back to Bengal was concluded, and we arrived in Calcutta, I embraced with unfeigned joy the opportunity thus afforded me of joining in the public worship of my God and Saviour. When I entered the Church, to me indeed the temple of the living God, and compared my actual blessed state, with that in which I quitted Calcutta, my emotions of joy, faith, gratitude, and humble love to our Lord and Saviour, were indescribable. But when the organ broke on my ear, which I had not particularly expected, neither was thinking of, the solemn and heavenly tones of the instrument were so perfectly in unison with the sentiments awakened in the harp of my heart that I was quite overpowered; and in spite of all my efforts to restrain myself before so many spectators, I burst into a flood of joyful rapturous tears. . . . I made a point of receiving the holy sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which was to me 'meat indeed, and drink indeed.' In performing these duties I felt an inexpressible pleasure, because I did them from my heart. The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, was there as well as gratitude, which, blended with the sense of my own unworthiness and weakness, penetrated my heart in an indescribable manner."

May the last experience of this devout soldier—who, if not positively the first fruits of India to Christ, must have been one of the earliest sheaves of the harvest—be that of many now living in that still benighted land.

WEARINESS.

O PAIN perpetual! wearing strength away
While spirits flag and fail,
And all the many-coloured hues of life
Have faded, and grown pale.

Oh, thoughts unwedded to the deeds ye seek!
Life that all fruitless seems—
Long dull inaction, yet without repose;
All feeling, fear, and dreams!

'Tis thine infirmity, impatient soul:
Remember now the years
That are at God's right hand, and cast away
Thy grievances and fears.

Think of the infinite abyss of peace
In which thy lot shall be,
Where ages are but ripples that run o'er Eternity's deep sea.

Give thou God leisure to prepare thee for
That destiny sublime,
When e'en with lifeless things his hand works on,
Unheeding space and time.

Listen! borne inland from the rocky coast,
Comes the wild voice of waves,
Which for uncounted centuries have toiled,
Among the deep sea-caves.

This ray from yon fair star serenely bright
Now broken in thy tears,
Had travelled onwards, ere it reached thine eyes,
For sixty thousand years!

When times and spaces of such vast extent,
Before thy thoughts combine,
Into a momentary pang shrinks up,
This long, long pain, of thine.

Then, if thy weary heart recoils and faints
At such high wondrous ways,
Turn where the great Creator bears a life
Which thou canst count by days.

A few hours' agony, the bloody sweat
From that sunk form has wrung;
And a few more have brought him to the cross,
To die when he was young.

Strive thou in soul to sympathize with him.
The infinitely great:
For he has stooped to understand, and share
The weakness of thy state.

Give thanks; the Lord is patient; he will work
A perfect work in thee:
And grudge no time to make thee fit to bear,
Joy for eternity.

—"The Name of Jesus, and other Verses"

THE FIRST PASSOVER.

IN an obscure village among the hills of Galilee, and to a few peasants gathered at a festival, our Lord had first manifested his glory. It was now time that He should display it on a more open theatre, and on a grander scale. From Cana in its mountain seclusion, he "went down" to Capernaum, the most populous and thriving of the towns which, in those days, skirted the shores of the Lake to which so many events of his after life were to give a sacred and undying renown. The single association that glorifies Gennesareth is His name. Amid all changes, and for all time, the sea of the Gospels preserves unbroken and unruffled in its glassy mirror the image of the Son of man. It was but a brief sojourn that he now made by the shores of the Lake of Galilee, though his mother, his brethren, and his disciples accompanied him. The great feast was approaching, and he was anxious to keep the first passover of his public life at Jerusalem. This is the first time that Capernaum comes into notice in connection with his history,—a city that was to be signally honoured as the place of his familiar abode during the intervals of his laborious career; the only spot in all the borders of Israel where the Son of man might be said to have a home. By the singular grace thus conferred upon it, Capernaum, by his own witness, was exalted to heaven. In its synagogue, many of His discourses were uttered; on its streets, most of his mighty works were done; in its houses, his was a familiar and welcome name. Yet Capernaum has vanished, and none can tell where it stood. Its site, its memory, its very name have been swept into oblivion; and as one wanders along the solitary shore where the small waves ripple and murmur on the white shells His sandals trod on, and here looks wistfully on some ruins by a fountain, or there on some mouldering fragments scattered over a sterile mound, no voice breaks the silence and reveals the secret. He who once dwelt on this shore has left no footprint. Capernaum is only the shadow of a great name. Its doom was written in the hour when Jesus upbraided it and its neighbour cities, because they repented not; and it has passed away as if it had never been, because it knew not the time of its visitation.

In those days Capernaum was a rendezvous for travellers going up from northern Galilee to keep the pass-over at Jerusalem. It was probably with a view to join the pilgrim-caravan now assembling there, that our Lord proceeded directly thither from Cana. Unknown, save to the few believing souls he had called to follow him, He journeyed on with the company, as they kept their course down the sultry valley of the Jordan, and thence over the vine-clad slopes of Ephraim to the metropolis; or, avoiding the unfriendly villages of Samaria, took their route along the other side of Jordan, crossing at the fords of Jericho, and up the wild and perilous ravine to Jerusalem. Many a time, we may believe, He had made this journey during the years of his abode at Nazareth; but with the first glimpse from Olivet of the Holy City and the Temple on this occasion, new and strangely mingled emotions must have been awakened within him. In the few eventful weeks that had preceded, he has entered on a new era of life, and girt up his loins for a longer and harder pilgrimage than this. He has heard the voice that calls him to his special vocation, and to follow it has dashed down the barriers which the Tempter threw across his path. Anointed by the Spirit, filled with zeal for God's glory as the elect servant of the Highest, and with love to man as man's Redeemer, it is in a profounder sense he now feels that he must be "about his Father's business." The hour is come; and as His calm, thoughtful eye beheld the fair city, gleaming far on its terraced heights, and towering over it in solemn stateliness and immaculate beauty, the mystic Sanctuary, the sacred Tabernacle, whose recess had shrined the visible glory; as He saw the smoke wreath rising into the blue air from the high altar of sacrifice, and heard the murmur of the paschal throng ascending from the streets and courts, there must have been an intense and thrilling consciousness of the work that awaited Him within these walls, and of the fiery ordeal of suffering through which He was to pass ere the work could be done. Heretofore He has come and gone unnoticed in the crowd of worshippers; now His presence must be signalized by an exercise of power that is a self-revelation,—an act that has distinctly stamped upon it the Divine authority with which He is invested,—one in which the inmost spirit of His earthly life vividly shines out. The voice from the excellent glory has proclaimed Him God's beloved Son, and with the halo of this celestial baptism on His lowly brow, the Son of God now crosses the threshold of His Father's house.

The scenes of coarse and vulgar traffic that met His eye as He entered the sacred precinct must have been painfully familiar. As often as He came up from Galilee to the feast, the sight of this unseemly desecration, the clamour, the wrangling, and confusion of a market-place invading the peaceful cloisters that should have been sacred to devotion, must have jarred most rudely on a nature like his. Hitherto He had restrained himself,—possessed His soul in severe and sorrowful patience, for His time was not yet come. Now it is time to purge the holy place from this flagrant scandal; to expel the rabble of sordid and low-minded traffickers from its gates. It was the outer enclosure, the court of the Gentiles, to which strangers were freely admitted, fenced off from the three inner courts by a palisade of lattice work, which bore an inscription in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, forbidding all aliens to pass within, that was profaned by these abuses. The noise of the traffic that was carried on might not penetrate into the altar-court, but it must have disturbed many a devout proselyte of the Gate, who could only worship in the outer porches. The practice of allowing animals to be sold for sacrifice in the Temple colonnades had been at first tolerated by the Sanhedrim for the convenience of worshippers from a distance, but it had grown into an inveterate evil, which, there is reason to believe, the priests connived at for a share of the unholy profits. The money changers plied a lucrative and usurious trade, by receiving the foreign coin which pilgrims from remote countries brought with them in exchange for the half shekel, which every Israelite was required to pay as a capitation tax into the sacred treasury. The whole system, in its gross and unblushing secularity, was a lamentable index of the decline of spiritual life in the Jewish priesthood, the proper guardians of the purity of worship. Such an unsightly excrescence, or fungous growth, adhering to the walls of the national sanctuary, could only have sprung up and thriven on the corruption of its ancient faith.

Priest and Levite, fresh from the service of the Holy Place, were mingling with the motley groups, or idly looking on, as the busy crowd of buyers and sellers thronged the great bazaar. In their souls the "zeal of God's house" had long been quenched by utter worldliness. Profoundly unconscious must they have been of words they had often repeated at the altar, ere they could have allowed the dwellers in the tents of wickedness to be door-keepers of the house of God. How great must have been the wonder and the commotion when this Man in the peasant garb of Galilee, with the dust of pilgrimage on his coarse raiment, stood forth with the fire of an old prophet kindling in his eye,—when with a scourge hurriedly twisted from the cords that tied the victims to the pillars, or the rushes that strewed the pavement, He, with imperious voice and indignant gestures, drove the terrified crowd of dealers, vile and brutish as the beasts they owned, from the precincts they polluted,—scattered the heaps of coin that were piled on the usurers' tables on the pavement, and commanded the sellers of doves to remove them forthwith, saying, "Make not my Father's house an house of merchandise." In the treatment of this last class of vendors we may discern a trace of greater mildness, as if He would deal more leniently with those who sold the offerings of the poor.

It might seem strange that a solitary and unknown stranger should have been able to expel these intruders without opposition,—without even a murmur. But in His look and bearing there must have been something undefinable that overawed them. His voice must have pierced, quick and powerful, to the conscience, carrying with it an impression of more than human authority. They must have seen in Him the grave and solemn majesty with which Elijah, or the Prophet of the Desert, would have rebuked the desecration, so that they could not resist the power by which He spake, and quailed in silence before the irresistible influence that went forth from Him.

Such was the first public manifestation of His glory, made in a form for which even his disciples, with their remembrance of the miracle of Cana so quietly and secretly performed, could not have been prepared. To the Virgin, with her recollections of the simple home-life of Nazareth, where, in meek and gentle obedience, He had been subject to his earthly parents, it must have come like an abrupt revelation of character,—a sudden and startling disclosure of that higher life, whose mystery a mother's love could not fathom,—into whose inner secrets the natural ties that united them gave her no right to enter. These words, "My Father's house," must have struck to her heart, as the echo of these premonitory words uttered in the Temple-court so long ago, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

This assertion of righteous authority is the first step in the career of devoted and self-sacrificing service of which He had then vaguely spoken. He has come to Jerusalem to enter on his Father's business in the sight of men; and as a visible pledge of His mission, as well as a grave preparation for work so solemn, His initial act is to purify His Father's house. It was evident to the disciples that a holy passion for the honour of God and the sacredness of the ordinances He had appointed was burning in His soul, and breathing into his words and actions a supernatural inspiration. They remembered the words of one of the Messianic psalms, "The zeal of Thine house hath consumed me," and applied them to Him in whose person and work so many other sayings of ancient Scripture were to find complete fulfilment. But there was in this manifestation more than zeal. It was an act of judicial severity that could only have been performed by one who was in himself divine,—one who was not like Moses, a servant in the house of God, or like one of the sacred Levitical caste, a minister of the sanctuary, for He did not spring from Levi, being of another tribe, Judah, of which "no man gave attendance at the altar,"—but who was a Son over the house,—the Lord of the Temple, invested with full power to control its discipline and economy. The disciples might have remembered other words as signally verified,—all the more that they had heard so recently the voice of the Forerunner, which was to be the immediate prelude to their accomplishment,—

"Behold, I will send my messenger,
And he shall prepare the way before me;
And the Lord whom ye seek Shall suddenly come to His temple,
Even the Angel of the covenant whom ye delight in."

Behold He cometh, saith the Lord of hosts.
 But who may abide the day of His coming?
 And who shall stand when He appeareth?
 For He is like the fire of a refiner,
 And like the soap of fullers; [the lye of the washers.]
 And He sitteth as a Refiner and Purifier of silver;
 And He purifieth the sons of Levi,
 And refineth them as gold and as silver,
 And they bring near to the Lord an offering in righteousness."

The Lord has come suddenly to his Temple,—the Son to His Father's house,—to sift, to winnow, to cleanse, to separate the chaff from the wheat, to discern between the precious and the vile. This act is the sovereign, judicial procedure of Him who comes with the fan in His hand thoroughly to purge His floor,—the sign that He is to baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire,—the solemn beginning of the work which from age to age He, as King and Head of the Church, the great Melchizedek reigning in righteousness, is to carry on in the earth,—purging the pollution from the midst thereof by the spirit of judgment and the spirit of burning, and whose consummation is to be when, on the throne of his glory, He presides over the last ordeal which is to try every man's work of what sort it is, and in the rigid, unerring, unalterable discernment, judgment shall be brought forth to victory.

These things were for an allegory. To every heart to which he comes as the Saviour He must come as the Purifier,—throwing a searching illumination into its inmost recesses,—revealing the hidden evil that lurks within it,—the pride, the selfishness, the impurity, the ungodliness, that taint its multitude of thoughts, so that it has become the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird;—and then by the Spirit of light and truth cleansing its dark and desecrated chambers, casting out the usurping passions, the vanities, the low and carnal aims, that have long ruled over it,—making it again the Father's house, an habitation into which He can enter, and in which He delights to dwell.

The purification of the Temple was, as we have seen, accomplished without an effort at resistance, as if great fear had fallen for the moment on all who witnessed it. To the first impression, as was natural, feelings of jealousy and rage quickly succeeded. The contrast between His appearance and His pretensions was too violent. What right had a peasant of Galilee to stand forth brandishing the prophet's menacing scourge under the eyes of stoled and mitred rabbins, the venerable custodiers of the holy place? Something like the taunt to Moses,—“Who made thee a judge and a ruler over us?”—comes out in the inquiry of the Jews, probably priests and scribes, members of the Sanhedrim, who had gathered round him, veiled, however, under a desire for fuller information, “What sign showest Thou us, seeing that Thou doest these things?” They have allowed Him, unchallenged, to take his own course,—what evidence can He now give to satisfy them that He had a right to assume these sacred and awful functions in the house of God?

To this question a prompt answer was returned,—one of those characteristic utterances of His purposely mysterious, and to those who first heard it, unintelligible, but one which in its infinite significance, a later day was to interpret,—the dark and occult ciphers of the oracle starting forth in spiritual clearness, as if inscribed on these Temple walls by the finger of God.

“Jesus answered and said unto them, DESTROY THIS TEMPLE AND IN THREE DAYS I WILL RAISE IT UP.” Most memorable to us is this first allusion to His death,—this sign, on the very threshold of His mission, of His divine insight into the future,—His intuitive knowledge that by the hands of these very men, the ministers of the material temple, the true tabernacle, in which the brightness of the excellent glory was enshrined, was to be laid in ruins. Into minds like theirs, so crusted with formalism, the profounder meaning of these words could not penetrate. Their nature was so hardened in its earthy mould that it could take no impress of spiritual truth. They could only attach to them some gross materialistic sense, debasing and perverting them into the utterance of a safe and vapid boast, as if He challenged them to put His power to the proof on conditions that were simply impracticable. They looked round them, on the edifice of which they were so proud as one of their national glories, the centre point of their symbolic worship, now complete in more than its primal magnificence,—colonnades, terraces, sumptuous porticos, and golden gates, glowing in the fresh and snow-white beauty of Herod's restoration, and said in bitter scorn, “Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt Thou rear it up in three days?” Sufficient rebuke, as they deemed it, to a foolish and flippant assertion, passed over in contemptuous silence at the time, but never to be forgotten. As an insult to their holy place, the Palladium of the Theocracy, it rankled in their hearts, to be often quoted against the hated Teacher of Galilee in their secret conclaves; to come forth in strangely distorted shape as a formal charge against Him when he stood arraigned for blasphemy at their bar; to be hurled in cruel sarcasm against Him to embitter His dying agonies, when “they that passed by reviled Him, wagging their heads and saying, Thou that destroyest the temple and buildest it in three days, save thyself.”

HE SPAKE OF THE TEMPLE OF HIS BODY. They had asked for a sign and a sign was given, which, though neither they nor his chosen disciples could understand it at the time, was, ere long, to be literally verified. That temple of His humanity, pure and undefiled, the earthly tabernacle wherein the Word made flesh screened His essential glory from human eyes, was to be defaced and broken, and laid in the dust. Its framework was to be dissolved, its sanctity violated in so far as earthly malice, inspired and aided by the powers of darkness, could execute its wicked will. And then in three days, in the darksome secrecy of the sepulchre, of His own will and by His own power, was He to build it up entire, and unblemished, incorruptible, and immortal, raising it up out of mortal weakness and abasement as a trophy of His almighty power, for its seeming dishonour refining and transfiguring it with spiritual beauty, and then exalting the glorified form of His and our humanity to the throne of heaven for evermore.

Not till the Resurrection was past, under the teaching of the promised Spirit of Truth, the Comforter, were these words, in their vital significance, brought to the remembrance of His followers. The dark enigma was then fully solved, the faded colours of the impression were suddenly revived, and in the light of that earliest testimony to His death and resurrection, "they believed the Scripture and the word that Jesus had said."

FORTY AND SIX YEARS WAS THIS TEMPLE IN BUILDING. Little thought those who thus boasted of its splendour that in less than forty years it would be overthrown. They little deemed that in their plotting to do violence to "the temple of His body," they were only hastening a ruin and desolation from the thought of which they would have recoiled with horror. By the hands of its builders that Temple fell; it was their sin in crucifying the Lord of glory that laid it even with the ground, and left not one stone of it upon another.

Through His decease, accomplished at Jerusalem, the Son of man was to lay the foundations of a spiritual temple which was to supersede that earthly building so soon to pass away,—that Church which, in another sense, is "His body," an house not made with hands, in which each believing soul is a living stone,—a temple, which is the glory of no one chosen people, but of all lands and nations, silently growing up from day to day to harmonious completeness and eternal beauty. In the place of the temple made with hands stands the temple made without hands, consecrated by the indwelling of the living God, wherein the holy priesthood of faithful and loving souls offer up the sacrifice of praise.

This passover was further signaled by the first miracles our Lord had wrought in the public view. The Jews had asked for a sign, and at the moment, He had not granted the kind of sign they sought. Now, wonders are performed before their eyes which might have convinced them of His Messiahship, and which, in fact, led many to believe on his name. Yet, as if to show that the belief produced by miracles was in but few cases saving faith, we are told that "Jesus did not commit Himself unto them,"—did not associate them with Himself, because He knew all men.

That Omniscience which pierced the secrets of the heart could discern that the signs which constrained the mind to acknowledge Him as a prophet, did not necessarily persuade the soul to accept Him as a Saviour. Of the many who believed in Him as a divinely-commissioned teacher, few were led to inquire further and follow out their convictions to honest and effectual results.

It is this that gives a peculiar interest to the case of Nicodemus, and, no doubt, with this view it has been placed on lasting record. The mighty works that compelled the ruler of the Jews to acknowledge that Jesus was a teacher come from God, could not of themselves impart to him any saving enlightenment. They left him standing outside the region of spiritual truth. All the mysteries of the kingdom of God—grace, redemption, and divine renewal—were hidden from the master of Israel in profoundest obscurity, until he sought the Saviour for himself, stood face to face with Him, and heard His living voice disclose the momentous truth that held the secret of salvation.

WANDERINGS OVER BIBLE LANDS AND SEAS.

GALILEE.

On Monday, June the 30th, our sojourn at Tiberias was to close. Once more, before mounting our horses, we walked over the places in the immediate neighbourhood of the baths, which had grown so familiar to us. The hot springs, steaming with their sulphurous odour, as they poured into the lake, over the shingly beach; the black stones and rocks scattered round; the little waves curving round our creek; the steep cliffs behind, their slopes tufted here and there with dry, thin vegetation. We gathered a few pebbles and shells, sat a few moments on the rocks, and listened to the ripple of the quiet waves; drew the sweet, fresh water from the lake in the hollow of our hands, and drank, and bathed our faces in it; and brought every sense into contact with the sacred scene, as if instinctively to stamp its reality on our hearts, and to associate a recollection with every sense, when memory and pictures would be all we had left of it.

We had seen the lake in so many aspects. At midnight we had looked out from our tent door, quite close to the water's edge, over the clear sky, full of brilliant stars and countless nebulae, with one planet shining over the dim hills on the other side, and casting a long silvery reflection like moonlight on the rippling lake. At early morning we had watched the glorious golden dawn spread over the sky above the eastern hills, till the sun rose behind them; in the haze of noonday heat we had seen it with the reflection of the opposite mountains warm and rich, and every crevice and cove distinct in the reality and the reflection; with the breeze rippling the waters, and crisping the little waves into foam; and so still that the fish could be seen swimming through it in multitudes, their leaping up the only sound which broke the silence. We had been by its deserted cities, its gardens or wildernesses of oleanders in full rosy bloom; its quiet sands and pebbly beaches; its black, volcanic, craggy hills, and "desert places near the cities;" and now we were to travel for a few days through Galilee to the Gentiles.

We soon climbed the shoulder of the height above Tiberias, and reached the hill with two summits or horns on the edge of the table-land, from which we had our last near, yet comprehensive view of the lake. This hill is called Kurun Hattin, and is entitled by tradition the Mount of Beatitudes,—those who have studied the subject seem to think with every probability of truth. It is a mountain,—a distinct and elevated summit,—and yet not wild and craggy, but containing platforms and slopes on which multitudes might have gathered and listened. Its situation is central; great multitudes from the towns and villages among the wooded hills of Galilee on the north, from Decapolis, even from Jerusalem, and from beyond Jordan, might easily congregate here; whilst Capernaum, into which our Lord entered so shortly after the sermon on the mount, and healed the centurion's servant, is (if the site be near Khan Minyeh) quite close at hand on the shores below.

There is something in the commanding situation of Kurun Hattin peculiarly suitable for a discourse spoken "with authority." The sermon on the mount is so different in character from most of our Lord's teaching. It is not so much the Oriental teacher, the Rabbi, impressing truths on disciples with endless variety of parable and illustration. Still less is it the friend conversing with friend, as on the quiet beaches of Genesareth. It is the Lawgiver, the royal Lawgiver, proclaiming from the throne the laws of the kingdom of God—the laws by which he will judge when he sits on the judgment-seat. And this hill, commanding the wide plain of Hattin, and, far below, the blue waters of the Sea of Galilee in their deep, oval hollow (then reflecting in its bosom the white walls of busy cities, and the marble façades of Roman villas, and the sunlit or tawny sails of countless boats), seems a fit throne for such a proclamation.

It began not judicially, but divinely; not with denunciations, but with benedictions; and then through all its searching and humbling, yet homely precepts, sealed by the majestic "I say unto you," it proceeds to the announcement of that day when the most appalling words that can be heard will be those from his lips, "I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work iniquity." The benedictions were unheeded, the promises were disregarded, the warnings were despised; and now on that house of prosperity and splendour, "built on the sand," the "rain" has indeed "descended," and the winds have blown, and it has fallen, and "great was the fall of it."

The gracious title, Mount of Beatitudes, echoes with a reproachful tenderness, sadder than any curse from that height on the deserted shores of the forsaken, lonely Sea of Galilee.

With the recommencing of our journey, recommenced one of the most continually interesting features of our sojourn in the Holy Land,—the realizing in some measure, by our own toil and fatigue, what the toil and weariness of our Lord must have been during the ceaseless journeys on foot of the years of his ministry, so much of which was spent in Galilee. Galilee is not an easy country to travel over in this hot climate. It is very hilly; and it is impossible to pass from one village to another on these hill-sides, or among these narrow valleys, without climbing many a steep and rugged path.

After leaving Kurun Hattin we crossed a ridge of hills, partly wooded with evergreen trees and shrubs, with prickly or glossy leaves, into another plain, or low broad valley, parched and waterless. Here, we had been told, was one of the supposed sites of Cana of Galilee; but our guide, through some misunderstanding, had been left behind, and therefore we had to trust to our own researches.

The soil of the valley seemed fertile, and in some places cultivated; but the crops had all been gathered in, and we had to plough our way through the dry clods of brown, sun-baked earth, among which from time to time were scattered round stones like potatoes, which, when broken, we found contained crystals of spar in the centre.

Hills more or less wooded swept down into the valley, and on the sides of these we often saw ruins, which we thought might be those of Cana, and were sure must be those of towns and villages where our Lord taught and healed the sick on his many journeys to teach and preach in their cities. We rode up the hill-sides to two of these heaps of ruins. Their extent, and the size of the carefully hewn stones, gave them more claim to the title of cities than to that of mere villages. In both there were a number of ruined walls, not merely scattered stones, as in the poor ruins of Southern Palestine, but fragments of well-built, massive walls, with extensive water-tanks and deep wells, now, indeed, all dry. At the second there was a very fine deep well, with a large carved trough beside it, all now dry and empty, and full of snakes crawling up its sides. We should have examined this more closely, but for a skirmish among our horses, one of which was vicious, and in his efforts to bite another, nearly wounded one of us, but happily only tore the clothes instead. Nevertheless, we had time to speculate whether this well, now so significantly haunted by serpents and noisome reptiles, was not once the pure and abundant fountain from which were filled the six water-pots of stone at the marriage-feast. No vineyards now on these slopes, no water in these fountains to be turned into wine by miracle, or by the wondrous chemistry of nature, meekly ministering always at the command of the same voice; no festive homes now in the village, where Jesus, and his mother, and his disciples once were guests!

On descending the hill we had to ride still a long way through the hot valley, without shade, or water, or refreshment of any kind (our muleteer with the provision saddle-bags having failed us), until we came to a village. It was a dreary, oppressive ride along that burning plain or valley, where the hills kept off all the air, but gave no shade. From sunrise when we started, till past noon, throughout that valley we saw not one human being, and tasted not one drop of water but the cupful we had brought in our little flasks. This is perhaps partly the reason why the village we reached on that noon (the name of which we do not know) stands out as such a cool, refreshing picture, a green type of shade, and refreshment, and rest. It was situated on a slope at the further edge of the plain. The oxen were treading out the corn on the thrashing-floor levelled in the rocky side of the hill, and near it was a spring of good, cool, sweet water, an abundance of which was poured into the troughs for our thirsty horses. It was always one of the especial pleasures of our journey to see and hear the eager delight with which those tired, patient creatures sucked in the water when we came to a well.

The people of this village were very friendly and open-hearted. When we dismounted they brought us bread and water, and what was a rare luxury, an abundant supply of good sweet milk.

Our horses were fastened to the outer branches of a gigantic oak, whilst we rested under the shade of the same tree; and the villagers assembled in various groups around us, the men gravely sitting on the ground in little parties, discussing the strangers, and the women timidly approaching in the background, wondering especially at the Frank "sit" (lady).

In many of the villages through which we passed it would neither have been pleasant nor safe thus to dismount and repose without guard or arms of any kind in the midst of the people. More than once angry and contemptuous glances and gestures had been directed against us, which made us glad to escape; but in this Galilean village all seemed simple, and friendly, and hospitable, reminding one of the tales of Arab simplicity and hospitality scattered through French "Recueils choisis," and juvenile literature of that kind.

Thus we had a delicious hour of repose and refreshment under the shade of that magnificent oak, with the hum of the villagers' conversation lulling us to sleep, like the noon-day murmur of bees. But there was one little incident in connection with that friendly village which more than all its shade, and rest, and hospitality, has stamped it with a kind of tender, sacred interest on our memories.

Among many of these simple peasants there is a prevalent belief that every Frank is a Hakim, a wise man, a doctor, a physician. Before we left, therefore, two or three of the women who had been timidly hovering near, ventured close, and taking me as the mediator, anxiously pointed to the sick children in their arms. The little creatures were evidently drooping and suffering. One poor mother I especially remember who brought us two sick little ones, and seemed to forget all her timidity in her longing to have them cured, and her confidence that we could do them good. We can never forget her imploring looks and gestures, and the beseeching tones of her voice, as she looked at us and then pointed to the little sufferers. And we could only stroke the little drooping head that leaned languidly on her bosom, and take the little feverish hands in ours, and give her kind looks, and hoping she would understand the pity in our tones as well as we could not fail to comprehend the distress in hers.

She little knew the mingled emotions her entreaties called up in our hearts, or the scenes they recalled of the days of the Son of man on earth, when in this Galilee, perhaps in this very village, they "brought unto Him all that were diseased, and he healed them." "For in Him was life," and in us was nothing, to help those poor, distressed, confiding people! It touched us very deeply to be appealed to in this way as superior beings, and feel so powerless to do or even to say anything to help them. How we longed to be able to tell those poor mothers of Him!

But kind looks and a little money were all we had to give these friendly villagers; and with many a lingering look we mounted our horses, and took leave of our hosts.

From this village the scenery became less monotonous and dreary. We left the burning narrow plain along which we had been riding so many hours, and crossed some beautiful breezy hills, wooded with green shrubs, dwarf trees, like a coppice lately felled, with some of the taller trees left standing. On the other side of the hills we came to a large village called Shef Arma, where the women crowded round me with eager childish curiosity, wanting to examine the contents of my carriage-bag, and the meaning of my note-book, which I took out and wrote in to amuse them. We had to wait here some little time to gain information as to our tents, which we found had been pitched at the further end of the town. We were not sorry to escape from the curious crowds who were rapidly gathering around us. They were by no means so respectful and courteous in their demeanour as the friendly peasants in the village of our midday halt, and we were glad to find our encampment removed some little way from the houses in an olive-garden at the outskirts of the town. Near our tent was a large draw-well, at which the women of the village seemed incessantly to be filling their pitchers. The veiled figures were constantly passing with pitchers on their heads or shoulders, and the noise of eager talking, broken every now and then by angry disputing, did not cease till sunset, and recommenced before sunrise the next morning.

On Tuesday, July the 1st, we set off soon after sunrise for Caipha, on the sea-coast, and Carmel. Our route, after descending from the hills, lay over sand-heaps covered with dry, long-stalked plants, varied with flowering shrubs, one with a crimson bell-shaped flower, and another with blue spike of blossom like the Veronica in our gardens. It reminded me of the sands swept in for miles by the Atlantic, on some parts of the western coast of Cornwall, tossed by waves, and drifted by winds into countless hillocks, bound together by coarse grass and various seaside plants.

On our left rose the range of Carmel, which we were approaching, and which forms the point at the southern extremity of the bay. Some of our party diverged from the plain, and rode a little way along its wooded sides. Carmel is not an isolated height like Tabor, or even a distinct mountain like Hermon, but a long range of fertile hills, broken by wooded dells, yet sufficiently united to constitute one ridge, terminating in the steep cliffs of the promontory, from which the white walls of the great mother-convent of the Carmelites look far over the Mediterranean. Among that long wooded range was the rocky height in the forest, commanding sea and plain, with its spring near it, which is supposed to be the scene of Elijah's sacrifice. But of this we did not hear until too late to visit it.

Before reaching Caïpha, at the foot of the promontory, we forded a wide but shallow stream, close to the sea. We were told to follow carefully and closely in the steps of our guide, because, above and below, the current was stronger and deeper, and might cause us some difficulty. Where we crossed it did not wet our feet, and just served to cool the legs of our horses. Yet this was "that ancient river—the river Kishon," which forces its way through a pass of Carmel some few miles above. Its whole course in summer is not more than a few miles, and its depth, I believe, in no part sufficient to navigate the smallest boats. But it is perennial, a quality which gives any stream, of a few miles' course, a claim to be called "ancient," in the land of shortlived summer torrents; and after the rains, no doubt it would sweep a fugitive army, attempting to cross it without knowing the fords, with irresistible force into the sea. More than this the song of Deborah does not imply, although to northern imaginations the words certainly suggest a very different river, from the small stream quietly pursuing its way over the sands which we forded on that summer noon.

In Caïpha we watered our horses. It was more like a town than any place we had entered since leaving Jerusalem, but not one Bible association detained us among its narrow streets, and after a short delay, we commenced the ascent to the promontory of Carmel. The road was good and wound up the face of the hill, overlooking the sea, and in some places shaded by fine trees.

In the convent we were most kindly and hospitably entertained by Frère Charles, who had just returned from a tour on the business of his order in France. He showed us his album, to which all visitors, if they wish it, are desired to contribute either with pen or pencil. The air of the whole place was rather French than Oriental, from our polite and lively entertainer himself, to the suite of rooms with French furniture provided for those who wish to stay any time at the convent. There was certainly little in what we saw there to recall either Elijah, according to Carmelite tradition, the founder of the order, or St. Louis, the founder of this convent; but into the interior of the monastery, of course, feminine feet dare not intrude. From the windows, and from the garden below, we looked down on the Mediterranean, breaking on the sands at the foot of Carmel far below. The steep sides of the cliff were dotted with olives, and with the breezes on this height, this broad sweep of sea in front, and the fruitful wooded range of Mount Carmel, with its glades and shady dells stretching inland behind, one can well fancy a heart weary with the hollow conventionalities of the European world turning to the monastic seclusion of this mountain, swept clear of conventionalities (it might be fancied) by the grand recollections of its solitary prospect, as its atmosphere is swept pure of malaria by the sea-breezes. There are, moreover, means of exercising benevolence in the Pharmacie, now presided over by an Italian monk. We understood Frère Charles to say that many of the neighbouring peasants apply for medical advice and remedies here, but that little gratitude is manifested by them, and no missionary work making progress among them. Have any of the monks who reside here, and say mass over "Elijah's cave," indeed come here with such thoughts, and if so, what have they found? Rest for those heavy-laden with earth's cares—reality and truth for those weary with the world's falsehood—are to be found in no place or thing, but in One Person, as near us in Paris as on Carmel. It would be interesting to know something of the interior life of these Syrian convents, whose outer courts make such hospitable resting-places for travellers,—unless, indeed, the monastery is only a reproduction of the hollow outside world in miniature, the larger ambitions of the court and camp exchanged for the petty ambitions of the monk.

With a grateful feeling towards Frère Charles for his cheerful courtesy, we left the convent in the afternoon, and wound our way again down the face of the cliff to Caïpha.

From Cuïpha, after re-crossing the Kishon, we had a beautiful cool ride of fifteen miles, over the sands along the curve of the bay to Akka (Acre). Here our encampment was in a garden, or orchard of palms, figs, and olives. Our Maltese cook had established his crocks and pans under the romantic shade of those trees. A little stream or river crept quietly along beside our garden, and found its way into the sea over the sands, not five minutes' walk off. The murmur of the Mediterranean made music for us all day and night. In sight rose the walls and towers of Acre, with all its crusading memories. Altogether it was a kind of "pleasant arbour" in the midst of the "Hill Difficulty" of our material pilgrimage, and the spirit of dreaminess and slumber came over us, so that between that and a discussion as to our future route, we did not leave our garden until rather late on the next day, Wednesday, July the 22d.

In the afternoon we rode through the poor streets and bazaars of Acre, and then leaving it, along the undulating sand-heaps drifted in by the sea to El-Bussah. The views on this reach of the Mediterranean were very fine. A noble amphitheatre enclosed the plain of Acre, from Carmel to the range south of Tyre, an arc of which the blue sea was the chord. At El-Bussah we found an abundant clear spring, rising pure and fresh as many springs do along the coast from this to Tyre, within a few yards of the sea. Cattle were being watered there; not sheep and goats, "lesser cattle" merely. We did not encamp near the spring, on account of the mosquitoes, but a little further inland, and higher up, beneath the hills which form the great barrier between the Holy Land and the shores of Tyre and Sidon, dividing the maritime plain of the south from that of the north.

No sandy beach lies between the sea and this promontory, as at Carmel. To cross from the land of Israel to that of the Phœnicians, you must scale the cliff by the rugged path called the Tyrian ladder.

We used the little light left in wandering about the rocky shore, so different from the smooth sands which all along the ancient Philistine coast border the almost tideless Mediterranean. Here, on each side of the strip of sand through which the fresh waters of our spring found their way into the sea, stretched a rugged platform of rocks, broken by little salt-water pools, reminding us of those on the coast of Cornwall. Some of our party found shells on the rocks. This is the commencement of the bold high promontory which forms the boundary of Palestine.

The next day (Thursday, July the 3d), was a day of adventures, of some danger and great fatigue; but we cannot regret it, as it gave us a far more extensive acquaintance with the hills and valleys of Galilee, than we should have gained by the ordinary route.

By a misunderstanding, our party was broken into three divisions, one of us wandering off alone, the muleteers, guides, and dragoman taking the ordinary route, whilst four of us, including a German servant, whose stock of Arabic was only a few words richer than our own, set off together expecting to be soon rejoined by the dragoman who had gone in search of our lost companion.

The original goal of the day's march had been Banias, but the muleteers positively pronounced this unattainable; and the point finally fixed on to be reached was Bint-y-Jebail (the daughter of the mountains), a village deep among the wild hills of Galilee. The name of this village, and its direction by the compass, was all we had to direct us, except that we wished to see, on our way, the ruined castle of Tirschiha, which we had been particularly desired at Jerusalem not to miss.

We first ascended a hill on the right of the plain by El-Bussah, from which we had a beautiful view of the whole plain of Acre, bounded on the south by Carmel stretching its hilly range far into the sea. On this hill we found a village. It was very silent; it seemed as if the inhabitants had deserted it to work in the fields. But two men appeared in answer to our call, and of them we asked the way to Tirschiha. They pointed across the plain to the opposite hills, but as they spoke they drew so suspiciously near, laying hold on our bridles and looking so dangerous, that we were glad to break from them and descend the hill as rapidly as we could. We had been told that the villagers among these Galilean hills are often very unfriendly and thievish, indeed, little better than bandits, to defenceless travellers, and we had no arms amongst us.

On reaching the plain we rode fast over it, and made a most difficult cross-country ascent of the hills on the other side, over rocks and through thickets of prickly bushes, only guided by cattle tracks, and often losing even these. Once in a glade of the forest we caught sight of a herdsman with a drove of cattle, and called to him to show us the way. But the more we called him the more he wouldn't come. He probably mistook us for Bedouins or Bashi Bazouks, and prudently made all haste out of our reach, hiding himself among the brushwood. With this exception we saw or heard no human being for hours, and after wandering from sunrise till noon over this ridge of wooded hill, we found ourselves on the edge of a dark, narrow ravine. From the bottom of this ravine, far, far below, came to us the sound of a stream eddying and falling among stones, like a Devonshire river. It was like the voice of a friend; and after debating some minutes whether we should attempt to skirt the valley or cross it, we could not resist the voice of the river, but dismounted from our horses, and throwing the bridles over their necks, began the perilously steep and rugged descent, guided partly by a track, made probably by wild cattle, to the stream. We reached the border of the river in safety, and resolved to make our midday halt there.

For half an hour after we gave ourselves up to rest. More we dared not allow ourselves, not knowing how many hours of difficult riding might be before us in this wild country. We took the cold chicken and Arab bread out of Wilhelm's saddlebags, and drank of the pure, cold stream. For our poor horses there was nothing but such herbage or leaves as they could crop from the rocks and bushes; but the powers of endurance of these little Syrian horses are wonderful.

The scene around us was quite different from any of our previous experiences of the Holy Land. We could have imagined ourselves in any wooded mountain district in Europe. The ravine was very deep and narrow, and its sides were clothed with tangled wood. At our feet the cold, pure stream or river tumbled over rocks, or eddied in pools with sandy bottoms. Close beside it opposite us rose the ruins of a Gothic church, with arched doors and windows, a relic, no doubt, of crusading times. Crowning the opposite height far above us rose the ruins of a massive ancient castle. But what this church and castle are called, to this day we know not. It was enough to give interest to that day's wanderings that we were among the hills of Galilee.

After our brief rest our next anxiety was to find a path out of the ravine on the opposite side. When our German servant believed he had discovered one, we followed him across the river, dismounting on the other side to lead our horses through the prickly thickets, under the branches of the trees, which grew too low to admit of our riding under them. But the path became more and more impracticable, and at last disappeared altogether, blocked up by masses of rock. Two of us went forward, leaving the four horses in charge of the rest, and scrambled with much difficulty up the precipitous rocks, to see if we could anywhere descry a practicable path. By climbing over rocks, rubbish, and ruins, we reached the foot of the castle, and there found again traces of the path the fallen rocks had blocked up. The frightened horses had to be dragged round by the same way, as no other appeared. One of them all but lost his balance on the precipitous rocks, and the others reared and struggled, but at length they were all brought safely through into the clearer space, and we remounted. The castle was very extensive and massive, with ruined walls fallen into the moats. It appeared to us, from the brief investigation we had time to bestow, a fortress of the Crusaders, reared on the gigantic foundations of ancient Phœnician or Hebrew builders. Anything more impressive to the imagination could hardly be seen than these solitary (and to us nameless) ruins of a castle and church rising by this unknown river in the wild woods of Galilee, and yet leading the mind back so plainly to era beyond era of past human history. It was strange to think of the strains of the Te Deum and the old Church hymns rising from that lowly church in the Galilean valley, and of the old Phœnician fortress echoing back the praises of the Nazarene—the Galilean.

We were thankful to get over this difficulty, which our entire ignorance of the country made really a danger; but this difficulty surmounted left us still in great perplexity. Of the distance to Bint-y-Jebail we had no idea, and the compass, which with the map gave us our only knowledge of the direction in which it lay, was a very imperfect guide in a country seamed with precipitous ravines covered with tangled wood. Soon after leaving the castle our path was crossed by another. I believe prayer for protection and guidance was indeed answered that day, for the danger in that thinly peopled country, where the few villages were inhabited by people we could not safely trust, was not small. Our great anxiety was lest darkness should overtake us in this wilderness, although it would have been safer to bivouac in the forest than to seek the shelter of an unknown village. Meantime the scenery was the finest we had seen in Palestine; ranges of lofty wooded hills, folding over each other, distance beyond distance, as far as the eye could reach from the heights;—not sprinkled with trees in park-like groups like Tabor, but thickly clothed with forest, tangled in many places with an undergrowth of luxuriant brushwood; deep wild ravines, and beautiful woodland paths through forests of evergreen oak and other trees, sweet clematis and wild convolvulus garlanding the trees, and countless other wild flowers springing in every brake and glade. And this was Galilee.

For miles after leaving the castle we did not meet or see one human being, nor even any cattle, or trace of man. When we lost sight of that watered valley, we scrambled over several high ridges, and crossed another magnificent wooded ravine, with a dry watercourse, and spanned by a bridge, near which was an abandoned well. There was something very weird and solemn in those traces of long-past human labour and life amongst these solitudes. At length, however, we came in sight of something like cultivation, and then of an Arab village. Wilhelm asked the way. They said Bint-y-Jebail was five hours off. We inquired again of some people we met in the path, and received contrary information and directions. At the next village a very unfriendly-looking peasant, working in the fields, of whom we asked directions, laid hold of one of our bridles, and wanted us to wait until some neighbours, to whom he called, came up, but we thought it imprudent to encounter an assembly of the villagers, and galloped off from him as rapidly as we could across ploughed fields and through low stone walls like Dartmoor hedges, until we came to what seemed more like a beaten track, where a peaceable looking man on a donkey met us, and told us the way. Across more hills to another village. Here the men were away in the fields, but two or three women at a well were friendly, gave us water from their pitchers, and said (as we understood) that Bint-y-Jebail was only an hour off. This revived our failing hopes, and we rode off again as rapidly as we could, up and down wooded hills and along valleys for nearly two hours, our agile but tired horses clambering over slabs of rock on the steep hillsides with wonderful perseverance. At length we reached another village in a valley, which, we trusted, must be our destination, but to our dismay here we were told Bint-y-Jebail was three hours further on. The sun, by this time, was not an hour above the horizon; in the valleys twilight began already to creep over the forest, and a wolf had daringly crossed the path in front of us, at a distance of a few yards. One of our party advocated waiting and trying the hospitality of the villagers, but this was concluded too great a risk. Accordingly, by means of entreaties and a dollar, we persuaded a peasant to guide us across the hills to Bint-y-Jebail. It was a wild ride, and our horses stumbled in the darkness before we reached the village; and when we reached it we looked in vain for our tents; but to our great joy a man met us at the large reservoir—into which our tired horses pressed—at the entrance of the village, and mentioned the name of our dragoman.

Soon after the lost member of our party came to us, and welcomed us cordially. He had been robbed by two men on his solitary ride, and had just induced the Bey of the village to send some soldiers in search of us. Our mules had rolled in a river, soaking our bedding, so that it could not be used that night, and losing our wine. But such minor difficulties were only matters of amusement after our day of toils and perils. The Bey very courteously sent us a dinner from his own table, borne on trays on the heads of his servants, who waited on us in our tents, standing behind us, and making extempore spoons of the flat Arab bread, for us to dip in the dish, instead of civilized forks.

We had been in the saddle for thirteen hours. The alternate baying of shepherds' dogs and howling of wolves near our tents, could not prevent us sleeping soundly that night on our bare camp beds, wrapped up in shawls. The excitement of the day, however, did not wear off immediately, and it was some time before the pictures of Galilean scenery, rocky hills, wild wooded ravines, and shady forest-paths festooned with fragrant flowers, which that day's fatigues had so deeply imprinted on our minds, faded into dreams. We could not regret the mistake which had led us from the beaten track so deep into the heart of Galilee.

"A GOOD MAN—A VERY GOOD MAN INDEED."

BY J. DE LIEFDE, OF AMSTERDAM.

CHAPTER III.

AN OPPOSITION BAKER'S SHOP IS GOT UP.

"THE landlord of the 'Golden Plough' was quite alarmed by this state of things. He was a man of considerable property, most of which he had earned by his ability at the bar. Having no family to support, he might easily have retired from business without danger of coming short for the future, but money making had become such a cherished employment with him, that he felt quite miserable at the discovery, that he could not turn gin and beer into silver and gold as quickly as he used to do. His conscience, however, would sometimes tell him that he ought to rejoice at this fact, if he truly loved his neighbours. But the love of money silenced this faithful inward voice, and he hardened his heart against the warnings of a better feeling. His friends, of course, would greatly confirm him in his indignation at the Methodistical baker, whose person and conduct usually formed the chief topic of their slanderous and scornful tap-room talk. The question was often broached, whether nothing could be done to put a stop to the influence of the fanatic, and at length it came to a firm resolution in the landlord's heart, not to rest until he had removed the baker from the village.

"Now, just opposite the baker's there was a house which belonged to the landlord, and was inhabited by a widow, whose eldest son was the baker's foreman. He was a fine young man of six and twenty, who scarcely found his match in the art of baking bread. It was well known that the baker used to call him his 'right hand,' and young Frederic felt that his master loved him as a man loves his right hand. Nor had the master's word and example altogether failed to influence the servant. It could not be said that Frederic was a converted Christian, but he appeared to be under serious impressions, and the baker had good hope that ere long the young man would yield to the power of God's word and Spirit. The baker's mind was even fraught with the secret plan of raising Frederic to the rank of his partner, and of giving him a share in the business, as soon as he might have given sufficient proof of a settled Christian character. The young man then would be able to marry the worthy girl he was engaged to, for his income would be sufficient to support both his mother and his family.

"Of this plan Frederic, however, knew nothing. The baker wisely kept it hid from him, not to mar the tender process of his spiritual change by the stimulus of earthly calculations. Still less guessed Frederic's mother anything of this purpose of the baker's. On the contrary, she was not at all contented with the way in which the baker was dealing with her son. She was a selfish, greedy woman, who often, when alone with her son, would wag her tongue against his master, abusing him as a miser and ungrateful 'Turk,' because he kept such a clever, sile, and zealous servant as Frederic at so low wages. Frederic would always defend his master, and show that his wages were higher than those of any servant in the village; but the old widow called him a fool, who did not understand his own interest, and could have married long since, if he only would speak out more boldly and require higher remuneration. This Frederic refused most decidedly, however, and the old woman knew no better way of giving vent to her indignation than by occasionally complaining to her neighbours of the baker's stinginess and her son's want of spirit. I need not tell you that the neighbours did not keep these confidential communications to themselves. They were soon a matter of conversation in the tap-room of the 'Golden Plough.'

"One day the landlord paid a visit to Frederic's mother. She had requested him to come to look after some repairs which were urgently required. After having examined the indicated places, he turned to the front parlour, and looking up to the ceiling as if to measure its height, and across to the walls as if to calculate their length and breadth, he said in a soft voice, as if speaking to himself, 'Why, this would do very well for a baker's shop.'

"'For a baker's shop!' repeated the widow in a tone of amazement and alarm. 'I hope, sir, you don't think of turning me out. Is the baker thinking of removing to this house?'

"'No, not at all!' replied the landlord. 'Even if he offered me double the rent I should not let it to him.'

"'Ah, very well,' said the widow, drawing her breath as if a heavy burden had fallen from her shoulders. 'I only asked so, sir, because you were speaking of a baker's shop.'

"'Yes, I did. I thought the other day that getting up a baker's business in this house would not be a bad speculation. The population has considerably increased during the last year or two. There would be plenty of work for an additional baker. If I had a son who was a baker I should not for a moment hesitate settling him here. I think I shall some day engage a baker to take the house for the purpose. But of course I'll let you know in time, that you may pack your things at your convenience. Our contract is with a half year's notice at any rate.'

"With these words the landlord left the house, but their impression remained with the widow.

"Frederic," said she, when her son came in, 'the landlord will turn our house into a baker's shop, and engage a baker to carry on the business. What do you say to that?'

"Impossible!" exclaimed Frederic, gazing at his mother as at a ghost.

"Yes, to be sure," rejoined she; 'he told me so just now.'

"And whom is he to engage?" asked Frederic uneasily.

"Well, nobody particular as yet. But, I say, if you don't go to him at once and apply for the situation, you are the biggest fool that ever kneaded the dough in a baker's trough.'

"I!" exclaimed Frederic. 'I to set up a business opposite my master? No, never, mother.'

"O you stupid boy," cried the widow, 'trampling your own fortune under foot! If you don't take it, another dog will run off with the fat lone, you fool. And,' added she, covering her face with her apron, and lowering her voice to a plaintive tone, 'your old mother will be turned out of this house, in which your dear father, now in heaven, died, and in which I have been living for upwards of thirty-six years; and you will be the cause of it. Yes, you will knock the first nail into my coffin.'

"Frederic could not sleep that night. Not until daybreak a slight slumber stole over his eyes, and in his dream he saw himself as his own master, settled in the new baker's business, his wife happy by his side, his shop crammed with customers, and his mother blessing him as the comforter of her widowhood.

"The next day he went to the landlord and settled the matter. A sufficient capital was allowed him, at an interest of only two per cent., to begin business with. The house was to be rebuilt into a baker's shop, and no increase of rent would be required.

"The next week he gave notice to his master; and before three months had elapsed, a splendid baker's shop arose opposite that of our friend.

"A series of most painful experiences now commenced for that child of God. It pleased his heavenly Father to give him a bitter cup to drink, to make him all the more crave the sweet fruits of the heavenly paradise; and Christ, while giving him a portion of his cross to bear, drew him by it on and upward to the mountain of his holiness. The sharpest thorn which at the outset pierced his soul, was the unfaithfulness and treacherous demeanour of Frederic. For an honest, tenderly-feeling mind, no experience is more bitter than that of the apostasy of a servant whom we confided in as a friend, loved as a son, and benefited as a brother. All other trials strike the flesh; this wounds the very heart. It was a hard struggle for our baker in patient silence to bear the sight of that splendid shop opposite his, obviously got up to damage him, and kept by a person whom he had taken into service as a poor, ignorant lad, and who was indebted to him for all the knowledge and business ability he was possessed of.

"My dear," he said to his wife, on the day when the new shop was opened, 'we must pray now twice as urgently as we have prayed hitherto, lest the devil catch us in his snares. We are in great danger now of hating our neighbour because he hates us.'

"But isn't it hateful indeed!" replied his wife, looking through the window at the new shop, and shaking her head indignantly at it.

"Yes, the shop is," rejoined the baker; 'and so is the whole plan of which that shop is the issue.'

"And so is Frederic, that ungrateful, treacherous fellow," interrupted she; 'he is a hateful scoundrel, whom—'

"Hush!" said the baker, laying his hands upon her lips. 'It is written, "Bless them that curse you; and pray for them that despitefully use you." The time has come for us now to carry that commandment of our Lord into practice; but I feel it is a heavy one indeed. We ought never to mind that shop, nor to take thought questioning what damage it may do us. We should only consider the great damage which poor Frederic has suffered.'

"He!" exclaimed the bakeress in a voice of surprise. 'What damage do you mean? Just look at him, standing this moment in his doorway, his young wife by his side. He appears as little aware of any damage as a conqueror who is returning from the field of battle.'

"Alas! that's the worst of it," replied the baker. 'He seems not to feel that his soul has suffered greater damage than the income of all the bakers' shops in the world can make up to him. The Evil One has caught him in the snare of covetousness, and seduced him by the lust of the eyes and the pride of life, so that he is trying now to build his house upon the ruins of that of his friend and master; for he knows as well as I that two bakers cannot well find bread for their wives and families in this small village of ours. Now, such a disposition of heart may be the very thing required to succeed in the kingdom of this world, but it is equally certain that it shuts one out from the kingdom of God. The damage which he may do us can only consist in the loss of some temporal property; but the damage which he has done to himself, I have every ground to fear, consists in the loss of his soul. I think, my dear, we should consider this, and pity our poor neighbour. I think we should pray for him, that the Lord may open his eyes, to make him see that he allowed himself to be a tool of that spirit which caused Cain to kill his brother, and Judas to betray his Master.'

"In this way the baker spoke to his wife, and in this way he found he had every day to speak to himself, to keep down his flesh which every now and then tried to rouse him into hatred and hostility. Having continually every day that malicious shop before his eyes, he felt that it was given to him as a thorn in the flesh, and that his former servant and friend now had become a messenger of Satan to buffet him. And sometimes his flesh would get the better of him, and cause him to speak words which he afterwards would heartily repent. This, however, brought him all the deeper down upon his knees at the feet of that Saviour who said to him, My grace is sufficient for thee. And thus struggling and wrestling in many prayers and supplications he at length succeeded in arriving at peace with himself and his Master's dealings. He now could see Frederic's shop without the slightest frown on his brow. He now could cordially pray for poor Frederic. He perceived that the shop was nothing, and that Frederic was nothing, but that there was an invisible enemy behind, who used both Frederic and his shop as a means to cause him to sin and to charge God foolishly. He perceived that he, as it were, was running a holy race, compassed about with a great cloud of invisible witnesses who were anxious to know whether he would stand the trial and gain the prize.

"All we have to suffer is permitted by the Lord," he would often say to his wife, "in order that we should show that we are richer with Christ in a desert than with the devil in a paradise."

"And, indeed, the day came at last on which our good baker found himself in a desert. Frederic, powerfully backed by the landlord of the Golden Plough, succeeded in drawing the greater portion of the population to his shop. The landlord, who used to purchase for his brewery large quantities of grain, supplied him with corn at a price below what the baker could obtain it for. Thus Frederic could sell his bread cheaper than his former master. In short, after some years our friend was compelled to quit his business, and, reduced to poverty, to enter service with the miller of the village, who engaged him at a weekly salary scarcely sufficient for the support of himself and his family.

"Dark clouds now gathered above the head of this good man, while there was feasting in the houses of the wicked, and especially in the tap-room of the 'Golden Plough.' Indeed, it seemed as if the Evil One had gained the victory, and, with one blow, swept away all the good which this servant of God had established during a succession of years. Our friend, obliged to live in a small cottage near the mill, was, from want of a suitable locality, compelled to stop his meetings for Bible-reading and prayer, and to give up his Sabbath-school. The small company of seriously minded people who used to consider him as their leader, were scattered like sheep which have no shepherd, and many a one who already had commenced to open his ears to the sounds of the gospel, fell asleep again from want of further exhortation. This apparent destruction of his labour in the Lord's vineyard struck our friend even more painfully than the ruin of his temporal concerns. He often would lie down quite prostrate in tears and groanings at the feet of his Saviour, and cry with the prophet of old, O God, hast thou cast us off for ever! Wilt thou be favourable no more! How long shall the adversary reproach? Shall the enemy blaspheme thy name for ever? And, indeed, the reproaches and blasphemies of the adversaries now increased with every day, and the place where they resounded most audibly was the landlord's tap-room, now filled with customers as numerous and merry as before.

"The Lord, however, did not forsake his faithful servant, nor leave him without his consolation. I need not tell you that Mr. G—, especially in these circumstances, often would come down, to strengthen his poor afflicted friend and brother by his prayerful sympathy, and to administer to him all the comfort his loving heart could derive from the word of God. His visits now were like refreshing fruits reached down from the heavenly paradise. He even succeeded in restoring his downcast brother to his former energy and cheerfulness in Christ.

"My dear cousin," he would say to him, "remember what the Lord has commanded us. When ye fast, he said, anoint your head and wash your face. You are in a time of fasting now; you are deprived of nearly every comfort of life; your former glory before men is turned into scorn, and your good work among them, at least it seems so, is burnt to ashes. This is a sad state of things indeed, and we have full reason for humbling ourselves in our closets before our God in tears and supplication, for all this mischief and misery is the effect of sin, and if the Lord does not come between with his heart-renewing and guilt-pardoning grace, this whole village will be lost like Sodom and Gomorrah. But while we are in secret pleading for Christ's righteousness in behalf of these people, we must, at the same time, in public defend the cause and honour of our God before men. We must show them that his grace is sufficient for us indeed; and that men, under the agency of the arch fiend, may rob us of everything dear and desirable in this life, but that they cannot deprive us of our peace and happiness in Christ. Remember how the prophet Habakkuk honoured his God in the day of great affliction, Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, he exclaimed, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labour of the olive shall fail and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls, yet—and mark ye what a glorious yet this is—I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation. Now I think the prophet of the old covenant ought not to put to shame the children of the new. If the wicked, while in prosperity, rejoice in their god, we ought to show that our God causes us to rejoice even in tribulation. So, my dear cousin and brother, anoint your head and wash your face, conscious that Christ, who was crucified by men, but raised from the dead by God, stands by your side. Awake cheerfully, and put your hand to the plough again. If anything is lost, it is on the part of your adversaries. You have lost nothing. On the contrary, you have gained a great deal. For it is not a small matter, indeed, to be counted worthy to suffer shame for the Lord's name's sake. Remember what the Lord says to such cross-bearers, Rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven.

CHAPTER IV.

THE BAKER SELLS HIS BETTER BREAD IN THE OPPOSITION SHOP.

"Thus Mr. G—— would speak to his cousin, and his words were to our afflicted friend like golden apples on silver dishes. As the corn, knocked down by a succession of heavy rains, rises from its prostration under the fostering beams of the summer sun, thus the baker again lifted up his head under the consoling and quickening power of God's word. Soon he again opened his Sabbath school. True love is quick in invention and inexhaustible in its resources. For one hour every Sunday all the moveable furniture of the little parlour was transferred into the bedroom, and by putting some boards across a few chairs, accommodation was made for about thirty children. To the baker's great joy nearly all his former young friends made their appearance, so that soon his school was crowded. The same process was for an hour or two gone through every Tuesday evening to accommodate a small Scripture-reading meeting. It is true, the little parlour was rather close, when containing upwards of twenty individuals sitting on the benches under the low ceiling, and nearly as many standing in the corners and in the doorway, and in the narrow passage outside; but the open windows, while letting in fresh air, at the same time caused the psalms and hymns to proclaim the praise of God all over the village. The landlord and his companions were compelled to feel, that while they could deprive the Lord's people of their house and field, they could not deprive them of their joy in the God of their salvation.

"Thus matters continued for a considerable time, during which, from our friend's parlour, many a fervent prayer was offered up to God for the conversion of his adversaries. The time was at hand when he was to experience that this prayer too was one of those of which we are assured that they "prevail much." The Evil One had succeeded in damaging the good work of the baker through the instrumentality of his servant. It was to be measured to him again now by the same measure with which he had been meting. Diseases are creatures of the devil; he brought them into the world through sin; they are his servants, whom he employs in order to plague mankind, and to dig the graves of the children of Adam. But God, who is sovereign over all, also controls the evil which Satan creates. He now resolved to employ one of Satan's servants to destroy Satan's work. One day that terrible angel of destruction called cholera, entered this village. Already hundreds of victims had fallen before him in the surrounding country. A general panic seized the population. The shouts and songs of the Golden Plough were silenced at once. But from the baker's little parlour the psalms of David sounded all the louder.

"Amongst the individuals whom that swift and terrific messenger of perdition visited was Frederic. On a sudden, in the midst of his business, he was attacked and cast down on his bed. The next day his servant sank down and was carried off to his bedroom. Frederic's wife and mother were in utter despair. Assistance was not to be obtained at any price. Every one shunned their house. Frederic's wife, leaving her four children to her mother-in-law's care, spent day and night in attending the sick ones. The business, of course, was brought to a stand still. Soon great inconvenience ensued, for the villagers' bread became scarce as in times of war or famine. A quantity was supplied from neighbouring villages, but not nearly sufficient to meet the wants of the population.

"One evening the front door of Frederic's shop was softly opened, and a person entered, who found himself in an Egyptian darkness.

"'Is there nobody here in the house?' he called out.

"'Yes, I am here!' shouted a voice from a back parlour; 'but I cannot go to you; I am alone with the children. Please step in here.'

"The individual groping his way through the dark in the direction of the sound he had heard, soon found himself in the room where Frederic's mother was sitting, a sick baby on her lap, while at the same time she was trying to undress one of three children standing at her knee. A small piece of candle, nearly burning in the socket, was the only light that illumined this dismal scene.

"'Good evening,' said the person who entered the room. 'Tell me, ma'am, how is your son?'

"The old woman contracted her brow to sharpen her sight, and looking keenly through the glitterings of the candle, discovered that our friend the baker was standing before her.

"'What! is it you, sir?' exclaimed she, in a voice of surprise mixed with fear.

"'Don't be put out, ma'am,' said the baker in a kind tone. 'I understand that you could expect me least of all. But I am told that circumstances are very distressing in your family at present, and I am come to ask if I can be of any service to you?'

"'Yes, my good air,' said the old woman, while a stream of tears gushed down her cheeks. 'Very distressing. God alone knows how we are to get through it, and what the end of all this will be. My son happily has got over the attack of the cholera, but he is so thoroughly exhausted, that the doctor says it will at least take four weeks ere he will be able to leave his bed. John, the servant, is in a worse condition, poor fellow. We expect his death every hour. My daughter-in-law has attended both of them day and night, till she sank down from exhaustion. She is laid up now and confined to her bed by fever. So I am alone with Mary our servant. She is attending the three sick ones, while I take care of the children. But, oh! my good sir! my good sir! what a position we are in; we have not tasted a bit of warm food since yesterday week. To complete our misfortune, this baby here on my lap took ill last night. The doctor cannot tell yet what ails her; but she will not lie still, poor thing, unless I keep her on my lap. You see in what a condition I am even just now. I scarcely can move my hands with this child continually on my knees. I see the candle is about to go out. I hardly know how to get down into the cellar to cut a fresh one off the bunch.'

"Where is the cellar?" asked the baker; 'I'll go and cut one.'

"You are too kind, indeed," rejoined the woman. 'Our good Lord has sent you, I'm sure.'

"She directed our friend how to go to the cellar door. He took the light, hurried to the indicated spot as quickly as the lingering flame would allow him, and returned with a fresh candle, which soon diffused its bright light through this abode of misery.

"But, my dear ma'am," asked the baker, resuming his seat, 'can you not obtain any assistance? You cannot possibly continue any longer in this position. Your son has so many friends,—is there not one amongst all of them who proves a friend in need?'

"Not one, sir. They are all of them afraid of the disease. Many of them, too, have invalids in their own house. We have tried everything, but all in vain. We are abandoned by God and man. I wish we were dead, all of us, for such a life is worse than death itself.'

"The old woman sank backward in her chair, and covering her face with both her hands, gave vent to her grief in a loud excess of weeping and sobbing. The baker was silent. The history of the last years flashed through his recollection. The saying of the woman, 'We are abandoned by God and man,' cut him to the heart. 'How terrible,' ejaculated he looking upward, 'how terrible art Thou in thy doings towards the children of men!'

"No, ma'am," he said, rising from his seat and gently laying his hand upon her shoulder; 'you are not yet abandoned by God. Your sins may be many, but God is not yet dealing with you according to your sins. Nor are you forsaken by men either. If you cannot find any help amongst your friends, God will procure it you now from those whom you hitherto have considered as your enemies. Where is your son lying? Do you think he would be able to see me for a moment? I must needs speak to him.'

"I think he will," replied the woman. 'God knows but that you must go to him to help him as you have helped me now. I'm sure he is quite alone, for Mary is certainly with John, to wet his dying lips.'

"The baker proceeded towards the room which the woman indicated, and soon found himself at the sickbed of his former servant.

"Frederic!" he whispered.

"Who is there?" asked the invalid, turning his face towards the speaker. It was rather dark in the room, as the night-light shone dimly.

"Do you want anything? shall I give you some water?"

"Oh, yes; water, water!" cried Frederic. 'I am perishing from thirst!'

"The baker soon found a jug filled with water and a tumbler. Putting his left hand under Frederic's pillow he lifted up his head so much as to enable him to quench his burning thirst.

"Oh, that's dew from heaven!" whispered the sick one, reclining backward on his pillow.

"A pause ensued. He appeared quite exhausted by this exertion. Then turning his face again towards his benefactor, he whispered: 'Is it you, master?'

"Yes, it is I," replied the baker. 'The Lord has sent me to help you.'

"O God! O God!" cried Frederic, lifting up his hands towards heaven.

"Don't speak now," said the baker quickly; 'you are too weak for it. Only answer one question. Will you permit me to take care of your business till you are recovered?'

"God bless you!" whispered Frederic.

"Very well. My daughter will be up soon to attend to you, and my wife will attend yours. Take rest now. The Lord be with you.'

"Our friend went home as quick as his feet would carry him. He had already spoken with his master, the miller, who had no objection to leaving him free for a couple of weeks, especially now that he was to take up the baking business, the stopping of which drained somewhat the miller's purse. One of the baker's Christian friends, who had been apprenticed with a baker in his boyhood, but had turned a day-labourer, gladly agreed to join our friend as his assistant in the bakehouse. Thus all was fully prepared; and that same evening four persons at one time entered Frederic's house, each of them to take their own place; the baker and his temporary servant in the bakehouse, his daughter in Frederic's bedroom, and his wife in that of Frederic's partner. The next day the population of the village was not a little surprised at learning that bread was to be had at Frederic's as usual, and before the sun went down the shop was emptied, so that not one loaf was left, and the counter-drawer was filled with a quantity of cash, such as had not been seen in it for many a day.

"The baker's noble conduct, of course, became the topic of conversation in every house from the burgomaster's down to the poorest cottage in the community. The simple people were quite astonished, and praised our friend as if he were an angel from heaven. Those who boasted a profound knowledge of the human heart, called the baker's deed a cunning trick for making his fortune. The minister, and the burgomaster, and the notary deemed themselves still better informed. They described the baker's conduct as a clever coup de main to produce effect, and thus to render his party more popular than ever. Our friend, however, knew nothing of all these judgments pronounced about him. He kneaded the dough, and baked the bread, and sang his psalm happy in the God of his salvation.

"Six weeks elapsed in this state of things till Frederic was fully recovered. This was the period the landlord of the 'Golden Plough' had with great anxiety looked forward to. He had heard the different judgments of the people about the baker's conduct, and he did not know what to make out of them. This much was certain to his opinion, that the baker either was an angel or a subtle intrigant. Which was the case time was to reveal. The landlord of the 'Golden Plough' with great anxiety looked forward to the day when Frederic would resume business and discharge his substitute. It would then be shown what remuneration the baker would require.

"That day soon arrived. With cordial joy the baker welcomed Frederic in his shop. He showed him all, that he might be sure that everything was in its place, handed him the book that had been kept, and the money that had been gained. There was such a surplus that Frederic could send a considerable sum to the landlord, to clear off a portion of the capital he was due to him.

"And what shall I return to you, my noble master?" said Frederic with tears in his eyes, while he looked at the book with its amazing result.

"You will find my remuneration in your book," answered the baker. "You will find that I every week took the salary which I used to receive from my master, the miller. Indeed," added he with a smile, "it is not so much to me as to him that you are indebted, for if he had refused to give me leave I should not have been able to serve you. So you may consider it in this way, that my master has lent me to you for a month, and I am glad that this loan has been of some service to you. And now, farewell. May God speed you and preserve your house from further calamities."

"Frederic could not answer a word. He burst into tears, and ere he was able to control his emotions, the baker had withdrawn, leaving the open shop-book and the piles of silver behind as the silent and yet eloquent witnesses of his disinterested faithfulness and self-denying love."

: READY.

BY REV. THEODORE L. CYLER.

"WHEN Death calls the roll, always be ready to answer, Yere!" was the everyday motto of the famous trapper of the Prairie. It was the shrewd backwoodsman's paraphrase of a still wiser and holier maxim, "Be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." This is one of our Saviour's aphorisms that will be always timely to the end of time. Every one admits its truth. Every one will admit the necessity of preparation for death. And yet there may be many a reader of these pages, who is within a few months, or even a few weeks of the eternal world, and yet has a very indistinct idea of what constitutes a fit preparation for death. Perhaps the following brief questions may aid those who are sincerely desirous not to be found wanting when the grim messenger—in the trapper's expressive phrase—"calls the roll."

1. Is your business in the right state to be left? We do not mean, is every honest debt paid? for it is hardly possible for even the most careful merchant or mechanic to so manage his affairs as to be entirely free from even the smallest obligations. But we do mean that every man should endeavour, as a matter of conscience, to keep his affairs in such a well-ordered state, that if death should meet him in the rail-car, or smite him from the summer-cloud, his creditors should not suffer the unjust loss of a single farthing. Nor should his executors be obliged to wade through a quagmire of confusion in order to arrive at an accurate knowledge of his estate, and its indebtedness. It is no more honest to cheat our fellow-men from our coffins than to cheat them while alive. The debt I bequeath to my family or my executors is just as binding as the note that to-day lies in the bank with my signature on its face. It is hardly worthy of a Christian manhood to "take the benefit of the act" by creeping into one's sepulchre. Let us see to it that no reproaches of the wronged and the defrauded are ever heard above our sleeping dust.

2. Have you made your will? Some men are absolutely afraid to make their wills, lest death should overhear the scratch of the pen, and be the sooner in his summons to them to lay down the pen for ever. This is a strange and yet a very common superstition. Many a man dreads to draw up a will as if it were the signing of his own death-warrant. We will waste no words on such preposterous folly. Make a will, my friend! if you have no more property to devise than had that poor minister of Christ who sat down and wrote, "I bequeath to my darling wife my Bible and my sermons and my few books; to my dear children I bequeath these words, I have been young and now I am old, yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken or his seed begging bread." The first provision in a good man's will should be for those whom God has made fairly dependent on him. Healthy and well-educated children do not always, of necessity, belong to this class. But infirm parents and bedridden kinsfolk commonly do. When we have provided for all who have an honest claim on our posthumous support, then it is wisest to make Christ our largest legatee. Christians—ay, and impenitent worldlings too—ought to remember that their wills are not only to be recorded in the surrogate's office, but in those books which will be opened on the day of judgment. Give everything you can spare to the Lord while you live; and leave him the rest when you die. It will be a blessed thing to have some well-trained orphan, or liberated slave, or Christianized outcast, come and plant roses on our tomb, and say with grateful tears, "Here lies one who cared for my soul."

3. Are you forgiven?

We do not refer now to such unhappy griefs or injuries as you may have thoughtlessly or intentionally inflicted on your fellow-men. Let not the sun of life go down on such wrongs unatoned. Let no injuries or harsh words unrepaired be buried with you in your coffin. It will be enough to make the nettles grow out of the greensward that covers your ashes.

But we refer especially at present to that forgiveness that you are to seek through the mediation of the Saviour. Friend! you need forgiveness. That long hideous catalogue of sins; not mere mistakes, not mere slips of the hand and tongue, not mere infirmities, but sins black as midnight in God's view, they must be forgiven or you are lost. Those evil words that ought to have blistered the mouth that uttered them—those ungrateful deeds flung back into the face of heavenly love—those breakings of God's holy law—those profaned Sabbaths, and lost opportunities for saving souls—those woundings of Christ and grievings of the Spirit—those sins so exceeding sinful, have they been blotted out? The path of pardon you probably know. It leads to the cross of Christ. "Through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." In the pages of my Bible I read, "He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Have you made honest confession of your offences against God? Have you clenched the sincerity of your confession by abandoning all discovered sin, and by refusing any quarter to your dearest lusts? Have you earnestly and believingly sought pardon through the atoning Saviour? Then do not distress yourself about any "unpardonable sin." There will be none such standing against you on God's book. For he has pledged himself to forgive every sin that you repent of in the name of Christ, and which you abandon to please your Redeemer. Blessed is the man whose transgressions are covered! Blessed is the man to whom God imputeth not sin!

Many other important questions might be started. But if you can give a prompt unhesitating Yes to the above named interrogations, then fear not to hear your own name in the fatal roll-call. You are ready to answer, "Here!" You need not to be either ashamed or afraid to make your appearance at the door of your Father's house. That door will open to you with an "abundant entrance." You will need to shed no tears on your dying bed. In view of parting with life you may say, with one of England's sweet singers:—

"Life! we have been long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather.
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear,
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not good-night; but in that happier clime, Bid me good-morning!"

FRAGMENTS.

Especially secret prayer—secret prayer especially; next to praise, this is the most spiritual employment.

MANY are complaining of their weakness who ought to be complaining of their worldliness!

THERE is something unutterably sweet in the consideration of the jealousy of God—that He should regard the affections of his child as to be jealous of occupying the second place!

As the Head hath travelled the flinty path, so must his suffering members do the same. It were not meet that he should find the world a wilderness, and they only a garden of flowers.

OH, let there be no offence in any dark providence! Trust him, He shed his blood, behold his hands and his feet! The God of providence is the God of grace, and He who laid down his life is he "by whom all things consist."

OH, let not the ingratitude you meet with chill your love: He hath not met with such abundant gratitude from you!

WOULD you like to give your brother a look of unkindness, a word of unkindness, and meet him the next moment in heaven?

WHAT are all the doctrines of the gospel but an unfolding of God?

HIS poor body the worldling wears out in the service of an empty, dying world; as for his soul, he throws it away.

"EVEN so, Father"—what a quieter! Is there a trouble this cannot meet?

To have the smiles of that world that frowned upon Jesus, is a sort of treason.

THAT which we learn profitably, for the most part, we learn slowly.

IF we were better acquainted with the depth of His sufferings, we should think less of the ripples of our sorrows, amidst the tempest of his anguish.

FROM whence can filial tears flow but from filial eyes?

THE OMNIBUS.

[This Paper forms the first of a New Series of Tracts, twelve of which have just been issued, in connection with the Stirling Tract Enterprise.]

LIKE the steamboat, the railway, and the telegraph, the omnibus has sprung up in our own day. Our fathers knew it not. It is a kind of moving parable, a true picture of human life, especially life in modern times. Its passengers are, in many aspects, like the population of the world. Some are old and feeble, needing help both in sitting down and in rising up; while others, with the spring of youth within them, leap lightly in and out. Some have soft white hands and costly garments; others are poorly clad and toil-worn. Some have sparkling eyes and laughing lips; others hide falling tears under widows' weeds. This one sits silent in a corner; those two chat cheerfully all the way. Here a new passenger joins the company, and there an old one drops off, as deaths diminish the mass of humanity on the one side, and births on the other side still keep the number up. An omnibus is the world in miniature, except that its passengers know right well where they are going, while many of the world's inhabitants know not what their course is, and seem not to care what their end may be. Now that the thing has sprung into general use, it is interesting to notice the uncouth but appropriate name that has sprung along with it. Omnibus is a Latin word meaning FOR ALL.

On a dreary day of December, when the fog was so thick that carriages were not visible until they came within fifty yards of the observer's eye, and even then were so dimly outlined that they seemed to be half a mile away, I was standing at the corner of a street in Glasgow, looking for an omnibus that I knew to be due at that time. After I had waited a while, a large lofty vehicle began to loom through the mist, nodding heavily as it rumbled over the irregularities of the causeway, jolting on its springs. This must be the omnibus, and I instinctively began to gird myself in preparation for leaping on; another moment and the huge dim bulk emerged distinctly into view—it was a hearse!

Somewhat depressed in spirit already by the state of the weather, I felt a cold shudder creeping through my frame.

It passed, and as I looked silently after it, a second thought seized me; I was not mistaken, this is the omnibus, this and this alone is truly the carriage for all. We must all take a passage for the grave. "It is appointed unto men once to die." Willing or unwilling, ready or unready, every one of us must some day take a place in this carriage. The secret knowledge of this necessity troubles life in its deepest spring. Many men are "through fear of death all their life-time subject to bondage." The dread of dying is a dark spot on the sun of the brightest life. If there were any way of getting that spot blotted out, not only would our departure from this world be safe at last, but also our sojourn on this world now would be cheerful. "Blessed is he that overcometh;" but the chance of a victory to be gained in the hour of my departure is not enough for me. I want the victory now. I would like to enjoy the portion of my life-path that lies between the present moment and my latest breath; and I cannot enjoy it as long as death with his sting in him is ever lying like a serpent coiled up at my feet threatening to make the fatal spring.

There is a victory, and a way of making it mine. A man of flesh and blood like me—a man defiled by sin like me, was able in this life to defy that enemy to his face; was able to turn the terror into an anthem of joyful praise,—“O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?” A happy man was he; when death is no longer dreadful, life becomes tenfold more sweet. Nor let the reader suppose that this was Paul's experience, and that he was a great apostle, and that common people need not expect to be on a level with him. The way by which he entered into peace is open still; and we are as welcome as he. It would be contrary to the Scripture, and dishonouring to Christ, to suppose that it was in any respect easier for Saul of Tarsus to get into peace with God than it is for you and me. The gate is open, and the inscription over it is, "Whosoever will." If any reader of this page is kept out from pardon and peace with God through the blood of Christ, it is because he will not close with the free offer now held out to all. "Seek, and ye shall find." Lay your mind to it as you have laid your mind to your education, your craft, your shop, or your farm, and you will not fail. Reader, as long as you keep God out of all your thoughts, his terrors will force their way in upon your pleasures. It is vain to fight against God; be reconciled to him through the death of his Son, and then enjoy the friendship of Him who has life and death in his own power. My friend, it is a great mistake to hang back, and make up your mind to stand trembling all your days at a distance from God, on the ground that great attainments are for great saints, and that it would be presumptuous in you to expect the same. This might be true if God's favour went by the merits of the man; but it goes by the worth of Christ; and the worth of Christ is as great for you as it was for Paul or John. The blood of Christ cleanses you and me from all sin, as it cleansed them; there is no more condemnation to us, when we are "in Christ Jesus," than there was to them. The way is as open to us as it was to them, and we are as welcome when we come. In Christ we are as safe, and we should be as happy as they were. There are no step-children in the family of God; he does not make favourites of the cleverest, whose names have filled the world, and neglect those who were "never heard of half a mile from home." The poorest, least talented, least known, are as dear to the Redeemer now as the greatest, and will be as happy in his presence for ever.

James Renwick, the Covenanter, and the last of Scotland's great cloud of Christian martyrs, says, in a letter written on the morning of his execution, "Death to me is as a bed to the weary." A young woman whom the writer knew, and who was subject to fainting fits in the latter stages of a fatal disease, said, in a tone of disappointment as she opened her eyes after a swoon, and saw her mother still bending over the bed, "Am I here yet?" She had hoped when she felt the fainting coming over her heart, that this time the Lord would lead her out on the other side. A young mother, also to the writer well known, had so completely gained the victory during her life, that when death was evidently drawing near, she threw back with a playful smile the sympathizing expressions of her friends, saying, "I have the best of it,—I have the advantage of you all, in getting over first." In that particular case, the soul in departing left its joy so distinctly imprinted on the body, that the countenance of the dead, instead of being repulsive, attracted by its angel-like loveliness even a little child. "Mother," said an infant of six years, after gazing on the face of the dead still radiant with joy,—“mother, will there be room for a little girl in Aunt W——’s grave?” “Why do you ask, child?” “Because I would like to be laid beside her when I die.”

God has provided for us, and now offers to us greater things than either the converted or unconverted fully realize. Disciples of Christ, why are you content to sit down in that low place? He calls you to come up higher. How great are his designs, and how low are our attainments! "Hear ye him" on this very point: "These words have I spoken unto you, that my joy may remain in you, and that your joy may be full." Your Redeemer's desire is, that your joy may be full. Open your mouth wide and he will fill it. Forget, in this matter, the things that are behind, and reach forward. The kingdom of God—if any one ask where it is, the Bible answers, It is within you; if any one ask what it is, the Bible answers, Righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. But beware; there is no such thing as true peace and courage in view of death and the judgment, along with a vain, worldly, prayerless life. There are not two ways of it. Confidence and victory consist in a walk with God. A "triumph" is attainable even now, but it is "in Christ" (2 Cor. ii. 14).

A word now for those readers who have no part yet in Christ. Your secret thought is that religion, though very necessary to die with, is very gloomy to live in. You are entirely mistaken. You are allowing the old serpent to cheat you out of your soul by a lie. Turn now; go to Christ in simple honesty and tell him all; throw yourself frankly upon his mercy, as a man deals with a brother man; let go all your righteousness and all your sin. Come true, open, single-eyed, and cast your whole sinful self on Christ. He will receive you; he will give you pardon, and peace, and joyful hope. He is true and real; be true and real to him, and you are saved. Don't deal falsely, and don't put off.

A hearse is an omnibus carrying all to the grave. But, brother, another chariot, bright and beautiful, is coming up before it. This also is for all. It is the gospel. See in lines of light written by God's own Spirit aloft upon its front, "Good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." This chariot is passing the spot where you stand—it is passing; leap in; it will carry you through the wilderness and home to heaven. But oh! if you let it pass, although it came for all it will leave you lost behind.

THE NAME OF JESUS.

ONE name alone in all this death-struck earth,
One name alone come down from highest heaven,
Whence healing and salvation we receive,
To sinful man is given.

Name brought by Gabriel from the heart of God,
And laid like flower seed in the adoring breast
Of her in whom the mystery was wrought,
And God made manifest:

O name of Jesus! of that lowly babe
That on the sunny slopes of Nazareth strayed,
Or on the cottage floor beside the lake,
With wild flowers played:

Name of the wondrous child that in the temple stood
With brow all meekness, and with eye all light,
Who to the blinded teachers of the law
Would have given sight:

Name of the prophet, healer, master, friend,
Sorrow's chief mourner, and death's perfect cure,
The fountain of new innocence for man,
That ever shall endure;

The secret, the unutterable name,
From the world's earlier ages hid so long,
Now in time's fulness given at length to be
The new creation's song:

And yet it was the scorn of Jewish lips,
And written by unholy heathen pen,
Then nailed aloft upon the awful cross,
Signal to God and men ;

But never written in the dust of death,
Nor cut upon the portals of the grave,
So quickly He that threshold has recrossed,
Triumphantly to save.

It dropped from heaven like gently falling plume,
Just when the shadow of the white cloud fell Upon the apostles' upward turned brows ;
"O wherefore dwell

Ye Galileans, gazing up so long
Into the clear blue depths ye search in vain ?
Lo ! this same Jesus rising to his throne,
Shall so return again."

Once more Heaven sent it down upon the earth,
When from love's central fount the recents came,
And on the persecuting Saul poured down,
In glory and in flame.

O name of value infinite ! and yet
Thou mov'st our spirits with a deeper thrill,
For the dear lips that have thy music breathed,
And then grown still.

For thou the last gift art our lost ones leave,
To be our comfort on our onward way ;
"Love Jesus," "Jesus is our only hope,"
Adoringly they say.

As shipwrecked sailors clasp a plank, an ! launch
Upon the billows of a midnight sea,
These fearless souls, embracing "Jesus," plunge
Into eternity :

Then safely floated to the home of peace,
Where the bright plumed angels throng the shore,
Still, still the name of Jesus those glad hosts
In anthems pour.

Name ! that the ransomed souls for ever wear,
Gemmed with pure lustre on each perfect brow,
Be thou the radiance of our earthly lives ;
Transform us even now.

O name above all names the most beloved !
Fullest of memories, and of untold peace,
Earnest of all unutterable joys !—
Yet, fond heart, cease,

For Jesus is the name of the high God :
Hushed be thy thoughts, and silently adore !
When thou shalt come to see him as he is,
Thou shalt know more.

GOD'S PURPOSE AND MAN'S OPPORTUNITY.*

"His name shall be continued as long as the sun, and men shall be blessed in Him: all nations shall call him blessed." The purpose of God to achieve this grand result is clearly recorded in many parts of his revealed will. Indeed, it runs like a golden thread through the whole of it. Expressed or implied, we find it in every book ; it types itself in the kingly history ; it gleams in the prophet's vision ; it breathes in the holy Psalm ; speaks out in the Acts of the Apostles ; runs through all the Epistles, and sighs up to heaven in that last apocalyptic cry, "Even so come, Lord Jesus!"

Now, brethren, the knowledge of this purpose, which we possess by our faith in revelation, is of inexpressible value to us in our missionary endeavours. We are taken up as to the top of a high mountain, not by Satan, but by Christ ; we are shown all the kingdoms of the world, and the true glory of them, and we see them all as belonging to him. All, all ! comprehended in his kingdom, ruled by his laws, filled with his Spirit, brought for ever under the spell and sway of his cross. When men cry to us from beneath, "Watchmen, what of the night?" we can answer, "The morning cometh!" The vision tarries, but we wait for it. The end is not yet, but we work for it ; and connecting, as we are taught, what we do and what we think with the resplendent issues of that bright millennial day, we feel that nothing can be in vain. Our tears will soften the soil into which we cast the precious seed ; our failures are worked into the texture of the plan which cannot fail and never falters ; our labours, the little as well as the great, and our prayers, the feeble in their measure as much as the fervent in theirs, will all coalesce with the Saviour's loving thoughts, and with the eternal purpose of our God.

And if we descend from this height we are in darkness, or, at least, in shadow again. You know it has long been a question, held in earnest debate among men, whether we have in our nature any principle, and, along with the principle, any power of progress ; and whether our united humanity will ever rise through the operation of natural laws? Are there any germs of development within, which the slowly-rolling centuries will call out into bud and blossom? Is there any natural hope that the face of this world will be filled with fruit at last? It is an interesting, an awful question. It would be a shame for us, brethren, to throw scorn on any, who with straining thought and serious heart, are seeking its solution. But ah ! see how little human thought can do in the management of a question so vast and complicated. One says, "Yea," another, "Nay." One sings a triumph, as he points to the advancing wave ; another a dirge as he watches an ebbing tide. One deifies the spirit of intelligence, as if mere knowing would accomplish all the purposes of being; another is timorous and trembling before the inevitable laws of change and death. To one of hopeful mood, the light of freedom beaming on the face of a regenerated people is a foreshowing of the universal glory; a decaying empire is to another a sad commentary on the old sentence, that "all flesh is grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of the grass."

At this present time, with all the wonders of modern progress around us—steam propelling our merchandise over land and sea, electricity carrying our thought round the earth, and a distribution of daily literature thick as the fall of snow-flakes—some of our most thoughtful writers, who still feel the sorrow and the solitude of human souls, know not what to think, and, in a kind of intellectual despair, they still write over all human achievements, their own systems included, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." "The world by wisdom knew not God." It is equally true that the world by wisdom knows not man,—can neither gauge his nature, nor forecast his destiny. And are we, as men and as thinkers, better than they? No, in no wise. If we refuse the ruling of divine revealed thought, and try to thread our way through life's mysteries by the light of our own, we shall stumble as they do, and be at our wit's end. We shall be worse than they, as Samson shorn of his locks was worse than the feeblest of the Philistines who led him. "Who is blind as he that is perfect," if he will not use his perfection? "Who is blind as the Lord's servant," if he will not walk in the Lord's light? Never on the low plain of human thought can we settle such a question as this. "O Zion, that bringest good tidings, get thee up to the high mountain!" On that high mountain we have prophetic vision; we penetrate the mysteries of God; we can see afar off; we are lifted above the very future; we look down on earth's plains, and see nothing but Israel's tents. As the valleys are they spread forth, as gardens by the river's side, and as cedar trees beside all waters. We look along the line of the coming years, and lo! heaven is baptizing earth with its brightness, and drawing it up as a bride adorned for the glad espousals of eternity. We listen; and the last groans of creation are sinking on the breeze. Sorrow and sighing are fleeing away from all human homes, and from every land and every sea are rising up like the music and incense of the early morn, the songs and celebrations of delivered man. All this, you say, is in the future, and perhaps it may be far away. Yes, but perhaps also it may not be far away. And be it far or near, this is our point—that underneath the providence of the present hour, in every country and in every place, that grand purpose of God is working, by which these gracious and happy results will be achieved at last—working in manifold ways, and to the production of diverse visible effects, but everywhere in divine force and continuance. Travel through all the earth, and everywhere you have that purpose beneath and around you. It is the gravitation of the moral world; it holds all things in check; it will bring all things to harmony. Ascend to the mountain-top, it is there. Go down to the deepest valley, behold it is there. Take the wings of the morning, and fly to the uttermost parts of the sea, even there the God of salvation will lead you, and his right hand shall hold you.

We can see this purpose working manifestly in some places of the earth, and in connection with the providence of some countries. In England, for example, by our just laws, our Christian habits, and our missionary efforts at home and abroad; in America, while the revival sheds itself through her cities, and over her vast plains and prairies, like a spreading fire; in Italy, by the resurrection of liberty, despite the harmless rage of a broken despotism and a baffled superstition. But it is not so easy to see—in fact, we cannot see, we must believe—that the same law is working underneath all that is black and horrible. But, brethren, it is! It is beneath the tyrant's throne; beneath the prison, where patriots are dying; beneath the idol's temple; beneath the fields where slaves are toiling; beneath the habitations of cruelty; beneath the ground where myriads of living men meet like fiends in the shock of battle, and thousands soon lie moaning and bleeding in death;—in all these places this purpose of our God lies silent, but not sleeping. With a mighty sanative force it is casting these things in succession from the heart and bosom of humanity; with a force not less it will soon draw into that bosom all the healing and sweetness of the cross. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given. And the government is upon his shoulder; his name is called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Father of Eternity, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this."

But God's zeal admits and requires ours. We pass, therefore, now from divine purpose to human opportunity. There is no need to expound the general doctrine of opportunity. "Our time is always ready"—far more ready than we are to meet it. "We are workers together with God" in this very thing; he calls us to the honour; he loads us with the responsibility. And if any man will not work, neither shall he eat of the living bread. No work abroad, no fulness at home. We must spend the gospel, or lose it. The more we give it, the more we have it. God makes all its grace abound towards us, that we, having all-sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work." And if we do not, we shall grow poor, and wretched, and miserable, and blind, and naked again. Yes, this is the law: we work and grow strong; we give and grow rich; we speak because we believe, and then believe more firmly because we have spoken.

for action and usefulness ; they are very precious, they are very brief, and when they are gone they cannot be renewed. God's great purpose will travel on, but our co-operation there is impossible for ever. There is a brand in the burning ! to-day I can pluck it out, to-morrow it will be consumed. I see one whom I know standing at the wide gate, gazing and growing giddy with the rising fever of wild delight. Now I can lay the arresting hand of affection upon his shoulder, and say, "Not there ; the strait gate, the narrow way for you !" But let me wait and draw back, and when I look for him again he will be away with the delirious throng along the broad way to destruction ! This maiden, bright as the flower with the dew of morning on it, I can say to her what, perhaps, no one else will dare whisper to one so sprightly and so happy, that one thing is supremely needful, the good part which Mary chose as she sat in meekness at the Master's feet,—

"That love, and hope, and beauty's bloom,
Are blossoms gathered for the tomb ;
There's nothing fair but heaven."

But all that constitutes these opportunities will be over soon. The time—the place—the circumstances—the states of feeling—the very persons will soon be away, some of them beyond the sea, some "beyond that bourne whence no traveller returns."

So, too, it is at times with Churches, with societies, and with nations. A Church grows and prospers for a while, and then comes to a point of spiritual potentiality, where her state is tested and her history determined. She must, at that point, either become the city on the hill, or sink back into the shades of obscurity. A nation struggles, and suffers, and grows, and then comes a time—it may be a time of war or a time of peace, but it is a crucial time to her, and in a few years, perhaps, the scale of the great balance in which she is being held and weighed, rises, and she is too light to be further used for God's purposes ; or falls, and she is settled in her place as one of his great kingdoms on the earth.

It has often been a question with historians and thoughtful men, "What will England's history and destiny be ?" Will her glory also pass away ? Will the rod of her power be broken ? Will the course of empire flow to the west or to the east, or north or south, anywhere away from her shores ? Different answers have been ventured, according to the views or the predilections of the individual. Some, with a blind and thoughtless partiality, have rejected the very idea of waning glory and decaying power for her. Others have thought that it is of the substance of God's plan for the whole world to change his instruments in successive parts of the progress, in order that no race or people should glory in his presence. But this, too, is a problem far too vast and complicated for our handling. God will answer the question in his providence when the time shall come. He will answer it actually by the conflicts of the nations, and by the voices of the ages. Meantime, however, there is an answer sufficiently definite and sufficiently solemn in the prophetic menace and combination of this text. If we fail in our generation work, in the high and holy task which God evidently assigns to us for this world's good, nothing can save us for very long, "We and our father's house shall be destroyed." And then the very things which now constitute our security and our boast will become the instruments and the illustrations of our fall and shame. Our knowledge will gleam like lightning among ruins. Our art-refinements will be like the decorations of a sepulchre. Our failing commerce will summon all the nations with which it has been carried on to behold the fate of the most gigantic selfishness the world has ever seen. Our broken fleets and armies will be like the floating wreck of ocean after a storm. While the very gales which pass over our desolated land will then seem to wail and shudder with the pathos of the divine lament : "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace ! but now they are hid from thine eyes."

It is quite conceivable that, even in the event of our faithfulness, we shall still lose what we call our national supremacy. For high and wise reasons—for the good of the whole world it may be best—for example, that there should be more equality among the nations—no one standing in enviable pre-eminence, all looking up to the throne of the heavenly King. But in that case there would be no "destruction," no national perdition or disgrace ; the transition, whatever it might be, would be natural and easy—a development, not a disruption—a free and honourable change for the great King's glory and for the great kingdom's good.

But if we do not use our opportunities for the service of God in this very thing about which he is so intensely concerned, and so constantly engaged, it is the merest presumption and folly to suppose that he will show any partiality to us, or turn aside from his high and inflexible pathway of government for this world, to show undeserved favour to an ungrateful and disobedient people. "We and our father's house shall be destroyed." This is a very humbling, but a very salutary thought. Meety may we take it with us through the streets of this great London ! Looking at the Exchange, at the Bank, at the massive and capacious warehouses, at the boundless display of various merchandise along the busy streets, at the gatherings of richest and rarest things, at the parks and the princely palaces, at the towers of our Houses of Parliament, at our cathedral piles with all the precious dust and all the sculptured and trophied glories which they contain, at the shipping on the river, at the Crystal Palace shining on the hill, and at the myriad masses of our countrymen mingled with natives of every country and faces of every race of mankind—as we look at all this with new wonder every day, we may meetly and profitably say, "If we altogether hold our peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the world from another place ; but we and our father's house shall be destroyed!" And as some of us pass from the city to our homes in the country, and behold on the way some of its most beautiful scenes and most interesting objects, we may take up the same moral refrain. That castle would soon moulder! That mansion would soon crumble down, and be no fairer to the sight than the smoke-stained walls of the dismantled cottage! That park, so rich and green, would soon fall beneath the old curse and bring forth thorns and thistles again! Those garden bowers into which the roses shed their fragrance, and in which are heard the soft whisperings of love, might soon be dark with the nightshade, rank with the hemlock, and sounding only with the serpent's hiss. For "the hand of the Lord will be on everything high and lifted up," unless on the same elevation his glory shines.

He has no antipathy to things high and lifted up in themselves. 'Tis He who makes all height, all strength, all beauty! He lifts the peaks of the mountains into clearest air, and gives them baptism of the purest snow. He watches the cedars of Lebanon during their thousand years of growth, and loves them for their hoary age and their shaggy strength. He feeds the wide-spreading oaks of Bashan with sap of the earth and dew of the heaven. He dwells in the high tower if it is built for him. He wafts the ships of Tarshish across all seas with favouring gales. He rejoices in the beauty of all pleasant pictures. But if these things are used as means of elevation for godless, daring, or selfish ease, or any form of human vanity or pride, then, according to the law, swiftly they must fall. He will uproot the old cedars of Lebanon. He will rend the strong oaks of Bashan. He will rift with his lightning the high towers. He will breach the fenced walls. He will rot the ships of Tarshish. He will stain the pleasant pictures. He will bow down the loftiness of man, and make low his haughtiness that he himself may be exalted in that day. "And the idols he shall utterly abolish," the idol of national glory among the rest, and "we and our father's house shall be destroyed."

A more solid fact is not to be found than this—that the spiritual kingdom of Jesus Christ is the grand power of this world to-day. There is nothing to match it—nothing to compare with it. Among ourselves especially, it is the force of forces—the fullest, strongest fountain of our country's life. It suggests legislation. It constitutes crime, defines virtue, fashions manners, describes rights. It rules thought, outreaches philosophy, anticipates science, quickens and refines the arts. There is nothing it doesn't touch, and it touches nothing but with the royal hand of a spiritual supremacy. Men may deny this; they may argue or declaim, fret or fume against it; but—still it is true. The great mountain is a mountain still, not losing one grain from its substance, although the angry child is beating it with a straw. Thus far the kingdom of God has come; and we have come to the kingdom. We have come weary and heavy laden, with heart-fears and life-burdens, seeking for our own souls its refreshing and its rest—seeking to be happy in the Saviour's peace, and pure in the purity of God. But not for these things only. We have come to the kingdom "for such a time as this"—soldiers for conflict, living witnesses for the testimony of God, workers ready for his blessed work—ready to press through the opening gates, ready to reap the ripening fields, ready to speak the living word to dying men—"Ready, aye ready." If we have not this motto upon our escutcheon, we are not come to the kingdom for such a time as this. Opportunity is so quick, possibilities are so great, forces are so strong, and the prospects of the opening future are so enrapturing, but yet so dependent on faithfulness in the present hour, that we must be "ready for every good work," or lose our function and our peculiar place in the great time on which we have fallen.

There is no need that we should all rush out to the formal defence of the system at every cry of alarm that may arise. We are not all needed on the battlements. Salvation has been appointed for walls and bulwarks long ago. The city is safe. The mountain which is to fill the whole earth will not be cast into the midst of the sea. This day calls us anew to our work—and in that work, quickened by a higher energy, refreshed with more earnest prayers, carried on beneath the Master's eye, we shall give the best reply we can to all suggested doubts; we shall most effectually scatter all difficulties, whether speculative or practical. More doubts in Oxford! how must we resolve them? by sending more missionaries to China. Are we told again (as if we had never been told before) that the canonicity of particular books of the Bible cannot be proved, and that the inspiration of the whole cannot be defined? What is our reply? That the questions thus raised are far too stupendous to be settled in their cloisters, or in our pulpits either. This is a question in which the whole race is interested. To humanity we make the appeal. We must translate the book into every language, and let it speak for itself in every land. Are we told again that miracles are impossible if "the order of nature" is to be maintained? What is our reply? It is this: That we are willing, as Christian workers, to put the whole question to this proof—we will go out with the gospel message as we have been told, and as we have been wont; and if moral miracles are not wrought, if there are no "signs following," as in the ancient days, we will come back and confess that man can be lighted best by reason, ruled but by inexorable law, and comforted when his sorrow comes only on the dark, cold bosom of fate. Is it whispered, or boldly declared, that what we have always regarded as the very heart and core of the gospel is, after all, but an error of our interpretation—a creation of our own imagination, while disturbed by consciousness of guilt, and not yet pacified by sufficiency of self-sacrifice! What shall we say? only this, "Let us tell the tale as our fathers told it, for so in the main we believe it to be! Let us try if the balm of Gilead will not still heal the wounds of suffering men—if the blood of sprinkling will not still pacify the troubled, guilty conscience. "Hinder us not, seeing the Lord hath prospered our way!" We tell a tale of love which has melted many a cold and sluggish heart, and which if untold can have no substitute, either in the facts of history, or in the fancy of man. Oh, hinder us not! Bid us "God-speed," if you can, even amid your doubts; for we go to preach Christ crucified, a stumbling-block, alas, to some, to others foolishness, but to all who believe, in whatever nation, of whatever class, Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God for ever.

THE CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN.

PART II.

THE first basis of union among the Bohemian Brethren appears to have been of a simple and general kind. Their great fundamental principle was the doctrine of Hus, that "The New Testament supplied the only infallible rule for the guidance of Christians in all things, and that all regulations not enjoined by the word of God, or fairly deducible from it, were to be viewed as mere matters of expediency, and might be altered according to circumstances." Another unanimous resolution was "To suffer all things for conscience' sake," and seek protection in the exercise of their religion, not from worldly weapons, but by prayer to God, and patient, calm remonstrance with their enemies. They elected, by a majority of votes, three "elders" to exercise a general superintendence over their concerns, the most remarkable of whom was Gregory, nephew to Rokyzan. Matthias Bradacius, a pious, venerable Calixtine priest, was their first minister, and other ministers from the same body soon joined them. Strict Church discipline was introduced and adhered to; they called themselves brothers and sisters, and everything was done to maintain and promote a spirit of brotherly love and harmony.

Their numbers, as we have already seen, rapidly increased, by Christians from all parts of the country joining the Union; and congregations were formed in various places throughout Bohemia and Moravia. Three years had hardly elapsed when their faith and endurance were most severely tried. Rokyzan, in whom they hoped to find a friend, proved in the end an enemy and persecutor. The reigning sovereign durst not protect them, having sworn, on ascending the throne, to extirpate all heretics. So, when the jealous vigilance of Rome was again awakened, a storm of persecution broke upon these peaceful, humble followers of Christ, such as divine power and faithfulness alone could have enabled them to endure and survive. It is dreadful to read of the tortures inflicted by men calling themselves Christians, but whose actions resemble those of the old Pagan persecutors.

Gregory, now the leading minister, paid a visit to Prague to comfort and encourage the suffering brethren there. He assembled them in an "upper chamber," to celebrate together the memorials of the Saviour's dying love. A message came to him from a kind magistrate that their proceedings were known and danger was at hand. Gregory, on receiving it, advised the little company to separate at once, and seek safety in flight. There was a variety of opinions among them on the subject. Some said, "He that believeth shall not make haste" (Bohemian translation: "does not flee"); some young men even boasted how lightly they thought of torture and death. While they hesitated the time for escape was lost, and an officer of justice, entering, addressed them thus: "It is written, 'All that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution.' Follow me, therefore, to prison, by order of government." Under pretence of discovering some seditious designs, they were then threatened with torture. The faith of most of those so confident beforehand now gave way, while the more timid ones remained firm. Gregory was placed on the rack, and fainting from excess of suffering, was supposed to be dead. His uncle, on hearing of this, hastened to the prison, and showed that neither natural affection nor conscience were totally silenced in his heart, exclaiming with tears, "O my dear Gregory, would God that my soul were in thy soul's stead!" But Gregory, like Paul in somewhat similar circumstances, recovered from his swoon, and was then, at his uncle's intercession, set at liberty. He is said to have told of a vision, during his unconscious state, in which he beheld the three men chosen some years afterwards as the first bishops of the Brethren's Church, under the figure of three watchers over the fruit of a beautiful and richly-laden tree.

The sensibility shown by Rokyzan on this occasion encouraged the Brethren to hope that he might still befriend them. They wrote, entreating him, as the highest ecclesiastic in the kingdom (Archbishop of Prague), to undertake a general reformation of religion, or, at all events, to grant his countenance and counsels in the direction of their affairs, representing that in the first formation of their Union they had very much followed his advice. But all their applications proved in vain, and they took farewell of him at last, with words of solemn warning, which still further irritated his proud spirit and uneasy conscience. "Thou art of the world, and shalt perish with the world." He became a more decided enemy, and obtained a royal edict, ordering that "these dangerous people should no longer be suffered to remain in Bohemia and Moravia."

Then, as in days of old, those "of whom the world was not worthy, wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth." In the thickest forests, in the wildest mountain solitudes, they sought for places of refuge. They could only dare to light fires during the night, lest the smoke should betray their retreat. And when the snows of winter lay around, they only ventured out in single file, the last dragging some brushwood to erase their footprints. How, in any considerable numbers, they survived such trials, can only be attributed to the special providence of Him in whom they trusted, and for whose truth they suffered the loss of all things.

Much of their time was spent in exercises of worship, and in anxious deliberation as to the best means of preserving and continuing a faithful ministry among them in future days. Their present ministers, who had been ordained by the Calixtines, might soon die; and should no others from that body join them, how were their places to be filled? To decide this important matter a Conference or Synod was called in 1467, to meet at the small frontier village of Lhota, in the house of a friend. Seventy persons of all ranks attended as deputies. Gregory appears to have been the chief speaker, and after much prayer and consultation, they came to a unanimous resolution to elect their pastors from among themselves; and following the example of the apostles in the choice of Matthias (Acts i. 15, 26), that this should now be done by lot, solemnly referring the decision to the Lord himself. Nine men of most approved life and piety were then chosen, any of whom were considered well qualified for the ministry, and it was determined that three out of this number should be appointed by lot. They prepared twelve slips of paper, writing on three of these the word "Est" (this is he), and leaving the others blank. Gregory now addressed the meeting, exhorting them to refer the whole matter with perfect confidence and resignation to the Lord's disposal, beseeching him by earnest prayer so to overrule and order their proceedings, that only such men as he appointed should receive the written papers, or, if none of the nine candidates were acceptable in his sight, that all should draw blanks. The papers were then mixed together in an urn, and after a time of solemn prayer, a boy was called in, who drew out and handed a slip to each of the nine brethren. The written ones were received by Matthias of Kunewalde, Thomas of Preschelaus, and Elias of Kreschenow. These three were joyfully hailed by the assembly as their appointed teachers, chosen of God. If the story of Gregory's vision be correct, it must have appeared a most striking and encouraging confirmation of the whole matter.

A second Synod was called, during the same year as the former one, to discuss the question of how to secure for themselves Episcopal ordination. Having been always accustomed to this form of Church government, they did not feel satisfied without it, and also feared that any departure from regular order in that respect might afford a new pretext for the accusations of their enemies. In this difficulty they turned for assistance to their old friends the Waldenses, by whom they were gladly welcomed. There were at this time several Waldensian congregations in Austria, and to the Austrian bishop, Stephen, the Bohemian Brethren sent a deputation of three of their ministers, selected for the purpose. He received them with the greatest joy, and ordained them as bishops, with authority to ordain others, as has been done accordingly in succession to the present time.

The question was now entertained, whether they ought not to unite with the Waldenses, so as to form one Church of Christ. But this was prevented by the fresh violence of persecution against both parties. Stephen, with many of his people, died at the stake, and the Austrian congregations were dispersed. The brethren had to endure indescribable hardships and sufferings until 1471, when the king and Rokyzan died, within a few days of each other, the latter in such mental anguish as might have been expected for one who had so greatly sinned against light and knowledge. The king who succeeded Podiebrad was a benevolent man, and under him the persecuted Church enjoyed a brief season of respite and repose.

This interval was employed to the best advantage, in seeking to strengthen their own foundations of doctrine and discipline, and to promote among themselves the graces of brotherly love and self-denial. Although incessantly accused of schism, which was considered a great sin in those days, the brethren were in fact most truly desirous to unite with other Christians, and now resolved to send a deputation to various parts of Christendom, to discover, if possible, some congregations free from Popish errors, living in conformity to the precepts of Christ and his apostles, with whom they might join in communion. Four deputies, furnished with money by some of the nobility, and a safeguard from the king, set out for this purpose in 1474, each one in a separate direction. They travelled through Greece, Dalmatia, part of Russia and Sclavonia, visited Constantinople and Thrace, penetrated into Egypt and Palestine, but returned with the melancholy intelligence that nominal Christians everywhere appeared sunk in superstition, error, and sin. Three years afterwards two messengers went on the same errand to France and Italy, in hopes especially of finding out the remnant of the Waldenses. But they also returned, saying that although they had discovered some of the Lord's "hidden ones" cleaving to him through much tribulation, and had seen some faithful witnesses suffer martyrdom for the truth of the gospel, they had found nothing like a living Church with whom they could unite. So it appeared as if all that remained for them was to hold fast the truth themselves, and pray earnestly for apostate Christendom. At a Synod in 1489 this resolution was unanimously adopted,—That whenever it should please God to raise up sincere teachers and reformers in the Church in any part of the world, the Brethren would gladly join and make common cause with them.

They had been engaged for some time in preparing a translation of the Bible in Bohemian, the first known translation into any European language. This was printed at Venice in 1470, and so rapidly sold that two new editions were soon called for. So the Church of the Brethren, before any other in Europe, enjoyed the blessing of having the word of God, for the use of the people, in their own mother tongue.

They sent their Confession of Faith to the celebrated

Erasmus at Rotterdam, requesting him to examine it, and point out any errors, or, if satisfied, to give them the benefit of his testimony in their favour. In reply, he assured them in general terms of his approval, but declined giving any public testimony, saying that this would not free them of the charge of heresy, while it might make his own writings suspected, and hinder his usefulness. However, in his preface afterwards to the New Testament, he spoke more decidedly, and defended the Brethren from the aspersions of their enemies.

These enemies meanwhile were not idle, but using every means, by calumny and artifice, to stir up persecution again. In 1481 a new edict of banishment dispersed multitudes of believers from Bohemia over great part of Europe, yet, instead of lessening, served rather to increase their numbers; and some troubles in Moravia diverting public attention, many of them returned home, and a writer of that period observes that "the poor miserable Brethren were left to themselves."

In 1506, the Popish party having gained over to their side the queen of Bohemia, who was then expecting an heir, excited her fears of personal danger and divine judgment to such a degree, that she used all her influence in persuading her husband to sign an edict against the "Picards" (a common term of reproach then for both the Brethren and Waldenses). The king, with strange inconsistency, when he signed the edict, is said to have fallen on his knees and besought God to pardon him for what he was compelled to do, and to bring this counsel against his people to nought. His prayer was heard, and answered "by terrible things in righteousness." The poor queen soon after died in child-birth, and death in such remarkable forms overtook the leaders of the persecution, that men could not but see in their fate the judgments of God, and it became a proverb, "If any one is tired of life, let him quarrel with the Picards, and he will not live another year." In this way the violence of persecution was restrained, while the suffering Church was recruited by many new converts, including men of wealth and rank, who gladly gave of their substance for the support of the ministry, and built places of worship in their towns and villages; and also many Waldenses, who had sought refuge in Bohemia.

Let us take a brief glance at the general constitution of the Church, in doctrine and government, as described by the historian Holmes.

The Bohemian Confession of Faith was in substance the same as that of the Waldenses and the succeeding protesting Churches. Holding Scripture as the only infallible rule of faith and practice, they taught from it the great doctrines of the Trinity in unity; man's original depravity since the fall, and inability to save himself; the "one full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world" made by God the Son upon the cross; justification by faith alone; and regeneration through the work of the Spirit. Baptism and the Lord's supper they observed as the only sacraments. External forms and ceremonies in worship were not strictly prescribed, but left as things which "might be regulated differently, according to the diversity of national character and local circumstances."

Their form of Church government may be called a modified Episcopacy. At a very early period it was resolved that the chief ecclesiastical government should never be in the hands of one man, but that there should always be at least four bishops, or seniors, equal in rank and authority. "They were not distinguished from other ministers, either by temporal rank or greater revenue, but by an increase of labour and care." Each had charge of a certain number of congregations. One was chosen as president over the ecclesiastical councils, another as secretary to report the proceedings. The office of a bishop was for life, unless—which never once occurred—it should be forfeited by misconduct; and each bishop had several conseniors, or assistants, to aid him in his labours, and supply his place when necessary. The bishops and conseniors constituted the Ecclesiastical Council, "the first ruling power in the Church, subject only to the General Synod."

The presbyters, or ministers, resembled in position and duties our own parish clergymen. Their appointment or occasional translations belonged to the bishops.

The deacons, next in office, were like our own curates or home missionaries. They were considered as candidates for the ministry, and assisted the presbyters by district teaching and preaching, under their superintendence and instructions.

There was yet a third congregational office. The acolyths were young men like our divinity students, under training for the ministry. Each minister had one or more of these youths as part of his family, under his peculiar care and teaching.

Each congregation, according to its number of members, elected by a majority of votes from three to eight men of known piety and good report as elders. Their duties answered very much to those of the same office among ourselves, but were far more strictly enforced and performed than in most Churches now-a-days; and they were expected to exercise a degree of surveillance which could hardly be submitted to in our congregations. There were also female elders—matrons of approved Christian experience, chosen by the votes of the women, and having special charge over them.

The highest ecclesiastical authority was that of the General Synods, which met every three or four years, the place and time being decided by the bishops. From this tribunal there was no appeal, but, as in our own Presbyterian Churches, every member was equally entitled to state his opinions. All elections for office and ordinations were made at this court. No resolution was adopted till every member declared himself satisfied with it.

The Ecclesiastical Council, as we have already said, consisted of all the bishops and conseniors. They received their authority from the Synod, and were bound to see its resolutions executed by ministers and people. From their decisions in any case an appeal to the Synod might be made.

The separate affairs of each congregation were managed by its own "Presbytery," or Board of Elders, presided over by the pastor.

Their views of discipline were very strict, and were then exercised without any respect of persons. It was considered part of Christian duty to "admonish one another" for any evident fault; and if no expressions of repentance followed, to mention the circumstance to an elder, who took a private opportunity of dealing with the offender, and endeavouring to bring him to a sense of his errors. In cases of serious and continued delinquency, the party was openly reprov'd, and suspended from the communion—during which time he was constantly prayed for by the congregation, and gladly welcomed again on giving tokens of repentance. Exclusion from the Church, in extreme cases, was reluctantly resorted to, and executed in the most solemn and public manner.

From this outline, some idea may be formed of the old Moravian constitution, which, as to its leading features, remains to the present day. And now the glorious morning of the Reformation was about to shine on Europe, and the Sun of Righteousness to arise on the nations with healing in his wings. But let us not forget that during the darkest hours of night preceding the dawn, this first of the Protestant Churches, whose history we are now reviewing, had been shining as a light in the darkness, bravely and openly maintaining a testimony for the truth as it is in Jesus, in the face of every possible danger and suffering. At this period, in Bohemia and Moravia, the Brethren already held two hundred places of worship, with regular congregations, where the word of God in their own language was read, and the truth of God faithfully preached. When we think of their feeble beginning, only sixty years before, and the almost unrelenting persecutions to which they had constantly been exposed, we can only say, Had this work and counsel been of man, it must have come to nought. But "the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand." This is his doing: it is marvellous in our eyes!"

SCATTERED SEED.

THE autumnal wind was sweeping over the wood, carrying away the scared leaves, and bringing down acorns and beech mast with a pattering sound, like heavy rain, when a grand old beech, whose spirits were probably depressed by the season, broke forth into a mournful soliloquy.

"I wonder," murmured he, "what is the use of year after year bringing so much seed to perfection. I have no opportunity of scattering it abroad, or casting it into soil where there is any chance of its taking root and springing up. It's well known that scarcely even grass or moss can thrive under our shadow; and so, summer after summer, the tiny beechlings that spring at my foot struggle in vain for life, and after putting forth a pair or two of leaves, they invariably give up and die. If I could only cast some of my nuts beyond the verge of the wood, where there is space and sunshine; but it is so far off, how can I? Sometimes, when the wind blows, I toss them as far as I can, and pray the breeze to carry them further. But they never go very far, that I can see. They have not wings for flying, like the keys of the ash and sycamore; nor down and feathers, like the seed of the alder and impudent thistle-down, that floats wherever it fancies. To be sure, the squirrel and his wife, who bring up their young families in the hole in my side, use my nuts very freely, and would be rather at a loss without them. The nut-hatch, too, is always busy cracking them; and now and then, when they come this way, the forest pigs get a good meal round my roots. I don't grudge them, I'm sure, all they get. I'm glad to have it in my power to do any good I can, but I would like to know that some of my seed was living and growing, and likely, after I am gone, to bring forth and perfect fruit in its turn.

"It's only natural," sighed the poor beech-tree, as he slightly swayed to and fro in the wind, and rustled his leaves in a discontented tone. Meantime, often when the squirrels had eaten as much beech mast as was good for them at a time, they amused themselves burying little hoards of nuts for winter use, and then forgot the exact spot; and the nut-hatch, a kind of miser in her way, and fond of laying up stores in tree-hollows, often dropped clusters from her beak as she flew from place to place. Some of these fell in suitable localities, where everything was favourable for the germination of the seed and the growth of the young plant; and so it came to pass that here and there, from the squirrels' forgotten hoards and the careless nut-hatch's lost treasures, young thriving descendants of the beech-tree were springing up, though he knew nothing about them, and was not likely to know, as the hiding squirrel and scattering nut-hatch were quite ignorant of the good turn they had unconsciously done their benefactor. It would certainly have comforted the beech could he have known; but happily his discontent did not last long, and he came to the wise conclusion, that it was his duty to do all he could, and obey the law of his being, and bring forth plentifully and perfect his seed, and then leave it in his Creator's hand to use as seemed good to him.

It is possible that you, my reader, may be in circumstances to sympathize with the old beech's natural longings. You are seeking to bring forth fruit unto God, not only in your daily life, but by scattering abroad, as you have opportunity, the good seed of the kingdom. You long to see that this your labour is not in vain. You would fain behold some seed taking root downward, and bearing fruit upward in some precious immortal soul. But by providential limitations, you are unable to trace the effects of your efforts for good, and your heart is often sick with the longings of hope deferred. Perhaps your hard-working week-day life, prevents you from looking after your Sabbath scholars in their own homes, and meeting them only from week to week on your one leisure evening, you can scarcely tell if any permanent impression is produced by your loving words and earnest exhortations.

Or you are an invalid, confined to your chamber, and unable to go about doing good. Yet, in the Master's spirit, you watch for and use every little opportunity of ministering to the spiritual welfare of those who are ministering to you, and through them also by book or message, you seek to reach those without who are beyond the reach of your personal ministry. You hear of others whose blessed life-labour it is to watch, and tend, and cultivate the up-springing of seed which their own hands have sown, and you feel that even to hear of one such vital growth resulting from your efforts, would be reward unspeakable for all your pains.

Or you may be one, through the pressure of many causes, limited very much to your pen in your direct efforts to benefit your fellows. Your heart here gets a vent in pleading with and exhorting sinners, which a timid nature or a stammering tongue would otherwise have denied it. But you cast your writings forth on the wide waters, and hear of them no more. You may know of those within the sphere of your own personal observation pleased or interested by them, but that does not satisfy you. The truths you scatter, contain the words of eternal life, and living souls, born of the incorruptible seed, to be in their turn seed-sowing centres, alone can meet your heart's desire.

Now this desire of seeing fruit is quite natural and quite proper, but it may or it may not be granted here. It is well to bear in mind, that it is one thing to expect fruit, and another thing to be permitted to see it.

It is our duty to sow in faith, expecting a blessing on the seed sown, but it is by no means necessary that we should see it. God may graciously permit us to see great results from our feeble efforts, to encourage our hearts and strengthen our faith, but he may also choose to purify our motives and simplify our faith, by hiding success from our eyes. Moreover, it often happens that a seed of prayerful effort cast forth in his name, takes no root in the spot directly aimed at, but, glancing aside, springs up in some unthought of corner, where the Spirit of God has guided it. Of such cases the original sower may never hear, but the Lord knows, and that is enough. It is no uncommon thing, in the case of a Sabbath-school teacher, to find that the truth carried home by a heedless child has lodged in the heart of a parent or friend, and here sprung up, and brought forth fruit an hundred-fold. The hospital visitor's earnest words and written urses, retailed in jest by the careless soldier to whom they were addressed, have sunk deep into the heart of his invalid comrade, and there wrought the work, they had failed in the first instance to effect.

The powerful influence for good emanating from a Christian sufferer's sick-chamber may—as in the case of Fanny Bickersteth—spread far beyond the circle of home or friends, and leaven with blessing the character and home of many a life-long invalid; and the book or tract, with its testimony for God and his truth, may be carried away to regions which your personal presence may never reach, and when you have rested from your labours altogether, and received at heaven's gate the greeting, "Well done, good and faithful servant," your words may be still dropping seed into prepared hearts, and trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, be springing up here and there, where messengers—like birds of the air—have carried them.

Be encouraged, then, to go on sowing seed according to your opportunities, limited or narrowed though these may be. Be careful only, that it be first fruit brought forth unto God, faith working by love in your own heart, and then love working by faith and prayer, as it casts it forth into the hearts of others. God will then take care of it, and use it as seems good to him. It will, by no means, be lost, and hereafter, if not here, you will enter into the joy of your Lord, and in your measure be gladdened and satisfied with seeing of the travail of your soul, and recognising the unknown offspring which God has given you. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand, for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that; or whether they both shall be alike good." "But we know that our labour shall not be in vain in the Lord." c.

THE BLESSINGS OF DISAPPOINTMENT.

BY REV. THEODORE L. CUYLER.

"BLEASSED be disappointment!" said we to ourselves one evening as we sat at the table of a distinguished civilian. He was one of the honoured of the land. A goodly group of "olive branches" were gathered around him. The sweet-voiced wife at the head of the table had in her early days been affianced to an aristocratic youth of great wealth and promise, but on the appointed day of their marriage he had eloped under circumstances of peculiar baseness. What a disappointment to expectant friends and ambitious kinsfolk! But the true-hearted girl swallowed her tears of mortification, and in fitting time gave her hand to a sturdy youth, who has since carried her as his wife to the American Capitol. She has lived to see her renegade lover reel into the grave of the profligate. How little did she know what an escape God had opened to her through the dark door of disappointment.

We might multiply instances of a like character from daily observation. A man hurries breathless to the wharf in order to reach a departing steamer. He is one moment too late! The plank is drawn; and as he watches the stately vessel plough her way off through the blue waters, she seems to be ploughing through his very heart. "How provoking," he exclaims to the half-smiling, half-pitying bystanders. He goes home sulky; he retires sulky to his bed, and wakes up to read in the morning paper that "a few hours after leaving port, that steamer took fire, and when last seen was floating on the water a flaming wreck!" He fancies himself clinging in despair to a sinking billet of wood, and his very blood runs cold when he thinks how near he came to being on board that death-freighted vessel. And yet the very next time that man is thrown out by Providence from some favourite plan, he is slow to apply the lesson of the past, and to thank his heavenly Father for a disappointment.

We do not pretend to be a very apt learner, but many of our best lessons through life have been taught us by that same stern old schoolmaster, disappointment. And one lesson we learned was that this world was not made only for us. If it had been, the sun would have shone just when our hay needed curing, and the rain would have fallen only when our gardens needed to be watered. But we found that God went right on and ordered things as pleased him best, without consulting us. And when our schemes were thwarted, the stern schoolmaster said, "The world was not made for you alone. Don't be selfish. Your loss perhaps is another's gain. The rain that spoils your new-mown hay makes the blade of corn to grow faster in your neighbour's field. The fall in grain that cuts down your profits will help the poor widow in yonder cottage to buy bread cheaper for her orphan babes. So don't be selfish."

On a grand scale we sometimes see this lesson taught. When a certain greedy self-seeker once clutched at the empire of the civilized world, stern disappointment met him in his ambitious path, flung a Russian snow-storm in his face, and out of the tiny snow-flakes wove a white shroud to wrap the flower of French chivalry! "Go back! go back!" he cried, "all Europe was not made for you." The lesson the proud usurper would not learn at Aspern was taught him in blood and agony at Borodino, and on the frozen banks of the Dnieper. So, too, have we been taught in the defeat of our humbler schemes and in the failure of our humbler plans—"Don't be selfish; God did not make this world all for you." This lesson is worth all it costs us.

A second lesson which disappointment has taught us is that our losses are not only gains to others, but very often the richest gain to ourselves. In our short-sighted ignorance we had "devised a way," and set our hearts upon it. Had we been allowed to pursue it, we must have been led by it to ruin. God could not have sent a greater judgment on us than simply to have let us have our own way. In a thousand instances we have seen this made true, both in things temporal and in things spiritual. A merchant is thwarted in some enterprise in such a manner as to excite his bitterest mortification. But the far-seeing God knows full well that he has been saved from a much sorer sorrow. The pecuniary failures of 1857 made many a man of business rich in the priceless treasure of a Christian's hope. It was a dark door which disappointment opened during that calamitous year, but it led tens of thousands into the pathway of heaven.

Mayhap these lines may reach some one who can recall the remembrance of some earthly idol which once held too high a place in the temple of her affections. Her life was bound up in the life of the boy. She worshipped him more than she worshipped her Saviour. At length the trial came. In terror and dismay she saw the colour fading out from that cheek of roses. Fainter and fainter fell each sweet "good-night" from his faltering tongue. In her agony she oft cried out, "O God, let me not see the death of the child!" And when the chestnut curl at last lay motionless on the silent lip, her grief burst out in David's passionate wail, "Would God I had died for thee, my son, my son!"

At length the first agony has wept itself out. She has come to herself. Above all, she has come to her Saviour; and as she beholds how ungrateful was her idolatry—how her best affections had been stolen from Christ—and how frail a reed she was leaning on, her trembling soul looks back with wonder to see from what a posture of guilt and peril she has been delivered. It is not, therefore, only the melancholy pleasure of knowing that her fair hope—plucked away by the angel-reapers—is now blooming in the fields of light which alone sustain her, but the sense of rescue from a state of fearful forgetfulness of Christ and of duty. She is done with idols. She never again will let any earthly object have that central place in her heart which a crucified Saviour earned for himself, and himself alone.

The record-book of every Christian life has some such pages as these. Tears have blurred and blotted the page at the time. But as you turn over to that page now, and read it in the light of experience, you can write across it, Thank God for these losses—they were my eternal gain; thank God for bereavements—they have saved my soul from being bereaved of a hope of heaven! "There," said a young man once, as he pointed to a diseased limb that was destroying his life; "there it is, and a precious treasure it has been to me. It saved me from the follies of youth: it brought me to this room, and made me cleave to God; I think it has brought me now almost to my Father's house on high."

Good reader, if you and I ever reach that Father's house, we will look back and see that the sharp-tongued, rough-visaged teacher Disappointment, was one of our best guides to bring us thither. He often took us by thorny paths. He often stripped us of our over-load of worldly goods; but that was only to make us travel the freer and the faster on our heavenward way. He often led us into the valley of the death-shadow; but never did the promises read so sweetly to us as when read by the light of faith in that very valley. The cross of Christ was the point toward which he oftenest made us look.

and the favourite passage he gave us for our encouragement was, "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." Dear old rough, harsh-handed teacher! we will build a monument to him yet, and hang it with garlands. And on it we will write—Blessed be the memory of DISAPPOINTMENT.

HEAVEN'S LIGHT IN DARKSOME DWELLINGS.

[We have pleasure in inserting the following appeal, from the pen of an esteemed contributor, Mr. Arnot. It has been issued on behalf of the Edinburgh Institution for Imbecile Children, but it may lead readers in other parts of the country to interest themselves in similar institutions in their own immediate neighbourhood.]

"HAVE you given thanks to God to-day for the use of your reason?" said a stranger, as he planted himself suddenly in front of a passenger on the street. Taken aback, and somewhat overawed by the abrupt but solemn manner of the interrogator, the citizen answered in all simplicity, "I confess I have not." "Go then, and do so instantly," continued the maniac, "for I have lost mine." It was one of those glimpses of deeper than ordinary wisdom that burst at times from the insane, like flashes of sun-light through momentary rifts in the thick black covering of the sky, on a still, electrically disturbed, summer day, seeming all the more intensely bright and burning because of the darkness before and behind. Thus, out of the mouths of babes and sucklings God ordains his own praise and our reproof.

Even among those who are generally well-disposed, there is a vast amount of sluggish forgetfulness and thanklessness in regard to the mercies which they enjoy every day and all the day. The proverb, "You will know the worth of it when you know the want of it," is a standing reproach to mankind. Why should we not know and acknowledge the worth of our mercies before they are taken away? They are no better than atheists who forget God as long as he blesses, and think and speak of him only when he smites them.

There is a class of persons, interfused throughout the community in every corner of the land, considerable in point of numbers, very interesting, but very helpless; much neglected in the past, yet capable of great improvement,—the imbecile or weak-minded. We have a machine fit for doing the needful work, and we are looking about for a stream to drive it. We must draw upon the same river that makes so many other useful mills go round, and that is LOVE. It is in the form of gratitude that it exerts its power. By gratitude we do not mean the ghost of a name; we mean gratitude for God's goodness, incarnate in actual beneficence to needy men. As thankfulness for the gospel embodies itself in efforts to diffuse its blessed light through the world; and thankfulness for freedom embodies itself in efforts to emancipate the slave; so those who really are thankful to God for the possession of their mental faculties, will experience a desire, amounting, when fully developed, to a craving like hunger, to alleviate by all available means the sad condition of the imbecile. Love to Him who makes our cup full will impel us to run to the rescue of those whose cup is almost empty.

Combined and systematic efforts to instruct and train children of weak mind is of recent origin. Scarcely any attempt was made before the beginning of the present century, and few of the existing institutions are more than ten years old. If we have been late in beginning this department of philanthropy, we should now work all the more vigorously to make up our lee-way. Former generations of the imbecile were permitted to grow up corrupt and corrupting, hurting themselves and shocking the passengers on the public highways. Of late years a veil has been drawn decently over that open sore by the removal of those children, graphically in our own Scottish vernacular styled objects, into workhouses or other places of shelter. This, though an improvement on the barbarous practice of the past, is only the half, and that the lower half of our duty.

In Switzerland, France, America, England, and also to some extent in Scotland, systematic efforts have of late years been made, with an encouraging measure of success, for the mental and moral training of imbecile children. In one state of America, whose case is not worse than that of other countries, but only more accurately known, there are 1087 idiots in a gross population of 1,225,000, which gives the proportion of about one in a thousand; and this is exclusive of 2632 persons who are, properly speaking, insane in the same community; so that there is one person of either unsound or feeble mind to every 302 of the general population. In Scotland, as nearly as can be ascertained, there are about 2236 imbeciles, and of these about 600 are of an age suitable for being admitted into educational institutions.

We cannot in this paper afford room for details of the methods employed in the education of idiots, or of the measure of success which has been attained. For these we must refer to documents, which are rapidly multiplying, in the shape of reports from institutions both in England and America; but on the faith of the experience already obtained, we are able to affirm that the success has been great as to the number of cases over which it is spread, and in some examples also great as to its amount in the individual. We scarcely know any greater luxury to a tender and pure mind than the history of some of these cases. If doing good in ordinary forms be to a Christian like meat and drink, the successful introduction of these helpless children to a measure of civilized habit, and intellectual light, and moral purity, and Christian hope, is like a cordial to the spirit, both sweet and restoring. Reader, have you ever, when somewhat weary, sat down to rest on a stone by the wayside in a warm summer day? And as you mused, happy and half-dreamy, have you observed a flower at your feet, much crushed by a stone that had accidentally fallen upon it while it was in bud, struggling ineffectually to escape from the pressure, twisting its body and crushing its petals in the effort? You stretched out your hand, of course, and lifted off the stone, and saw the floweret spring up, and look into your face, as if it were glad and grateful. When you rose and resumed your journey, ruminating on what you had done, you felt happier because of doing it. Ah! the spirits of these imbeciles were sweet flowers in bud, and some fall in infancy, or some abnormal outgrowth about the brain, has lain there a dead weight, and crushed them, as the stone crushed the wild flower on the wayside. We are trying to lift the pressure off, and so enable these immortal flowerets, ere it be too late, to open their bosoms to the Light. Come and help us, that you may enjoy with us the peculiar delight of helping these helpless little ones. Jesus loved to relieve them; so should we.

A Society has been formed; men of high position and character have owned and befriended it. On a small scale, in the neighbourhood of Dundee and in Edinburgh, the work has begun. It is now time that a larger and more permanent institution should be erected, capable of dealing with the ailment effectually, and on an adequate scale. Treatment in an institution where medical aid is available, as well as experience in the training of the imbecile, is not only better than neglect, but better than any private efforts which can be made either by rich or poor; and, as the rich avail themselves of the benefit as well as the poor, the work, when once it is fairly established, can be made to a great extent self-supporting. It is, accordingly, for the building and first equipment only, and not for subsequent maintenance, that an appeal is made. A suitable site has been secured in the parish of Larbert, about half way between Edinburgh and Glasgow. The estimated cost is £10,000, of which £1600 have already been obtained. The balance, £8,400, we ask from those who love God and man, for this needful work. For all Scotland, and for once, the sum is small. We expect that it will be obtained, all and soon.

We appeal to the Young, who have grown to maturity in possession of all their faculties. While you wield these strong arms, and plant these wondrously-framed feet upon the ground; while you distinctly remember the past, and thoughtfully plan for the future; while you begin the race of life, and, like the sun in the east, begin to run that race rejoicing; while you write your thoughts to distant friends, and read off theirs from the record which reaches you in return; while you learn from the Scriptures God's revealed will, and raise, through the Mediator your prayer for mercy;—think of the children who, if left to accident, can do none of these things at all, but who, by God's blessing on skilful effort, may be taught to do them all in measure, and the highest of them, so as to become members of the whole family of God.

We appeal to Parents whose children bud and blossom like olive-plants around their table, unscathed by that dreary mildew that creeps over some infant minds. Look again on that familiar and much-loved circle—gaze once more into those bright eyes, avenues out from bright minds within, and calculate as you gaze, "How much owest thou unto thy Lord?" Trust to the logic of your heart at such a moment and in such a frame, for it is true. Do not permit the glow of gratitude to cool down, but "take thy bill and sit down quickly," and write for our Institute of Imbeciles, not an extravagant, but a well-considered, true, honest expression of your thankfulness to God for the Light of Reason, kindled and kept shining in yourselves and your little ones.

LARGE TYPE CHRISTIANS.

AMONG a crowd of placards, varying much in size, colour, and subject, which jostled and overlaid each other on a piece of neglected, half-ruined wall at the entrance of a great city, my eye was arrested by an intimation, at once conspicuous and laconic: LARGE TYPE CHRISTIANS. Doubtless, intermediate lines in smaller letters informed the reader, who might be near enough to see them, that some publisher had prepared a series of Tracts in large type for the use of aged Christians; but from my point of view, on the opposite side of a wide street, only the larger letters were legible. I passed on, but the thought suggested by the curt and apparently odd intimation, continued to stir within me. That placard, even as seen at a distance, and without the smaller lines, is laden with a mighty meaning to my reader and to me. Large type Christians!—that is the very thing which the world wants to-day. As young and struggling colonies advertise amid the teeming populations of the mother country for able-bodied farm-labourers and skilled artisans, covertly hinting that certain other classes would only be in the way, the Church of the living God, charged to colonize and cultivate this wilderness world for Christ, should deeply feel and faithfully proclaim her need of Large Type Christians.

We have many who are truly Christians,—more than the world knows,—but not so many who are visibly, clearly, largely, unmistakably Christ-like in spirit and conduct. If the graces of the Spirit, though real, are small and stunted; and especially if they are overshadowed by a rank growth of vanity, worldliness, self-pleasing, and such like, they will never be seen by those who most need their evidence. The careless passenger will class you according to the earthliness which is large in your life, and will not be at pains to search for the heavenliness, which is so small that it must be searched for ere it be found. We address Christians, and our warning is, Although the light of life be within you, if it is choked and hidden by an abounding worldliness, you are in point of fact thwarting the purpose of the Lord, and hindering his kingdom in the world. "Let your light so shine, that men, seeing your good works, may glorify your Father which is in heaven."

Think, Christians, of the Lord's design in redeeming you, and the work in which he desires now to employ you as instruments. To save the lost, so that they shall not perish, is not the "end of the Lord;" it is a means toward a higher end. As the husbandman makes an evil tree good by engrafting, in order that he may enjoy its fruit, so our Father in heaven saves us that he may enjoy us as his children, and employ us in his work. "Man's chief end is to glorify God, and enjoy him for ever."

"What is in yonder vessel?" I inquire of a passing stranger. "Chaff," he replies, turning a hasty glance in the direction to which I point, and passes on. His answer is all that you could expect him to give, and yet it is not correct. The vessel was filled with wheat and chaff, mingled together as they were thrashed from the sheaf; but it has been shaken from side to side for some time, and the wheat has all sunk to the bottom, while the chaff has all risen to the top. In like manner many real, though not perfect Christians, are set down as hypocrites by careless observers, because the things of the Spirit gravitate downward, lie unseen, while the vanities that perish in the using occupy almost all the visible surface of the life.

That which is Christ-like in Christians should not be small, but large and full-grown; should not sink out of sight, but stand forth visible to all. If God has visited you sovereignly, and given you grace, then you must cherish and cultivate it, as a fruit-tree in a garden. Feed it by the word of life, plead that it may be abundantly watered by the Spirit, and give it fair, full exposure to the Sun of Righteousness.

That which is Christ-like in Christians should not be hidden under a thick shade of earthliness. If you would let your light shine, you must labour to cut down and root out the covetousness, the envy, the evil speaking, the pride, the anger,—all the bitter roots, whose branches weave themselves together into a thick veil, and turn your light into darkness.

Another reason, Christians, why the epistle of our life should be large and fair, is that the readers are not skilful. They seldom take pains to overlook what lies on the surface, and search the true meaning of a Christian's walk. In many instances they are blind, and cannot see; in many they are prejudiced, and will not. Ah, there is no good ground to depend on the skill, or fairness, or earnestness of the world, as if they would stand still and study and discriminate and read our lives aright; we must labour, with the help of God, to make the meaning so large and transparent, that they shall be compelled to read it while they run,—run past in carelessness, or away in hate.

Reader, you have asked the question, "What must I do to be saved?" and the blood of sprinkling on your conscience is even now the answer of peace. Another question demands all the energy of your saved soul, from this time forth and for ever,—the question, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Be not a double-minded borderer between Christ and the world; follow no doubtful course. Be Christ's in strong, jealous, enduring love to him who bought you, and your Christianity will appear in large characters, both to friends and foes. A life so redeemed, devoted, and spent, is not a wearisome, but a joyful thing; it is not like a stagnant pool, but like a sparkling river,—bright is its course over time, glorious its issue in eternity.

THE BORER WORM.

My neighbour had two beautiful mountain-ash trees, that looked so nearly alike, you would have taken them for twins. Their roots were in a fine, deep soil, and their owner enriched them every year with a sub-soil of rotten leaves and top-dressings of lime or powdered charcoal. He watered them faithfully through every drought, carefully nipped off every dead or superfluous twig, and cleaned their bark of scabs, and moss, and mould. As might have been expected, the twin trees repaid his labour in their rapid growth, their beauty of form, and the richness of their scarlet clusters of berries—and often when people went by the yard and saw the good man at work, they would stop and say, "What a beautiful pair of trees you have there!"

After a while, however, from some mysterious cause, one of the trees stopped growing. The other continued to spread out its branches and leaves, and seemed to wax taller and handsomer every day, but this one resisted all the combined influences of the season, rich dressings, and careful attendance. In vain the proprietor loosened the soil around its roots, again and again. In vain the sweet rains watered it, and the kind sun shone. Even the birds acted as if they had an interest in the tree's prosperity, for they came and picked off the caterpillars, and every stray bug, and even ant, that could be supposed to do it any harm. In spite of all that could be done for it, the ungrateful tree remained to all appearance just as it was. It had come to a stand still.

At last the owner determined to make a thorough examination of its roots, and throwing up the earth, he carefully scraped them with his knife and washed them with water, whereupon, just at the bottom of the trunk, he discovered three or four little holes, and after some skilful probing, brought to light the rogue that had done all the mischief, in the shape of a borer-worm or teredo. Quickly crushing the ugly grub, my neighbour threw back the earth around the roots again, and hoped the best for his tree.

But it never grew any more. He was obliged to cut it down.

"One sinner destroyeth much good," and he is tenfold the more destructive if he can conceal his depravity until he has done all the harm he wishes. So we sometimes see the choicest advantages of education and religion lavished upon a boy or young man without any effect. He grows morally worse instead of better. Watch closely for a while, and it is but too likely you'll find a wicked associate in the secret of it. Thank God if that borer-worm has not sapped his virtue beyond recovery.

UNINVITED TRAIN OF THOUGHTS.

THE thoughts which come to us unasked, and the trains which float in the twilight of our careless hours, are often those which are most precious, longest remembered, and most deep in their influence on future life. They are sometimes the result of long studies pursued at irregular intervals during previous years, the distillation from many gathered flowers, and therefore they cannot be looked for as daily visitations. As they will not come for being called, so they will not stay for being courted; and when they give the first intimations of their approach, we should lay aside lesser employments and joys as we open our window when the fragrance of orchards is wafted on the breeze. Yet there is a posture of soul, better fitted than all others for the reception of these revelations; and there are pursuits and habits so alien to them as to be almost prohibitions.

We must not look for them in the crowd of mammon-mongers, or amidst the clangour of political array, or the mining drudgery of technical study. They steal over us rather when we close the eye at nightfall, listening to the drowsy music of the autumnal insect tribe; when we walk alone in the sight of mountains, or on the seashore; or when we kneel before the open Bible, and meditate on the oriental usages of inspiration. Enthusiasts of various sects have taken these goodly visions for direct revelations of new truths; and mystics have deemed themselves inspired. But they are, after all, only higher manifestations of the reason which is common to us all. We deny not that a Divine agent is sometimes at work, but the operation follows the laws of our rational humanity, and conforms itself to the conditions of all influence from above upon free creatures. The mind, though elevated, is not overborne. The free-thinking principle is the same as before, though raised to a loftier point of observation. God, who speaks in this silence, speaks by the word which was recorded hundreds of years ago; and though chapter, or verse, or textual phrase may not always be recognised, the truths which ring in the ear are echoes from Sinai or from Zion. That word of the Lord which abideth for ever, has an infinite variety in its combinations and suggestions. It is a well whose sources are hidden in infinite wisdom, and whose flow is fresh and abundant, and sparkling to everlasting periods.

We place ourselves in the way of such favoured contemplations, when we linger long and often over the holy pages, and imbue our thoughts with the lessons of apostles and prophets. To be inspired like them, we may not pray for, in this world, but we may catch a kindred glow from their heavenly rapture, sympathize with their affections, carry out the trains which they have begun, harmonize the scattered propositions which they have announced, and live over again in our experience the divine happiness of their sanctification. Though our circumstances may be unlike theirs, in the proportion in which the new world is unlike the old, our faith and love may be essentially the same, and may at some favoured moment realize to us glories of religious awe or fruition, which, after many years of Scriptural study, shall still be new and unwonted. It is thus that Christian experience is a book, of which the page we are turning over to-day is unlike all that have filled the volume before.

To gain these results, a man must in some degree live apart. He must leave the beaten track, and converse less with earth than heaven. There are meditations which the common talk and worldly reading of our busy day do not prompt and cannot represent. They are beyond the scope of science, and unwhispered in the halls of letters, and the galleries of art. But as little should we seek them in the cell of the ascetic. True love and true humility, which are the nurses of such a progeny, are closely connected with familiar converse with our kind. Best thoughts are those which spring up under the tears that fall over the ills of distressed fellow-creatures. Jesus Christ is still present by his Spirit where broken hearts are to be bound up. The house of mourning and house of prayer are the places where the heart is made better. —Dr. J. W. Alexander's Thoughts on Preaching.

SOMETIME.

'Tis a wild, sweet song, a beautiful song,
With a low and rhythmical chime,
Rung out from the topmost boughs of a tree
The winds have christened "Sometime."

Its words are strung on a golden string,
In a long melodious rhyme,
Telling of germs, in each withered flower,
The rain shall bring out sometime :

Telling of hopes that are buried low,
'Neath the dust of deceit and crime,
That true repentance and true belief
May waken to life sometime—

Of folded hands or a pulseless heart,
Under some fragrant lime,
In the beautiful city with pearly gates—
Shall I clasp them again sometime ?

Of tiny ringlets of golden hair,
And eyes, with a look sublime
In their shadowy depths, as we said "good by,"
Hoping to meet sometime.

Ah, yes ; tis a beautiful song that I hear,
Afar in this changing clime,
Rung out from the topmost boughs of a tree
The winds have christened "Sometime."

And it lessens my heart of its weary load,
Renews all its olden prime,
For it tells of a mansion beyond the skies,
Where I hope to be happy sometime.

CHILDREN'S TREASURY.

LIFE LESSONS.

BY THE REV. JAMES BOLTON, KILBURN.

"Whoso walketh in a perfect way, he shall be my servant."

THIS is a gracious promise of God to his faithful children. He will condescend to employ them in his divine service. They shall not only be safe for eternity and happy in themselves, but he will honour them in making them successful labourers in his vineyard. They shall go forth weeping, indeed, bearing precious seed; but they shall come again with rejoicing, bringing their sheaves with them. That he will thus own and bless all their direct efforts, the word of God both asserts and illustrates in a hundred passages; and it is so notorious as a matter of every-day experience amongst Christians, that I do not propose to dwell on this aspect of the subject now. My object is to interest you in another and less obvious aspect of this truth, namely, how God owns and blesses his faithful children as instruments of good to their fellow-creatures indirectly, without their being at all aware of it—without their lifting a finger, so to say, to do it. I want to show you that he that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve God when he is resting, as well as when he is fighting—when he is mending his net, as well as when he is casting his net.

But, first, I would remind you of how this principle runs through the current of our every-day lives.

We light a candle for our own convenience; but as we are carrying it about, it throws a ray across the landscape, which guides some weary wanderer to the road. We walk across a field for our pleasure, and as we do so, we tread in an acorn, which by-and-by is to grow into a glorious tree, which shall be a shelter to the panting flocks and herds, and in whose branches the birds will sit and sing. We take an airing in our garden before breakfast, and at every step we imperceptibly sweep away a spider's web, in which poor little flies would else have been entangled. Slam goes the gate behind us, as we return home late at night; and the report scatters a band of burglars who were on the eve of breaking into our neighbour's premises.

These are what we may call natural instances of unpremeditated benefit to others. But these, of course, are open to the worldly, no less than to those who walk in a perfect way.

If we turn to the Scriptures, we have similar instances. We have the soldier drawing his bow in battle at a venture, and the unaimed dart plunging through a joint of Ahab's harness into his loins—thus delivering Israel from that villanous tyrant and plague.

We have Joseph going down into Egypt as a slave, his heart wrung with anguish, imploring his brethren to spare him so cruel a fate; and yet, by and by, this very sale of him to the Ishmaelites for twenty pieces of silver, eventuates in his providing right royally for his father in his old age, and his warding off threatened destruction from the whole land of the Pharaohs.

We have Ahasuerus sending for a roll of Babylonish history, to relieve the tedium of wakefulness—for somehow he could not sleep; and there he read of the valuable information which Mordecai had given when a conspiracy was getting up against him; and thus both Mordecai and his people were preserved from Haman's diabolical plot. We have our blessed Lord himself coming to the well of Sychar for refreshment, and there entering into conversation with her who from that hour believed on him to life everlasting. We have Peter journeying to Joppa with no particular purpose apparently, but thus being near and in readiness both to visit the centurion at Cesarea and to raise Dorcas from the dead at Lydda.

These are scriptural specimens of undesigned good to others.

But I now submit to you the following instances, which may come within the compass of any one who walks in a perfect way, and then I shall leave them, with the briefest possible application, to be rendered fruitful and effectual to you by the Holy Spirit.

The first I shall mention is that of an old shepherd in Essex. He was a fine man to look at. Full, fresh-coloured, and with snow-white hair. In his Sunday smock and yellow gaiters, staff in hand, you would have noticed him in a cathedral. Better than any of these, he was a child of God,—as pure, and meek, and gentle as one of his own lambs. In church his devout bearing was a sermon to all who sat near him. Then he seemed to forget everything earthly, and to realize the presence of God in a peculiar manner. Down on his knees, with his face bowed and buried in his palms, he would enter into the spirit as well as the form of our beautiful prayers. His voice in the responses was rich, and full, and pathetic; the chime of eight bells in the tower was not more sonorous and sacred. Now a hardened blacksmith dated his conversion from sitting by that old shepherd at a club sermon. He had gone to it utterly careless, thinking only of the ribbons and flowers in his button-hole, and the dinner at the Inn afterwards. He chanced (as we say) to be put into the same pew with the old shepherd. His sorrowful repetition of the general confession, "Almighty and most merciful Father," rather shook the blacksmith; but when in the "Litany" the old shepherd poured forth his soul in those plaintive appeals to the "Son of God;" "the Lamb of God," the sturdy blacksmith was completely melted. He sunk on the hassock and wept as he had not done since his mother died. From that hour the Holy Ghost wrought an effectual work in him. He always declared—in his blacksmith phraseology—that the old shepherd's "way of praying, was God's hammer to shatter him."

Secondly, A clergyman was visiting a sick lady. She was a stranger to him, but her husband recognising him in the street, asked him to visit his dying wife. He took the address, and presented himself at the door of a stylish house. Inside, the furniture, pictures, and ornaments were in keeping. As he was admiring them, the maid returned and invited him up stairs.

The lady was sinking fast. Her flesh was like alabaster. She received him with an artificial smile, and at once began talking about her "luck" in being still alive, her kind servants, her capital doctors, her determination to be patient and courageous to the last. Miserable creature!—The clergyman perceived at a glance that she was without God and without hope. After an appropriate remark to introduce it, he inquired for her Bible, and simply enough turned about expecting to see it; but there was none!

She coloured, and said to the maid, "Fetch yours, Susan."

The maid coloured, and did not think that she could: (the clergyman guessed what that meant).

Then she said, "Bring my keys; you will find my wedding Bible locked up in the library."

"Stay," said the clergyman, "I have mine" (producing his own from his pocket), "where I can reach it in a moment; our Bibles should be as near our hearts as possible."

They retained their blushes (and he was glad of it), until he left.

When he paid his second visit, both of them were ready with nice new Bibles, even before he could un-pocket his own; and now he notices that they are well thumbed and turned down, and referred to with ease; in other words, he trusts that they are "near their hearts now." But how innocently did he convict them of that sin; that awfully common sin, a neglected Bible!

Thirdly, A child, a Sunday scholar, was given a Testament by her teacher as a reward. When she reached home she set about spelling a part of the 23d of Luke, —spelling it, for she was backward in her learning. Her father was in the window reading,—though it was Sunday, a weekly newspaper. The child happened (so we say) to stick fast at that touching passage where Jesus, being nailed to the cross by the barbarous executioners, says, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." The child spelt F-a-t-h-e-r,—Father. "Why, father," she cried, in the most artless way, "here is you; here is your name.—Jesus is speaking about you here!"

"Nonsense," he said, "nonsense. Go on reading to yourself, child, and don't do it so loudly;" and he reverted to his newspaper, but his ear was caught, and he listened in spite of himself.

"Father, f-o-r-g-i-v-e,—forgive; Father, forgive him."

"No, child, that is wrong; it is not me,—I mean, it's not him,—it's 'forgive them.' There,—now don't you interrupt me again."

But the child persisted in repeating it; "Forgive,—Father,—forgive,—Father,—forgive,—Father," banking at the mispronounced word "them," until her father was quite in a tumult of mingled shame, and alarm, and anger. He folded up the newspaper hurriedly, and almost snatched the Testament from the child, told her peremptorily what the verse was, and then went into his yard with the arrow rankling in his bosom: "Father, forgive him, for he knows not what he does."

"It is me," he said; "I was ignorantly but wickedly provoking God: and yet Jesus intercedes for me! Forgive them! My God, I acknowledge my transgression." And, dragging the newspaper from his breast, he trampled it under foot, in token that he would desecrate the Sabbath no more!

Fourthly, After a severe illness, a university undergraduate was travelling in a train. Having recovered the long-lost privilege of eye-sight, he was employing it on a tract, printed in large type. The subject was, The Blood of the Cross. There were some exceedingly striking sentences in it, and he paused ever and anon to ponder them, dropping the tract on his lap. By his side in the carriage sat a young woman who had been annoying him by what he considered, and perhaps rightly considered, too interested glances. Certainly her whole demeanour suggested thorough worldliness of mind. As they proceeded, she caught sight of the title of the tract, then was drawn by curiosity to peep at its pages. Eventually she said very softly and solemnly, "Might I request the loan of that tract, when you have quite done with it?"

The under-graduate was so glad to observe the change in her that he entreated her to accept it, as he had another with him. As it pleaded her Saviour's cause with her, her handkerchief was applied beneath her veil to streaming cheeks. And when he quitted the carriage at his station, she bowed respectfully to him and said, "Thank you very much, sir." But it was with a broken utterance, which showed that the "blood of the cross" had been stirring the depths of her frivolous nature.

Fifthly, A pastor was addressing a sufferer stretched on her sofa in a darkened chamber. Amidst her faint moans, he spoke to her of His sympathy, whose grace is all-sufficient for our direst extremities. Somehow or other the Saviour seemed particularly near then, smiling so tenderly, his everlasting arms underneath her, his bowels yearning over his agonized daughter. The pastor fancied that he had only to point her to him, and she must behold him and be comforted. So he did no more than this in the simplest language. He did not ascertain till afterwards that the nurse (hitherto a mere professor of religion) was suddenly overwhelmed with a realization of Christ's presence there. It was (she said) as if she had been unblindfolded, and stood in the dazzling lustre of the sun. That was the moment and the method of her awakening.

Sixthly, and lastly. I remember how a youth of my acquaintance was brought to extreme anxiety about his eternal state by overhearing a foreigner in an adjoining apartment of the hotel, at his closet supplications ere he slept. He could not interpret his language, but his fervent protestations to Jesus, his wrestling earnestness with him, sounded through the keyhole and the walls, and led another than himself to rise from his bed to an intenser application to the throne of grace, and to feel that his devotions had hitherto been undeserving of the name.

Now, it is scarcely necessary to add that none of these are to be imitated for mere imitation's sake; to affect them would be hypocrisy. May they encourage those of you who, having done your best, are apt to feel that you have done nothing, so far, for God. It may be that, unknown to yourselves, he has used you in this indirect way; and eternity will reveal it. Let our motto ever be, "Lord, I am thine, what wilt thou have me to do?—let me glorify thee, in season and out of season!"

To each of us who says that, this promise is an oracular response, "Whoso walketh in a perfect way he shall serve me." "Therefore in the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand, for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether both shall be alike good."

A THREEFOLD CORD.

Doctrine.—He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities, . . . and by his stripes we are healed. Isa. liii. 5.

Promise.—This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins. Matt. xxvi. 28.

Prayer.—Deliver us, and purge away our sins, for thy name's sake. Ps. lxxix. 9.

We are all sinning every day, and therefore every day we need to go to God for forgiveness. We must always ask this for Jesus' sake; asking the Father to pardon us, and save us from the punishment we deserve, because his dear Son has obeyed and suffered in our place, No prayer without this will be accepted by God. But let us also pray, like the Psalmist, to have sin purged away, that is, the love of it taken out of our hearts, so that its power to tempt us may become less and less.

TITLES AND OFFICES OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST.

"We have a great High Priest, that is paved into the heavens. Jesus the Son of God."—Heb. iv. 14.

THE ministers of God among the Jews were called priests, and one of them, the head over the rest, high priest. They were, like the prophets, teachers of holy things; but their chief office was to offer up the sacrifices which God had appointed, in the tabernacle and the temple. And in doing this, all of them, but especially the high priest, were what we call types, or emblems, of the Lord Jesus, the Messiah to come.

It would take too long time for me to explain all this to you. But we may consider a little this title of our Lord, our "great High Priest," and see how much greater he is than all who went before as types of himself.

They were all mortal men, one high priest dying after another. But Jesus, Emmanuel, God with us, lives for evermore, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." "We need no other priest now that he has come" (Heb. vii. 23, 24).

The old priests were all sinful men, like ourselves, and needed to offer up sacrifices for their own sins, as well as those of the people (Heb. v. 3). But Jesus, although he gave himself for our sins, had no sins of his own, and therefore is just the High Priest we need (Heb. vii. 26, 27).

The old priests had to offer many sacrifices, day after day, year after year, the blood of bulls and goats, which could not in itself take away sins (Heb. x. 3, 4). But the one great sacrifice which Jesus offered upon Calvary, of his own body broken, and blood shed for sinners, is enough for the salvation of all who believe in him, to the end of the world (Heb. x. 14).

You will understand all this better in a few years than you can do now. But think often of Jesus as the great High Priest, who came to redeem us by the sacrifice of himself, and now intercedes for us in heaven. And ask him every day to take away your sins, and to make you his obedient and holy children.

Prayer.—O heavenly Father, we thy sinful children desire to confess our sins before thee. We do not feel them, and we do not grieve for them, nearly so much as we ought to do. May thy Holy Spirit come into our hearts, and give us true repentance, and true faith in Jesus, as our great High Priest, who has offered up himself on the cross for our sins. Oh, for his sake, do thou look with compassion upon us, and let his blood cleanse us from all sin. And help us now to watch, and strive, and pray more every day, against all that is evil. We ask all in the name of Jesus. Amen.

"TO WHAT PURPOSE IS THIS WASTE!"

THE waste of MONEY, or money's worth. I am not going to speak of the halfpennies and pennies which young people often throw so thoughtlessly away on trifles—toys and sweetmeats, and other such things. I am not going to counsel you never to spend a penny, but to put every copper into the Savings' Bank, and hoard up your money there, and become little misers. As to this, there are two kinds of men, neither of whom I would wish you ever to be like—misers and spendthrifts. "Misers" are so called, as being miserable, wretched men, having no comfort or enjoyment in laying out their money, either for themselves or others; always afraid of losing what they have got; having the same painful craving for money that the drunkard has for drink, or that you have for water when you are very thirsty. "Spendthrifts," again, are those who soon run through all that they have, like the prodigal son, and come to beggary. Both are opposed to God's will and law. I would not have you to be either of these; but I do not mean just now to warn you either against hoarding up your money or spending it uselessly. I wish to speak against wasting that which costs money.

I sometimes notice on the street, or in other like places, a crust of bread, and sometimes more than a crust, trodden under foot of passers-by—a sight I never see without pain. How did that come there? A boy got it to his dinner, or would have it after his dinner, and having more than he could rightly manage, instead of putting it into his pocket till he should be hungry, or giving it to some one who would have been thankful enough to get it, he thoughtlessly tossed it away. When that boy goes to school and reads in the Bible lesson, or hears at family worship (if there be such a thing in his house), about some of the famines from which Israel suffered, how all sorts of animals were used for food, and the most repulsive things that were eatable were sold at an enormous price; or in the history lesson about the taking of Jerusalem, how bread was more precious than gold, and women were reduced to such straits as to eat their own infants;—I wonder if his conscience does not check him; if he never thinks of the bread he so lightly threw away. I wish I could take him to houses which I have seen, and show him that bed-ridden old woman, or these starving little children, crying for bread when there's none to give them—how they would prize and relish a morsel even like that! When he sees these, he will not wonder that I ask, "To what purpose is this waste?" In this, Jesus himself has set us an example, that in this, as in all things else, we should walk in his steps. You remember his feeding the multitude—five thousand men, besides women and children, with five loaves and two fishes. When they had all eaten and were filled, Jesus told them to gather up what was left. Why! Not only that when they saw the twelve baskets full, they might see what a wonder-working Saviour he was,—but, as he himself says, "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." Think of that, dear children, when you would do what is not uncommon.

I sometimes see, in mischief or in thoughtlessness, the stop-cock of the water-pipe left unturned, and whole gallons of water allowed to run to waste. Some children were getting a drink, or amusing themselves, and forgot, or could not be at the trouble, to put things right, and hence the loss. "Nobody suffered by it," you say; "the only loss, if there was any, was to the Water Company." Well, I never like to see such things. How welcome that water would be to many! At that very moment, perhaps, there are travellers passing through the desert; their supply of water is exhausted; the very camels are beginning to fail; one rushes forward to what has been a well among the rocks, but oh, his look of despair—when he finds it dry! Another sees a jar, which those who have gone before, have somehow left; perhaps it may be water; "No," he says, bitterly disappointed,—"it's only diamonds!" At that very moment, perhaps, there is a boat at sea—those in it, all that remain of that emigrant ship that is now engulfed in the deep; as the warm sun breaks out, oh, what burning thirst! how priceless would be every drop of a passing shower!—

"Water! water! everywhere,
And all the boards did shrink;
Water! water! everywhere,
But not a drop to drink."

And how can I but grudge the waste of that which they would give anything to get? Might not such thoughts come into the minds even of children, and teach them a lesson; "To what purpose is this waste!"

I sometimes see children coming to school on a Monday morning, clean and tidy, with every rent in dress or jacket mended. I do not like to see them too much concerned about keeping all right, so that they cannot join with others in play, and would grumble ever so much, because they had rubbed against the dusty jacket of the passing baker's boy or miller. But when I see the opposite extreme, which I do far oftener—clothes and shoes rubbed and worn, needlessly dirtied and torn,—I do think of that father who has so far to go to his work, and has such a long day of it, and such difficulty in earning the money that provides clothing and food for himself and his family; and of that mother whose washing days are such a serious affair, with her young baby and her delicate health, who finds it no easy matter to eke out the week's wage so as to get ends to meet, and who had to be up so late and so early to get these very clothes made, or mended, or washed, which are so soon calling for the like at her hands again. Children! I am serious in saying all this. I cannot look at what you are doing, without thinking of your fathers and mothers—all they have to do, and all they have to endure—and asking, “To what purpose is this waste?”

Think, then, of what I have said of money and money's worth, and be warned in this by the end of wasters. There are two young servants in a family: one of them is a waster. Crusts of bread, drops of milk, and similar things may often be seen about the kitchen and washing-house. “I often fancy,” says her neighbour to her, “that there is never a bit of food wasted in a wilful manner, which may not hereafter come to be wanted by the very person who threw it away. I should not wonder though you yourself may come to be glad of such a dish.” But it makes no impression, and out on the dunghill goes the plateful of bones, and meat, and crusts. Some years pass away. The careful servant is now a respectable and happy wife and mother. Giving a helping hand to her former mistress one day, she is in the old kitchen, when she hears the cry of a child; she opens the back window from which so much good food had been thrown out, and on the ash-heap lies a miserable woman all in rags, her head upon the ashes, her little child, as wretched-looking as herself, gathering up the scraps, and eating a black and mouldy crust, which a dog would almost have refused to eat. The woman can only answer the questions put to her with a groan, for she is dying. And who does she turn out to be? The wasteful girl of former years, furnishing a touching illustration of the proverb, “Wilful waste is woful want.”—The Golden Fountain, by the Rev. J. H. Wilson.

THE SIXPENNY CALICO.

One day a new scholar appeared in school, and as usual was the mark of public gaze. She was gentle and modest-looking, and never ventured to lift her eyes from her books. At recess, to the inquiries, “Who is she?” “What’s her name?” nobody could satisfactorily answer. None of us ever saw or heard of her before.

“I know she’s not much,” said one of the girls.

“Poorly off,” said I.

“Do you see her dress? Why, I believe it is nothing but a sixpenny calico.”

“Poor thing, she must be cold.”

“I can’t imagine how a person can wear calico in winter,” said another, whose rich plaid was the admiration of the school.

“I must say I like to see a person dressed according to the season,” remarked another; “that is, if people can afford it,” she added, in a manner plainly enough indicating that her father could.

Such was recess talk. None of us went to take the stranger by the hand and welcome her as the companion of our studies and our play. We stood aloof, and stared at her with cold and unfeeling curiosity. The teacher called her Abby. When she first came to her place for recitation, she took a seat beside the rich plaid. The plaid drew haughtily away, as if the sixpenny calico might dim the beauty of its colours. A slight colour flushed Abby’s cheek, but her quiet remained the same. It was some time before she ventured on the playground, and then it was only to stand aside, and look on, for we were slow in asking her to join us.

On one occasion we had a harder arithmetic lesson than usual, completely baffling our small brains. Upon comparing notes at recess, none of us had mastered it.

“I’ll ask Abby of her success,” said one of my intimate associates.

“It is quite unlikely she has,” I replied; “do stay here; besides, what if she has?”

“I will go,” she answered.

Away she went, and as it appeared, Abby and she were the only members of the class ready for recitation. Abby had been more successful than the rest of us, and kindly helped my friend to scale the difficulties of the lesson.

“Shall we ask Abby to join the sleigh-ride?” asked one of the girls, who was getting a subscription for a famous New Year’s ride.

“Judging from her dress,” I said, “if she goes, we must give her the ride.”

“But how will it do to leave her out?” they asked.

“She does not of course expect to be asked to ride with us,” I said; “she is evidently of a poor family.”

As a sort of leader in school, my words were influential, and poor Abby was left out. How often did I compare my white hand and warm gloves with the purple fingers and cheap mittens of my neighbour Abby. How miserable I should be with such working hands and no gloves.

By-and-by I took to patronizing her. “She is really a very nice creature, and ought to join us more in our plays,” we said. So we used to make her “one of us” in the play-ground. In fact, I began to thaw towards her very considerably. There was something in Abby which called out our respect.

One Saturday afternoon, as I was looking out of the window, wishing for something to do, my mother asked me to join her in a little walk. On went my new cloak, warm furs, and pink hat, and in a trice I was ready. We went first to the stores, where I was very glad to be met by several acquaintances in my handsome winter dress. At last I found my mother turning off into less frequented thoroughfares.

“Where, mother,” I asked, “in this vulgar part of the town?”

“Not vulgar, my dear,” she said. “A very respectable and industrious part of our population live here.”

“Not fashionable, certainly,” I added.

“And not vulgar because not fashionable, by any means,” she said; for you may be sure my false and often foolish notions were not gained from her. She stopped before a humble-looking house, and entered the front door.

"Where are you going?" I asked with much curiosity.

She gently opened a side door, and hesitated a moment on the threshold.

"Caroline, come in," said a voice from within. "I am very happy to see you."

"Pray, don't rise, dear," said my mother, going forward and affectionately kissing a sick lady who sat in a rocking chair. "You look better than when I saw you before. Do not exert yourself."

I was introduced, and I fancied the invalid looked at me with a sort of admiring surprise as she took my hand and hoped I should prove worthy of such a mother. Then, while my mother and she were talking, I sat down and took notes with my eyes of everything in the room. It looked beautifully neat, and the furniture evidently had seen better days. By-and-by mother asked for her daughter.

"Gone out on some errands," said the sick lady. "The dear child is an inexpressible blessing to me," and tears filled her eyes.

"A mother might well be thankful for such a daughter. She is a pattern my child might safely imitate."

I thought I should be exceedingly glad to see the person my mother was so willing I should copy.

"She will return soon," said the invalid. "She has gone to carry some work which she has contrived to do in her leisure moments. The self-sacrifice of the child is wonderful. She seems to desire nothing that other girls of her age generally want. A little while ago, an early friend who had found me out and befriended me as you have done"—tears came into the speaker's eyes,—"sent her a handsome winter dress. 'O mother,' she said, 'this is too expensive for me, when you want some warm flannel so.' I told her it was just what she needed. A few days afterwards she went out and came home with a roll of flannel and a calico dress. 'See, mother,' she said, 'I shall enjoy this calico a hundred times more than the finest dress in the world, when you can have your flannel.' Excuse me for telling it, but you know a mother's heart. There is her step; she is coming."

The outer door opened. How I longed to see the comer! "A perfect angel," I thought, "so generous, so disinterested, so good; I should love her." The latch was lifted. A young girl entered, and my school-fellow Abby stood before me. I could have sunk into the earth for very shame. How wicked my pride! how false and foolish my judgments! Oh, how mean did my fine winter dress appear before the plain sixpenny calico!

I was almost sure my mother had managed all this, for she had a way of making me see my faults, and making me desire to cure them, without ever saying much directly herself. This, however, had not come about by her intervention; God taught me by his providence.

As we walked home, my mother gave me an account of Mrs. G——, an early friend who made an imprudent marriage. But that story is no matter here. I will only add, my judgment of people was formed ever after according to a truer standard than the dress they wore, and that Abby and I became intimate friends.—Child's Paper.

THE GREAT COMMANDER.

Boys, do you want to enlist? Should you like to be a soldier? But first count the cost. Soldiers, at best, have hard times of it. They leave father and mother, brothers and sisters, wives and children. They are exposed to all sorts of weather, hot or cold, wet or dry. They can't choose their times or seasons. They have hard fare. Often they have short rations, sleep on the damp ground, or have no sleep at all. They are liable to be blown up by bomb-shells, or have their limbs shot off by cannon-balls, or fall by the bayonet. Thirty men once offered their services to a captain. "If you enlist under me, half of you will be dead men before thirty days," said he. "Ay, ay, sir," answered the men; for brave men never flinch at danger. War, with all its great evils, has called out shining virtues. Nothing demands greater sacrifice. The mother gives her boy, rich men part with their money, and thousands give themselves. Nor is it done for "the pay." A soldier's pay is poor pay, only a few shillings a month, not half the wages of a farm servant; but it is willingly, cheerfully met and undergone at the call of duty.

The children are called for. Will you not enlist? "Are we called to fight?" Yes. There is a commander who invites, nay, who is urgent for the children to join him in his march. He has a soldier's suit for you. It is not red and gold, like our regiment, or brass and iron, like the old Romans; but it is a glorious fit. And a sword too. You shall be fully armed and equipped, depend upon that. Come, come; duty calls you. You will have to fight; there is no escaping it; but it will be a "good fight." And perhaps I ought to say, to comfort you, that the captain never lost a man who obeyed orders. Washington could not say that. Much as he felt for his poor soldiers, he could not save them from a soldier's fate. Napoleon left his thousands on every battle-field. But the captain who would recruit his ranks from the children, can with strict truth say, "Of them which thou gavest me I have lost none." Think of that. What other commander could ever say it? Yet mind this, you must obey orders. But can he make his words good? Yes. "All his commandments are sure; they stand fast for ever and ever; they are done in truth."

Who is this great captain? What is his name? Jesus Christ. Satan is your bitter enemy, determined to seize you. He goes about like a "roaring lion." "The fiery darts of the wicked" are pointed at you, while the traitor sin is at the very door of your heart. God pitied you. He sent his Son, his well-beloved Son, to save you. "Behold," says God, "I have given him for a leader and commander to the people." "Seek ye him while he may be found; call upon him while he is near."

Jesus Christ came. He suffered for us; he died for us on the cross; but he now lives and reigns, and has set up his standard, which is called the "Standard of the cross." Have you seen his proclamation? This is a part of it: "Ho, every one; incline your ear and come unto me; hear, and your soul shall live." "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper;" "ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace." Will you not serve? Here is your soldier's suit: the "breastplate of righteousness, and the shield of faith, and the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." Put this on and you are armed for the fight—a fight not with "flesh and blood," but against sin and Satan—a fight for Christ's glorious kingdom within and without you, worth braving and daring everything for. It is well called "the good fight."

Sometimes you find the soldiers of Christ looking quite poor, and proud people say they have poor pay. Ah, they don't know. Besides their daily rations from a treasury always full—for the silver, and the gold, and the cattle on a thousand hills, belong to Christ—every faithful soldier has a final reward. What? "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life," says the commander to every one who enlists. Every little child, even, shall wear a crown. Nobody but kings and queens wear crowns upon earth. They are very costly and very splendid. Millions of money and millions of lives have been spent to win and wear a crown. Yet Christ promises one to every faithful soldier—a "crown of life,"—something very, very precious laid up in heaven. Come, dear child, come to Christ; come and enlist a soldier of the cross. The martial music of this host runs thus:—

Am I a soldier of the cross,
A follower of the Lamb?
And shall I fear to own his cause,
Or blush to speak his name?
Sure I must fight if I would reign;
Increase my courage, Lord:
I'll bear the toil, endure the pain,
Supported by thy word.

—Mrs. H. C. Knight.

A LITTLE TALK.

THREE little girls were telling each other one evening what they wanted to be. One wanted to be a queen; another to write books. The third said she should be contented to be a lamb in Christ's fold. Ah, that was the greatest as well as the best wish of all. The greatest, and yet the easiest to be had; for Christ says, "Come;" and what have we to do but to go?

"Suppose you stray away and get lost," said one of the others.

"The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost," replied she.

Oh yes, we should never find Christ if he did not find us. We should never seek him if he did not seek us first. Sometimes sheep and lambs get lost in the snow-storms, and the shepherd sets out and seeks them, and finds them in the deep ravines, huddled together under the snow. He digs the snow away, but they are afraid to stir. They won't take a single step to save their lives; so the Good Shepherd carries them out. Thus Jesus saves his lost sheep. He finds them in the deep pit of sin. They can't help themselves; so he reaches out his strong arm and takes them out.

Jesus provides for his sheep and lambs. "They go in and out, and find pasture." You may be sure of being fed if you are Christ's lamb. You shall have bread to eat and clothes to wear. "I have been young, and now am old," says king David, "yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread." Christ is always able to pasture his flock. His pastures never dry up or are burnt over. He also feeds their souls. Did you ever see the little flower fed by the morning dew? Just so will Christ feed you with the dews of his grace and love. The Bible is a table full—a rich feast to the hungry soul. You can feed on its leaves every day, three times a-day, all through the year, and all through the years of the longest life that ever was, and yet they never fail. There is enough and to spare; and what is better, you never get tired of it. It tastes better and better every day.

I know of nobody that would die for me. Do you? But "the Good Shepherd giveth his life for his sheep." All that are in Christ's flock were once condemned to die. Jesus pitied them. He left his Father's house, and came into this wicked world to die for them. "While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." Therefore every sheep and every little lamb can say, "He loved me, and gave himself for me."

Oh, how precious to be a lamb in Christ's fold! The greatest, the best, the easiest reached of all wishes is to be there.

"ONLY A BIBLE!"

It was Louisa Fulton's tenth birthday, and, as usual on such days, she received many kind wishes and little gifts of love.

"Louisa," said her brother Charles, when he came home from school, "have you got all the presents you expected yet?"

"All but one. I have got nothing from Aunt Jane."

"Will she have forgotten you?"

"Oh no; Aunt Jane never forgets. It will be coming to-night, or to-morrow perhaps. I wonder what it will be!"

"A book most likely; she can easily send that by post."

"I hope it will be a pretty one, with pictures, like what she gave us at Christmas."

The children then talked over various books which they had seen or heard of, and wished to possess.

They were interrupted by a loud knock at the door.

"Mamma, will that be the postman?"

"Yes; this is the English post-hour. I saw he had a parcel in his hand."

"Oh, how delightful!" Charles rushed down stairs, and presently returned, holding a parcel above his head.

"A book, a book, Louisa! addressed to Miss Fulton! Guess! guess! what will it be?"

"Charles, do not keep me waiting! Give it me! I see gilt edges!"

It was a minute or two before scissors could be found to cut the cord; and there were several wrappers of brown and white paper.

"It must be something very precious. Oh," exclaimed Louisa, with a tone of disappointment, "it is only a Bible!"

"Only a Bible, Louisa!" said her mother, in a low, sad voice.

Louisa blushed deeply. "Mamma, I did not think what I was saying. But you know I have one already."

Charles commented on the beauty of the binding and the kind words on the title page.

"See, here are maps, Louisa—better than pictures."

He was just then called away to his lessons. Louisa took the Bible, and sat down with it on a stool at the window. She did not speak; and her mother, who was writing, went on in silence. This lasted for nearly an hour, till the daylight had almost faded away. At last the little girl came softly up to her mother, and laid her head on her knee.

"Mamma, I am very, very sorry."

"For what, my child?"

"Because I said that about the Bible, and because I felt in my heart that I would have liked another book better."

"But you love the word of God, Louisa?"

"Yes, mamma; and I know that I will love this one, too, very much. Will God forgive me?"

"If you were obliged to part with every book but one, which would you choose to keep?"

"I would keep my Bible, mamma; indeed, indeed I would."

"I believe you, my dear. I do believe that my little girl loves Jesus, and loves his holy word."

"But it was very sinful, mamma, to feel as I did. Will God forgive me?"

"Surely he will, if you ask him for Jesus' sake. We will do so now together."

They knelt down, and the mother prayed that this sin, and every other, might be pardoned, and that both might be taught more and more to know the preciousness of the Scriptures, and to have them as a lamp to their feet and a light to their path; to find in them help for every duty and comfort in every sorrow.

"And now," she said, when they sat down again, "I shall tell you a story before you go to bed, which I read lately. We see the Bible so often in our happy land, we can get one so easily, that I am afraid this sometimes makes us think more lightly of it than we ought to do. It was because you had a copy of your own already that you were tempted to think another book would have been better just now. But oh, how different it was once even in this country, when a Bible was such a rare thing that it was chained to a table in one of the churches, and people came in to hear it read there, because they had none at home! And how many countries there are still, where it is hardly ever found, though the people are called Christians. Do you know what a colporteur means?"

"A man who goes through the country selling Bibles."

"Yes; the word is a French one, and we always use it now to mean a person who sells Bibles or religious books. Well, the colporteur I wish to tell you of was going about in France, which is a Roman Catholic country, where the Bible is very scarce in many places. He came to a very miserable-looking house; and when he opened the door, saw that there was hardly any furniture, and a woman and child, who were within, though clean and neat, looked so extremely poor, that he thought it would be quite useless to ask them to buy books, when they did not seem to have enough of daily bread. However, he felt that it would be wrong to go away without speaking; so he said that he was a seller of good books, and at a very low price. The woman asked what they were; and when he spoke of the Bible, her face lighted up with such a look of joy, that he says he cannot describe it. Then she told him that when a little girl she had attended a school where the New Testament had been used as a lesson book; and she found such pleasure in the stories there, that she never tired of reading it. When she left school, her parents bought a copy for her, and for many years it was her greatest comfort. But one day it disappeared, she never knew how,—only thought that her mistress, for she was a servant, must have seen it, and given it to the priest. She went to the booksellers in several towns near; but not one of them could give her a copy, the Bible was so rare then in France. After this she married, and went to Spain, where she remained fourteen years; and during all that time could never succeed in meeting with another New Testament. She repeated various passages which she had learned by heart, and had found her chief comfort in many trials. She took the book out of the colporteur's hand with looks and words of the greatest joy. But when she asked the price, and found it was fifty centimes—that is, about fivepence—she burst into tears. 'Alas!' she said, 'I have not a single centime in the world! I must let you go away, and lose once more this precious treasure. No, that is impossible: wait for a short time; God has put a thought into my head.' She ran out of the house, and left the good man with her child for nearly an hour. Then she returned, her face beaming with delight. 'Here is the money,' she said. 'I have had difficulty in getting so much from my poor neighbours, for they know that I can hardly get a little bread and potatoes for myself and child, and that I may not soon be able to pay them back; but they have been kind to me, and God will provide.'

"The colporteur felt inclined to give back the money, and pay for the New Testament himself. But then he recollected that our Lord loves to see his people ready to make any sacrifice for his sake, and that he could repay this poor woman in heavenly blessings. 'I wish,' he says, 'you could have been there to have seen her delight when she found herself in possession of the gospel. She pressed the volume to her heart, and spoke to it as if it had been some living thing—promising that this time she would take great care that no one should separate her from it.'"

"O mamma, I am so glad she got it at last. Was it long ago?"

"No, only last year. What a lesson this poor French-woman may teach us all, of love and value for the word of God! And as by his goodness we have no difficulty in getting the Bible ourselves, surely we should be willing to give up some of our indulgences, that we may have money to spend in sending it to other countries, by the means of those good colporteurs who are found willing to employ their life in this way, for the sake of Christ and the good of their fellow-men."

"Mamma, shall I give some of the money I got to-day to the Bible Society?"

"You cannot make a better use of it, my dear."

J. L. B.

THE CHILDREN'S PARTY.

"WHAT shall we do to-morrow?" asked Helen and Robert, whose few days of "no school" had already begun to hang heavy on their hands. At first the prospect of a whole week of play was fine; and though they had a nice play-room and an abundance of playthings, besides books, and little duties all about house, yet I am sorry to say, too ill-looking creatures sometimes crept into the play-room and spoiled all their enjoyment, setting the children snatching, and crying, and striking, in quite a terrible way. They always put a stop to everything pleasant wherever they go, and I wonder they should ever for a moment be harboured anywhere. Perhaps you have seen them. I hope not. Lest they ever should offer to keep company with you, I must mention their names, and warn you against them. You will know them by their sour faces. They are Discontent and Disagreement. Keep clear of them, children, for they will not let you have a minute's peace or enjoyment.

But I must go back to Helen and Robert when they asked their mother, "What shall we do to-morrow?" which they did, just after a brush with these two.

"You shall have a little party," said she. That was delightful.

"But I don't want a crowd," said Robert, "like George's birthday party; and I don't want Tom Bates to it, nor Harry Emery, nor—"

"And I don't want Maggie and Jane," added Helen.

"Oh, I shall choose who are to come," said their mother. "They have never all been here together, but they are a delightful set."

"Oh, yes," cried the children. "Do we know them all?"

"You are not so well acquainted as I wish you were, and as I desire you to be," said their mother. "You must be glad to see them, and be careful not to hurt their feelings, for if you do, I am afraid I shall not be able to persuade them to stay."

"Oh, we will, we will," cried the children heartily; "we'll do our very best."

"I hope none of them will be quarrelsome," said Robert.

"They are not," said their mother; "they won't quarrel, you may depend upon that; they aim to make everybody happy."

"I wish they'd come real early," said the children.

"One of them, where she is in the habit of going, often comes before people are up in the morning."

"How funny!" and the children laughed heartily.

"Yes," continued their mother, "and she would like nothing better than to come and creep into your beds to-morrow morning the minute your eyes are open."

"Capital," shouted Robert; "let's see her come. Company into bed with us!"

"No," said Helen, "let's be as smart as company, and get up to receive her."

Of course the children were anxious to know their names and who they were. Their mother thought they had best write them down. Robert drew a pencil from his pocket, and said one pencil would do for both. Mother thought not, but wished each to have paper and pencil, and carefully write a list of them. This set the children on a small business jaunt of much interest, and at length brought them back to two crickets by their mother's side.

"All ready," said Robert; "now for the names."

"Certainly," said their mother, "and you must not speak one word till you have finished."

"Now then," said their mother, "the first is from a large family, which we cannot stop to specify; so write down, The Little Kindnesses."

Robert and Helen stared at their mother, then at each other. Their faces flushed very red, but not a word was said, and they headed the list with the Little Kindnesses.

"Sweet Temper," said she. They wrote that. "Thankful Heart." They wrote that. "The two bears, Dear and Forbear," said she. "Good Behaviour. True Politeness; and last, though not least, Brotherly Love."

All were written. "That is enough to make a pretty good day of it," said mother. "Each read aloud your list, and let us see if it is all right."

The children read over their names, and then such a talk followed as I wish you could have heard. But I cannot write it; only the children determined to be as good as their word, and receive and treat their friends accordingly.

"Which is the one that comes so early?" asked Helen, looking over her list.

"I should think it was most likely to be Thankful Heart," said Robert, "coming just as quick as we wake, and making us thank God for,—

* The goodness and the grace
Which on our births have smiled.*"

To make a long story short, to-morrow came, bringing the company; and Thankful Heart just as early as the day, who helped to prepare the way for the rest. I wish I could stop to describe the day. It was a very interesting and happy day, however.

When Robert was trying to mend Helen's doll, Miss-understanding peeped in at the door, and winked at Helen; but For-bear was happily on the spot, and beckoned Miss-understanding off; so that what might have brought Hard Words ran into Soft Smiles, and the affair ended in a frolicsome somerset on the carpet.

This is a children's party I am sure no good mother could object to.

"SOMEBODY'S GRANDPA."

"Oh," cried Emma Rich, out of breath with running to catch up with Julia Kent, "there's an old man coming down Truman Street, and he walks so queer; the boys are pestering him, and it frightened me awfully."

Julia looked round, yet saw nobody but Emma at her side, pale and trembling. "How did he look?" asked Julia.

"Awfully," said Emma, who saw him through her fears,—and fears, you know, often give quite a wrong impression.

Julia looked again, and then caught sight of an old man staggering round the corner, with a pack of rude boys behind him.

"Let's run away," cried Emma.

Instead of that, Julia stopped. "I should think those boys would be ashamed to treat an old man so," she said, her cheeks glowing. He's somebody's grandpa."

"Oh, I am so frightened," cried Emma again.

"Frightened!" cried Julia, indignantly; "then run." Julia went back. "Boys," she said boldly, "I think you ought to be ashamed to treat a poor old man so. Should you like it, if 'twas your grandpa?"

"Who are you?" cried the rude boys, and they began to sneer at her.

"You may laugh as much as you please," said Julia, "I don't mind it."

"I hear a friendly voice," said the old man, "but I'm blind; I cannot see where it comes from."

"It is I," answered the child, going up to him, "and I will lead you home, if you'll like me to. Maybe you lost your way, sir. It must be so hard not to see."

"Yes, dear child," said the old blind man; "I'm a stranger here. I'm visiting my daughter, who lives in — Street. I just stepped out to sun and air myself, and somehow missed my way. The boys think I'm in liquor, for I can't walk with young legs. How came you to befriend me, dear child?"

"Oh, sir," said Julia, "I thought you must be somebody's grandpa, and I could not bear to see you treated so. I will lead you home, sir."

"God bless you, dear child," said the old man.

As soon as Julia took him in charge, the rude boys sneaked off, showing that the brave stand of even a little girl for the right, confounds and puts to flight the wicked. Kindly and carefully she helped him down unexpected steps, and round sharp corners, and by the dogs and the people in the streets, the old man thankful for a little child to lead him, and Julia very pleased to do it, for Julia had been taught to respect and care for the aged. Her grandpa had lived in her father's family, and she knew old feet needed young, active steps to go for them; old eyes wanted young, bright eyes to see for them; and old hands, which had done the hard work of other days, must now have young, strong hands to help them.

So in every old man, no matter how poor or how pitiful he was, she saw "Somebody's grandpa," who ought to have the respectful behaviour, the kind attentions, and the affectionate treatment which made her grandpa so happy while he lived, and which made grandpa's memory so sweet to his little grandchildren.

THE NEW COMPANION.

WHEN I was sixteen, said a gentleman, I was sent to — Academy. At the boarding-house I was put into a large room with accommodation for four boys. Two were already there. We spent the first evening in little study and much talk. They were droll fellows, and amused me highly.

At bed-time the habit of reading God's word before going to bed knocked at my memory. Did they? I saw nothing that looked like it. Should I then? Could I? I tried to outsit them, and unpack my Bible after they were asleep; but that was out of the question. I went to my trunk to take it out, and came back without it. I went again, fumbled over the things, then got up and looked out of the window. What would they say to see me reading the Bible? Would they not laugh? Should I not see ridicule twinkling in their eye, even if they said nothing?

On the other hand, could I forget my mother's words when she packed my Bible? Could I so easily abandon a habit formed from earliest boyhood? Forget! No, I did not forget; but I was afraid—ashamed; ashamed of my God, my Saviour, and his word; afraid of the new public opinion around me. "I'm too sleepy to-night," I thought, and undressing quickly, tumbled into bed.

Morning found me in ill-humour. Dissatisfied with myself for the last night's omission, and angry at having to suffer the same fight with conscience over again, I wished the other lads would get up and be off. As soon as they awoke, the same joking began, and kept up all the time of dressing. "When you are among the Romans, do as the Romans do," I said, hoping that would quiet conscience. But conscience rejoined, "Peter tried that once, and you know what came of it."

So it passed on till the Sabbath, my Bible in my trunk, unopened, unread, and no family reading and family altar to supply the deficiency. Sabbath brought me no closer to the neglected duty. I once went to my trunk, determined to take my stand at all odds, but was so agitated, that one of the boys seeing it, cried out, "Hold! What's the matter? Your hand shakes." Tears started in my eyes. I made some light answer, and taking my cap, hastily left the room.

On Monday the fourth boy arrived, who was to sleep with me. We had speculated a good deal about him, and hoped he'd prove the "right sort." What a little fellow he was; yet he was but a year younger than myself. I, however, was overgrown. "Langdon." A good name. Easy, too, in his ways; not too free, or Nick Doty would have come down on him. After tea we went to swim, and a capital swimmer he was. We all studied pretty well that evening. At nine o'clock Langdon emptied his pockets of chestnuts, and we cracked some hard jokes over them.

At length Langdon went to his trunk, and taking out a book, he fetched it to the study-table. Nick eyed it curiously. "This is my Bible," said Langdon. "I always read in it before going to bed. My parents are Christians, and my father told me never for a single day to omit reading my Bible."

"I've got a Bible in my trunk," said Nick, starting for it. "So have I," said the other boy. "I have," echoed I, blushing. I would have given anything to have been in Langdon's shoes then. How I admired and respected his moral courage! We all brought our Bibles, and Nick, who never lost the chance of a story, began one about Noah, I forgot what, only we all laughed, all but Langdon.

"Well, boys," he said, with a quiet seriousness, "as this is God's word, let us read a chapter, and suppose we all read round." "I'm certain my folks would like it," said Nick; and so we began Bible reading in our room, which did not fail of producing marked effects. The room, from having had a doubtful reputation, became one of the best-ordered among the students. The habit of seriously reading God's word every day gradually bred a thoughtful, reverent spirit among us, checking overmuch levity, and strengthening the good habits which we brought from home.

As for me, it taught me a lesson of the folly of indecision never to be forgotten. Let every young person, on first leaving home, promptly discharge the first and most obvious duties enjoined by his Christian education, and a thousand young men would stand where now a thousand fall, and fall to rise no more. Many wonder that the children of pious parents often go so far astray. It is no wonder. A well-instructed and sensitive conscience needs careful handling. Like fine steel, its delicate edge is easily blunted. Disregard its warnings, deaden its convictions, and its voice is soon hushed. Restraint once removed, and one goes from better to worse, a down-hill path, with ever increasing speed. Safety alone lies in prompt and faithful obedience to its dictates.

KITTY AND THE EYE.

KITTY was left at home one Sabbath because she was not quite well and the weather was lowering. She had her hymn to learn, and a beautiful book, called "The Night of Toil," to read. One verse was nearly perfect, when an idle thought entered her head, and she followed it to the baby-house. That house was shut up on the Sabbath, and rarely visited, for in Kitty's home Sabbath was a holy day, loved and prized by all the family. It was not a stiff, disagreeable day, as some children regard it; but a day when father was at home from his work, with leisure to speak with his little ones. Kitty often thought how good it was in God to make a rest-day for her papa; else how could she see him enough?

Well, the idle thought carried Kitty to the play-room, only to look. But she saw a doll's pelisse left unfinished the afternoon before, and she took it up, pulled the needle through, sewed a good many stitches, and then tried it on Miss Dolly. The little girl had some misgivings; but she said to herself, "Aunt Mary can't lecture me for what she don't know, and there's nobody to see." Nobody to see! Presently it seemed as if there was an Eye looking right through the wall, watching her—not an angry Eye, not a fiery Eye, but a great sorry Eye. Kitty put her work down. Kitty trembled. Oh, she seemed to remember in a minute all she ever knew about the Sabbath-day; how God, when he made the world, put by his work; how he wrote it in his ten commandments himself; how the people in Jerusalem displeased him because they broke it. Did God set so much by his Sabbath, and she not mind it? She had no excuse to make. She did not try to. She only felt that her conduct had grieved and offended the great and blessed God, and she was sorely troubled. Kitty stayed not a moment longer in the baby-house.

That evening, when her father heard her hymn, and stroked her hair, and took her in his lap, she leaned her head on his shoulder, and a tear stole down her cheek. "Papa," she said, with a choking voice, "I don't deserve your love. I have been grieving God to-day," and she told her papa everything. "If I'd only gone to church, it wouldn't have happened," she said.

"You have had a more faithful teacher than your minister to-day, my child," replied her father. "You have the Holy Spirit, whose office it is to convince of sin, and who has opened your eyes to see God and to feel what a grievous thing it is to break his holy and blessed law;" and, as he looked down on his little girl's face, that tear on her cheek was more precious in his eyes than silver or gold.

There are many kinds of tears—complaining tears, teasing tears, tears of disappointment, tears of joy; but this was a tear of penitence; and a tear of penitence is precious, because it softens, sobers, and humbles the heart. It waters some of the feeblest thoughts of God planted there by the Holy Spirit, which may prove to be the little seed-corn of eternal life. Kitty's prayer was, "O God, forgive a sinful child, for Christ's sake"—a prayer dear to the heart of God from every infant lip.

LITTLE CROSS BEARERS.

It was a rosy morning in June, and the sun, who had gone to bed very unwillingly the night before, clinging to the hill-tops with his long red fingers, some time after his honest face had disappeared—was back again bright and early, and seemed to be full of business. He pricked the eyelids of the young robins with fine golden needles, till they awoke, and chirped so shrilly for their breakfast, that the poor mother bird had to stop short in a beautiful little prayer she was just setting to music, and hurry down to see if there were any fresh worms in the bird market. Then he poured a shower bath of light on the heads of the sleepy flowers, not forgetting to creep under broad leaves, and touch the shy little violets, so that the most modest blossoms—Cinderellas among flowers—nodded their heads to each other in glad surprise at their new golden crowns, and whispered, "So we are to be princesses, after all."

Then creeping out again, he met two or three little girls in the road, and, kissing them right in the eyes, said:—

"So this is the day for your pic-nic. I was in the woods all day yesterday making ready for you. You'll find a path all emerald and gold, dry and soft as the parlour carpet, and I've hung the rocks with moss and flowers, and I looked so hard at the wild strawberries that the foolish little things turned red, but you won't like them any the less for that."

The little girls laughed merrily, and, hurrying home, packed their dinner baskets in such haste, that Carrie and Jenny Bell had hardly finished their breakfasts, when the whole eager party arrived at the garden gate.

"Why, girls," cried Susy Wright, "not ready yet? Do hurry, for it is a long walk, and we want to get into the woods before it grows much warmer."

"It won't take me two minutes," cried Carrie, but Jenny stood irresolute.

"I'm afraid we oughtn't to go."

"Why not, pray?" cried Carrie sharply.

"Why, you know mamma has one of her bad headaches coming on, and there's Walter and Fred to be taken care of."

"Well, and there's Sally to do it," said Carrie.

"But you know Sally's sister is very sick, and mamma has given her leave to go home to-day."

"How provoking," said Carrie, fretfully. Then she added, after a pause, "But I don't believe mamma's head is very bad, and I'm sure Fred will be good, and Walter would help to amuse him."

"Walter is almost a baby himself," said Jenny; "and Fred frets almost all the time since he's been getting his teeth, poor little fellow!"

"Fred will be good enough if you're not here to spoil him," cried Carrie, "and I'll just go and ask mamma if she can't get along without us. It would be too bad to keep us in such a lovely day."

Carrie was back in a few minutes with a radiant face. "Mamma says we may go. She can spare us if we are going to enjoy ourselves so much."

Jenny hesitated. The woods in the distance looked so misty and pleasant, and Fred's fretful little cry jarred upon her ear, while she thought how hard it would be to amuse him, and keep Walter quiet and happy through all that warm day. But would it be any easier for her mother, left all alone with her aching head? "No," thought Jenny, "I cannot be so selfish. I should not enjoy myself at all."

"What are you thinking about so long?" asked Carrie, impatiently. "Come, let's get our baskets ready."

"I believe I won't go," faltered Jenny.

"Why not?" cried two or three disappointed voices.

"I can't bear to leave mamma so sick."

"What a mean girl you are, Jenny Bell," whispered Carrie, angrily. "You want to make all the girls think you are such a saint, and I am so selfish. That's all you're doing it for—just to show off."

"No, indeed, Carrie," said Jenny, colouring deeply; and turning to the girls, she added,—

"One of us can go just as well as not, and, of course, as Carrie is the oldest, she has the best right, and, indeed, I do not believe I care half as much about it as she does, for she has been talking about it all the week."

No persuasions could move Jenny, who only shook her head cheerfully, and insisted that she did not feel badly at all, and at last the impatient little party moved on.

After watching them down the road with glistening eyes, for it was really a very great trial to be left behind, Jenny went back to the nursery, where her mother sat bathing her head with camphor, and trying to amuse the little complaining Fred with some pictures. A look of glad surprise came over her flushed face, as she heard Jenny's step.

"I thought you were gone to the woods."

"No, mother," said Jenny, trying to speak carelessly. "I thought I would like to play housekeeper to-day, and first I am going to put you to bed with your dreadful headache, and then Walter, and Fred, and I, are going to have a nice time out in the arbour."

The happy tears came in Mrs. Bell's eyes as her kind daughter arranged the pillows under her throbbing head, and darkening the room, stole softly out with Fred and Walter.

But it was no small task that Jenny had undertaken. Poor baby Fred bit his fingers with his hot, swollen gums, but as that did not make matters any better, he threw away, one after another, flowers, books, and playthings which patient Jenny brought, and was quite determined to be a very unhappy little baby. Then Walter was full of mischief, and could only be kept still with stories, which poor Jenny told industriously, walking up and down the garden walk, carrying baby Fred till she thought her arms would drop off.

Once in a while a vision crossed her of the happy party seated in the shady woods, making crowns, and eating wild strawberries, but she pushed it bravely aside, and kept on her tiresome walk, only thinking to herself that if mother was having a nice rest, she could bear it a little longer.

The sun grew very hot, but little tyrant Fred would not be carried into the house, and as poor Jenny, turning in the path, was just beginning her seventh story, she saw a gentleman at the garden-gate.

"Could you give me a glass of water, little lady?" said he, pleasantly; and Jenny, encumbered by the clinging Fred, soon brought a cool, brimming supply.

"You looked tired," said the gentleman kindly, as he thanked her; and before she knew it—drawn on by his sympathizing questions—she had told him all the story of the morning's trials and disappointments, though, for some reason, she hardly understood herself, she never told him she had a sister Carrie, who had gone to the woods. They had quite a pleasant talk together, and at last, when the gentleman went his way, he said,—

"I like you so much, little Jenny, that I don't want you to forget me," and drawing from his pocket a small book, he begged her to keep it in memory of his visit, and with a bright, kind smile, he was gone.

The day wore on. At noon Jenny made a nice cup of tea for mother, and after feeding baby his bread and milk, and giving busy Walter his dinner, to her great joy, both children, overcome with heat and fatigue, fell fast asleep.

Now she had time to examine her little book, which she found very strange and interesting. It told about some pilgrims, going on a long journey, with heavy crosses on their backs. They had a great many trials, and often their way lay through hot, sandy deserts, so that some of them grew very tired and sad, and some tried to throw away their crosses, but others went on very patiently, always looking as if they saw something so beautiful just a little way before them, that they forgot all present sorrow and trouble. So the story went on, till the pilgrims all came to a very dark valley, through which they all must pass. Then some of them trembled, and grew pale, but others went in singing, and some of the words of their song were, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me," and suddenly, while they were singing, the heavy crosses fell from their backs, and in their stead, angels brought them shining crowns. And there came a voice, "Father, I will that these whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory." Then the whole valley was filled with light, the angels shouted, "They shall see the King in his beauty," and the happy pilgrims passed through the everlasting gates into the golden city.

Jenny's tears fell fast as she finished the strange little book, which she could not quite understand.

"My sweet little daughter," said a voice, and looking up, she saw her mother coming in at the door, and knew from her eyes that the bad headache was quite gone. "You have made me very happy," continued Mrs. Bell, kissing Jenny's round cheeks. "You have been so self-sacrificing and patient to-day, that I am sure my prayers have been heard, and that one of my little daughters is learning to take up her cross daily, and follow Christ."

"Mother," said Jenny eagerly, "do you mean that I am a cross-bearer?"

"You certainly have been to-day," said her mother, with an affectionate smile.

Jenny burst into happy tears, and held out her little book. They read it over together, and Jenny's mother explained it.

"And will all that ever happen to me?" said Jenny.

"Yes, if you take up your cross daily, and bear it patiently for Christ's sake, you, too, shall see the King in his beauty."

Carrie came home very cross that night. She knew she had been selfish, and nothing had gone right all day, while there sat Jenny, looking so wonderfully happy. What could be the reason? Was she doing it just to be provoking?

The little party stopping at the gate were very voluble, telling Jenny of the pleasures of the day. "They never before had had such a splendid time, and had never seen the woods so beautiful, and so full of birds and flowers." But not one of the party was as happy as the patient little cross-bearer, for the angels were singing, "She shall see the King in his beauty, and the land that is very far off."

THE CAMEL AND THE MILLER.

DID you ever hear the fable of the camel and the miller?

One night a miller was waked up by his camel trying to get its nose into the tent. "It's very cold out here," said the camel. "I only want to put my nose in." The miller made no objection. After a while the camel asked leave to have his neck in, then his fore feet; and so, little by little, it crowded in its whole body. This, as you may well think, was very disagreeable to the miller, and he bitterly complained to the forth-putting beast. "If you don't like it, you may go," answered the camel. "As for me, I've got possession, and I shall stay. You can't get rid of me now."

Do you know what that camel is like? Bad habits; little sins. A young man is asked to drink. He takes one glass, only a glass. Then he takes two. Intemperance has got its fore-paws on him. He neglects to rouse up and shake them off. So, little by little, it gains ground, until it gets the mastery; and too late he finds he has lost place, power, character, everything.

Coveting puts its nose in the soul, breathing only wishes, little wishes. It is not thrust out. Desires for ill-gotten gain grow strong and stronger. They get a footing, they fill the mind, they take possession, and at last lead to stealing, robbery, or murder.

Guard against the first approaches, the most plausible excuses, only the nose of sin. If you do not, you are in danger. It will surely edge itself slowly in, and you are overpowered before you know it. Be on your guard. Watch.

A CHILD'S STORY OF THE OLDEN TIME.

2 KINGS V.

SHALL I tell you a true, true story,
Of times long ago gone by,
That will prove that e'en little children
Win praise for the Lord Most High?

How a brave little Hebrew maiden—
A slave in Syria's band—
Remembered the God of her people,
Whom he saved with outstretched hand.

Not a sullen and thankless captive
Was this godly Hebrew maid;
Though afar from her mother's bosom,
Yet her heart was not afraid.

She knew that God's love was about her,
As well by Abana's shore,
As when she had played by the Jordan,
In the freer days of yore;

So her pure, gladsome heart illumined
With God's light her captor's home,
As she warbled sweet strains of music
First heard 'neath the Temple's dome.

It may chance that her song was with David:
"I will lift my eyes to the hills,

For my help from the Lord is coming;
My foot will he keep from illa.

"He that dwells in the holy covert
Of the Lord our God Most High,
He shall brood 'neath his blessed shadow,
And close to his heart shall lie!"

Yet she paused in her happy singing,
For she read in her master's face,
Although highest lord in the kingdom,
The leprous curse of his race.

Her heart leaped with joy in a moment,
For she knew her power to bless!
So eager was she to be helpful
In making some burden less.

"Oh! would that my lord were in Canaan,
Where God's honour and glory dwell!"
She said to her Syrian mistress,
"His prophet would make him well!"

With a sad heart answered the lady,
"Child, you know not what you say;
The leper must bear on his burden
Till the close of his weary day."

Still the brave little girl repeated,
"Elisha can make him as pure
As the flesh of a little infant—
God teaches him how to cure!"

At last, one told to Naaman;
"Sire, that little Hebrew child
Declares that a leech in her country
Can heal the leper defiled!"

"Come hither, thou strange little maiden;
What story is this they tell!"
"God's hand is with Prophet Elisha!
He will surely make thee well."

So this haughty captain of valour
Went forth to the Hebrew's land,
But was wroth at the Prophet's message,
Which sent them to Jordan's strand.

But at last his spirit was humbled,
And the holy Jordan's wave
Washed away the leprous defilement,
As promised the little slave.

So praise for our God was perfected,
For him who in Israel reigned,
From the mouth of this babe in Israel,
And health for her lord ordained.

THE STONE THAT REBOUNDED.

BY THE REV. JOHN TODD, D.D.

"O boys, boys, don't throw stones at that poor cat-bird," said an old, grey-headed man.

"Why, sir," said a little fellow, "she makes such a squalling that we can't bear her."

"Yes; but she uses such a voice as God gave her, and it is probable as pleasant to her friends as yours is to those who love you. And, besides, that hoarse, flat voice is not her only song. Early in the morning, on some bright day, you will hear her in some high tree, pouring out notes that are delightful. She is a species of mocking-bird, and often fills the air far and near with her varied and sweet melody. And, besides, I have another reason why I don't want to have you stone her. I am afraid the stone will rebound, and hurt you as long as you live!"

"Rebound! We don't understand you, sir!"

"Well, come, and I will tell you a story!"

"We shall like that, sir. Is it a true story?"

"Yes; every word is true. Fifty years ago I was a boy like you. I used to throw stones, and as I had no other boy very near me, I threw them till I became quite accurate. One day I went to work for an old man by the name of Hamilton. They seemed very old people then. They were very kind to everybody and everything. Nobody had so many swallows making their nests under the roof of their barn. Nobody had so many martin-birds in their red-box at the end of their little red-house as they. Nobody had so many little chattering, flitting, joyous wrens as they. Nobody so many pets that seemed to love them as they. Among other things was a very tame phebe-bird. For seven years she had come after the long winter was over, and built her nest in the same place, and there reared and educated her young phebess. She had just returned on the day that I went there to work, and they welcomed her back. She had no note but to repeat her own name, and she cried 'phebe,' 'phebe,' as if glad to get back. In the course of the day I thought I would try my skill upon old phebe. She stood upon a post near the spot where she was to build her nest, and looked at me with all confidence, as much as to say, 'You won't hurt me.' I found a nice stone, and, poisoning my arm, I threw it with my utmost skill. It struck poor phebe on the head, and she dropped dead! I was sorry the moment I saw her fall. But it was all done. All day long her mate came round and called 'phebe,' 'phebe,' in tones so sad that it made my heart ache. Why had I taken a life so innocent, and made the poor mate grieve so? I said nothing to the Hamiltons about it. But through a grandchild they found it out; and, though they never said a word to me about it, I knew that they mourned for the bird, and were deeply grieved at my cruelty. I could never look them in the face afterwards as I did before. Oh, that I had told them how sorry I was! They have been dead many, many years, and so has the poor bird; but don't you see how that stone rebounded and hit me! How deep a wound upon my memory! How deep upon my conscience! Why, my dear boys, I would make great sacrifices to-day if I could undo that one deed! For fifty years I have carried it in my memory, and though I have never spoken of it before, yet, if it shall prevent you from throwing a stone at the poor cat-bird, that may rebound, and make a wound in your conscience that will not be healed in all your life, I shall rejoice!"

The boys thanked the aged man, dropped their stones, and the cat-bird had no more trouble from them.

LOVE WINS LOVE.

"MOTHER, the birdies all love father," said a little boy of five summers, as he stood with his mother, watching the robins, who were highly enjoying their morning meal of cherries from the old tree that overhung the house.

"Does anybody else love father, Charlie?"

"Oh yes! I love him, and you love him, but we know more than the birds."

"What do you think is the reason the birdies love your father?"

Charlie did not seem to hear this question. He was absorbed in deep thought.

"Mother," at last he said, "all the creatures love father. My dog is almost as glad to see him as he is me. Pussy, you know, always comes to him, and seems to know exactly what he is saying. Even the old cow follows him all round the meadow, and the other day I saw her licking his hand, just as a dog would. What can be the reason, mother?"

"Think, Charlie,—try and find out a reason yourself."

"I think it is because father loves them, mother. You know he will often get up, when he is tired too, to give pussy something to eat if she is hungry, and he pulls carrots for the cow to eat from his hand, and pats her, and talks to her, and somehow I think his voice never sounds so pleasant as when he talks to the creatures."

"I think his voice sounds pleasant when he is talking to his little boy."

Charlie smiled. "Father loves me," he said, "and I love him dearly. He loves the birds, too, I am sure. He whistles to them every morning when they are eating cherries, and they are not a bit afraid of him, though he is almost near enough to catch them. They look at him with their funny little eyes, and chirp and eat away just as if they knew he liked to see them. I wish you could hear him whistle to the 'dogalinks,' as little Mamy calls them. They come and sit on a twig, close by him, and sing so loud, and make such funny noises. It always makes me laugh to hear him try to do as they do. Mother, I wish everything loved me as well as they do father."

"Do as father does, Charlie, and they will. Love all living things, and be kind to them. Do not speak roughly to the dog. Don't pull pussy's tail, nor chase the hens, nor try to frighten the cow. Never throw stones at the birds. Never hurt nor tease anything. Speak gently and lovingly to them. They know as well as you do who has a pleasant voice. Feed them and seek their comfort, and they will love you, and every body that knows you will love you too."

THE MOTHER HEN.

A FAT mother hen was one day strutting on the green, with her chickens running merrily about her, pecking and peeping, as happy as any happy family could well be. Suddenly she caught sight of a dark spot in the sky. What a cry of terror came from her little throat! How the frightened chicks rushed in an instant under her wings! How bristling and fierce the old hen looked! What was the matter? Ah, it was a hawk in the air, cut getting his breakfast, and ready to dive at some unwary chicken. But every chick is safe and snug under its mother's wings. The hungry hawk was loath to go. "I will die before you shall seize one of my little ones," the old hen seemed to say in every feather of her body and every look of her eye. The hawk soon saw it was no use, and in a few moments flew away. She then gave a note of joy and triumph, and out hopped the chickens from their secure hiding-place; some hesitating, as if not quite over their fright; others, more bold, stepping confidently off. Ah, they knew those warm and friendly wings were ready at a moment's notice to shelter them again.

Do you remember what the Lord Jesus once said to Jerusalem in the twenty-third chapter of Matthew? He loved Jerusalem. He knew that enemies wanted to destroy it. He desired to save it. But no; the people would not mind his warning cries, and one morning, as he stood looking at the city, he said, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thee, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings."

The blessed Saviour, you see, is a refuge from harm. He is a sure refuge, an instant refuge, a warm refuge, a loving refuge. He cares for the "little ones," for he says, "Suffer little children to come unto me." Under the refuge of Jesus we shall be safe from the attacks of sin and of Satan, that like hungry birds of prey, are always ready to pounce upon us, and we can be safe nowhere else.

FAIR ROSE.

FROM whence came thy mantle of green, bright rose—
From whence came thy mantle of green?
So deftly woven, so richly wrought!
At a costly price thou hast surely bought
That beautiful mantle of green.

God gave me this mantle of green, dear child—
God gave me this mantle of green;
By his skill 'twas wove, by his fingers wrought;
No earthly riches could e'er have bought
Such a beautiful mantle of green.

Who painted thy delicate blush, fair rose—
Who painted thy delicate blush?
Such skilful shading, such tender tone!
'Tis certain no hand but a master's own
Has tinted thy marvellous blush.

God painted this delicate blush, my child—
God painted this delicate blush;
His tender touch gave the tender tone;
No pencil but his—the MASTER'S OWN—
Could e'er tint such a marvellous blush.

And whence came thine odorous breath, sweet rose—
Thy balmy and odorous breath?
So fresh, so fragrant!—some chemist's skill
Must sure from the dews of eve distil
That balmy and odorous breath.

From God came this odorous breath, fair child—
From God came this odorous breath;
'Tis his, and no earth-born chemist's skill,
Which can from the early dews distil
Such balmy and odorous breath.

And who taught thee such winning grace, my rose—
Who taught thee such winning grace?
So stately, so meek!—at some court, I ween,
Thou hast caught that modest yet regal mien,
And borrowed that winning grace.

God lent me this winning grace, sweet child—
God taught me this winning grace;
In the light of his gracious smile, I ween,
I have caught this modest yet regal mien,
And borrowed my winning grace.

And what dost thou render to him, my flower—
Ah! what dost thou render to him?
Such gifts and graces from his high hand
Must even from thee some return demand;
And what dost thou render to him!

I render myself unto him, dear child;
My beauty and fragrance to him;—
Thy gifts, too, and graces are from his hand:
They surely from thee some return demand;
And what hast thou rendered to him!

OUT OF THE DEPTHS.

A SERMON ADDRESSED TO THE YOUNG.

BY THE REV. W. ARNOT.

"For we ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another.

"But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour;

"That, being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life."

—TITUS III. 3-7.

I HAVE seen a great continental river, after it had flowed for many miles within a comparatively narrow bed, bursting suddenly into the dimensions of an inland sea. At the lower extremity of that expanse it again became a stream confined within its banks; and at another stage became another sea. The St. Lawrence, in North America, is the grandest example of this in the world, but the same characteristic feature may be seen elsewhere on a smaller scale.

The Scripture, especially in these Epistles of Paul, resembles such a river. In some parts its bed is narrow, and you can easily see over from bank to bank, as in the two first verses of the chapter, where he exhorts the people to "obey magistrates" and to be "no brawlers;" but in such a portion as our text the current breaks at once through all these things of the present world, and spreads into an ocean where we can neither feel a bottom nor see a shore. Here, in a few lines, lie all the loss or man, and all the salvation of God.

This portion of Scripture, although a connected whole, is made up of three distinct parts.

The first (verse 3) reveals our low estate;

The second (verses 4-6) explains how the fallen are raised;

The third (verse 7) points to the high place on which the saved stand.

It is a Pilgrim's Progress from the city of Destruction to the city of the living God. The most interesting of all reading or speaking is a story; especially if the story tell of terrific dangers and hair-breadth escapes; most of all, if both the danger and the deliverance concern ourselves. Such a story is our text; and such a story, if we preach truly, ought our sermon to be. It is a more exciting tale than that which Nathan told to David about the poor man and his one ewe-lamb; and, here too, the moral of the tale, like the sharp spear-head fixed to the handle and pointed to the trembler's breast,—the moral of the tale is, "Thou art the man."

Perhaps common people, as well as kings, would open their ears more widely to the lesson, if it were spoken as a parable. The meaning of our text, if it were cast into this mould, would run as follows:—

"I fell from heaven, my first dwelling-place, the happy home of the holy. I fell fast and far. In the fall, my senses were so stupified that I did not afterwards rightly know the good that I had lost, nor the evil to which I had come. I alighted in a sea; it was a sea, for I sank into it, but it was not water. Serpents, and all kinds of filthy, slimy living things made up its mass. The movements of those reptiles were the waves of that sea. Darkness, too, was over the deep. In it, and of it, I grew one of those serpents; and twisted and writhed like the rest. Worst of all, instead of loathing my nature and my associates, I liked both. It became my nature and my delight to be there. I had neither the power to rise out of that abyss, nor the will to try. Right over me, at length, the heaven opened, and an angel of light came down. He laid a bond around me, a bond which I felt but could not see. It was very soft, but very strong. It was called the Love of God. He laid that bond round me, and drew. The power that drew was divine; I could not resist; it drew me out. When I was drawn out of the filth, I began to loathe the filth in which I had lain. When I was drawn out by the angel, I grew an angel too. The angel who raised me, was the Messenger of the Covenant, the Eternal Son. When I was brought near him, I grew like him, and loved him for loving me. Then I wondered at myself for having ever loved the unclean place and the unclean company."

I. The low condition in which the fallen lie. "For we ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another" (verse 3). What a sea of wickedness! It cannot rest. "Who are these, and whence came they?" Listen to one who has been rescued, and he will tell what the imprisonment was. He who in this verse describes the condition of the sinful, is now among the saved. While he was in the pit, he could not have described its abominations so faithfully. It is after he has been delivered that he either can or will bear true witness regarding the bondage in which he was held. Listen to this man, speaking in this verse, as you would listen to a saved seaman telling of the shipwreck in which his companions were lost, and from which he was snatched as by a miracle. Ah! the saved man tells the story not only to those who are saved like himself; he tells it in the ears of some who lie in the lost state still. This missionary man, Paul, after his own deliverance, was ever ready to tell of his former unconverted state; but while he remained in that state, he did not complain of it, or know that it was evil.

The characteristic marks of the lost estate constitute a connected series, "foolish, disobedient, deceived," &c.

1. "Foolish." It is thoughtless, or heedless. An infant or an idiot may be in a place of extreme danger, on the top of some tall ladder it may be, or on the brink of some yawning gulf, and yet be entirely unconscious of danger. Nay, more, he may be disporting himself with childish glee, when you come in sight, and perceive that he is in the very jaws of death. He laughs, but you shudder. You know his danger; he does not know it himself. He is mindless, thoughtless. This represents one feature of an unrenewed, unpardoned sinner's case. Although sin lies on him, and wrath before him, he eats, drinks, and is merry. The thoughtless throng were sporting in Jerusalem while Jesus was weeping over it. So sport the unpardoned and unconverted to-day.

2. "Disobedient." This implies that the warning voice has come, and has been neglected. None of the thoughtless, in this land at least, can plead the excuse of ignorance. The sound of the gospel has come to the ear of every inhabitant of this island. Those who do not know it, remain ignorant because they do not desire to know. The guilt of disobeying a command has been added to the guilt of slothfulness. God's voice has been heard saying to them, "Do this," and they have refused to do it. Expressly, "This is his commandment, That we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another" (1 John iii. 23). This commandment every prodigal disobeys every day and all the day long, until he arise and go to the Father.

3. "Deceived." It signifies wandering. It speaks of those who have lost their way. They have departed from the right path, and they are going further and further at every step in the way of error that leads to death. Those who are distant from God, are ever going further distant. It is the distinguishing character of the evil heart of unbelief, that it departs from the living God. Human hearts, with the impetuous flow of manifold affections, are like "rivers of water" when God, by the power of his grace, turns them; but they are like rivers of water also before they are turned. The life and spirit of an unreconciled man is not like a still lake, but like a rushing stream. Deceived by the corrupt bent of his own heart, the person who does not come near to God in the Mediator, is always going further off by a law of his being. "Evil men and seducers wax worse and worse."

4. "Serving divers lusts and pleasures." He is a slave too, although he does not think so. Indeed, none more loudly boast of liberty than those who are led captive by their own impure desires. When the wanderer left the right path, and lost the protection of the King, he was taken prisoner by the enemy, and compelled to grind in the mill of his hard master. This slave is entirely under the control of the evil spirit who possesses him. The lust or pleasure needs only to say, Go, and he goeth;—needs only to say, Come, and he cometh. The lusts and pleasures are not all of one kind. There is great variety. One kind of cord suits better for binding one soul, and another kind for binding another. The love of money holds some; others who do not care for wealth, are held by vain shows; others still who despise both vanities and riches, are led captive by intemperance and other kindred passions. Various are the masters whom the multitude serve, but none walk at liberty except those whom the Son of God has made free, and guides by his Spirit.

5. "Living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another." It is a dreadful picture; and the last lines are the darkest. Slaves far from home and serving the stranger, might have their distress greatly mitigated by a gentle heart within each bosom, and mutual love in their common sorrow; but these slaves of sin are neither contented in their own minds, nor at peace with each other. For the present, at least, the heaviest part of their punishment is the malice that rankles in their hearts. The kingdom of God, when it comes in power, is not an outward material thing, coming with observation; the kingdom in its essential character is "within" the souls of its true subjects. In this respect the kingdom of darkness is like the kingdom of light. It is not so much an outward manifestation as an inward power. Such is the low condition of the unrenewed and ungiven. Consider now,—

II. How God raises up his own from that depth:—

1. Who is our helper? God.

2. What is the specific affection wherewith an offended God regarded a rebellious and sinful race? It is "kindness and love to men." The latter expression consists of one word in the original, and the whole is briefly, "When the kindness and philanthropy of our Saviour God appeared." Ah, how guilty, suspicious human hearts misinterpret the mind of God! Marks of his fatherly tenderness are scattered everywhere in heaven and earth. The sun that runs his race rejoicing, the clouds that soar over our heads, the winds that sigh in the forest, the flowers that bloom under our feet, the water that lies treasured in the ocean, or flows along the surface of the earth,—all these and a thousand other features of nature proclaim the philanthropy of God. Evidences yet more powerful we bear about with us, in every member of our bodies and every faculty of our minds. That was a true estimate of our heavenly Father's character, which was formed and expressed by a godly woman in ancient times, "If the Lord had been pleased to kill us he would not have showed us all these things" (Judges xiii. 23). Bravely spoken, thou heroic Hebrew matron, thy happy hopeful word rebukes our dark suspiciousness! God our Maker tenderly cares for us; we must look unto Jesus if we would measure the depth of God's philanthropy. His love to men was embodied in the "unspeakable gift." It was in our Redeemer's incarnation, ministry, sufferings, death, and resurrection, that the divine compassion for men finally and fully "appeared."

3. The great cardinal point on which divine mercy turns, "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy, he saved us." Pardon is given by God, not gained by man. It is not that the righteous Judge undervalues righteousness in the conduct of his creatures: it is precisely because he values it at its own great worth, that he does not give his favour in return for any righteousness which the fallen can perform. He will not count the fitful, unloving works of unreconciled sinners an obedience deserving the reward of heaven. It is not because righteousness is not a legal tender in the judgment of the great day, but because none of the fallen family have aught of righteousness to bring. What the sinful offer as righteousness he cannot receive. The forgiven and regenerated are of the same mind in regard to all the offerings of self-righteousness which they brought in the days of their unbelief. The act of saving us from our state of sin and wrath is an act of pure mercy. It is in no measure of the nature of a bargain: it is wholly of the nature of a gift. This may to some seem a narrow point; but it is, nevertheless, the turning point, and to take the wrong side of this narrow point is to miss the salvation of God.

4. The manner in which mercy from God is applied on the one side, and accepted on the other, "by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour." Language, even when inspired by the Spirit, labours to represent fully the greatness of this change. It is both a "washing" and a "regeneration"—a cleansing and a birth. The vile must become holy, the old become new; the dead must live. In the act of believing we become new creatures in Christ; and this not by our own power, but by the quickening of the Holy Spirit, given according to Christ's promise and for Christ's sake. A believer's sins are all blotted out through the blood of the covenant, and he is made a new man by faith's living union to the Saviour.

Such is the process whereby the fallen are raised. The Son is the gift of the Father's love, and the Son makes the prisoners free—free from sin in all its aspects and consequences—free from the sentence which it deserves, and the dominion which it exercises—free from its threatened curse and its defiling presence.

III. The high place on which the redeemed stand: "That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life."

1. "Justified by his grace." Mark well how great is the Father's gift, and how great the children's privilege. It is righteousness that he bestows and that they possess. They are not left trembling with a part of their own guilt still reckoned to their account, and a part of the wrath of God still burning against them. The work of mercy is complete. "There is now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." A Christian's place is very high, and his footing very sure; he should know his privilege, and take the comfort of it to-day. The righteousness in which he stands accepted is not indeed wrought by himself, but it is a more perfect righteousness, the work of the Redeemer; and that righteousness of Christ, when it is mine by God's free gift in his covenant, is as really and surely mine as if I had wrought it out unaided in my own life. What God, for Christ's sake, freely gives to the needy, is theirs by a better title than any other thing that they possess. When we accept Christ as our righteousness, we have a righteousness which will stand in the great day. Our own sins are not reckoned to us, but the worth of our Redeemer is reckoned to us. Our names are written in the Lamb's book of life, and our sins blotted out from the book of God's judgment. To count on this is not presumption; it is trust. It is not to reckon our own sin small, but to esteem Christ's worth to be great. Trust, even to confident joyfulness, is as honouring to the trusted Father, as it is comforting to the trusting child.

2. "That we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." Not possessors yet, but heirs. What is implied in "eternal life" we cannot fully comprehend. Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard it all. In the nature of things the knowledge of it cannot be communicated before the possession of it is reached. If we could adequately know what it is, that very thing would show that it is not great. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Christians are now in the place of heirs. The inheritance is not in their hands, but it cannot go past them. What they enjoy to-day is hope, and hope is very sweet when its grounds are sure. How firmly he plants his foot on the ground, who knows that the step that leads him off the earth leads him into heaven! It is a great mistake to suppose that godless young people enjoy this world well, and that godly young people renounce the happiness of this world in order to make sure of the next. No greater deception can be practised upon the unwary by the father of lies. The contrary is the truth. In the nature of the case, they can best enjoy whatever good is going in the present life, who expect a better when this is done. I love my home on earth; but if I have no other home in prospect, the dread of one day losing the one I have keeps me in continual terror. I would enjoy to the full my home here, if I knew that when I leave it I only go to "a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." If I am, and know myself to be, the heir of an eternal life, I enjoy all the good which the present life contains, and when its sorrows come, my weary spirit is soothed by the certainty that they will soon be over. Joys and sorrows are mingled in the lot of all in this world,—alike those who are Christ's disciples, and those who have neglected the great salvation; but if Christ be "in you the hope of glory," your joys are more joyful, and your sorrows less sorrowful than those of other men.

In these verses, then, we are led near the mouth of a horrible pit; the covering veil is drawn aside, and we are permitted to look down into that seething sea of wickedness. But, as you gaze and grieve, a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, attracts your attention. Something "appears." What? It is the philanthropy—the man-love of God our Saviour. The Saviour comes, and his coming is like the morning. That bright sun beams down from heaven into the dark, deep sea of the sinful. Silently, softly, but resistlessly, the Light of the world draws some—draws many out of the deep, and lifts them upward to himself. Purified in the process, and leaving all their defilement behind, they soar away like clouds, and cluster round heaven's gate, waiting for the time when an abundant entrance will be administered to them into the joy of their Lord. This is the present life of the justified: they walk by faith, and blessed hope reigning in their hearts, beams from their faces.

What of those who are lying in the deep still? To them the invitation comes to-day, "Come out of her, my people;" "Whosoever will, let him come;" "Now is the day of salvation." This portion of Scripture is a religious tract, and it is one of the narrative series. A sinner saved tells the story of his own redemption; he tells it to the saved that they may glorify the Lord that bought them, and to the unsaved that they may profit by the example—that they also may arise, and on the footprints of that returned prodigal, return to his Father and their Father, to his God and their God.

PETER JONES, THE NORTH AMERICAN INDIAN MISSIONARY AND CHIEF.

In the most beautiful and productive regions of Upper Canada, before the axe of the white man rung in its forests, six Indian nations claimed the lordship of the soil. Their sovereignty was an extensive one. It ranged over the vast region in which lie the immense fresh-water lakes, now the highways of Canadian intercourse, and the favourite resort of the naturalist in search of additions to his stock of knowledge, and of the traveller in quest of the more pictorial and grander scenes of nature. In the country of these inland seas the six nations had their settlements. Before the Spaniard had unveiled the western world to the European eye, Mohawks and Oneidas, Tenecas and Onondagas roamed over their boundless solitudes, and claimed them as their home and their hunting-ground. Scattered along the shores of the lakes, these tribes found their subsistence in the white fish, the most dainty and delicious food of the Indian, or wandering in the interior, pursued through trackless forests or open prairies the game which yielded to them at once their food and clothing. Whence these nations sprung, at what point they entered the great American continent, are still unsettled questions. With more eagerness than truth, there was long assigned to them a Jewish origin. The customs of the red man were carefully sought out and ingeniously interpreted to identify his race with the lost tribes of Israel. Their observance of days of purification, their offering of first fruits of the earth, and their reckoning of time by moons, were confidently pronounced conclusive as to their Hebrew origin. Allowance was not made in the eagerness of controversy for the absence of all traces amongst them of a Sabbath, of circumcision, of altar rites, of distinction between clean and unclean animals—those well-defined and enduring peculiarities of Jewish observance. The theory of their origin most accordant with their language and their prevailing customs and manners is that which ascribes their descent from the Asiatic Tartars occupying the part of Asia which lies nearest to Behring's Straits. In their own account of themselves they are a separate branch of the human family. They believe that when the Great Spirit made the different nations of the earth he gave them various languages, complexions, and religions, as well as divers customs, manners, and modes of living, and that each nation had its own distinct origin. Indeed, one main difficulty which the Christian missionary encounters in planting the gospel amongst the aborigines of North America arises from their opposition to the Scripture revelation of the origin of the human family from a single pair.

Receiving their country as a gift from the Great Spirit and as their peculiar inheritance amongst the nations, it is not wonderful they should have keenly resented the intrusion of the white man. His settlement on the shores of their lakes, his possession of their forests, his very cultivation which drove the game on which they subsisted from its accustomed haunts, were violations of their most deeply-cherished rights. The country, though a solitude, was theirs. Their thinly-scattered tribes claimed it as their own; and as they would have resisted the intrusion of one Indian nation upon the territory of another, they unitedly repelled the white-faced invader. The story of the unequal struggle of the red man with the arts and arms of civilization needs not to be rehearsed. Since their intercourse with Europeans, the history of the Indian nations has been one of "decline and fall." They have been disappearing like the wilderness before the axe of the settler. European wars, diseases, vices have thinned the ranks of the six nations. Fire-water has destroyed its thousands. It has been the curse, the depopulator of once numerous and thriving Indian settlements. More than any other cause it has contributed to the rapid decrease of the Indian tribes. Once intoxicated, the savage passions of an Indian's nature assume the entire control. There is nothing to restrain from the most barbarous acts of cruelty and murder. The maddened Indian woman sells her child for a bottle of fire-water, or suffers it to perish from want in search of the fuel to feed her own self-consuming passion. "When I have put the question," says our American Indian missionary, "to the Indian whose head was white with the frost of many winters, and who had heard the expiring wail of once numerous and powerful tribes of my people, What have been the causes of their rapid decrease in numbers? the reply has been given me in the following melancholy picture, 'My son, my heart sickens when I look at that which has happened to our fathers since the pale face came amongst us. Before the white man landed on our shores the red man of the forest was numerous and powerful. In those days nothing but the weight of many winters bore them down to the grave. The Indian mother could then rear a large family of healthy and happy children. The game in the forest, the fish in the waters abundantly supplied their wants. The Indian corn grew rank and tall, and plenty smiled on the land. The old men made their feasts, and smoked their pipes, and thought of their munedoos (gods), they sang and beat upon the tawaegun (drum). The young men and women danced. The pow-wows (medicine men) visited the sick, sang and invoked their gods, applied their medicines gathered from nature's stores, and thus drove away the grim monster death. But as the white man advanced the red man was stripped of his hunting-grounds and corn-fields, and driven far from the land of comfort and plenty. The fatal small-pox and measles visited him for the first time, and swept away the poor Indians by thousands. Goaded to despair, they clutched the deadly tomahawk, and sought to wield it against the encroaching whites; but, instead of conquering, the act only afforded a pretext for a more general slaughter of the defenceless natives. Then, as if disease and the musket could not mow down the Indian fast enough, the fire-waters crept in and began to gnaw their very vitals, debasing their morals, lowering their dignity, spreading contentions, confusion, and death! My son, these are the causes which have melted away our forefathers like snow before a warm sun. The Great Spirit has hidden his face from his red children, on account of their drunkenness and many crooked ways.'"

If there be the warm colouring of a native mind in this picture of the past, it cannot be questioned but that the advent of the white man changed the character of the aborigines, and added to their vices those peculiar to European civilization. If through our intercourse we mitigated their savage spirit of revenge and abated their mutual relentless wars, we corrupted their morals and lowered their sense of dignity. They lost the independence of a self-reliant people, bent before the destructive force they could not resist, and sought for their safety in the meanness of false complaisance and the arts of deceit. Few scenes could have been more imposing from the grave dignity of the actors than the proceedings of the general councils of chiefs of the olden times. From such assemblages the masters of modern court ceremonies and the speakers of houses of parliament might have learned lessons of courteous procedure and forbearance. "Brothers," said the chief of the Ojebways on the opening of one of these native councils, "we thank the Great Spirit for preserving us to meet this day at the time appointed. Brothers, it makes our hearts glad to see you all seated with us on this ground. You have come a long march to settle yourselves down by us. Brothers, I raise my hand to heaven and take the white feather and brush out your ears that you may hear us distinctly. Brothers, I raise my hand to heaven, and take the white linen and wipe your eyes that you may see us clearly who we are. Brothers, your journey has been long and tiresome; you have come through dust and mud, and in your hard march have sweat much. I raise my hand to heaven, and take the clean white linen and wipe off all the perspiration and dust from your bodies, that you may be rested and have contentment. Brothers, I raise my hand to heaven, and take the white linen and make your feet clean that you may tread softly and take comfort. Brothers, we are thankful to the Great Spirit who has brought you here in safety with your women and children. I raise my hand to heaven, and take the pure white linen and wipe all your hearts clean that you may have great happiness in the land of our fathers. Your march is now ended; we meet you as brothers; we shake hands with you all. This is all I have to say."

If, instead of our exterminating wars, wasting diseases, and deadly vices, we had introduced to the red man, from our earliest intercourse with him, the gospel of peace, how different would have been the story of the native tribes. Christianity would have proved itself "a saviour of the body" in dispensing to the Indian its higher, saving virtue. It would have arrested the waste of their nations, preserved the red man as a distinct integral part of the human family, and in his conversion and civilization illustrated afresh its own adaptedness to all forms of humanity. Is it too late to pay this long-deferred debt to the Indian races? In the gospel lies the antidote to the mischief we have done. It is, in more than one sense, the red man's tree of life. Its reception will alone stay the plague under which his people are being stricken down. Its leaves can alone prove the healing of his nation. With this deep conviction the Rev. Peter Jones devoted his life to the conversion of his countrymen, the Ojebway or Chippeway Indians of Upper Canada. Himself a North American and chief, he had looked deeply into the causes of the dissolution of his nation, marked the forces before which they were melting away, and was convinced that only through the influence of the glorious gospel could the progress of his race to extinction be stayed. In a volume from his pen newly published, abounding in researches into the antiquities, customs, and languages of the Indian tribes, and furnishing interesting materials to the ethnological and philological student, a sketch is given of the early life and labours of this remarkable man.*

About thirty-six years ago, as the writer of this biographical notice informs us, the tribe of which Jones was chief were nearly all pagans. After more than two hundred years' intercourse with the white man, they had not received the gospel at his hand. The sun, moon, and stars; the lightning and thunder; beasts, birds, and serpents, with innumerable imaginary gods, continued to be the objects of their worship. Europeans had too faithfully communicated to them their vices; they had given their fire-water and fire-arms; they had prepared for them instruments of death, and shared with them the cup that maddened and destroyed thousands, but they had not given to them the knowledge of the one living and true God. Up to that time darkness covered their minds, hunger and ardent spirits destroyed their health; the prey of the designing white man, they were fast dying from off the magnificent country which their fathers called their own. At that period through the instrumentality of the Methodist Mission, multitudes of Ojebways were brought to renounce their idols. The preaching of the gospel was accompanied with a remarkable and solemn awakening amongst their tribe. The breath of the Spirit, for which Brainerd had so often prayed, as he laboured by the banks of the Susquehanna, was felt along the lakes where the Ojebway dwelt. Pricked in their hearts, they cried aloud for mercy and salvation; and He who sent his son to seek and save the lost, heard the poor Indian's penitential cry, and appointed to him beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garments of praise for the spirit of heaviness. Within a few years from the rise of this movement, fifteen Christian Indian settlements were formed, hundreds were turned from idols to the service of the living and true God, and proved, by the test of all religious profession, the fruits of righteousness, the conversions of that season were as genuine as they had in many instances been sudden. The Indian converts who had so recently worshipped stocks and stones, became examples in their new Christian settlements, in labours of love and in the patience of hope, to their more favoured white brethren.

It was during this season of ingathering amongst the red men of the wilderness, that Peter Jones was shaken in his pagan prejudices and practices, and ultimately savingly converted. He who was dedicated in his infancy—as his Indian name Kahkewāquonāby implied—to the thunder god of his country, was then set apart to the service of his true Lord. He exchanged the sacred eagle's feathers, the war club, and the canoe, which had been the emblems of his first dedication, for the baptism by water and the Spirit, and for the name that was afterwards to prove so distinguished amongst the heralds of the gospel to his countrymen. His own account of this important crisis of his life is deeply interesting. It occurred during a visit he was induced from curiosity to make to a Methodist encampment, to see how they worshipped the Great Spirit in the wilderness. The encampment was in the midst of a deep forest, where the underbrush having been carefully cleared away, the large trees that still shot high above the tents formed during the day a shade to the assembled worshippers, and reflected in brightness the camp-fires that blazed during the night season. To this encampment the people had poured in from a wide circuit of the neighbouring country, bringing with them their sons and daughters in the hope of their receiving some saving impressions. Many ministers were present, who delivered by turns addresses to the assembled multitudes. One acted as president, who was charged with the general oversight of the encampment and religious services, whilst at the conclusion of each sermon a prayer-meeting was held, in which any one was at liberty to exhort the penitents, and unite with them in prayer for their special needs. It was during the services of this wilderness encampment that Jones began first to feel, as he expressed it, "sick at his heart." The sermons had deeply impressed him. He thought the black coats understood all that was in his heart, and that he was the person to whom they were speaking. In spite of his old Indian heart, tears flowed down his cheeks at the remembrance of his sins, and he thought within himself, "What shall I do to be saved?" At the time he saw many of the white people powerfully awakened, and heard them cry aloud for mercy. Others, he observed, only stood and gazed and laughed. Amongst the latter class was his own elder brother, who had come from Hamilton to the meetings, and who, observing his state of mind, tauntingly remarked to him, "Oh, I see you will yet become a Methodist." Notwithstanding the taunt, his convictions became more deep and overpowering. He listened with increased earnestness to the word preached, yet much, hiding his head behind the shoulders of the people, as weeping is regarded by his countrymen a sign of weakness, and beneath the dignity of an Indian brave. In this conflict of his heart he retired into the solitary wilderness to try to pray to the Great Spirit, and there wrestled with God in prayer. Still, his mind was in deep trouble. He resolved, as he tells us in his own touching narrative of that crisis of his life, to go back to the camp, and ask the people of God to pray with him; but when he got to the meeting, his fearful heart again began to hesitate. "I stood," says he, "by the side of a tree considering what I must do; whether I should give up seeking the Lord or not. It was now about dusk, and while I was thus halting between two opinions, a good old man came up to me and said, 'Do you wish to obtain religion and serve the Lord?' 'Yes,' was my reply. 'Then do you desire the people of God to pray for you?' I told him that was my desire. He then led me into the prayer-meeting. The old man prayed for me, and exhorted me to believe in the name of the Lord Jesus, to trust in the atonement of him who gave himself a ransom for sinners; for Indians as well as for white people. Several of the ministers prayed for me. I prayed for myself, and at first my heart was soft and tender; but, strange to say, some time after it became hard as a stone. I tried to look up, but the heavens seemed like brass. I then began to say to myself, There is no mercy for poor Indians. I felt myself an outcast—a sinner bound for hell. A sister, who had obtained peace in believing, comforted me in my despondency. She came to me, wept over me, and exhorted me to give my heart to God, and told me how she had found the Lord. Her words came with power to my sinking heart, and I fell upon my knees and called upon God for mercy. My sister and others prayed for me, especially Mr. Stoney, whose zeal for my salvation I shall never forget. At the dawning of the day I was enabled to cast myself wholly on the Lord, and to claim an interest in the atoning blood of my Saviour, Jesus Christ, who bore my sins in his own body on the tree; and when I received him unspeakable joy filled my heart, and I could say, 'Abba, Father.' The love of God being now shed abroad in my heart, I loved him intensely, and praised him in the midst of the people. Everything now appeared to me in a new light, and all the works of God seemed to unite with me in uttering the praises of the Lord. There was a time when I thought the white man's God was never intended to be our God; that the white man's religion was never intended to be the red man's religion; that the Great Spirit gave us our way, and that it would be wrong to put away that mode of worship, and take to the white man's. But I and my people now found that there was but one true religion, and that the true religion is the religion of the Bible. Christianity has found us, and has lifted us up out of a horrible pit, and out of the miry clay; it has placed our feet upon a rock; it has established our goings, and has put a new song into our mouths, even praise unto our God."

From that period he was in labours abundant amongst his Indian brethren. Solemnly set apart to the work of the ministry in 1833, for twenty-three years he went forth bearing precious seed. Hundreds of pagan idolaters were, through his instrumentality, turned from the worship of idols and brought into the fold of the good Shepherd; and when brought were watched over by him with unceasing vigilance and tender solicitude. On the conversion of sinners under his ministry he evinced the deepest emotion, and rejoiced over them as one who had found great spoil. Not satisfied with holding a certain number of religious services, he longed to see the end of all preaching answered in the salvation of those who heard him, and in the "building up of believers in their most holy faith." Upon him rested from the commencement of his ministry the care of the Indian Churches. His position as a Christian pastor and a ruling chief of his tribe, gave him great influence not only among his own people, but among all the tribes of the Ojebway nation, with whom he had an opportunity of holding personal intercourse. Though after his conversion he obtained a fair English education, and had made no inconsiderable progress in mental culture through English studies, his whole intellect and demeanour were essentially Indian; and it was his being so striking a representative of the Indian, transformed and elevated by the influence of Christianity, that gave him his hold over the wise and good of his own and other lands. His still and sombre countenance when in a state of repose; or the flashes of his dark and lustrous eye when kindled by any incident or feeling, brought vividly before the imagination, as one who knew him remarked, what tale or history had told of the solemn and stately manners, the freedom and unshackled fortitude, and the once tameless spirit of the man of the wilderness.

This dignified representation in his person of a once numerous people was his element of power, in his missions to the United States and to this country, in pleading the spiritual interests of his countrymen. The audiences that listened to his pleadings saw in him the worth of the race for whom he pleaded. They were made to feel they owed a return to the remnants of a noble people, who had been stript by the rude invasion of former times of their lands and liberties. Their sympathies and their charities flowed forth to the Indian orator; and through the offerings presented on these occasions, he obtained the means of originating and sustaining some of the best schools and churches, which are even now exercising a beneficial influence over the destiny of the red man in the wilderness. Clearness, simplicity, and pathos marked these appeals from the pulpit and the platform of the Ojebway chief, and no one listened without the conviction that he spoke the truth in love. His audiences were moved from his own simple, impassioned earnestness. So great was his influence amongst the Christian settlements of his countrymen, that even their passion for fire-water yielded to his persuasive entreaties. He knew, from the impulsive character of his brethren, that there was no safety for them but in entire abstinence. Strong drink had been the scourge of his race. It was an enemy entitled to receive no quarter at his hand, and he gave it none. Amongst other instances recorded of the success of his temperance labours, it is told that shortly after the work of God commenced among the Indians of Schoogag Lake, an Indian trader brought a barrel of whisky to sell to them. The Indians requested him to take it away, as they were resolved not to purchase any. He persisted in offering it. The Christian Indians then went in a body to the trader, and demanded the barrel, which he reluctantly delivered. They rolled it to the lake, cut a hole through the ice, into which they tumbled it, sinking it to the bottom. When four Indians from Muncy Town, who had gone to an adjoining white settlement to trade, were tempted to drink, they resisted with like decision, replying to the trader who tempted them, that they were Christians. Finding he could not succeed, he thought their abstinence was from fear, lest some one should see them drink and tell the missionary; and that if they could take it slyly, they would drink as formerly. Knowing the road by which they should return home, he put a small keg of whisky by the side of the Indian path, at the edge of a sloping bank, and hid himself in the bushes beneath, thinking to enjoy the sport of seeing them drink when alone. As they came along, following in Indian file, suddenly the first one stopped, and exclaimed, "Lo! the evil spirit is here!" The second, on coming up, said, "Yes, me smell him." The third shook the keg with his foot, exclaiming, "Of a truth me hear him." The fourth Indian coming up, gave the keg a kick, and away went the fire-water tumbling down the hill—the Indians, as they proceeded on their way, leaving the mortified white heathen to take up his keg and drink "the evil spirit himself."

That the influence was great that accomplished so entire a revolution in Indian habit may be judged from many current tales in Canada, of the resistless attractions of strong drink to the natives. The exclamation of the Indian, after taking a dram of fire-water, is well known—"Oh that my throat were two miles long, that I might have tasted it all the way it went down." The following is a less familiarly known incident, illustrating the same intensity of desire, and of the quickness characteristic of the red man. An Indian having begged from an agent at Mackinac a dram of fire-water, the agent refused, adding, he never gave drunken Indians any drams.

"But me," replied the Indian, "very good Indian."

"But good Indians," answered the agent, "never ask for drams. It is only bad ones that get drunk and ask for whisky."

"Den," replied the Indian, "me be very bad rascal."

Indeed, so well known to the fur trader was the passion of the poor Indian for drink, that he used it as his common device for spoiling him of a just return for his hunting toils. On arriving at a trading-post with his pack of skins, the Indian was wont to begin by asking a fair price for his peltries. The trader, knowing where his weakness lay, appeared indifferent about closing the bargain, and treated him with some rum. No sooner had the Indian tasted the fire-water, than his thirst becoming insatiable, the trader, by a little manoeuvring, got all the skins he wished at his own price.

It is pleasant to be told by one so accurately informed as Mr. Jones, in the relation subsisting between the white and the red man of North America, that the companies now pursuing the fur trade have abolished the fire-water as an article of traffic, and that many of the factors are now taking an active part in assisting the missionary to civilize and Christianize the Indians within the bounds of their territories. Still, it is the earnestly-expressed desire of this lover of his brethren that fur companies and fur traders should come to an end. "Desirous," he remarks, "of the welfare of our Christian Indians, I have often longed for the time when the game and fur shall be so destroyed as to leave no inducement for them abandoning their farms and houses. No one acquainted with the hunting propensities of the Indians will deny that the little game now left is a source of injury rather than of benefit to them. It induces them to leave their homes, and fosters indolent and lounging habits. So long as they depend upon this precarious mode of subsistence they must continue in wretchedness and want. The sooner, therefore, they abandon hunting the better. They will then, from necessity, be compelled to devote their attention to the more primitive, healthy, and profitable employment of man, and become tillers of the ground."

For the last six years of Mr. Jones' life, he was called to exemplify in patience the gospel which his apostolic labours and active obedience had commended to his countrymen during more than twenty years. A constitution never vigorous, though his frame was broad and athletic, yielded to excessive exposures, colds, and fevers. So severe and repeated were his attacks that his life was despaired of in the spring of 1850; but the prayers of his faithful Indian children were at that time heard for the prolongation of his days. On his recovery, his remark to a friend was, "The prayers of the good people have kept me out of heaven." The delay, however, was but for a brief season, and that he might taste something more of heaven on earth before he entered it, and that he might enter into a fuller joy.

On a visit after this time to New York he experienced a great deepening of the work of grace on his heart—a fresh baptism of the Holy Spirit. The means of this enlargement was his attendance at meetings held at the time for prayer for greater holiness of heart. Writing to his wife he says, "My soul has been greatly blessed. My heart is full of Jesus. Little did I think when I came to this bustling city that I was going to obtain such a baptism from above. Continue to pray for me, that I may retain this simple power to believe what God has promised in his holy word." It was a baptism in preparation for the trials and conflict that lay so near him. When his last illness approached, he could say, "Not a wave of trouble has crossed my breast; I feel resting on the Rock of Ages." On that occasion many friends came from day to day to see him, to each of whom he addressed a few appropriate words. When the Indians of the New Credit Settlement repaired to see their dying chief and apostle, in the gratitude and sorrow of their hearts they proposed, at their own expense, to despatch a messenger to Rice Lake for a noted Indian doctor; and they assembled several times a day in an adjoining room, where they prayed, and sang, and wept aloud. His last audible words were a prayer for his Indian brethren that they might be saved.

A life so nobly spent, and closing in a death of Christian peace and hope, is a triumph of grace. It is a testimony, that cannot be gainsayed, to the gospel as the power of God to every one that believeth—to the Indian Gentiles of Canada—to the Gentiles of the world.

MOSES AND BALAAM—A LIKENESS AND A CONTRAST.

BY THE REV. W. G. BLAIR.

It is singular how often great men, destined to become great antagonists, come into the world together. Luther, the main-spring of the Reformation, and Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits were born in the same year. So were the Emperor Napoleon and the Duke of Wellington. So also, if we remember rightly, were Wesley and Voltaire. At a much earlier period of history, we find, in the persons of Moses and Balaam, a striking instance of the same fact, to which it may be well to call attention, as it has not, so far as we know, been pointed out before. It is not likely that these two remarkable men were born in the same year, but they lived in the same period, and their earthly careers ended almost together. At first, Moses and Balaam were like each other in many respects. At the beginning of their respective careers, it would have been difficult for a man of sagacity to foretell the remarkable contrast they were to present. Like two race horses, rejoicing in their pre-eminent strength and spirit, they seemed equally likely to excel. The difference in their actual careers was due chiefly to the opposite principles by which they were guided. The one was a man of faith, lived for the unseen, and followed the Lord fully. The other was a man of sight, lived for the present, and would fain have served God, but with his heart bent on present advantage, he could not. The lesson resulting from their opposite careers and ends is very striking. Nothing could show more strongly the difference between serving God alone, and trying to serve God and mammon together, or the necessity, especially on the part of the young, setting out on the work of life, of a deliberate, resolute, inflexible choice between them.

Let us study the parallel for a little.

1. Both Moses and Balaam were men of remarkable talent and learning, and had the best opportunities of cultivating and improving their powers of mind. The one was born and bred in Egypt, the other in Chaldea. Egypt and Chaldea were then the two great centres of the world's learning and culture. Whatever learning their respective countries could give, Moses and Balaam appear to have mastered. Both, too, were men of the kingly order,—“kings of men” in Homer's sense; men of commanding power, that could leave their mark in their generation, distance all rivals, and become the foremost men of their day. Balaam's fame, in his particular walk, had spread to countries as distant as Moab and the Midian desert; and Moses, even before his divine call, was “mighty in word and deed.”

2. Both were well instructed in the knowledge of the true God. And both seem to have reached and clung to that truth, in spite of great difficulties and temptations. Moses, instructed by the Egyptian priesthood, would find it no easy matter to exalt the One God of whom his mother had told him, above Isis, and Osiris, and the countless other deities of Egypt. Balaam, surrounded by the temples of Bel, and the other gods and goddesses of Chaldea, might have been expected to grow up in utter ignorance of the true God. It is indeed a very remarkable circumstance that Balaam attained that knowledge of God which he possessed. Perhaps in the land of Abraham and of Laban there still lingered some traces of the knowledge of God, which Balaam had the sagacity to appreciate and lay hold of. More likely, the fame of God's doings in Egypt and in the Red Sea and the wilderness, had reached his ears, and impressed him with the belief that Jehovah was the greatest and the strongest of all the gods. In any case, it is very remarkable that Balaam should have come to know God so well. How came he, in a matter where the wise men of the world are usually so blind, to show such quick-sighted discernment? What was it in him that supplied the place of that divine teaching which enlightened Moses? The only answer we can give is not creditable to Balaam. It seems to have been pure worldly interest that sharpened his discernment, and led him to grasp, in a sense and in a measure so peculiar to himself, the truth about God. His profession was that of a sooth-sayer or enchanter, and as such, he would be ever on the out-look for the most powerful spirit, in whose name, and under whose auspices he could carry on his business. When he heard of the mighty deeds of Jehovah, he seems to have had a strong conviction that of all such spirits, He was by far the most powerful. The echo of the song of Moses probably rung in his ears, “Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders.” The last expression would make a great impression on Balaam. He resolved to attach himself to this wonder-working God. He diligently endeavoured to learn all that he could learn about him. He resolved to make use of his name, as the most powerful he knew, for spreading his curses, wherever these were sought and paid for. Probably he even sought communion with Jehovah, prayed to him, thought of him as a living, real being, and expressed his thoughts and wishes to him. In one respect, too, his knowledge of the true God had a beneficial effect. He was most unwilling to disobey God openly, unwilling to quarrel with him, or turn him into an enemy. In a sense, he spoke truly and honestly when he said to the messengers from the king of Moab, “If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God, to do less or more."

But all this was done by Balaam very much as a matter of commercial speculation. It was all in the way of business. He took to godliness as the road to gain. The great aim of his life was to obtain power, fame, and wealth in his occupation as a soothsayer. That was really the god before whom he fell down and worshipped. In these respects, he is represented in modern times by those who make a religious profession from finding it useful in advancing their worldly interests. The vileness of the prostitution of what is most holy and glorious to the wretched ends of worldly gain, is one of the lessons most clearly taught in the life of Balaam. We can seldom think of him without recalling the unconscious confession of a sanctioning undertaker, mentioned by a celebrated writer, who, to a remark on the gloomy nature of his duties, complacently replied, that "he found these opportunities extremely profitable."

How different from this was Moses! In what a vastly different light did he view the true God, and to what different purposes did he turn his knowledge. In his case, there was real spiritual insight into the essential glory and infinite beauty of God; there was true devotion to him, and full satisfaction in him. God was prized and loved for his own sake, not for the worldly advantage which his service might bring. The exclamation, "Who is like unto Thee among the gods?" was not drawn out merely by his wonder-working power, it was still more due to the fact that He was so "glorious in holiness." The stuff that martyrs are made of thus appeared in Moses. The ring of true metal was in him. A man with such convictions, we may be sure, will surrender everything, and suffer anything, rather than forfeit his portion in God.

3. We are now prepared for a more striking contrast, arising out of another resemblance in the life and character of the two men. The decisive trial that determined once for all the character of Moses and Balaam was nearly the same. The manner in which each acted in reference to it, was entirely opposite. Each of them was tempted with the riches and honours of the world, and called to choose between God and mammon. Moses renounced the world, Balaam clung to it. Moses gave it up, with all its riches, pleasures, and honours, left them when he was surrounded by them. Balaam went thirsting after them, ready to do anything for them, short of direct disobedience to God, when he was offered them by King Balak. Both were called to fight the same battle, but the one was a noble conqueror, the other was ingloriously defeated. There is something, too, exceedingly instructive in the decision of the one, and the indecision of the other. Moses seems to have made up his mind firmly and conclusively, and never wavered. Balaam exhibits the pitiable spectacle of a man tossed like a football, between his wishes and his fears, "willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,"— hungry, voracious for the rewards of divination, but terrified to give mortal offence to the Being on whom he felt that he was dependant. Nothing can exceed the simple dignity of the story of Moses' great sacrifice and victory: "By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt, for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward. By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king, for he endured as seeing him who is invisible." Contrast this with the story of Balaam's wavering; now assuming a position of high integrity, and next day scheming for the treasure he had but yesterday renounced; moving with Balak from height to height in the hope that God would somehow withdraw the interdict against his cursing Israel; then finally plotting, by means of an odious temptation, so to entice the Israelites, that in spite of himself, as it were, their God should be constrained to curse them. The sight of any man wavering between interest and duty, between God and mammon, is a pitiable one; that of a strong man is intensely so. Who should hesitate between the two examples—Moses and Balaam? Even if you leave out of view the ending of the two careers, is not the very contrast between the simple dignity and comfort of the one, and the painful doubtings and writhings of the other enough to determine your choice? What a world of misery is saved by a decided choice in early life—a resolute purpose to take the Lord's side—to steer by the grand rule—"Not my will, but thine be done!"

4. Moses and Balaam had both a strong persuasion of the blessedness of the people of God; but while the one admired, and kept aloof, nay, even sought to turn their blessing into a curse, the other joined their communion, though at the sacrifice of every worldly advantage. Balaam could not withhold his admiration of the encampment of Israel, nor his desire, at death, to be numbered with the righteous. Hardly any verses that Moses ever wrote are more beautiful than the inspired gushings of his brother-poet—

"How shall I curse whom God hath not cursed,
Or how shall I defy whom the Lord hath not defied?
For from the top of rocks I see him,
And from the hills I behold him.
Lo, the people shall dwell alone,
And shall not be reckoned among the nations.
Who can count the dust of Jacob?
And the number of the fourth part of Israel
Let me die the death of the righteous,
And let my last end be like his!"

And again:

"How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob,
And thy tabernacles, O Israel!
As the valleys are they spread forth,
As gardens by the river's side;
As the trees of lign aloes, which the Lord hath planted
As cedar trees beside the waters."

Why then, if it be so, do you not join them, Balaam!

Why not apply for the privilege which Moses freely offered Hobab, "We are journeying to the land of which the Lord hath spoken to us—come thou with us, and we will show thee good." Answer honestly. Is it not because you cannot bring your mind to forego Balak's rewards and honours? Your heart clings to the world—you cannot forego its good things, you cannot be satisfied with the humble lot of a humble Israelite. What a contrast to Moses! Whence that noble recklessness with which he flings from him Egypt's choicest gifts? It springs from faith's conviction that a child's lot, however poor, is better than all an alien's treasures—that all earth's richest prizes are less than nothing to the dew of that glorious blessing:—"The Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord lift the light of his countenance upon thee and be gracious to thee; the Lord make his face to shine on thee and give thee peace!" Let the history tell which of the two—Moses or Balaam—abandoned the substance to grasp the shadow.

5. Moses and Balaam had each the honour to receive very remarkable communications from God, but differed utterly in the use to which they turned them. It is one of the remarkable things about Balaam, that God condescended to give him real visions from heaven. Evidently he began his career as a heathen conjuror, and followed his art as a soothsayer usually did in those times; what amount of intercourse he held with Satan, or with any other spiritual agent, is a question that cannot be answered; what exactly was the nature of his art it is also very difficult to tell; but it is certain that it was an art, that it had rules and methods that made those familiar with them very powerful for evil; and that it was an abominable art, deeply demoralizing, so much so, that God gave the Israelites the stern command, "There shall not be found among you any one that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer; for all that do these things are an abomination to the Lord." Notwithstanding, it pleased God to hold real communications with this man, to ask him questions, to hear his answers, to give him instructions, to show him visions, to reveal to him the future, and even to give him a glimpse of the Messiah—the star that was to come out of Jacob, the sceptre that should rise out of Israel. This was another testing-point in Balaam's career. When at last, after long working with the vile tricks of magic, and villainous consultations of we know not what kind, with unseen powers of evil,—when at last the true light shone on him, and God permitted him a glimpse of futurity in his pure ray—should we not have expected that he would say to himself, "Now, thank God, I have got the true light! I shall walk no more in the light of my own fire, or in the sparks that I have kindled. I shall sweep away these vile magic arts. I shall follow the sure guidance of the day-star from on high!" But in this ordeal too, Balaam proved faithless. After all his heavenly visions, we read of his continuing "to use enchantments." He could not trust God in this matter, any more than in the other. God's light might be the purer light, but it was not so profitable. It would not pay. He could not make up his mind to abandon a profession that was so lucrative. That was the root of bitterness that sprang up and troubled him. That was the worm that died not, the fire that was not quenched. What a contrast again to Moses! Never bargaining for any personal honour—ever willing to renounce self, and every selfish interest for the good of his people, rejoicing in the bright vision of "the prophet like unto Moses" that was to arise, in distant days; thankful himself for the light from heaven that guided him, and ever concerned that his people should follow its safe and blessed track.

Balaam's history shows us most impressively with what a terrible force worldly interest and inclination may drag a man in opposition to God. It warns us on the one hand, of the awful risk of letting the love of the world grow to commanding power—of acting silently on the principle that the first thing to be considered in all bargains is profit. It teaches, at the same time, the blessedness of a choice, early, firm, unflinching; of making up the mind not only to follow Christ, but to follow him fully; to cast overboard whatever he does not approve; to spend time, money, everything as under his inspection; to choose only such friends as he would allow. He that truly sees the glory of Christ will not grudge this entire surrender. The Psalmist's words will be true of him, in all their depth of meaning, "I AM THINE."

CHAPTER V.

THE BETTER BREAD WINS THE PRIZE—TWO SHOPS AND NO OPPOSITION.

THE next morning, Frederic brought the money to the landlord. He was not a little astonished when he learned how he had come by it.

"He is a noble man," said he.

"Yes, he is," added Frederic, "and, sir, he is better than both of us. We have shamefully wronged that man. We have committed a great sin against God and that man, sir. I have acted the part of a mean traitor. I have, as an ungrateful and unconscious villain, conspired with you to ruin that good man, whom you hated because of his righteousness, and whom I envied because of the prosperity God blessed him with. And had God taken me away in my illness, I should have been for ever lost, sir, and it would have been better for me if a mill-stone had been tied round my neck, and I had been cast into the sea. And now, here is the money which that man has gained for me in the sweat of his brow. I give it you because it is your property according to the contract between you and me. But it burns like molten lead in my fingers, sir, and so it must in yours, for it is the wages of our iniquity, and every coin of it should spring up into our face, for this money, together with all the money I have given you already, from the beginning of my business, is the harvest of our wickedness, gathered from a field which we have moistened with the sweat and tears of that good man and his family. And how has he revenged himself? He has moistened my parching lips when I was about to die from thirst at the brink of the grave, and his daughter has nursed me in my sickness, as if I were her own father, and his wife has stood by the sick-bed of my Jane as a loving sister, while he, day and night, was labouring hard to support us, as if we, all of us, were his children. Oh, oh, what a monster I am! that I ever could lift up my heel against that man! Where shall I go to hide myself? The world is too narrow for me. My shame burns like a fire within me, and my conscience haunts me like a phantom.'

"Under the weight of his remorse, Frederic sank down on a chair, burying his face in his hands. The landlord stared at him aghast, as if a thunderbolt had struck him. His conscience, too, awoke with a terrible shock. He felt that all that Frederic had said was true. Yet he ventured one objection, to soften down, if possible, the vehemence of his self-reproach.

"But why did he turn the whole village upside down, by his praying and preaching?" said he, 'we were such intimate friends before that.'

"And what harm was there in his praying and preaching?" answered Frederic. 'Can you continue finding fault with him because of that, even after such heavy judgments of God as our village has been visited with? I have been lying in the sight of death, sir, and I have learned there terrible things. Whatever may be the effect which the rod of the Lord has produced upon this unhappy people, it has fully convinced me that the baker is right, and that all who oppose him are aggravating their judgment in the day to come. Yes, he is right, when he tells us that unless we be converted we shall surely perish. He has told you the same, and he has besought you to abandon your sinful ways, and to turn to a merciful Saviour, who was ready to receive you. But you became angry with him, because he attacked your idols, for you loved your sinful ways, because they yielded you profit for this life. Confess it now, sir. We, all of us, have sinned with you, and we know all about it. As long as the baker filled your tap-room with customers, you were his friend. But from the moment he filled the place of prayer with repenting sinners, you became his enemy.'

"The landlord bit his lips. A blush of anger flushed up his face.

"Frederic,' said he, looking at him with beaming eyes, 'do you know to whom you are speaking?'

"Yes, I do,' answered Frederic, 'and I am quite prepared to take all the consequences of it. And I'll tell you more. I have before God made up my mind not to rest, till that good man has taken my place, and till I am his servant as in former days.'

"What!' exclaimed the landlord, taking a step backward. He kept staring at Frederic, unable to find words equal to the impression which this unexpected communication had made upon him. But at this moment of critical silence, his own conscience again had an opportunity of speaking a word to his heart. Gradually his countenance changed. He cast down his eyes. A tear glistened between his eye-lashes. Then approaching Frederic, he held out his hand to him, and taking his with a spasmodic pressure: 'My friend,' he said, 'you are better than I. Go now, I will think the matter over.'

"That day was a day of great strife for the landlord of the 'Golden Plough.' The peace which the world had given him, and which he had so long supported by the violation of all his better convictions, was gone. The plague that had visited the village, and filled everybody's mind with thoughts of death and judgment, had shaken him also out of his slumber. He took a walk through the fields, and giving his thoughts free course, recalled all the past and pondered over the question, whether he could reasonably expect any good fruit from the field that was lying behind. Had he sown any seed which he was sure would ripen to the glory of God? Could he, if summoned before the judgment seat of a holy and omniscient God, point to any deed, any plan carried out, any scheme of his, whether domestic or social, on which he might hope that that Judge would smile with pleasure? Or, if practice had been deficient (and what man's practice is not! we all have our defects) could he remember any truly good thought of his, any truly good purpose or design risen up in his heart, and fostered for a moment with the honest intention of carrying it out for the true welfare of others, and to the praise of his Creator? Alas, no: he could not. Dealing honestly with himself now, he could not but confess that all he hitherto had thought and planned and carried out, had only tended towards the profit, the pleasure, and the glory of his own miserable self. If God were to ask him: 'What hast thou done for thyself?' his answer would be, 'Everything.' If God were to ask him, 'What hast thou done for me?' 'Nothing, nothing!' Ah, if it were but nothing! But it was worse than nothing. It was everything against God. He had prevented the course of God's word and work. He had persecuted God's servants. He had blasphemed God's name. How different his life's last ten years had been from those of the baker! He compared himself with his former friend. He fancied that man standing by his side at the tribunal of the heavenly Judge. What a different aspect he would exhibit! With what smiles of divine pleasure would his Master receive him at the close of a life spent in the service of his word, and in many bereavements and sufferings for his name sake. Alas, alas! The landlord found himself poor, and naked, and miserable, in the midst of all the desirable things he had heaped up round about himself. 'I must turn,' said he to himself, 'I must necessarily turn, if I desire to avoid the bottomless abyss. The baker's way is the right one, and I must walk in it. But how to get at it? Shall I go to him and beg his instruction? . . .

"He did not answer that question. He walked home in mournful silence. That night no sleep stole over the landlord's eyes.

"A few days later the baker held his usual Scripture reading meeting in his little cottage parlour. It was a dark night. The place was crammed, and, as usual, the windows were open. A tall stout person cautiously skulked through the shades of the evening along the wall of the cottage, and kept standing close to the open window. He could perfectly hear every word that was spoken inside. It was the baker's voice. He spoke about the two thieves hanging by the Saviour's side on the cross. He pointed at the stubborn perversity of the human heart as exhibited in the conduct of one of the thieves. He described the wonderful power of God's grace, as exemplified in the contrition and confession of the other. He called the attention of his hearers to the willingness, the readiness, the power of a loving Saviour to save even there where life has been but one continuous series of hatred, blasphemy, and wickedness. 'Now where such a Saviour is ours,' he concluded; 'there, my friends, we have reason to hope that sinners may turn to God still, even though years and tens of years lie behind them like so many fields covered with thistles and thorns. Let us not despair, though we have seemed to plough rocks for the last time. Conversion is not our work, but the Lord's. And now, we have again witnessed that it is equally easy to him to pluck an old sinner from the gate of hell, as a young one from the entrance of a bad way. Thus let us not cease to hope and to pray for our fellow-sinners in this village. Who can tell but that perhaps many of them will soon turn their faces to Jesus, and say, Lord, remember us! Oh what more is there required but this simple ejaculation rising up from a broken heart to a Redeemer for sinners bruised. We have heard it again, my friends, it can not truly be whispered into Jesus' ears, without at once opening his blessed lips for the joyful answer: To-day—yes, to-day—shalt thou be with me in paradise.'

"The baker then offered up prayer, in which he fervently entreated the Lord's grace upon the village. He prayed that the sins of the people might not be remembered, nor the fierce and stubborn enmity of some of them against the Lord's word and servants. He prayed that, for Christ's sake, God might not lay this sin to their charge, but give them a time of repentance, that they, like Paul, might, from persecutors of the Church, be turned into friends and allies, and fellow-labourers and defenders of the gospel in the sight of all the creature.

"Now while the baker was speaking and praying in that way, the person outside listened with such keen attention, that he had not observed the coming of another person, who kept standing close behind him, and, like him, was quite absorbed in devotion. 'Amen,' said the baker with a loud voice, concluding his prayer, and 'Amen,' repeated the last comer. His fellow-listener, who was standing before him, apparently a little startled by this unexpected company, turned round, and by the light from the window recognised Frederic.

"Is it you?" whispered he.

"And you!" returned Frederic. "God be praised, sir. Oh, if those inside knew that the landlord of the 'Golden Plough' was with them, kneeling at the feet of Jesus! Shall we not go in, sir?"

"No, by no means."

"I pray, sir, let us go in and give praise to God. Come along."

"Frederic took the landlord by the arm, and to his unspeakable joy, found that he allowed himself to be led into the house. A psalm was just being sung, and the crowd that had filled the passage was mostly gone. So they easily found their way to the door of the parlour. Picture to yourself the astonishment of the little congregation, and especially of the baker, when they noticed these two persons. The psalm was finished soon, and before the baker could offer the concluding short prayer Frederic proceeded onward, holding the landlord by the arm, and said, 'Dear friends, give glory to God. We come to give praise to the Lord in the midst of you.'

"Amen!" said the landlord, bursting into tears. 'Yes, my dear friends, the Lord has conquered us. Here we are, your enemies formerly, but your friends now. We have sinned against God and you, but we come to ask your pardon, as we have received it from Christ.'

"Is it possible?" exclaimed several voices, and a joyful confusion for a few moments prevailed amongst the congregation. The shock of the surprise threatened to be too heavy for some, and the baker wisely gave out another psalm to give time for recovery. Meanwhile he beckoned the landlord to step up to the little platform, and to take his place by his side. When the psalm was finished the landlord rose and in the simplicity of his heart told the audience how he was overpowered by the pressure of his conscience, to give up his opposition to God, and to bow down at the feet of Christ. 'I could no longer resist, my friends,' he concluded. 'I saw that this man, the baker, was doing the work of God, and that I was a servant of the devil. But God has had mercy upon me, and I have taken refuge under the wings of the only Saviour. God knows what fearful days and nights of despair and agony I have gone through. But I now am enabled with the thief to cry, Remember me! and I believe Jesus has said to me, To-day thou shalt be with me.'

"I shall not dwell upon the further proceedings of that remarkable evening. Suffice it to say that the next day the whole village knew that the landlord of the 'Golden Plough,' and Frederic, had turned Methodists. Many a one could not believe it, but soon every doubt was removed when the landlord sold his house and quitted his business. He bought a large house in another part of the village, and built a school-room in his garden, which, at the same time, was fit for holding religious meetings in the evening. Not less astonished were the villagers, when they saw the baker and his family removing to their old quarters, and resuming their former business. Two bakers' shops again were seen opposite, but not opposed to each other. The baker and Frederic entered into partnership, and the two shops belonged to one and the same firm. Most beneficial was the effect which this evidence of the power of the gospel produced upon the population. The baker regularly continued holding his Scripture reading meetings in the landlord's school-house, and the numerous attendance proved that he was gifted with the talent of preparing the spiritual bread as tastefully as the earthly.

"Thus this good man was for a number of years a blessing to the village, and a fertilizing fountain calling forth, under the agency of the Divine Spirit, flowers and fruits to the glory of God, where formerly nothing was seen but a barren wilderness. If now you were to pay a visit to the inhabitants of this place, you would find the Bible in most houses bearing marks of being the family instructor in the morning and the family comforter in the evening. Indeed, you would meet with a happy population ready to listen to a good word and willing to co-operate with their minister, the Rev. Mr. G—— in all that tends towards the spreading of the Gospel among old and young. I need not tell you that it was chiefly through the influence of the baker that Mr. G—— was called to this place, when the old minister took his pension. The two friends were permitted to enjoy each other's company for four years, during which they side by side laboured in the vineyard of their heavenly Master. It is only six weeks since a serious illness cast the baker on his last bed. It was not a sickbed, however, but the couch of a triumphant hero rejoicing in the victory he had won under his almighty and faithful Chief Captain, and longing for the glory he was destined for by the side of Him for whom he had lived and laboured and suffered.

"And now, sir," thus concluded the stranger, while we rose from the bench and again approached the simple grave, "you cannot wonder to have found me at this spot absorbed in a mixture of sadness, admiration and affection, nor can you accuse me of exaggeration, when I say, A good man is buried here; yes, a very good man indeed. There he lies now, resting from his labour, waiting for the day of his resurrection. It is a costly seed that is sown here, sir, and when once it breaks through the clod and rises up at the mighty word of Him who shall call the dead out of their graves, it will be something exceedingly beautiful and glorious that will come out of this dark chamber of death. For was he already so like his Master in this body out of dust and ashes, how like will he not be unto him in that future building, of which it is said that it will be fashioned like unto the glorious body of the first born of the dead!"

We still kept standing for a while in solemn silence by the grave, and then walked down the main path to the gate. The stranger here kindly bade me farewell to turn off a footpath that seemed to lead to a large house conspicuous at a distance.

"Pray, sir," said I, "forgive my indiscretion. May I ask whose company have I had the privilege of enjoying?"

"My name is Sandring," answered he, but among the villagers I am better known as the old landlord of the 'Golden Plough.'"

"Why, you?" exclaimed I, in great and joyful surprise. But he was gone, evidently speeding along to escape further questions. I, however, kept looking after him till his tall stout form disappeared in the distance. Then casting a last glimpse at him, I said, "And you also are a good man; yes, a very good man indeed."

August 1861.

THE FIRST THREE REVIVALS.

In three chapters in the Book of Acts—the second, the eighth, and the eleventh—we have three statements relating to very similar events: "The Lord added to the Church daily such as should be saved." "And there was great joy in that city." "The hand of the Lord was with them, and a great number believed and turned to the Lord." The passages refer to three different places in which, after the ascension of our Lord, there occurred in succession three very remarkable religious awakenings. The first place was Jerusalem, where the subjects of the revival were Jews, followers of Moses, either because they were literally of the seed of Abraham, or because they had been brought to see that the Hebrew was then the only true Church. The second place was Samaria, a city inhabited by a mixed race of people, with whom, on account of their impurity of blood and heresies of doctrine, the Jews would have no dealings. And the third place was Antioch, a town of Syria, where the great number who believed and turned to the Lord were Gentiles, heathens, representatives of that great outlying world which up to that moment had appeared even to the Christians a hopeless and inclaimable waste. The order of succession observed here is very noticeable. The ascended Saviour, in his first dealings with his Church, acted in the spirit of the charge which, ere leaving the world, he had given to his disciples. In pouring out those gracious influences which he had purchased by his death, he "began at Jerusalem;" but the limitation which had characterized his own personal ministry was not to be the rule for the ministry of his apostles. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," was the commission granted to them; and it was not long before the circle of his mercy was seen visibly expanding. First, the despised and excommunicated Samaritans were embraced within its sweep; and then, all barriers whatever being broken down, the catholic-minded among the Hebrews were able to say with joyful satisfaction, "Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life."

The course of a revival movement in a country—as all Church history, inspired and uninspired, tells us—is not like that of an evenly-flowing river, which, rising visibly from one spring, holds on its way unbroken to the sea. It is rather like a stream which has one definite enough fountain-head, but which, as it proceeds, is ever receiving fresh accessions to its volume from other springs which are opened by the way. The awakenings which took place at Samaria and Antioch were not merely the old waters from Jerusalem arriving in those cities. They were, in an important sense, the outbreaking of fresh streams, resulting from new outpourings of the Spirit. Still, while this is the case,—while those men mistake entirely the character of these movements who think they are extended in virtue of a merely natural excitement spreading from place to place (else why should not every district be affected alike?)—still, we say, it will generally be found that one spot may be singled out as the cradle of the revival, and that one particular awakening may be spoken of as the first, and in a sense as the source of the series. Thus it was, very evidently, with the period to which we are now referring. No one doubts that the great awakening of religious earnestness throughout the whole Roman empire in the days of the apostles was due, in the first instance, to that free and abundant effusion of the Holy Ghost which was given on the day of Pentecost, and which (it is well ever to remember) fell, to begin with, not on the world, but on the Church. From that ever-memorable upper chamber where the hundred and twenty believers were assembled praying, we trace the outgoing, as from a center, of all the blessed influences which, in the course of a generation or two, were to change the face of the Roman world. The new vital force with which the followers of the Crucified One were then and there endued was revealed first in the streets of Jerusalem, where three thousand souls were converted. The fire spread to Samaria, where Philip found such unexpected acceptance for his message. And by-and-by it broke out in Antioch, where a great multitude of the Grecians became obedient to the faith.

In trying, however, to discover the laws which determine the movements of the Spirit, we cannot but feel that we venture into a field in which mystery meets us on every side. The Spirit is like the wind, which "bloweth where it listeth;" and it is not for us to speak with confidence or assurance of the course which he may choose to take. But there is another side of the subject, of which we can speak without any hesitation; and that is, the question of the human means whereby a revival work is to be extended. In this connection it is very instructive to mark the history of the three awakenings now under notice. Of course, prayer preceded and pervaded the whole movement. No one is likely to overlook or forget the all-importance of that agency to begin with, who reads and realizes the history of the ten days which elapsed between the Ascension and the morning of the Pentecostal Sabbath. But following up that grand essential means, there was in every case—in Jerusalem, in Samaria, in Antioch—preaching: "Peter, standing up with the eleven, lifted up his voice and said unto them," &c.—"Then Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and preached to them."—"They which were scattered abroad travelled as far as Antioch, and spake unto the Grecians, preaching." But what was it they preached? Not themselves! not dead doctrine! They set forth a living Christ. We all know what Peter said, for his sermon is reported, and he who runs may read and see that it is full of Jesus. Respecting Philip it is expressly said, that he "preached Christ" to the Samaritans. And as for the emigrants for conscience' sake, it is said of them also, in so many words, that "they spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus." But further, who were the preachers? Why, evidently the men who had themselves in the first instance drunk deeply of the revival spirit. It is possible that not only Peter but Philip and those who were scattered abroad after the death of Stephen, were among the hundred and twenty on whom the Pentecostal shower fell in the upper chamber. It is at least certain that they all were partakers of the spiritual blessings which were dispensed so liberally afterwards. The fire then was in their hearts. Wherever they went they carried it along with them; and the words they spoke were not words made forcible simply by the power of reasoning or natural eloquence, but by the burning fervour with which they were sent forth from their very souls.

There are four delusions, in one or other of which men professing to be Christians have been able all their lifetime to live. The first is, that the world may be converted without much and earnest prayer. The second, that preaching, in the great business of establishing the kingdom, is of secondary importance. The third, that it is comparatively of very little moment whether or not in the pulpits of the Christian Church Christ is visibly set forth. And the fourth, that it is of little or no consequence that we have a converted and earnest ministry. That these are delusions, no believing reader of the Bible can possibly doubt. And it is only when we have been thoroughly wakened out of them, and have all begun to act under a different inspiration, that we shall see the truth spreading like a prairie fire, and promising to invest it soon as with a mantle of living light.

H. L. W.

STUDY.

FOR MINISTERS.

He can never preach well who has nothing to say. The all-important thing for a messenger is a message. Of all the ways of preaching God's word, the worst is the purely extemporaneous—where a man arises to speak in God's name without any solid material, and without any studious preparation. A thousand-fold better were it to read every word of an instructive discourse, in the most slavish and uncouth manner, than to vapour in airy nothings, with suavity of mien, fluency of utterance, and outward grace of elocution. It is this which has become the opprobrium of extempore preachers; and it must be admitted that the danger is imminent. As all men dislike labour in itself considered, the majority will perform any task in the easiest way which is acceptable. And as most hearers unfortunately judge more by external than internal qualities, they will be, for a certain time, satisfied with this ready but superficial preaching. The resulting fact is, that in numberless instances, the extemporaneous preacher neglects his preparation. If he has begun this slovenly way while still young, and before he has laid up stores of knowledge, he will in nine cases out of ten, be a shallow, rambling sermonizer as long as he lives. Immense gymnastic action and fearful vociferation will probably be brought in to eke out the want of theology, as a garrison substitute of ball, will be likely to make unusual pother with blank cartridge.

Omitting, for the moment, the unfaithfulness of such a ministry, the man who thus errs will find the evil consequences rebound upon himself. It is only for a time the most injudicious or partial congregation can be held by indigested and unsubstantial matter, however gracefully delivered. They may not trace it to the right cause, but they know that they are wearied, if not disgusted. The minister, having rung all the changes on his very small peal of bells, has nothing for it but to repeat the old chimes.

Another inevitable result of unstudied preaching is the habit of wandering or scattering. Nothing but laborious discipline, unintermitted through life, can enable a man to stick logically to his line of argument. Discerning hearers know better than the preacher, why, after stating his point, he constantly plays about it like a boat in an eddy, which moves but makes no progress. "Skeletons," as they are ludicrously called, however good, do not prevent this evil, unless they be afterwards thought out to their remotest articulations. The idle, but voluble speaker, will flutter about his first heap, and flutter about his second, but will mark no ratiocinative connection, and effect no fruitful deduction. Evidently he who is continually pouring out, and but scanty pouring in, must soon be at the empty bottom.

Ministerial study is a sine qua non of success. It is absurdly useless to talk of methods of preaching, where there is no method of preparation. Ministerial study is twofold—special and general. By special study, I mean that preparation for a given sermon, which is analogous to the lawyer's preparation of the case. If faithful and thorough, this may lead to high accomplishment; but, as in the instance of case lawyers, it may be carried too far, and if exclusively followed must become narrowing. The man who grows old with no studies but those which terminate upon the several demands of the pulpit, becomes a mannerist, falls into monotony of thought, and ends stiffly, drily, and wearisomely. At the same time, he wants that enlargement and enriching of mind derived from wide excursions into collateral studies, of which all the world recognises the fruits in such preachers as Owen, Mason, Chalmers, and Hall. Yet even this inferior way of study into which busy and overtaken men are prone to alide, is infinitely better than the way of idleness, oscitancy, and indecent haste. For thus the student who begins betimes, manages to pick up a great deal more than is necessary for his special task. In premeditating one sermon, he often finds hints for three more. By tunnelling into the rock of a single prophetic passage, he comes upon gems of illustration, nuggets of doctrine, and cool springs of experience, all which goes into the general stock. Yet no wise student will restrict himself to the lucubration asked by next Sabbath's sermon.

By general study I mean that preparation which a liberal mind is perpetually making, by reading, writing, and thinking, over and above the sermonizing, and without any direct reference to preaching. Such studies do indeed pour in their contributions to every future discourse with a continually increasing tide; but this is not seen at once, nor is this the proximate aim. No man can make full use of his talent, who does not all his life pursue a high track of generous reading, and inquiry.—Dr. J. W. Alexander.

FRAGMENTS.

Who does not see the difference between a man pleading for another, and a head pleading for its own members? It is for himself. Jesus pleads for his own members; for his Church, as one with his Church.

Not only to tell him of our wants—that is but half prayer; but to speak to him of his promises, to rest ourselves in his Word.

Jesus is called the "arm of the Lord." He is his working arm, his upholding arm, the arm which dispenses all his blessings. How blessed to have this arm to lean upon! still more blessed to know that this arm is beneath us—still more blessed to find his arm around us, clasping us to his bosom, and saying, "This is my beloved, in whom I too am well pleased."

MAY we approach Thee with the confidence of those who know Thee, and the diffidence of those who know themselves!

I WOULD wish you to have that religion which makes conscience of a word, a look, a tone of voice!

"I HOPE God will give it me; I trust he will." Knock, seek, ask. Give him no rest; that is the divinity of our gospel: the other is the divinity of the sluggard. Did you ever know one holding such a creed healthy? Never.

DR. BUSHNELL'S WRITINGS.

THE writings of Dr. Bushnell have of late obtained a great degree of popularity in some parts of this country. They have been circulated under influential recommendation, and extensively read. We are inclined to think that in many quarters the teaching of these works is not clearly understood, and we intend to offer a few remarks on some of the features by which they are characterized, and on the kind of influence which they seem fitted to exert. The propriety of doing so might be vindicated on the ground that Dr. Bushnell's works are able and interesting specimens of one large section of popular Christian literature, and serve to indicate the general tone of much that lies on the counters of our booksellers' shops. But, apart from this consideration, Dr. Bushnell has written so much, and in many respects so well, that no apology is needed for singling him out, and weighing the merits of his volumes, as in themselves a sufficient pièce de résistance.

It is a pleasure to begin by acknowledging the attractions which these works possess, considered as popular treatises on Christian topics. It would hardly be consistent with the objects which ought to be kept in view in a periodical like ours, to linger long on those things which concern only the literary form. But we cannot omit a tribute to the eminent readableness of every one of the works, and to the success with which Dr. Bushnell always carries us over the ground which he sees fit to traverse. This is due, in part, to clear writing. The general idea of a discourse, or of an argument, may sometimes be vague enough; but the obscurity does not affect the meaning of the separate sentences, each of which rings clear, and stamps some definite impression on the mind, with sensuous, picturesque phraseology. Still more, however, is the readableness of this writer due to the uncommon freshness of his mind, and the vigorous cast of his conceptions. Whatever he has to say is said, often gracefully, sometimes happily, never in a commonplace manner, nor as ordinary people would say it. Indeed, one is half-amused, half-tantalized, to find how frequently what seems a new thought, or almost a new truth, turns out to be an old friend, new minted, with so bright a face and sharp an edge, that one only recognizes it after a long and earnest look. The power of thinking and expressing himself in this way is a pulpit gift of high value, and must give a peculiar charm to Dr. Bushnell's ministrations. It has undoubtedly done very much for the circulation of his works, notwithstanding frequent Americanisms, which, to an English ear, have an indescribably lowering effect upon the style, and notwithstanding the exaggerations of expression and sentiment which too often suggest the idea of aiming at a sensation.

Besides these advantages, which are more of the nature of accessories, Dr. Bushnell is possessed of substantial qualities, both mental and moral, which amply account for the popularity of his writings. Though not of the most comprehensive order, his mind is sufficiently able, vigorous, and intrepid to secure attention for him as a thinker. And he aims so steadily and earnestly at the elevation of Christian character and Christian life, that his readers willingly yield him a tribute of respect and regard. Add to all this the strength of conviction out of which he speaks, and the frequently recurring evidence of regard to the Lord Jesus, in which he would have all his own and all his readers' convictions rooted; and it is easy to explain the currency which his writings have obtained, and easy to understand that they must contain many suggestive thoughts, and many pleasing, many touching, many arousing views of truth and duty. We have ourselves accordingly more than once transferred to our own pages passages from Dr. Bushnell's writings. We shall find it necessary to take exception, and that seriously, to some elements of Dr. Bushnell's teaching. Indeed, if we had no exceptions, or only slight exceptions to take, there would have been no reason for our devoting to his writings an extended notice like the present. But we should be sorry to seem insensible to his many brilliant qualities. It is really because we fully admit his merits, that we feel constrained to put our readers on their guard. Writings less earnest and attractive might safely be left to their natural obscurity.

The works of Dr. Bushnell which have been most circulated among us are those on "The New Life," on "Christian Nurture," and the fragment on "The Character of Christ." A more extensive treatise on "Nature and the Supernatural," we intentionally set aside. Though eminently open to criticism, yet as it discusses the philosophy of religion, we do not judge it profitable to consider it here. To save space, we shall confine our remarks chiefly to the first, which is on all accounts the most important. We cannot, however, pass by the third,—that on the Character of Christ,—without acknowledging its great beauty, and the felicity and force with which the argument is sustained. It is not wholly free from traces of a system which we regard as defective. But when considered, as it ought to be, as an apologetic treatise, an argument against infidelity, ex concessis, the general scope of the volume is worthy of all praise, and no one can peruse it without reaping pleasure and profit in a very high degree. We regret that we cannot pass a verdict so unqualified on all the works of Dr. Bushnell.

It may be expedient to introduce what we have to say in the way of criticism, by removing a presumption in Dr.

Bushnell's favour, which may exist in the minds of some of our readers. It is a presumption arising from the degree in which many persons (and those of evangelical sympathies) find his works attractive, and edifying too. They find in these works a great deal with which they can cordially sympathize; and a great deal also which seems to give them light and help in regard to Christian duty and Christian privilege. They have not remarked, in the course of perusal, anything that offended them: at most, perhaps, an occasional address and novelty in the way in which certain departments of doctrine are contemplated. They may be disposed, therefore, to repel beforehand all exceptions and censures, as probably unreasonable and hypercritical.

But it is not at all difficult to explain how works may prove attractive, and may even contribute to the edification of Christians, against which they yet require to be put on their guard, as unsafe guides. It has in the present day become habitual with a large class of thinkers and writers (many of whom are even less evangelical in sentiment than Dr. Bushnell) to admit to a large extent the fallen and degraded state of human nature as it now exists; the necessity for its being raised again to a state of freedom and of love; and the peculiar place and power which are to be ascribed to the Lord Jesus Christ, as at once the model or specimen of that perfect goodness from which we have fallen, and the source from which the regeneration of men must proceed. At the same time they have no place in their minds for the proper judicial character of God; for the doctrine of the guilt of human sin as deserving divine wrath; nor for the doctrine of the atonement, in any such sense of it as it has in all the articles and confessions of Christendom. These doctrines, and others that depend on these, they either oppose, or pass by as antiquated theologoumena which had best be allowed to die. And as a matter of course, the principles which lead them to reject all this, give a corresponding cast and turn to all the remaining articles of their system. We are not giving this as an account of Dr. Bushnell's theology. It would be rather too sweeping and general a statement for that. We are, however, immediately to show the degree in which, as we believe, Dr. Bushnell's views approximate to this scheme. But what we now say is, that even those who hold it in its most developed form, may and do succeed in handling some Christian topics in a way which will secure the admiration of all Christians. They may bring out much truth with effect, both about the degradation of a state of sin, and about the glory of a pure and renovated life. Their system leads them to bestow especial pains in illustrating the just influence on human feeling and action, of the divine dispensations in providence and grace. In connection with this they often throw light upon the mechanism of human motives, in connection with temptation on the one hand and holy influences on the other, so as to make to men an instructive exhibition of the working of their own human hearts. And all this, in the case of many of them, is warmed and lighted up by much loving commendation of Christ, as the revealer and author of salvation, as the life of every man who ever truly lives at all. Now let the person who devotes himself to these topics be, like Dr. Bushnell, a person of warm feelings, having strong sympathy with and insight into human life and its conflicts; let him be one who is in contact with a world of religious thought and religious life, of which the theology is firmer and richer than his own; let him be one whose system is not so clear nor so rigid, as to save him from occasional happy inconsistencies; or, at least, whose language, without any conscious insincerity on his part, slides often into the grooves of the speech distinctively styled evangelical; let him be one who has a large and intelligent acquaintance with that style of religious experience which we may call puritan, who respects it as real and valid, but imagines that in its substance it may consist with his own theological scheme, and be realized on that scheme as a groundwork; let him be such a man as this, and it is no wonder if he interests and instructs his readers. It is no wonder if his language appeals so often and so familiarly to the associations and experience of more orthodox Christians as to secure a confiding welcome for the writer and the writings. If the cast of the teaching be one sided, and a great deal be left out that is necessary to its scriptural completeness,—that is unconsciously supplied by the reader, as he goes along, out of the strength and fullness of his own convictions. If, also, statements occur and representations are made that are questionable, how readily does one assume that he does not clearly take the writer's meaning! Indeed, what percentage of readers now-a-days give themselves the trouble to make sure of any writer's meaning, if they do not catch it at the first glance? We do, therefore, entirely believe that many persons have read these works with hardly a suspicion that any discrimination in dealing with their contents was reasonable or requisite.

But, after all, is there anything that calls for especial jealousy or caution in the works before us? This is the question with which we must now deal. As already stated, we have chiefly in view the volume on "The New Life."

It will be apparent, then, to every reader of that volume that, throughout, the guilt of sin, as that which deserves God's condemnation, and exposes us to just and certain punishment, is entirely left out of account. Of the existence of sin in the human heart, Dr. Bushnell has a very lively sense; a reference to it, as one of the most important of practical considerations, pervades the whole treatise; many just and striking things are said of the miserable and degrading nature of it, and of its tendency to go from bad to worse. That he speaks lightly of the evil of sin, or would tolerate light impressions of it in others, is the last charge we should think of bringing against Dr. Bushnell. But it is simple matter of fact that he leaves entirely unnoticed the guilt of our sin—that is, of our sin past, as the matter of a cause which is in hand in a divine forum, a cause in which we are concerned, and which we require to have adjusted with a view to our eternal well-being. Occasional expressions may be susceptible of a different interpretation. But, undoubtedly, the general way of representing things in this book is characterized by this omission. And accordingly the idea of our relation, as a race, to God, which prevails from end to end, is that he is dealing with the world with a view to extricate us from our actual sinfulness, without the least regard to any other consideration than the desirableness of our being so delivered. He wishes, and tries, to make us better, and that is the whole case on His part. It may be said that this is only an omission, and that the omission is not the rejection of a doctrine. We grant this; and we grant that an author is unfairly treated who is accused of rejecting what he merely failed to exhibit with due prominence, owing to the occupation of his mind with some other favourite aspect of truth. But this is a volume on the New Life: the scope of it is to exhibit the possibility and necessity of that New Life, how it may be found, exercised, and increased. In such a volume the omission of a doctrine which has so direct an aspect upon the conscience of every inquirer, is even more significant than if it had been mentioned and explained away. If he had held the doctrine that divine justice requires that guilt be justly dealt with, and that the enlightened conscience responds to the demand and enforces it,—Dr. Bushnell could not possibly have been silent upon it in such a work as this.

We have referred to this omission, however, not only for its own sake, but because it is connected with another important subject, namely, the nature of the work of Christ, or what he did for us when he died. If we have rightly construed the omission to which we have referred, we may expect to find that Dr. Bushnell cannot hold in any proper sense the propitiation and sacrifice for sins as effected by our Lord upon the cross. We are sorry to say that upon this point no doubt can be entertained. The answer to the question, What our Lord Jesus was doing for us when he died, and what he has accomplished for us by that death, is given with sufficient distinctness. The view taken is one which, once understood, will be found appearing and re-appearing in Dr. Bushnell's works with significant frequency. We have no space for numerous quotations, but we must ask our reader's attention to a passage or two.

One of the discourses of which the volume is composed is upon "The Power of an Endless Life." The text is explained in a manner sufficiently fanciful, so as to accommodate it to some striking conceptions in reference to the immortality of men and angels. But the topics proposed for consideration are, I. The power of an endless life in man, what it is, and, as being under sin, requires. II. What Christ, in his eternal priesthood, does to restore it. Under the second head he has to exhibit the "fitness and practical necessity of" what Christ has done in his eternal priesthood, "as related to the stupendous exigency of our redemption;" and after exhibiting our Lord's incarnation and progress through human life as no more than were requisite in the circumstances, he comes at last to his death, and this is what he has to say of it:—

"But the tragedy gathers to its last act, and fearful is to be the close. Never did the powers of eternity, or endless life in souls, reveal themselves so terribly before. . . . The deepest depths of malice in immortal evil are now finally stirred; the world's wild wrath is concentrated on his person, and his soul is, for the hour, under an eclipse of sorrow—'exceeding sorrowful, even unto death.' But the agony is shortly passed; he says, I am ready; and they take him, Son of God though he be, and Word of the Father, and Lord of glory, to a cross! They nail him first, and what a sign do they give in that dire frenzy of the immortal depth of their passion! . . . He dies! It is finished! The body that was taken for endurance and patience, has drunk up all the shafts of the world's malice, and now rests in the tomb.

"No! there is more. 'Lo! he is not here, he is risen.' . . . In that sign behold his victory. Just that is done which signifies eternal redemption,—the conquest and recovery of free minds, taken as powers dismantled by eternal evil. By this offering once for all, the work is finished. What can evil do, or passion, after this, when its bitterest arrows, shot into the divine patience, are by that patience so tenderly and sovereignly broken? Therefore now to make the triumph evident, he ascends a visible conqueror to the Father, there to stand as a priest for ever, sending forth his Spirit to seal, and testifying that 'he is able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by him.'

"This, in brief historic outline, is the great salvation. And it is not too great. It stands in glorious proportion with the work to be done. Nothing else or less would suffice. It is a work supernatural transacted in the plane of nature; and what but such a work could restore the broken order of the soul under evil? It incarnates God in the world; and what but some such opening of the senses to God, or God to the senses, could re-install him in minds that have lost the consciousness of him? What but this could enter him again as a power into the world's life and history?" *

This, it is to be observed, is the statement of the meaning and effect of our Lord's death in a discourse upon his priesthood, considered as related to the exigency of our redemption. Does any one ask, "What does it mean?" This is what it means. What our Lord suffered when he died was that which man inflicted on him, combined with the sorrowful reaction of his own holy nature, contemplating and experiencing conduct so vile at the hands of men. This conduct on the part of men was, of course, the crowning sin of the world, the capital manifestation of the baseness and vileness of sin. Now, when God in Christ received or endured this inexpressible wrong and evil, with an infinite sweetness, patience, and sorrowful endurance, neither resisting nor avenging, therein lay the failure and the defeat of sin, whose "arrows" therein "were broken." For here is that which is able to prevail over the sinfulness of men, and to bring them in penitence and shame to God; it forces them to confess themselves overcome by the might of his patience. And it bears on men generally, because this sin of the Jews is the proper specimen and model in which each sees his own sin, and sees the tenderness of Christ to himself.

It will readily be understood that much fine feeling and thinking may be connected with such a representation as this. What is objected to is, that this should be given forth as the proper account, the main and leading view of our Lord's atonement. So presented, it must be condemned, as a view that denies the proper grace of our Lord's priesthood, and takes away that true propitiation for our sins on which our hopes depend. Christ suffers not the penalty of sin, but simply the sorrow which he could not but suffer in being sinned against; which sorrows he bears with infinite patience.

Some further developments of these views may be found in another discourse entitled, "The Power of God in Self-sacrifice,"—a discourse in which the Patripassian heresy is in these later days revived. The theological consistency of this is easily explained. According to the view of our Lord's death which we have just exhibited, and which denies it to be a proper satisfaction for sin, the place which the Church has been wont to ascribe to the Father, in connection with the Son's death, can be ascribed to him no longer. The Father is no longer to be contemplated as sustaining in that great transaction the majesty of Godhead as the fountain and the upholder of right. Nor can he be contemplated as giving the Son to be the propitiation for the lost. If then the place heretofore ascribed to the Father in connection with the death of Christ, and the manifestation by him, accordingly, of righteousness and grace, each in an inconceivable degree, are to be discarded, it becomes necessary to provide some new representation; for that the death of Christ involved some signal manifestation of the mind of the Father, as well as of that of the Son, is written on the face of Scripture. Dr. Bushnell, then, provides for this by asserting that the death of Christ was but an exhibition of divine experiences under human sin,—reactions of the divine mind with reference to sin, that are constantly in process of realization. Those divine sorrows, thus perpetually experienced, are identical in their nature with the sorrows of Christ. And they operate to redeem us from sin, that is to say, to disarm our rebellion and bring us back, just as the sorrows of Christ do; only but for the sorrows of our Lord, embodied in the world's history, those others could hardly have been discerned or believed. This doctrine requires, of course, to be grounded on a new doctrine about the divine nature. And, accordingly, it is as the sequel to a formal argument in behalf of the "moral passivity" of the divine nature, that is, its subjection to true grief, that we find the following statements occur (the italics in all the quotations are ours):—

"In this view it is that Christ crucified is the power of God. It is because he shows God in self-sacrifice,—because he brings out and makes historical in the world God's passive virtue, which is in fact the culminating head of power in his character. By this it is that he opens our human feeling, . . . pouring himself into its deepest recesses, and battling it with his cleansing, new-creating influence. There is even a kind of efficiency in it, and that the highest, for it is mental power, not physical,—not force. It is that kind of power which feeling has to impregnate feeling; that which one person has in good, to melt himself into and assimilate another in evil. Hence it is that so much is said of Christ as a new-discovered power—'the power of God.' . . . All the figures of cleansing, sprinkling, washing, healing, purging, terminate in the same thing,—the new-creating efficacy of Christ—the power of God. It is the power of character, feeling, a right passivity, a culminating grace of Scripture in God.

"But how does it appear that any so great efficacy is added to the known character of God by the life and death of Christ? Was not everything shown us in his death explicitly revealed, or in language formally ascribed to God, by the writers of the Old Testament? God, I have already shown, was certainly represented then as being duly affected by all evil; that is, he was shown to be affected according to its true nature—displeased, abhorrent, hurt, offended in purity, burdened with grief and compassion. But to have these things said, or ascribed formally to God, is one thing, and a very different to have them lived and acted historically in the world. Perfections that are set before us in mere epithets have little significance—none but that which we give them by thinking them out. But perfections lived, embodied physically, and acted before the senses under social conditions, have quite another grade of meaning. How much, then, does it signify, when God comes out from nature, out of all abstractions and abstractive epithets, to be acted personally in just these glorious and divine passivities that we have least discerned in him, and scarcely dare impute to him! By what other method can he meet us, then, so entirely new and superior to all past revelations, as to come into our world-history in the human form—that organ most eloquent in its passivity, because it is at once most expressive, and closest to our feeling."*

We shall not stop to inquire how far views like these are likely to prove in the end consistent with just conceptions respecting the Persons of the Trinity. But there can be no doubt that, according to this passage, the atonement, instead of a great transaction bearing effectually on the relations between God and man, becomes a scene only, or exhibition of that which existed already, and could not but exist, in the nature of God.

And there can be as little doubt that the extract entirely confirms the view we have presented of what we are to see in this solemn exhibition. The death of Christ, in so far as we can gather Dr. Bushnell's meaning, is an exhibition of human sin, and of divine patience, forbearance, and sorrow in contact with that sin, fitted (to use his own expression) to "enter" into the minds of men a fruitful and victorious impression of the baseness of sin and of the loveableness of God; fitted to possess them, as by a kind of divine contagion, with a sorrowful, repentant love, which is the germ of new life. This is the atonement; and hence it is here, and here alone, as far as we have observed, that our author finds the explanation of that peculiar depth of anguish which characterized the closing hours of Christ. Those who reject the vicarious sacrifice, are bound to offer some explanation on this point. Here is Dr. Bushnell's, in which the word "vicarious" occurs indeed, but not the thing:—"There is a vicarious spirit in love; all love inserts itself vicariously into the sufferings and woes, and in a certain sense into the sins of others, taking them on itself as a burden. How, then, if perchance Jesus should be divine—an embodiment of God's love in the world—how should he feel, and by what signs of feeling manifest his sensibility, when a fallen race are just about to do the damning sin that crowns their guilty history,—to crucify the only perfect being that ever came into the world; to crucify even him, the messenger and representative to them of the love of God,—the deliverer who has taken their case and cause upon him?" *

STUDIES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND CHARACTER.

ROBERT BRUCE OF KINNAIRD.

THE name and designation of the subject of our present sketch are both suggestive. The former was that of the illustrious Scottish patriot; the latter that of the well-known Abyssinian traveller. Nor was the connection we are thus led to think of an imaginary one. The Robert Bruce of whom we are about to speak was actually descended, it is said, from the hero of Bannockburn; and though we cannot affirm the fact as the result of a personal examination of the family tree, it seems highly probable that he was also the ancestor of the great African explorer, since both were Bruces, and both "lairds" or proprietors of Kinnaird.

He was born in 1559, amid the birth-throes of the Reformation. His father, one of the ancient barons of Scotland, possessed the fine estate of Airth in Stirlingshire; and the education bestowed upon Robert, the second son, and the career sketched out for him, were both befitting the wealth and the rank of so noble a family. First of all, he was sent to the University of St. Andrews, where he made good proficiency in the philosophy of those days, and took his degree of Master of Arts; and then, having exhausted such means of instruction as his own country at that time afforded, he was despatched to the Continent, where, in France and the Low Countries, particularly at the University of Louvain, he "applied himself to the law and humanity, in which he was inferior to few in his days." Coming home after this, he commenced practising as a lawyer; and although he does not appear to have continued long in this work, his reputation for learning and capacity grew so rapidly, that the proposal was entertained of elevating him at once to the bench. If Providence, therefore, had not interposed at this point, we might have had Robert Bruce figuring as "Lord Kinnaird" in the records of the Court of Session, instead of becoming one of the leaders of the Scottish people in their efforts after spiritual freedom. The first alternative was the one which was planned and favoured by his family, especially by his mother, who was bitterly opposed to his becoming a minister of the gospel; but the second was that which was arranged in the counsels of God; and when he has chosen a vessel to be used in his service, it is vain for any other power to seek to divert it to another purpose.

As to the time and manner of his conversion, we have no particular account. It must, however, have been early; for he was not more than twenty-six or seven when he formally began the study of divinity, and he tells us himself that during no less than the ten years previously he had felt strong inclinations to do what he did then, and that for some time before he left the profession of civil law he found no rest or comfort save in the close study of the Scriptures, and the company of good persons. "As touching my vocation to the ministry," he says, "I was first called to my grace before I obeyed my calling to the ministry. He made me first a Christian, before he made me a minister. I repugned long to my calling to the ministry; ten years at least, I never leaped on horseback, nor lighted, but with a repugning and justly accusing conscience." At last a crisis came. Lying in his chamber in the house at Airth, he had a strange vision, which made a powerful impression upon his mind. It was made clear to him that he must no longer hesitate; and, having with much difficulty freed himself from the entanglements gathered around him by his business, and procured also his parents' consent, he set out again for St. Andrews, to place himself under the instruction of the famous Andrew Melville. "My mother," he tells, "would not [give her consent] until I had denuded my hands of some lands and casualties that I was infested in; and that I did willingly,—cast my clothes from me, my vain and glorious apparel—sent my horse to the fair, and emptied my hands of all impediments, and went to the New College.”

Bruce began to preach publicly in the winter of 1586, and that with so much acceptance, that the people of St. Andrews at once invited him to settle among them as their minister. But the leaders of the Church saw in him one whom they could employ in a higher and more difficult sphere. Popery, though not now in the ascendant, was still far from having ceased to be formidable. A revival of it in a diluted form—in the form, that is, of what we would call Puseyism—was being actually attempted by the court. And King James VI.—the Scottish Solomon, as he delighted to think himself—although a Protestant nominally, had high enough views as to his own divine right to rule both in State and Church, to make his vacillating policy a source of much anxiety and concern to those who desired to see the triumph of evangelical principles. Edinburgh, with its old palace of Holyrood, was, of course, the scene where the various forces which were then acting on the social and religious life of Scotland came most sharply and distinctly into collision; and it could not fail to strike such a shrewd and far-seeing man as Andrew Melville, that it would be an advantage to have as one of the ministers of that city a man like Robert Bruce, who, besides being a gentleman by birth, and, as such, entitled to mingle on terms of equality with the frequenters of the court, was likely, in consequence of his liberal education and legal experience, to be able to render the Church good service in the peculiarly difficult course which in those times it was required to steer. Accordingly it was arranged that Bruce should be asked to settle in the metropolis. His own heart did not go with this call. He would have preferred to remain in St. Andrews. And, indeed, he so far resisted the invitation as to refuse ordination as one of the regular ministers of the city. But as the opinion of the General Assembly was very distinct upon the subject, he at last consented to undertake the charge for a definite period. Temporary arrangements of the same nature were made from time to time; and the upshot of the whole was, that he gave up entirely the idea of labouring anywhere else, and continued to act as one of the ministers of Edinburgh till he was driven from it by the tyranny and intolerance of the king.

The position which Mr. Bruce in a very short time achieved for himself in the metropolis justified the decision of the Assembly. He entered on his ministry there in 1587, and in the end of 1589, we find the king, who was then in Norway, for the purpose of bringing home his queen, writing letters to him, as one of his most confidential friends and counsellors. In a letter dated November of that year, James “thanked him for the care he had for the peace of the country in his absence, acknowledging he was worthy of the quarter of his kingdom.” Another letter, dated February 19, 1590, and addressed “To our trusty and well beloved Mr. Robert Bruce, Minister of the Evangel at Edinburgh,” begins thus: “Good Mr. Robert,—Besides the welcome news that, by your last letter you sent unto me, you pointed out so vividly therein your honest meaning to my service, besides the good report I have otherwise of your daily travels for that effect, now during my absence, as I think myself beholden, while I live, never to forget the same.” It is true that the volatile son of the unhappy Mary by-and-by came to speak in a different strain; but for a time at least Mr. Bruce was in high favour at the Court of Holyrood, and was of the greatest service in maintaining friendly relations between the Church and the State. Well had it been for James, and for his house, if he had continued to follow the counsels of such a man. Scotland would in that case have been saved from unspeakable misery; and the dynasty of the Stuarts would not have been so speedily overthrown. The character of the “Scottish Solomon” is well known. He had so much learning (thanks to George Buchanan) as to fancy himself capable of settling all disputed questions, in whatever quarter they might arise; and at the same time he had so little steadiness or decision as to allow himself to be swayed hither and thither by every new favourite for whom he happened to conceive an affection. Hence the Protestant party in Edinburgh were now scandalized at seeing him fraternizing with Papists, now alarmed by his endeavours to take away the blood-bought liberties of the Church. Now there was much plain speaking in the churches in those days. The king sitting in his royal pew in the “Little Kirk” of Edinburgh, had his duty sometimes set before him in remarkably unvarnished language; and among the ministers who did their best to keep things right in this way, few were so down-right and fearless as Robert Bruce. It is little to say that he might have been one of James’s archbishops in the course of time, if he had chosen to play the part which some of his brethren did; but he was not the man thus to make shipwreck of his faith and of his integrity. Uncorrupted by the blandishments of the court, he spoke out his mind without reserve in regard to the bad and dangerous course which he saw it to be pursuing; and the consequence was, that he fell into disgrace, and became the object of a long-continued series of petty persecutions, which illustrated at once the malice and the narrowness of James’s mind.

Two examples of the petty tyranny of this little-minded king may be given here, as they also bring out into clear relief some of the features in the character of Mr. Bruce. One of the peculiarities in Mr. Bruce’s position as a minister in Edinburgh was, that when inducted into his charge he did not receive ordination by imposition of hands. The explanation given of the irregularity is this: While he was still hesitating about his course of duty—whether he should remain in the metropolis or accept the call to St. Andrews—he continued to act simply as what would be called in Scotland a probationer; that is, as a minister not in full orders. One of his brethren, who believed in his supreme fitness for the highest offices of the Church, was a little provoked at what he considered to be his unreasonable indecision, and he resolved to take rather a singular step by way of precipitating a conclusion. "That minister," says John Livingston, "one day giving the communion, had desired Mr. Robert Bruce, who was to preach in the afternoon, to sit by him; and when he himself had served two or three tables, he removed out of the church, as being shortly to return, but sent in word to Mr. Bruce with some of the elders that he would not return at that time; and, therefore, Mr. Robert behoved to serve the rest of the tables, or else the work must be given over; and, therefore, when the eyes of the elders and the whole of the people were upon him, and many also cried to him to serve the table now filled, he went on, and administered the communion to the rest, with such singular assistance and elevated affections among the people as had not been seen in that place before; and for that cause he would not thereafter receive in the ordinary way the imposition of hands, seeing before he had the material of it, to wit, the approbation of all the ministers, and had already celebrated the communion, which was not by a new ordination to be made void." Now we do not enter into the question of whether he was right in the view he thus took of the service into which he had been entrapped. But one thing at any rate is clear, that the matter was one in which the king's conscience had little concern. If the Church and the people were satisfied of the validity of Mr. Bruce's ordination, James had no call to interfere. But years after the event, when his rights as a minister had been universally recognised, it pleased the king, to gratify his private animosity, to raise the point afresh, and Mr. Bruce was required either to receive imposition of hands or retire from Edinburgh. For the sake of peace, and guarding carefully against the inference which onlookers might draw from it, he submitted to the ceremony; but while in the mingled firmness and liberality which marked his conduct on the occasion we see everything to admire, we cannot but look with contempt on the childish malice of a sovereign who could place before such a man such an alternative.

But there is another case in which the characters of both parties came out still more distinctly. Many of our readers must have heard of the Gowrie Conspiracy. According to the king's account of it, the story runs thus: The Earl of Gowrie and his brother had just come home from France, and were in their own house at Perth, when they were honoured with a visit from their sovereign. On the very night of his arrival, however, a mysterious scuffle took place; and next morning the world was informed that the two young noblemen had made an attempt on the king's life, and had both been slain in the treacherous effort. Now, it so happened that the nominal leaders in this "conspiracy" were extremely popular; they were, moreover, earnest Protestants, and there had occurred no circumstance to cause them to be suspected of anything approaching to disloyalty. Many, consequently, did not believe the story to which the court party gave currency. It carried, they thought, improbability on the face of it, and it was not supported by such evidence as to cause that improbability to disappear under a closer inspection. Yet James made it almost his first business to send a message to the ministers of Edinburgh, requiring them to rehearse the tale to their people as true, and to return thanks publicly for his delivery from the knife of the assassin. Now Mr. Bruce and others felt that the form of this demand was a little unreasonable. They had no objection to tell the story as the king's; and to return thanks for his safety in a general way. But they declared, and very properly, that before they could do the thing that was asked of them, they behoved themselves to be satisfied in their own minds that the case was exactly as it had been described. James, however, was not satisfied with this at all. With the true spirit of a tyrant, he insisted upon obedience; and, on their still holding fast their integrity, they were cited before the king and council; and, proving still contumacious, "they were discharged preaching in the king's dominion under pain of death; and charged to remove out of Edinburgh in forty-eight hours, and not come within ten miles of it under pain of death!" Such were the penalties inflicted in those days for being guilty of the great crime of having private opinions, and refusing to say to God and men what was not fully believed. After a time the associates of Mr. Bruce submitted to be instructed; but he was either so obtuse or so honest that he could not be induced to join them in their conformity. It was amazing the interest taken after this by the king in his conversion. Arguments, entreaties, threats, all were employed in vain, however; and at last the poor persecuted man was actually obliged to flee to France, that he might have liberty to think as he liked about the question of whether the Earl of Gowrie was a martyr or a conspirator! When he had been six months abroad he was induced to return to London, by the hope held out to him by some that he might there be reconciled to the king. But the hope turned out to be a delusive one. He went down to Scotland, and negotiations were renewed, but for two whole years longer this contemptible business remained unsettled, and, in point of fact, there was no end to it till the death of Elizabeth opened up James's way to the throne of England, and he found himself engaged and engrossed with weightier concerns. It was in no spirit of obstinacy that Mr. Bruce resisted for so long a time, and at such a cost, his sovereign's will. He had learned, he told the king himself, "that in doubtful things, to give an undoubted trust is temerity; and in undoubted things, to give a doubtful trust is infirmity;" and in a letter written to his wife while he was in London, on the occasion referred to above, he expresses himself in this noble way : " This has been my petition to God ever since I came out of France, and I took the sacrament of the Lord's body in France on the same condition, that the Lord Jesus should lead me safe out of this temptation, without impairing my union with him, without the hurt of the peace of my conscience, and without the loss of the credit of my ministry in the hearts of his dear children. . . . The Lord increase my faith to look for this ! I DESIRE NOT MY COUNTRY OTHERWISE."

We have said that there was an end of the Gowrie business upon the transference of James to London ; and so there was in reality, and so far as the king was personally concerned. But by that time corruptions of various kinds were being infused into the Scottish Church, and the Puseyite party, who were the agents in this work, found Mr. Bruce such a troublesome opponent, that they resolved, by foul means or fair, to get him removed to a distance. To serve this purpose, they made a stalking-horse of the dead and buried Gowrie charge ; and on the strength of it they got him banished to Inverness. Here he remained for four years, and as no restraint was put upon his actions, he took advantage of the opportunity to labour in his proper calling. " He preached every Lord's day forenoon and every Wednesday ; and read and exhorted at the prayers every evening." Nor was he left there without seals of his ministry. " Many were converted, and multitudes edified." Aberdeen and Forres also benefited by his services for short periods during this time ; so that the persecutors, as of old, instead of extinguishing, only diffused the light. In August 1613, through the intercession of friends at court, his sentence of banishment was so far remitted that he was permitted to return to his own house at Kinnaird, where he lived for three years a life of quiet usefulness. But the spirit of intolerance, which was at last to provoke an insurrection, was ever growing more intense, and so good and prominent a man could not be allowed to linger out his last years in peace. He was again cited before the Council on some pretence, and, of course, found guilty ; and up till 1631, when he entered on his everlasting rest, he was tossed about from one place to another, as the malignity or indulgence of his persecutors happened to predominate. It was graciously ordered that he was not " in ward in the Castle of Edinburgh," but in his own mansion-house at Kinnaird, and in the bosom of his family, when death came to put a period to his trials.

The subject of our sketch will generally be found spoken of in Scottish Church Histories as " the celebrated Mr. Bruce ;" and from this circumstance we are probably to infer that he was even a greater and more influential man than he appears to have been from the scanty biographical notices of him which Wodrow has collected. But very defective as these notices are, they are still sufficient to set forth before us, in outline at least, the principal features of a noble and remarkable character.

" While he was in the ministry at Edinburgh," says Robert Fleming, " he shined as a great light through the whole land, the power and efficacy of the Spirit most sensibly accompanying the word he preached. He was a terror to evil-doers ; and the authority of God did so appear in him and his carriage, with such majesty in his countenance, as forced fear and respect from the greatest in the land—even those who were avowed haters of godliness. Yea, it was known what awful impressions King James himself had of him." " No man in his time," says John Livingston, " spake with such evidence and power of the Spirit. No man had so many seals of conversion ; yea, many of his hearers thought no man since the apostles spake with such power. He had a notable faculty of searching deep in the Scriptures, and making the most dark mysteries most plain ; but especially in dealing with people's consciences. He was much exercised in conscience himself, both in public and private. He was very short in prayer when others were present, but every sentence was like a strong bolt shot up to heaven. I have heard him say that he wearied when others were long in prayer, but being alone, he spent much time in wrestling and prayer."

When he ascended, his mantle fell upon Alexander Henderson, who became, thereafter, the most prominent minister of the evangelical party in Scotland ; and it is interesting to read that these two men sustained a near relationship to one another, the one having been the agent in the other's conversion. At the time that event occurred Henderson was minister of the parish of Leuchars, near St. Andrews, into which he had been violently intruded against a reclaiming people. Hearing that the celebrated Mr. Bruce was to preach at a communion at some distance from his own charge, he resolved to go quietly to hear him. Having reached the church, he placed himself in an out-of-the-way corner, to escape the notice of the congregation, and there, in a spirit of mere idle curiosity, waited to see the end. " When Mr. Bruce entered the pulpit," the story goes on to say, " and rose up to preach, he, as his custom was, stood silent for some minutes, which astonished Mr. Henderson a little ; but he was yet more moved by the first words he uttered, which were those of our Lord : ' He that cometh not in by the door, but climbeth up another way, the same is a thief and a robber ; ' which words were powerfully sent home upon his conscience, and, by the blessing of God, as he afterwards owned, were the instrument of his first conversion."

The account given of Mr. Bruce's death is very beautiful in its simplicity : " That morning before the Lord called him to his rest he came to breakfast at his table. After he had eaten, as his use was, a single egg, he said to his daughter, ' I think I am yet hungry ; you may bring me another egg,' and instantly fell silent ; and after having mused a little he said, ' Hold, daughter, hold, my Master calleth me.' With these words his sight failed him, and he called for the Bible; but finding he was not able to read, he said, 'Cast me up the eighth chapter to the Romans, verse twenty-eight to thirty-nine,' much of which he repeated, particularly, 'I am persuaded that neither life nor death shall be able to separate me from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus my Lord,' and caused put his finger upon them, which was done. 'Now,' said he, 'is my finger upon them?' They told him it was. Then he said, 'God be with you, my children. I have breakfasted with you, and shall sup with my Lord Jesus Christ this night,' and straight gave up the ghost without one groan or shiver."

"And," adds good John Livingston, "as he was renowned in his life, so was he honoured after his death with the love and approbation of all honest people, and at his burial, where there were great numbers of all ranks of men, both nobles and inferiors; and with all honesty and modesty requisite, he was buried in an aisle of the Kirk of Larbert, biggit in his own time."

THE TRUE TREASURES OF THE CHURCH.

THE Roman Church gives out that she possesses a treasury of "good works," amassed by the contributions of successive saints, which, opened by the golden key of St. Peter, affords welcome augmentations to the scanty stock of merits possessed by some of those who are found waiting at the posts of her doors. We disallow the meritorious character which she attributes to these her possessions; we denounce the vicarious use to which she pretends to apply them; but we do not deny that the Church of Christ possesses, in the labours and sacrifices, the lives and characters of the servants of God, a treasury of immense value and continual use. By these means, a vast accumulation has been formed of testimonies for God, of evidences to his word, of manifestations of his Spirit, from which the Church can borrow a thousand resources in her conflict with the world, and to which she can always point, as an ever-growing monument of the power of truth and of the reality of grace. From far distant countries, from successive generations, from public and from private life, from a vast variety of natural characters, from an endless diversity of careers, contributions have continued to flow in, by which those resources have been multiplied, and that majestic monument enlarged. Who can contemplate without a profound satisfaction and delight this mutual relation and combined influence of the separate lives and particular actions which have displayed the power of the Spirit of God? Various in their circumstances, and scattered far apart amid the confused scenes of human life, they yet are one in their origin and in their end. One Spirit is their Author, and their influences blend into one mighty force, their achievements enrich the store of one great treasury. We know how various mechanical forces, when combined into one whole, and mutually lending and borrowing support, acquire new uses and a vast increase of power, and bear their parts in the production of stupendous results. We know how many small possessions, aggregated into a common capital, become the means of conducting gigantic enterprises, and multiply themselves by the returns of increase. Thus Christian principles and motives of all kinds, in all their various manifestations, work together with one common action, and make upon the world one great impression; and the works of faith and labours of love, small as they may often seem in themselves, are so many real additions to the general stock of gospel fruits which form the riches of the Church, which cheer the hopes of the solitary servant of God, and prompt him to larger labours of holiness and love.

The resolute faithfulness of the martyr at the stake, the courageous ventures which men have made for Christ, the cheerful labours of one who goes about doing good, the open-handed liberality of one who gives for the love of God, the disinterested conduct, the voluntary sacrifices of one who seeks not his own things, but those which are Jesus Christ's—all these have an influence extending far beyond the particular objects which called them forth. Viewed in connection only with those objects, they may sometimes seem to have failed in their aim, and to have been thrown away, producing no adequate results; but when we regard them as swelling the great tide of Christian testimony and influence, we see them possessed of a power, and attended with a success, of which it is impossible to estimate the amount. We can never tell what share they may have had in gaining fresh triumphs for the truth, or imparting fresh blessings to the world; what part they may have borne in awakening attention, dissipating prejudice, deepening conviction, consoling, strengthening, rejoicing other hearts, inspiring them with resolution or suggesting to them holy designs, and kindling perhaps in distant bosoms the faintly-glowing sparks of zeal, devotion, and love.

The methods in which one man's character and conduct will tell upon another are so impossible to predict, the lines by which the electric power of example and personal influence is conducted from heart to heart, are so secret, so various, and so infinitely ramified, that it would be quite preposterous to define in any particular case the limits of its action, or to gauge the amount of results to which it may contribute. The doings of a man whose very tomb has mouldered may interest the mind and affect the whole character of one living in a far distant age; the labours and efforts which seem barren of all fruit in that quarter on which the eye of expectation is fixed, may make an unsuspected impression on some chance witness who crosses the scene but for a moment; the simple testimony and holy patience of some obscure old woman may prove the means of moving the conscience or fixing the principles of one who afterwards becomes a blessing to his race. Such suppositions, or rather such facts, it were endless to enumerate. It must have occurred again and again to every observant person to notice cases in which the influence of Christian conduct may be directly and distinctly traced in entirely unexpected quarters. But of course the cases where it can be so traced must be exceedingly rare in comparison with those where it cannot. In fact, these plainer instances only serve to make us feel that similar effects are ever being produced by causes with which no connection can be discerned. No testimony for God, no sacrifice for Christ, no manifestation of the Spirit takes place in vain, though the act may seem like the hidden gems and wasted flowers lamented by the poet. It goes to enlarge the general mass of testimony and influence, and contributes its share to the glory which is given to God, and the good which is done to men: as, when a pecuniary collection is made for some holy or useful purpose, we do not claim this or that part of the result for the shilling which was given by one, or the penny which was spared by another, but count the benefit produced by those particular contributions not the less real, because incapable of separation and distinction.

I must say that I delight in this view of the matter, and that it gives me a double pleasure in every evidence of grace, every Christian effort, every good work which comes to my knowledge. "Here," I say to myself, "is a new subscriber to our funds—a fresh contribution to the treasury of God." In my parish, I feel that the cause entrusted to me is strengthened and enriched by whatsoever of this kind may have occurred. Has a young man borne the reproach of the foolish, rather than swerve from obedience to his God? Has an old and necessitous person been found to bring secretly to the missionary collector her little offerings to her Saviour's cause? Has an injured Christian displayed the spirit of forgiveness and love, where only bitterness and resentment could have been expected from the natural heart? Has a ready liberality been exercised, or trouble been taken to relieve the afflictions of a neighbour? Has any one resigned worldly advantages, or incurred actual loss, rather than compromise Christian faithfulness and consistency? Then, besides the pleasure which I feel on the account of the individual, I am further rejoiced by the sense that something has been gained, that an important addition has been made to that body of evidence which is one of the most effectual means for impressing on the minds of an unbelieving people the power of truth and the reality of grace. I feel like a person who, endeavouring with difficulty to raise a fund for the prosecution of some important work, receives a sudden accession of a substantial and valuable gift. Alas! these moral contributions are precious from their comparative rarity, as well as from their intrinsic worth.

What has been said of the more ordinary manifestations of divine grace, which tell upon the narrow world of a parish, applies of course still more strongly to those more remarkable instances which engage the attention of a wider circle. A man has been led, in the providence of God, to undertake labours out of the usual track, or to make sacrifices of no common kind. Unfriendly eyes fasten on the transaction, and scrutinize the apparent results. If these are pronounced inadequate to the ventures made, the proceeding is imputed to a mistaken enthusiasm, and regarded as a man of business regards an unwise speculation. "Here," it is said, "are considerable powers thrown away, and a valuable life sacrificed—and what has been secured? Perhaps hardly anything—perhaps the dubious adhesion of a few savages to a faith which they could scarcely understand." Of course the direct results are in general far greater than is represented; but admitting them (as is sometimes the case) to be scarcely discernible, yet, from the point of view at which we have been standing, we see that, in the character which has been displayed, in the testimony which has been borne, a contribution of inestimable value has been made to the riches of the Church. In utter loneliness among Musselman strangers, Henry Martyn closed his short career by a premature death, and his remains were laid under a humble stone in the Armenian burying-ground at Tocat. He left behind him scarcely two or three converts to record his zeal for the conversion of the heathen. But who can estimate the value of the living witness which he bore to the gospel of Christ, or the power which his name and memory have exercised in unnumbered hearts, or the effects which they have aided to produce in the lives of others?

Standing at this point of view, I delight to reflect on the inestimable benefits which missionary movements confer on the Churches which undertake them, as well as on the rude nations to which they are directed. The peculiar nature of the trials which attend them, and of the sacrifices which they impose, necessarily call forth such evidences of the spirit of power and of love, such instances of Christian heroism and devotedness, as animate and strengthen the hearts of thousands, and illustrate the glory of the gospel in a manner not to be overlooked or mistaken. I take up, for instance, one of the last "Church Missionary Records," and read of the arrival of a clergyman and his wife at their station. And what a station! In the deepest recesses of the most inhospitable region of the earth, to which they travelled through many hundreds of miles of solitude and desolation, they take up their abode at the furthest point of separation from all the interests of civilized life. Several days of weary journeys intervene between it and the nearest station, little more attractive than itself; and if a request be forwarded to friends in England, two years must elapse before its fulfilment can be known. The man, it may be said, has buried himself alive, has thrown himself away. Why not stay in England, where there is so much work to be done, instead of consigning his years of youth and activity to that horrid solitude, where he may perhaps be disappointed even in the efforts which he makes for the good of those wandering and degraded creatures whom he endeavours to rally round him? Far from me, and from him, be these anticipations of disappointment! But even were they fulfilled, the man who has done this thing and has manifested in doing it the spirit which breathes in the following words, has given (if I may judge by what I felt in reading them) a greater stimulus to others, and conferred a greater benefit on the Church, than he could have done by a life of ordinary duties among the comforts and satisfactions of home:—

“Hitherto hath the Lord helped us. Thus have we arrived at our destination among the Indians, whose souls Christ has sent us to seek.

“The appearance of our station, and the low logs and mud houses, and all such merely physical matters, were far from prepossessing. The interior of our two rooms was a degree better; still their look and smell called out for water and for the brush and broom. A more prominent defect was their not being water-tight. Our outer room we converted into a store-room, in which we take our meals in the midst of our bags and baggage, some of which does duty as chairs, &c. We entered an inner room, where were a small table, two chairs, and a bedstead, each of them an individual sui generis; and we found it the house of God and the gate of heaven. . . . The water rests in pools under our very floors, and to take a walk dry-footed for a hundred yards is at present out of the question. . . . I am engaged in putting fresh clay upon the roof of our house, with the hope of causing the water to run off. These houses are very inconvenient. In dry weather the clay falls down inside and outside in lumps and dust; in wet weather it runs down inside and outside in the shape of mud opening the way for wind and rain. Sometimes it is necessary to have an umbrella over your bed; and in frosty weather it contracts and lets in the cold at the cracks. . . .

“My dear wife and myself have made up our minds, in the strength of the Lord, to share the earthly lot of the poor North American Indian, in whatever place there may appear to be the best prospect of successfully soliciting him, in Christ's name, to ‘come with us’ and share our future portion in the paradise of God. May he grant that, having glorified him on the earth, and finished the work which he has given us to do, we and our now widely scattered flock of Indian wanderers, with our Christian relatives and friends, may there assemble in the light of Christ's loving and approving countenance.”

I need make no apology for gleaning these few passages from the journal. Indeed, I should pity the man who could read them without emotion. No one surely can have glanced upon the disconsolate scene which these exiles for the Lord's sake find to be the house of God and the gate of heaven, and apprehended the nature of that spirit which they exhibit, without feeling that a valuable contribution has been made to the store of Christian testimony and influence; and my readers will, I think, deem it no unnatural thing that the reading of these words should have suggested to my mind the imperfectly developed reflections which I have ventured to submit to them.—Christian Observer.

TRAVELS TO THE LAND OF THE MORMONS.

FIRST ARTICLE.

THIRTY years ago there were just six persons in the world professing what is called the religion of Mormon. At the present day, the number of Mormons, or Mormonites, is reckoned variously at from 100,000 to half a million, and, by the most trustworthy accounts, is not much below 200,000. The members of this community are scattered over all parts of the globe. In the American territory of Utah—their special home—they amount to 80,000; in the other American states they are 40,000; even Canada and British America furnish 8000; England and Scotland contain no fewer than 32,000, in spite of the numbers that are constantly emigrating from our shores; in other European countries, they number about 12,000; in Africa, Palestine, India, China, Australia, and New Zealand, they are met with in considerable numbers; while, in the islands of the South Sea, they are particularly numerous, their numbers being reckoned at about 9000. It is the boast of the Mormons that Christianity itself did not spread more rapidly within thirty years than Mormonism has done, and did not strike its roots into a greater number or variety of countries and nations.

To some persons, Mormonism is an utter mystery. Paragraphs appear from time to time in the newspapers regarding it, which are quite bewildering. But the other day, the following notice might be read in the English papers: “A vessel having been chartered to convey a cargo of 500 Mormonites from Liverpool to the United States, en route to the settlements in Utah territory, about 70 men, women, boys and girls, forming the contingent supplied by the London district, assembled on Saturday morning at the Euston terminus of the London and North-Western Railway, under the charge of Elder Joseph Gibbs. All seemed to belong to the working classes, and the proportion of the sexes was about equal. Many of their relatives attended at the station to bid them farewell.” Such occurrences are exceedingly common. In one year (1856), the number of emigrants from Liverpool was 5000. In twenty years (1840–1859) it was in all 30,853. In every hundred of these emigrants, it is calculated that there are, 4 blacksmiths, 6 shoemakers, 2 bakers, 6 masons, 3 mechanics, 7 farmers, 2 gardeners, 2 carpenters, 28 labourers, 14 miners, 1 miller, 2 sailors, 1 painter, 1 potter, 2 sawyers, 4 tailors, 2 wheelwrights; in every 200, 1 printer, 1 shepherd, 1 domestic servant; and in every 500, 1 schoolmaster. The emigrants to Utah represent fairly the industrious classes of Britain; they are not the acum of the population; they contain, perhaps, a smaller proportion than other emigrant cargoes of unskilled labourers,—hewers of wood, and drawers of water.

The question, almost unanswerable, is, What hallucination induces these multitudes of respectable operatives to receive the delusions of Mormonism, and to banish themselves to that inhospitable region on the Great Salt Lake of the American desert, where Brigham Young and his seventeen wives seem to have again reared a shrine to licentiousness? It can be no ordinary motive that, year by year, induces so many of our people to believe that Joseph Smith was in truth a prophet of the Lord, and that beyond the pale of the Mormon Church there can be no salvation; to place themselves under the government of a man who, at any time, may order their sisters and daughters into his harem, and send their males, unprovided and unwarned, as missionaries to any part of the globe; to choose as their home the shores of a lake as lifeless and dreary as the Dead Sea of Palestine; to devote their labour to a soil covered with saline incrustations, whose crops at best are liable to be withered by drought, or consumed by locusts; and to encounter, on their way to this bleak place, all the hardships of a journey across the whole breadth of North America, surmounted by the Rocky Mountains? Most people, when these strange facts are brought under their notice, can only regard them with a feeling of blank astonishment. Probably there is added to this a feeling of mysterious awe when attention is drawn to the extraordinary machinery by which Mormonism extends itself. Whoever joins the Mormon Church is liable (as we have said) to be sent out as a missionary to any part of the globe. The head of the community has only to announce his appointment, and nothing remains for the man but to obey. He may have married a wife but the day before; he may have members of his family in dangerous sickness; he may be in the midst of rearing a house, or improving a farm; it matters not, the command of the President must be received with absolute submission; there is no alternative but to obey. He has to set out, perhaps, the very night he receives the command, carrying nothing with him but the clothes on his back, and the staff in his hand. No provision is made for his wife and family in his absence, they must sustain themselves as best they can. And what is more to the purpose, no provision is made for the missionary himself. He must support himself by the labour of his hand, both during his journey, and in the place to which he has been commissioned. The purpose of this arrangement is obvious. The Mormon missionary goes unsuspected among those whom he is to endeavour to proselytise. He gets into their confidence, he becomes one of themselves, and knows the character of the people he has to deal with, before he casts his hooks. He can select the persons with whom he is most likely to be successful—the young, the ardent, the credulous, the visionary, and approach them with skilful steps. He knows how to raise and how to gratify curiosity, how to remove objections, how to excite dissatisfaction with existing religious and social arrangements, and how to strike the final blow, by a glowing description of the happiness, and prosperity, and glorious destiny of Utah. Thus it is that Mormon missions advance so noiselessly, and yet so efficiently. The number of the missionaries is legion—hundreds are at work in all parts of the globe. Even that masterpiece of Romish skill, the Society of Jesus, in its silent, ubiquitous activity and restless scheming, is almost cast into the shade by the missionary device of Joseph Smith, Prophet and first President of the Church of Mormon.

The want of accurate information on the subject of the Mormon Church and community has been keenly felt of late years by all intelligent persons. In two large and handsome volumes, now before us, an important contribution has just been made towards the supply of this want.* The author, Jules Remy, is a French gentleman who has devoted ten years of his life to travel in all parts of the earth, and who seems to have a special love for the more strange and singular manifestations of humanity. A man who has spent much time in the Sandwich Islands, and can converse in the language of Hawaii, will be acknowledged to hold a first rank among travellers. But, once for all, we must state, in the plainest terms, that while we willingly accept M. Remy as a witness of what he has seen, and feel grateful to him for the minute details he has given us of all things connected with Mormonism, we totally dissent from many of his opinions. The introduction to his book—"On the Religious Movement of the United States,"—is simply a eulogy on Ralph Waldo Emerson, and on that proud, pretentious, and pernicious system of Deism which rejoices in his name. We think we can trace in some of his representations of Mormonism the unconscious influence of his own creed—a disposition to give to Mormonism a somewhat more respectable character than it has commonly been supposed to have; and to view it as a system, founded on imposture, no doubt, and upheld by fraud, but possessing important elements of good, that place it not very far below the level of some of the Christian sects. The impression produced on our mind, and on that, we doubt not, of every earnest believer, by reading M. Remy's account of Mormonism, is one of much deeper disgust than the spectacle itself caused to him. Indeed, to us it seems to afford a very convincing proof that imposture and disgust are inseparable. We fall back, with an immense feeling of relief, on the early history of Christianity; and in the pure atmosphere that encircles us in the company of Jesus and his apostles, in the absence of anything fitted to occasion the slightest revulsion of moral feeling, we find a fresh and very welcome proof of the divine origin of the gospel.

The territory which is now occupied by the Mormons, it may be well to inform our readers, is an extensive basin, corresponding in size to the area of France, lying between California and the Rocky Mountains. Our travellers left San Francisco, in California, on the 18th of July 1855, and arrived at Deseret, "the New Jerusalem" on the 25th September following. The road by which they travelled was that along which, in the opposite direction, emigrants from the United States proceed to California; and it is a touching fact, that on several occasions they found the true track indicated by bones, mostly those of animals that had sunk and died under their loads, mingled possibly with those of pilgrims too, who, on their way to their El Dorado, had got this solemn interdict against laying up for themselves treasures on earth. The journey had its own share of perils and difficulties. Cold and rain, with their accompaniments—fever, diarrhoea, boils, and sore throat; sleepless nights, terror of Indians and American freebooters; animals straying, loads falling off, loss of knives, fishing-hooks, and other useful implements; water impregnated with soda and utterly undrinkable, were among the privations and difficulties which the love of travel, in the present case, and the love of gold in those travelling the other way, have to overcome. One Indian tribe, called the Shoshonés, met with on the road, deserve a passing notice. They are in some respects unlike every other people. M. Remy could not discover the name of God in their language, and an American settler who lived among them assured him that they had no kind of worship. It was confidently affirmed that the females had no names; the state of things among them must have had a resemblance to the house of the little British heathen, who, when asked his name, replied that "father called him 'young good-for-nought,' while his mother had so bad a memory, that she called all the girls Sall and all the boys Will." We learn, without surprise, that this people neglect the old and sick; that the men hunt and the women do the work; that they have midnight revellings, accompanied by a wild music, imitating the bellowing of the buffalo, the roaring of tigers, the bleating of the mountain sheep, the howling of wolves, the croaking of the raven, the neighing of the horse, the barking of dogs, and the yelping of foxes; and that they are passionately fond of games of chance, and will even stake their wives in the excitement of gambling. But the most affecting and shocking of their customs are their funeral rites. Our travellers, when among them, were present at the burial of a petty chief. "According to usage, they slew one of his wives and two of his best horses on his tomb, to keep him company, the Indian say, on 'the happy hunting-grounds,' the distant land whither his soul had fled to the chase of unknown game. The deceased had selected his prettiest wife to accompany him on his last journey. After two horses had been sacrificed, the unfortunate young woman stepped without flinching on the tomb of her husband, whose brother forthwith cut off her hair, and then shot her through the heart. We shuddered at the spectacle, but the Indians remained unmoved; so thoroughly does habit, aided by prejudice, render us indifferent to every thing, even death itself. . . . The mother of the dead chief was the only one who appeared inconsolable at the loss of her son. Every evening we saw her go and prostrate herself on his grave, and heard her sing a wild air, expressive of grief." It is sad to think that this wretched people, who, within the last twelve or fourteen years, have got the Mormons for their near neighbours, have so little prospect of receiving instruction in the pure gospel of Jesus Christ.

Our travellers at length reached the holy city of the Mormons, called, for the most part, Great Salt Lake City, also, New Jerusalem, Modern Zion, and Deseret (land of the bee). The origin of this colony dates no further back than 1847. Its history, however, cannot be rightly understood without some acquaintance with the previous history of the sect and its founder. It may be well for us briefly to rehearse the leading facts in the history of Mormonism.

The founder of Mormonism was Joseph Smith. He was born in December 1805, in the State of Vermont. His mother seems to have been a person of visionary and mystic turn of mind, so much so that, on one occasion, when her daughter, Sophronia, had been considered dead for some hours, her mother declared that she was suddenly cured and given back to her family. Smith's father, who was a farmer, was at first an irreligious man, but, along with his wife, became a zealous convert to the religion invented by his son; and like her, too, a seer of visions and a dreamer of dreams.

It appears that, while a mere boy, Smith, after first oscillating among the various sects of the country, came to believe that all of them were radically defective, and that something new was needed for the world. In this frame of mind, he says, he had a vision, in which a shining being told him to join none of the sects, for all of them were wrong together. At the age of eighteen he had another vision, and among other things his celestial visitor told him that there were certain gold plates buried at a certain place, on which the whole gospel of Jesus Christ was written, and divers other articles, including the Urim and Thummim, by means of which he should be enabled to discover the whole truth of God. Smith went to the place indicated, on a hill in the State of New York, and saw all the articles, as specified by the angel, but was not allowed to remove them. He got a solemn charge to return to the same spot every year, and receive the further revelations and instructions of Heaven, as to the new religion which he was the chosen instrument for making known to the world. In 1827 he got possession, and, from that time till 1830, he and one or two coadjutors were engaged in translating the Golden Book, or, as they now usually call it, the Book of Mormon. This book consists, for the most part, of the history of America from the days of the Tower of Babel, when a Hebrew colony crossed from Asia and peopled the country. It details the history of this Hebrew people, their backslidings, their wars, their extermination, and the re-peopling of the country by a new colony of Jews that left Jerusalem in the days of King Zedekiah. It tells how Christ, after his ascension, visited South America, chose twelve disciples there to preach his gospel; instituted the Supper, and left many instructions for his followers, some of which are to be found in the Book of Mormon, while the greater portion are still sealed up, to be revealed to the Saints at some future time. The Book of Mormon is affirmed to have been written by a man of that name in the fifth century, and committed to the plates which Smith alleges that he found in the hill of Cumorah. Its style is pompous and empty; it bears a general resemblance to the pseudo-gospels and other apocryphal writings of the early Christian age; and by its very contrast with the simple, majestic style of the Bible, proves at once its own hollowness and the divine origin of the Holy Scriptures.

It is difficult to say whether, at the very first, Joseph Smith, amid his youthful visions, may not have been deceiving himself. But from the time (1830) when his Church was founded, and when revelations and miracles are met with at every step, we can give him no character but that of a deliberate impostor.

Beginning with a handful of adherents, several of whom were his own brothers and near relatives, the Church of Mormon rapidly advanced. The alleged miracles of its founder—curing diseases, casting out devils, and the like—arrested attention and drew in members. Several men of mark joined it very early, including some eloquent popular preachers, Parley Pratt, his brother Orson, and Sidney Rigdon; also a man named Brigham Young, who, some years after, on the death of Joseph, was appointed his successor. From the very first, missionaries were sent out over America, by whose zeal and enthusiasm many were converted. Miracles (so called) continued to be wrought; revelations were constantly given; new orders of priesthood were inaugurated; newspapers were set up; the gift of tongues was received, and the washing of the feet was instituted; settlements were formed in Ohio and Missouri, and the course of Mormonism advanced with rapid strides. With its prosperity, however, came checks of considerable magnitude. A few who had adopted its creed openly renounced it, and the information leaked out, that the contents of the Book of Mormon were known, before the (alleged) translation of it was executed. The Mormons, from their very pride and prosperity, too, now began to excite the hatred of their neighbours. They were subjected to many coarse indignities, as well as to many serious and irritating injuries: their printing presses were destroyed; the prophet himself on one occasion was "tarred and feathered;" and measures were taken for their expulsion from the localities in which they had settled. Generally, their behaviour under these persecutions and annoyances was very commendable, and produced a very favourable effect. Smith himself preached publicly the day after he was insulted, and baptized several converts after the sermon.

In the state of Missouri their sufferings were very severe. The mob that rose against them behaved with the usual barbarity of an American rabble. The losses of the Mormons amounted to between three and four hundred men, women, and children. All their property was destroyed or confiscated. The prophet himself was about this time cast into prison, but effected his escape, and continued to cheer and guide his followers (A.D. 1839).

Escaping from Missouri, the Mormons found a refuge in Illinois, and at a place called Nauvoo in that state, they attained a large measure of prosperity. So much was this the case, that in 1844, Smith, on occasion of an election for the Presidency of the United States, after writing to the several candidates to inquire what course they were disposed to follow towards the Mormons, and receiving unsatisfactory answers, took the bold step of offering himself as a candidate, and circulated a long address explanatory of his views of state policy. So elated were his followers at the success of their Church, and the importance which his new position gave to their prophet, that they carried him in triumph through the streets of Nauvoo. But at the very time of their doing so, a summons was served on him, at the instance of some of his enemies, to appear before the court at the neighbouring city of Carthage, and answer a charge of adultery and perjury. The charge of adultery leads us to mention, that the year before (1843), Smith affirmed that he received a revelation respecting polygamy. All along, the prophet had shown a tendency toward sensual indulgence, in more forms than one. Several singular sayings are ascribed to him, explanatory of the fact of a prophet getting drunk. "I do it," he is reported to have said, "to prevent my followers from adoring me as a god." It was well enough known that at this period he had several wives; very opportunely a revelation came, commanding him to do the works of Abraham, these works including the marrying of several wives. It is said that his good wife Emma was grievously opposed to the publication and execution of this revelation, and that she went so far as to destroy the original copy which had been committed to her care. It was not the first time that a revelation had been received favourable to the personal interests of Joseph. One had been received some time before, requiring the people to build him a house; another, requiring them to devote a large share of their property to the maintenance of the Church and the building of a great temple at Nauvoo. Smith's followers, it is said, do not profess to know the precise period at which he began his practice as to the plurality of wives; but if the truth be, as it seems, that he had several before he even pretended to receive the revelation making them lawful, we can form some notion of the spirit of the man who, to sanctify his lust, pretended to a revelation from heaven, and threw open the doors of the temple of licentiousness to his followers, just that he might the more comfortably frequent it himself.

The trial of Joseph Smith for adultery and perjury was destined never to take place. While he lay in prison awaiting it, a furious mob broke open the doors, and proceeding to the cell where he was, fired upon him and killed him. His brother Hiram, the "patriarch," or second man in the Church, shared his fate. The mob had been exasperated by the violent conduct of the prophet, as Mayor Nauvoo, in suppressing a hostile newspaper. Thus miserably ended, at the age of thirty-nine, the career of Joseph Smith,—a man gifted with no ordinary talents, and with a singular degree of influence, amounting almost to fascination, over those with whom he came into contact; but who would neither submit his understanding to the teaching of God's word, nor his heart to the authority of God's will; and who, consequently, in place of a humble and holy missionary of the truth, became the proud and polluted apostle of imposture.

The Mormons were stunned by the death of their two leading men, but by no means overwhelmed. They carefully avoided all excesses, and proceeded to re-organize their society, by electing successors to their martyr president and patriarch. This was a somewhat difficult matter, for there were several that seemed to have equal claims to the honour of president. But by a series of excommunications, which would be amusing if they were not painful as an abuse of a solemn ordinance, all of them were got rid of save the one who was the general favourite of the community. This man was named Brigham Young, "The Lion of the Lord," born in 1801, the son of a farmer in Vermont, who, with his eleven children, had early become a convert to Mormonism. Brigham was a carpenter by trade, and of the Methodist persuasion. The gift of tongues was early manifested in his person, and he is said to have spoken many that were unknown, among others the Adamic language. Unfortunately, when Messrs. Remy and Brechley paid him a visit, and asked him somewhat abruptly and unthinkingly if he spoke French, he was obliged to confess that that language was not among his gifts. He was a man of amazing activity; had been in all parts of the world as a missionary of Mormonism, and was possessed of a power of government and administration exceedingly remarkable. The settlement of Nauvoo flourished under him; and in the close of the year it had a population of 14,000, of whom about nine-tenths were Mormons.

But the more they prospered, the more they were attacked and hated. All kinds of wickedness were laid to their charge. We have no room for detailing the proceedings that ended in their being forced to abandon Nauvoo, and seek a home in the distant though barren plains of the West, where they might live unmolested by their neighbours. There seems no reason to doubt that much of what they suffered was grievously unjust.

It was the effect of wild Lynch law; and when they appealed for protection and redress to courts and governors, they were simply told that their case was a good one, but that the voice of the people was too strongly against them for the magistrates to afford any redress. Their persecutions and banishment had naturally the effect of drawing them more closely to each other, and stimulating them to very great efforts of virtue and industry. Their pride was roused to rebut the calumnies under which they laboured, and to show to the world that they were not the monsters alleged. In proof of their patriotism, they sent a battalion of 520 men to the Mexican war; and it is a singular circumstance that it was by some of these men that the discovery of gold in California was made. The story of their persecutions must have been very useful to their missionaries over the world; it would serve to awaken sympathy and conciliate friendly feeling, and even to draw proselytes, for the more they were oppressed, the more they could say that they prospered: and to those who do not consider that there is scarcely any infant cause which does not thrive under moderate persecution, this would be regarded as a proof of the favour and protection of God.

There is no country where it is so easy as in America, when they persecute you in one city to flee to another. But it was a very bold, laborious, and remarkable scheme, every way, to transport a large colony beyond the Rocky Mountains. After a year or two of much privation and wonderful management, the scheme was accomplished. They crossed immense plains which have no tenant but the bison and antelope, traversed the snowy defiles of the Rocky Mountains, and finally toiled across the deserts of Utah. Brigham Young had declared, "by divine inspiration," that they were to establish themselves on the borders of the Great Salt Lake, which belonged to nobody, and whose uninviting shores nobody was likely to covet. In 1847 the city of Deseret was begun. In 1848 it was peopled by thousands of Brigham's disciples. It has advanced with extraordinary rapidity, and the industry with which its people have striven to overcome the disadvantages of their position is very remarkable. To a great extent, the territory of Utah, as it is called, is covered by salt. But smaller plains are found which are not so incrustated, and are fit for cultivation. The climate is healthy and temperate. In 1848, the whole district of New California, comprising Utah, being ceded by Mexico to the United States, the Mormons unconsciously became again subjects of the Union. They immediately started a proposal that they should be recognised as forming a separate State. This proposal was not accepted to the full; they were only admitted to the inferior rank of a Territory, under the name of Utah. But during the following years, they increased so rapidly (numbering nearly 100,000 in the end of 1856), that they must have carried their point, had not a serious dissension sprung up between them and the Federal government. Complaints of a most serious nature were made against them;—it was alleged that they spurned the authority of the Federal government, that they insulted and thwarted its judges, and that they had caused a large number of persons to be assassinated or poisoned. In 1857 an army was sent against them. But so determined was the attitude of the Mormons, and so vigorous their protestations that the charges brought against them were calumnies, that there was no actual war. In 1860 the troops of the Union left Utah, and the place and people resumed their ordinary aspect.

It has been necessary to give this sketch of the history of the leading community of the Mormonites, preparatory to a brief account of their doctrines, worship, and morals, which we must reserve for another paper. Looking to the universal dispersion and ceaseless activity of their missionaries in all countries, and especially Great Britain, which, strange to say, is their most productive harvest-field, we consider it to be of very great importance to diffuse correct information regarding this strange and dangerous people. It will not do to abandon ourselves to vague wonder regarding them; it is with the ignorant or the prejudiced that their missionaries have most success. Mormonism is unquestionably a fact,—some would say a great fact; it has attractions and fascinations that make it dangerous to thousands; it is a duty to probe and search it—ascertain the secret of its strength, and warn our people of its delusions and its woes.

MODERN IDOL-MAKING.

No one who studies the moral history of our times will imagine that because Paganism is on the decline, the first commandment has become antiquated. The speculative tendencies of modern philosophy are tempting men to a breach of this commandment quite as effectually as did the "high places" and "pleasant groves" of ancient idolatry. Indeed, there probably has never been an age in which so many have worshipped gods entirely of their own making as in this conceited nineteenth century, and that, too, with no higher wisdom than was manifested by the framers of golden calves. We can even analyze the manufacture of these philosophic divinities, and discover what elements men have chosen in the composition of their deity, and what they have rejected. The characteristics ascribed to these gods are found to be exact indices of the taste and education of their devotees, and not unfrequently also of the place of their education. As there were gods of the Philistines, and gods of the Zidonians, between whom the affections of the Israelites oscillated, so now there are German species with American varieties, modified somewhat by differences of soil and climate. And as the pagan Roman imported foreign deities, and after a short naturalization worshipped them himself, so is the very same process repeated in our day. Thus Brahma has been naturalized by "the Sage of Concord," and possibly the Vedas are to-day as sacred to some ideal religionists of Boston as are the Hebrew Scriptures.

On the other hand, we sometimes find American self-reliance and independence manifested in the work of idol-making. Some half-fledged theologian, some "progressive" Christian carrying the spirit of "Young America" into his faith, fashions his deity to suit himself—this or that trait in the God of the Bible is not to his liking, and, therefore, he makes his own god.

The school of idol-makers is well represented by Bunyan's Mr. Anything. "Men," say they, "do not worship each a different and therefore false god, because they ~~extend~~ only one and the true God. Socrates and St. Paul, Nena Sahib and Payson, the Imam of Muscat and the Moderator of the General Assembly all address the same Father, and are by him heard and accepted! The language of each is not the same in form—how could it be?—but God does not only understand Hebrew or the Westminster Catechism. He did not make men to differ in every conceivable respect, and only not allow them variety in theology as well! Were you capable of taking a broad view of the question, you would, on the other hand, see that all these apparently discordant elements can be harmonized into one beautiful whole, in which, according to the fine language of St. Paul, there is neither Jew nor Greek, Scythian nor barbarian!"

Such are the sentiments of these "liberalists"—though covered up by layer upon layer of elastic phrases designed to deaden the effect of their sudden contact with long accepted beliefs; sentiments continually dropping from the popular lecturer, the magazine writer, and the "liberal" preacher. Such heterogeneous vagaries, the work of men's minds, are no better divinities than the idols made with hands. Against these, no less than the outward representations of divinity, is addressed the command, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Was this spoken to the Jews only? Wherein is a god the work of men's minds, any more real than the work of men's hands? We would smile at one who should reject the whole system of astronomy, solely because of his inability to conceive how a revolution of the earth could take place without occasioning to him and his neighbour the most urgent personal inconvenience—for what difference could human views or preferences make in planetary movements! And yet there are those who say that the Creator of this heaven and earth must deal with his moral creatures only in a way that harmonizes with their own views and preferences. They will not have a jealous God, nor one whose justice or whose mercy is that revealed in the God of the Bible. But to change the conception which the Bible gives of God, for a God of our speculation, is to set up an idol in the place of Jehovah.—Boston Recorder.

TREASURY PULPIT.

THE BLESSED DEAD.

"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord."—Rev. xiv. 13.

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

THE plateau, or high ocean bed, which stretches across the Atlantic between Great Britain and America, and along which they laid the lines that were to unite two worlds together, and flash our messages over the bed of the sea, is covered, it is said, to some depth, with a fine impalpable powder. To the naked eye that powder looks like dust—mere dust, devoid alike of beauty or organization. But beneath the microscope how it changes! There it appears a mighty collection of beautiful shells, once the habitation of creatures exceedingly minute. Their home was in the upper regions of the ocean; and when they died, their shells became their coffins; and, sinking many thousand fathoms down, they found their grave in the ocean bed. We know that it takes the burial of very many generations to raise the mould in the narrow churchyard. How many ages, then, must have elapsed before the coffins and corpses of creatures so exceedingly small, could have raised the broad bed of ocean! To account for this phenomenon it is necessary to suppose that these creatures are falling in showers, night and day, summer and winter, seed time and harvest; dropping down into their graves in showers as thick as the drops of summer rain, or the snowflakes of a winter storm. And if so, how great the profusion of life in the vast ocean!

This is one of the last, and not the least interesting of the evidences that go to prove how this world teems with life. You meet it everywhere. Turn where you may, you meet it. Though not detected by the naked eye, you devour it in every morsel of your food; you inhale it in every breath you draw; you drink it in the cup filled at the purest spring; you bathe in it among the billows of ocean. Nor can you walk wild moor, or shaggy mountain, or flowery meadow, but your foot goes down on life. Life sleeps the winter through in every bud; it opens in every flower; dances and quivers in every leaf; and rises before you in every spike of grass. Where is there not life? More changeful than the fabled Proteus, it assumes innumerable shapes. There it cleaves the air on feathery wing; there it cleaves the deep with fins; there it crawls forth in the slimy worm; there it stands before you in the majesty of the human form. Here it breathes in vile corruption; and there it plays and dances in the heavenly sunbeam. Where do you not find life? Water cannot drown it. Earth cannot bury it. Open the grave—for a moment—life is there; penetrating the domain of death, it seizes on the lifeless body, and takes possession of the tomb. We can say to it what David said to its dread Giver—"Whither shall I flee from Thy presence? Thou hast beset me behind and before: Thou compassed my path."

Now, common as life is, death, its counterpart, though less apparent, is not less common. Death is the shadow which life flings upon the ground. Wherever life goes, there travels that dark, unsocial, dumb companion with it. Though not coeval, death is coexistent with life. Wherever you find life in this world, there you find death. It is the fate of all that lives to die. We forget this! Some like to forget it, and try to forget it; and all of us are too prone to forget it. Because death is not beautiful, God has so arranged matters that there is not much evidence of it in this world; nor does he long allow such evidence of it as there is, to deform and disfigure this beautiful creation. You may walk a whole day in this crowded city, nor once meet a nodding hearse, or poverty's plainest funeral. I have walked down a long summer day across moor, mountain, and woodland, nor seen a sign of death. No shriek of pain, no groan of agony, disturbed the melody of nature. Where the cricket chirped among the grass, and the lark sang in the cloud, and the cattle lowed in the pastures, and the silver tenants of the stream leaped and played, and the flowers with their ten thousand golden censers offered up odours of incense to God, and all nature rejoiced and revelled in the possession of life, no withering skeleton crumbled beneath my feet. No sign of death was there. As if God not only has no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but no pleasure in death at all, in the death of any creature, he has so arranged matters that all evidences of death are speedily removed. Let bird or beast fall, and curious creatures come creeping forth to do the sexton's office; the denizens of air and earth seize the lifeless body. You say death is quick to seize on life; but life is as quick to seize on death. How does nature cover with a green and flowery shroud all that moulders and decays, changing corruption into beauty, and the lifeless corpse of one creature into the pregnant womb of ten thousand lives! Still, though life is a far more apparent thing than death, death is as common as life. The fate of all your eye looks on is to die. You never see a flower to admire its beauty, but it shall die. In the Crystal Palace there is the noblest specimen of the vegetable world man has looked upon. It was smitten by his hand. It had towered three hundred feet above the ground, and lived more than three times three hundred years; yet, if man's axe had not laid it low, the hand of death would have felled it with the ground. There is not a bird that sings, nor a flower that blooms, nor a thing that lives, but is doomed to die.

And death, the penalty of sin, bitter fruit of man's unsanctified ambition, shall extend to all of us. Ten, twenty, fifty years after this, where shall we be? A few brief years, and not this congregation shall be changed, but this great city shall have changed all its tenants. There is not a face you meet on your way to church or market that shall be seen then. The bells shall ring, but they will be rung by other hands, and rung for other worshippers;—pulpits shall be filled by other preachers, and the pews by other worshippers. We shall go the way of all the living. A few years more, and all the animated forms around me shall lie cold in death—mouldering in the silent grave. What says the apostle? "Death has passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."

Now before, according to the spirit of my text, briefly turning your attention to this, that death by grace is changed into a blessing, let me, in further discoursing on this subject, as is suggested by the apostle's remarks, observe, in the first place, that death is a curse. After that I will endeavour to show how death by the Gospel is changed into a blessing.

I. My text says, "Blessed are the dead,"—but death, notwithstanding that, is a curse. You who have read the poetry of Milton, know that, using the poet's license, he represents Death as the son of the Devil, begotten in the womb of Sin. He pictures Satan, on his flight to our world, as encountering two strange and terrible objects at the gates of hell:—

"Before the gates there sat
On either side a formidable shape;
The one seemed woman to the waist, and fair,
But ended foul in many a scaly fold
Voluminous and vast: a serpent armed
With mortal sting. The other shape,
If shape it might be called that shape had none
Distinguished in member, joint, or limb;
Or substance might be called that shadow seemed,
For each seemed either; black it stood as night,
Fierce as ten Furies, terrible as hell,
And shook a dreadful dart. What seemed his head,
The likeness of a kingly crown had on."

Sin, the half-lovely woman, half-scaly reptile, who, as portress, guarded the gates of hell, thus explains to Satan the name and history of the other crowned and armed monster:—

"Pensive here I sat
Alone; but long I sat not, till my womb
Pregnant by thee, and now excessive grown,
Prodigious motion felt and rueful throes.
At last this odious offspring whom thou seest,
Thine own begotten, breaking violent way,
Tore through my entrails, that with fear and pain

Distorted, all my nether shape thus grew Transformed; but he my lubred enemy
Forth issued, brandishing his fatal dart,
Held to destroy. I fled, and cried out, Death!
Hell trembled at the hideous name, and sighed
From all her caves, and back resounded Death!"

In that picture, Milton embodies a very common notion, and a very common error; putting that into poetry which many people believe in fact. They fancy there was no death till there was sin in the world; and misunderstanding the apostle's observation "death by sin"—which applies only to man—they extend it out and beyond man; and make it embrace the whole of this world's creation. In regard to the lower animals as well as to man, they believe there never was death till there was sin;—by sin, man's sin, came death. Now, that is an error. No man of common intelligence can open a shark's mouth with those rows of tremendous teeth, can look at the paw and claws of a lion, can study the talons of an eagle, can examine the beautiful mechanism of a serpent's fang—the poison-bag above, and the groove by which the fatal drop enters into the wound—but he must see there was death before sin; he must see that these animals, which were made before man, were made for the very purpose of living by death—living by each other's destruction; and that, in fact, in the plan of the divine government, God took death into account,—laid his account with death, provided for it, planned for it. Death in this world, as much as life, was in the plan of the divine government.

I grant you, that it is not so expressly stated in the Bible. I do not find it stated in the Bible that there was death before sin. Though I do not find that in God's Word, I find it in what is as good—it appears in his works. I have the testimony of the Bible to this, that "death reigned from Adam to Moses;" but although I have not the testimony of the Bible to this, that death, which reigned long before Moses, reigned long before Adam too, I have what is as good—the testimony of the rocks. I have that truth written this day on tables of stone. If I turn over these stony leaves of God's writing, I read on them, that death was, long before Adam was. I see the remains of monstrous creatures that, armed with tremendous power of destruction, turned this world into a scene of battle and of death long before Eden ever bloomed; their remains lie entombed in the rocks where the convulsions of nature buried them long ages before Adam was made. You may ask me, why there should be death when there was no sin? I cannot answer that question; I do not pretend to answer it. It is a mystery. It is indeed a mystery why dumb creatures should suffer pain—pain that often moves man's pity. It is a mystery why a benignant and benevolent God, that never had pleasure in the pain of any creature, inflicted it upon an innocent creation. And it is a mystery, perhaps, to angels, why that should suffer which never sinned.

Yet there is a manifest difference between the death of these creatures and that of man. It is where death extends its ravages to him that it becomes a curse. "The sting of death is sin." It is that which has armed his dart.

The lower creatures die, but with how little pain ! in what happy ignorance ! Death springs on them with a tiger's leap. The coming event casts no shadow before. I have seen a lamb go gambolling to the slaughter-house—cropping the wayside flowers. No vision of the butcher's knife ever disturbs the easy ox as he browses in abundant pastures. There is a mother to be pitied. See how her brow is clouded with care as she watches the cradle of her withering child ! But no fear veils the joy of yon mother bird as she embraces her nestlings in her wings ; or, seated on the bending spray on a sweet summer eve, sings her young to sleep. The prospect of death never alarms them. The groans of a dying ox disturb not the feast of his next neighbour in the stall. The dead body of their own kindred never suggests to them the idea that they also are to die. There is no curse, so to speak, in their death. There is no dread hereafter ; nor is there any dreaded present. These happy creatures enjoy life unimpaired by the fear of losing it ; and when it is lost, they part with it in most instances with very little pain—sometimes with none at all.

But, brethren, it is not so with us. I suspect the bravest men are afraid of death. It is an easy thing for a soldier, amid the whirl and excitement of a battlefield, to dash upon the serried bayonets ; but show me the man, unless he be a Christian, that will calmly and coolly meet his dying hour without fear. Ah ! death tries the courage of the bravest ; and more than that, it tries the piety of the best of men. The great mass of mankind are undeniably afraid to meet death ; to stand face to face and front to front with the king of terrors. Afraid to meet him—they are afraid to think of him ! Is he knocking at a neighbour's door ? They tremble to hear it ; they are alarmed at his very approach. They do not quarrel with grey hairs so much because they spoil beauty, as because, like the snow powdered on mountain heights, they proclaim the approach of the coming winter. And why are many thousands in this city, perhaps some within these walls, happy ? What is the secret of your happiness ? It is this—you are happy because you are hopeful—that you will not die to-day ; no, nor to-morrow ; nor next week ; nor for another year. Poverty is an evil ; exile is an evil ; disease is an evil ; calumny is a greater evil ; but evils of human life as they are, they all make way for death. Trampling under his feet crowns and laurels, sweet hopes and bleeding hearts, he marches at the head of all human ills—by the universal consent of all men crowned the king of terrors. "Skin for skin," said the devil—and for once the father of liars spake the truth—"Skin for skin, all that a man hath will he give for his life." Brave death as you may, it is an awful curse ; to all but Christian faith intolerable ; admitting no comfort but the blessed hope of salvation by the blood of Christ. Have you that hope ? Happy are you ! I congratulate you. Though you were a beggar, happy are you ! If you have it not, I would not change places with you, not for a thousand worlds.

Brethren, apart from this death is an awful evil. Nature shrinks from it, shuddering. I do not like to think of being—and who does ?—a cold, inanimate form of clay, unconscious of the love and grief of all around us ; screwed down into a coffin ; carried away from our happy home ; and when the green sod has been beaten down above us, left, not by enemies, but by those we love, to be the food of worms, and lie mouldering in the silent grave. And, then, the grave is the land of oblivion. Who but dislikes to be forgotten ? We may flatter ourselves we shall be remembered some little time within the family circle, and that now and then a sigh will be heaved over our memory,—now and then a tear dropped on our grave. We do not like to be forgotten by all around us ; nor to think that the grave shall close over us as the waters over a sinking ship, that in going down makes some slight swell and commotion, but by-and-by leaves the billows to pursue their course, and all to become smooth again. Who but shrinks from the thought of being torn from those he loves ? of leaving the cheerful voices and bright countenances of his family circle to keep companionship with those dumb, grim tenants of the grave, that lie there for years, and centuries, but never exchange a word ? God has made this body beautiful ; and I do not like to see the ruin that death works on us. God has made me to love life ; and I love it. I love the bright sky ; I love the song of the birds ; I love merry voices ; I love cheerful faces ; and I confess to you, I do not like to think of being laid in that narrow black hole among mouldering bones and silent death. Profess what you like, flesh and blood shrink from that. Believe me, there is no mere earthly power beneath the heavens that can stand by an open grave, and looking down there, speak of it as a bed of sweet and peaceful rest.

Besides these sad imaginings, death itself is a curse. Ah ! how many weary days and nights may precede the closing scene ? We do not think, or, at least, often refuse to think of that. But I wish you to think of it. It may be blessed for your everlasting welfare, and preparation for a coming eternity. Anticipate the closing scene of life. I have seen many die ; and I know death to be a tremendous evil. What agony may then rack your frame ! How may your last hours resemble those of one who fights with an invisible enemy, that has him clutched by the throat, and is choking him ! Death bears all the features of a tremendous curse.

Never, nowhere to my eye, does Religion look so magnificent as beside scenes like that. Never does she seem so triumphant as when, with her fingers closing the filmy eyes, she contemplates the peaceful corpse ; and bending down to take one cold kiss of the pallid lips or marble brow, she rises, and, raising her hands and eyes to heaven, exclaims, 'Blessed, are the dead. The battle is done ; the victory won. Rest, warrior, workman, pilgrim,—rest ! “Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord ; for they rest from their labours, and their works do follow them.”

II. Having pointed out these aspects of the curse of death, let me, with all possible brevity, show how death is a blessing ; how true these words—“Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord.” Die in the Lord ! That is a remarkable expression ; but a phrase that corresponds with others in the word of God. For example : the apostle Paul sometimes speaks of us “being in the Lord,” and sometimes of “the Lord being in us.” He says, for instance, “Christ in us the hope of glory.” And elsewhere he uses this also remarkable expression : “Nevertheless, I live ; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me.” My text speaks of us, “that die in the Lord,” as being in Christ. Whether the expression be that “Christ is in us,” or that “we are in Christ,” the meaning is thus far the same, that both express that intimate, spiritual, indissoluble, eternal union which is formed by faith between the Saviour and the saved. Brethren, that is a union more intimate than marriage—unfaithfulness will dissolve that ; that is a union more intimate than the connection between body and soul—one stroke of death dissolves that ; that is a union more intimate than that which may unite churches that, though differing, co-operate. The union I refer to is not one of co-operation, but of incorporation ; so that, what one is, the other is ; where the one is, the other is ; and what the one feels, the other feels. As my body and arm have blood in common, as the branch and trunk have sap in common ; so Christ and his people have all things in common. “All mine is thine,” he says—his merit, ours ; his righteousness, ours ; his victory, ours ; his glory, ours. And as we were in Adam on that day when standing by the fatal tree, and before the beautiful temptress, he took of the fruit, and ate, and sinned, and fell, all of us falling that fatal hour ; so, on that other day, when Jesus stood by another tree, and gave his hands to the nails, and his side to the spear, and his head to the thorns, we were in him. As we were in Adam on the day of the fall, we were in Christ—those of us who are believers—on the day of redemption. In him I was condemned before earth and heaven ; in him I triumphed on the cross ; in him, on the third day, I rose in anticipation of the hour when the dead shall rise to the sound of the trumpet ; and rising in Christ, mortal to put on immortality, we shall be crowned with victory. To be in Christ, therefore—to be in the Lord—implies that we shall enjoy all that Christ purchased. Could you have more, or wish for more than this, that putting aside our own merits, and casting them behind us, we can claim his merits as ours ; that, as he was his Father’s beloved Son, so are we the beloved sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty ; and that though now on earth, in a sense, we are in heaven ! If believers, we shall be there literally on that day, when all the members have been joined to the body, whose Head is now crowned, and throned in glory.

Am I not, therefore, entitled to say with the apostle, “Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord” ! They are blessed ; they must be blessed. How can it be otherwise ? It does not matter where they die. The dying is nothing, if they are in the Lord ; nor does it matter how they die ; nor does it matter when they die—die in their bed, among holy prayers and blessed voices—die in battle, amid thundering cannon—die like a martyr, swinging in the air—or die whelmed in the deep, with the rush of waters in their drowning ears. Dying in the Lord, they are blessed, wherever or however they die. It has been a comfort to a dying child, to feel its mother’s arms around it. And when candles burned dim and the mists of death were gathering over the failing eye—I have seen the dying ask if some loved one was near ; and I have felt the cold hand grasp my own, as if when passing through the deep waters there was some stay in a human hand. But oh ! in that hour God give us to feel that we have a hold of Christ ; that our head is laid on his blessed bosom ; that his hand wipes away nature’s last bitter tears ! And when we are beyond the hearing of a mother’s, or wife’s, or child’s, or any human voice, oh ! it will be blessed to hear Jesus whispering, “Fear not, for I am with thee. Be not afraid, for I am thy God.” We shrink back and say, Ah, Lord, the water is dark ; is cold ; is deep ! How blessed then to hear him say, “Go forward, fear not. I have redeemed thee. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee ; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee : when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned ; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee. For I am the Lord thy God, the Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour.”

Believer, let the world shrink from death—not you. Familiarize your mind with that event ! Think of it, not so much as death, as life ! It is the gate of life to a good and pious man. Think of it not as death, but as glory,—going to heaven, going to your Father, going home ; as a good man said to me when I was sorry to see him sinking into his grave, “I am going home.” If you will think of it as death, then think of it as the death of sin ; the death of pain ; the death of fear ; the death of care ; the death of death. Regard its pains, and pangs, and struggles, as the battle that goes before victory ; its troubles as the swell of the sea on heaven’s blessed shore ; yon gloomy passage as a shady avenue that shall guide your steps to heaven. Think of death as life through Christ ; life in Christ ; life eternal ; life for evermore. We should be much happier than we are if we could take death in that light. That is the light in which every true Christian man can, and ought to regard it. And we should be much holier too. How holy would the believer be who, each morning, as I have heard people say, should think he might be dead before night, and who each night should think he might be dead before morning ! That is true : but it is better and nobler to think in the morning, I may be in heaven before night ; and when I lay my head down on the pillow, and close my eyes for sleep, to think, Next time I open them I may see Jesus, I may be where there is no night ; nor morning ; nor sunset ; nor cloud ; nor grave ; nor grief ; nor sin ; nor death ; nor sorrow.

WE should be very glad to believe that the passages we have cited, and others that might be produced, embodied merely the occasional aberrations of a speculative mind, not extremely systematic in its modes of thinking, and not to be held pledged to every chance utterance. And we should lean strongly to that construction if we found any clear evidence of a sounder view prevailing at other times and in other passages. But while Dr. Bushnell generally avoids, with considerable caution, anything like a formal, and much more a controversial statement of his views on these points, the whole of his writings, as far as we have access to them, are formed in consistency with the scheme which we have found indicated so distinctly. We must believe it to be constantly present to his mind, and to be, in short, his faith upon the points in question. If in any case modes of experience are referred to in his writings which the reader can hardly reconcile with theology so unsatisfactory, or phrases occur that seem more full and ample than that theology would suggest, that is to be accounted for, either by Dr. Bushnell using phrases in a different sense from that which the reader assumes ; or because the influence and traditions of a religious experience not squared to his theology, come in upon his mind from the atmosphere in which he moves ; or lastly, because possibly his own experience, in reading the Scriptures and in prayer, may carry him into regions for which his system does not provide. But explanations of this kind will not be often needed, if we are only careful to take Dr. Bushnell's words in his own sense. Let it only be noticed, for instance, how the Scripture expressions which speak of cleansing are taken as universally applicable to moral renovation, without a hint of any other reference—for example : " It is the aim and purpose of Christian redemption to raise us up into the state of complete purity before God. The call of the word is, ' Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord : though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow ; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.' And it is curious to observe, when we read the Scriptures, what an apparatus of cleansing God seems to have set in array for the purification of souls,—sprinklings, washings, baptisms of water, and, what are more searching, baptisms of fire ; fierce meltings, also, as of silver in the refiner's crucible ; purifyings of the flesh, and purgings of the conscience ; illustrations of blood, even of Christ's blood ; washings of the word, and washings of regeneration by the Holy Ghost." *

All, it is observed, are taken as referring equally and indiscriminately to the cleansing of sanctification, and to nothing else.

It is not needful, and certainly it is not our intention, to occupy these pages with evidence or argument in order to show how defective and unscriptural are such views of Christ's atonement, and of man's state before God as a sinner. It is enough to say, as to this, that in the sense in which those words are taken by the mass of believers, we find in Dr. Bushnell's scheme no atonement, no justification, no " righteousness received by faith." There may be many things good, in their own place, contained in these writings, but there is excluded, we solemnly believe, that gospel of the grace of God whose first article is that Christ died for our sins. But we shall not have exhausted our task unless we say something of the bearing of all this on the practical tendency of such books as Dr. Bushnell's. It is, indeed, mainly for the sake of indicating this that we have taken up the subject at all. The acceptance which these works have found, as works of Christian edification, is the circumstance that brings them within our especial sphere, and it is in reference to that interest that we feel peculiarly called upon to consider them.

It may be said that the topics to which the objectionable opinions apply, are not the main topics of the work, are referred to only indirectly and incidentally. The proper subject of the treatise is to speak of the new life as it may or ought to manifest itself in the souls of men. It speaks of the thoughts, feelings, and works of renewed men. And it may be said that it is hardly fair or desirable to object so seriously to the work unless we are prepared to take exception to what constitutes the bulk and body of its teaching. As to other things, if Dr. Bushnell comes forth with a formal treatise upon them, let them be then discussed. Meanwhile, we have ourselves already admitted, in the course of this article, that Dr. Bushnell has many a pleasing, and many an instructive page, both on the nature of man, and on the motives, the exercises, and the attainments of a better life. " Why," it may be said,—“ why not leave these to do their work in the minds of readers, even though some things seem to be omitted which it were most desirable to have supplied ? Why formulate objections which may create a prejudice even against those portions of the work which are least objectionable ? ” For many a writer and many a reader, now a days, seem inclined to hold, that, let men dispute for ever about the atonement and the connected doctrines, what is practical in Christian duty and attainment remains the same on any scheme.

But books influence the mind and determine the practical convictions by the general strain of representation which prevails in them, and by the cast of thought and feeling from which they come and to which they introduce the reader. It will not do to judge of their tendency simply by portions of them which are true and weighty, as separately taken. Indeed, if such books were never to be read, but by established and circum-spect Christians, there might be little need for sifting them. But the case is far otherwise. We would not forget how largely God may be pleased to make use of any portion of his truth to awaken the consciences and enlighten the minds of men. Still less would we be guilty of the folly and sin of presuming to judge the state of any person, by what appears to us to be the tendency of some of his views. But a book which will come, no doubt, into the hands of many young persons and many inquirers, must be judged according to its scope and tendency as a whole. Ought there to be any writing on the new life, can there be any that is satisfactory, of which the doctrine of the great atonement does not form a vital element? Nay, must not that life which in its beginning and in its progress dispenses with a true atonement, be either a mere ethical dream, or else a form of natural life that merely simulates the life of godliness,—in either case equally deceptive and misleading? We wish to fix attention on this point. Let us set aside all question as to anything that tends to unsettle the doctrinal views of readers, and let us ask whether the mere propounding in detail of a new life which does not rest on or refer to a true atonement, be not full of practical danger? We are willing to discuss, and think it useful to discuss, the point in this view only. Admitting, then, most fully that there are good and useful things in this book, we must yet express our conviction that it is fitted to mislead the inquirer in reference to the beginning and outset of the new life, and also as to the nature and manner of its growth; and this misleading tendency is the direct result of the defects to which we have referred already.

It is one of the great dangers of inquirers, of those especially who are capable of the finer impulses, that they are apt to mistake a new life (so called) for the new life; they are apt to embark in a new life which involves and implies no new birth. There is a religiosity with which many minds are readily visited, which includes aspirations after the good, the beautiful, and the true,—admits many movements of graceful sentiment, and is capable of assimilating and embodying many moving and elevating views of Jesus Christ. It may produce very considerable alterations upon the conduct, and throw a glow of elevated feeling over many passages of the history. Yet it may altogether fail to bring the man to God, and in particular may fail to bring his heart into harmony with the peculiar tone and spirit of the Scriptures. It proves, accordingly, transient, passing over by degrees into some other mood of life; and even while it lasts it is not mighty to the casting down of strongholds. And this is precisely the plane

(to use one of Dr. Bushnell's expressions) of religion to which we apprehend, and have reason to apprehend, that the way will be smoothed, by every such scheme as that which Dr. Bushnell expounds. We hope we need not say that we keep fully in view the fact that men are often better than their scheme, and may have received safely into their own hearts the benefits which their scheme endangers or obscures. That makes no difference on the judgment that is to be made of it. And we repeat, that every scheme which obscures the tremendous condemnation due to the sinner, and the proper propitiation of Christ, has a direct adverse bearing on the conversion of men; and that in the way of leading them into practical mistakes about the new life, not to speak now of any other danger.

First, It hides from them the heinousness of sin as an infinite wrong done to God, a wrong which the sinner himself can neither recall nor expiate. Every one feels and acknowledges that there is something wrong about his sin. But what the wrong is and shall be held to be, is in fact a great part of the controversy between God and men. On God's part, what is to be thought of it is revealed chiefly by the exhibition of the doom which sin justly incurs, and by the exhibition of that only atonement by which sin is expiated and put away. The whole question of repentance consists in this, whether the sinner shall pass over to be heartily agreed with God about his sin. And he who obscures (with whatever good intentions) the truths we have alluded to, runs the imminent hazard of misleading men to content themselves with some sort of repentance which shall not be repentance unto God. There are many kinds of repentance in the world, but repentance unto God is something by itself. Nor does Dr. Bushnell supply a sufficient practical substitute for what he takes away, when he represents Christ's suffering as an immense sorrow on our Lord's part, arising as sin came into revolting contact with his pure mind; and this again as the manifestation, once, in history, of divine reactions and endurances under the burden of sin which are perennial. This will be found utterly inadequate to the purpose of grounding in the minds of men a due sense of the evil of their sin. It may awaken a sentiment of remorse; but in the end, men will not believe that the divine nature suffers, in any such sense as should hinder them to forgive themselves for what they have done amiss. This is the grand danger; that men whom God has not forgiven shall find means to forgive themselves, and to rest content with that. There is one view of sin and of forgiveness, and only one, which effectually meets this danger. We regret to say it is not Dr. Bushnell's. Indeed, we wonder that he can hide from himself the insignificance of the difference which divides him from the mere Socinian view of the death of Christ.

Secondly, This scheme leaves no room for calling men to cast themselves on the atonement of Christ as the sole ground of acceptance with God. It does leave room for calling men to place themselves under the influence of Christ, and we willingly acknowledge how earnestly Dr. Bushnell does so; but the faith in Jesus as the propitiation which has been heretofore enforced in the Reformed Churches, is quite beside the mark on this scheme. Now, this is vital in its bearing, not merely on the peace of conscience, but on the renewal of hearts. That movement of the inner man in which a sinner heartily embraces and embarks for eternity on the propitiation as that which alone redeems him, is something more than the era of a sinner's justification. It is the inward decision of the questions which are in hand between God and man, in the form in which God has stated those questions in the gospel, and with reference to the issue upon which he finally requires us to return. That decision, in the experience of a multitude of Christians, was the step which carried them into newness of life. It involved the elements of all; it was the heart bowing to accept the doom of God upon the whole world's life and righteousness; and it was the personal appropriation of Christ and of his righteousness as that which henceforward should alone be held fit to come into consideration before God as the plea and hope of men. It involved, therefore, a clear and honest passing over, in the inner man, from self to Christ. It was a passing over upon the question, what was to be held to for righteousness, and what abhorred and doomed for sin,—doomed already by God, that doom accepted now by us. We have no words to express our sense of the mischief likely to be wrought by every scheme which obscures this point,—wrought in the way of misleading men, not only as to the ground of acceptance, but also as to the decisive transition which conversion implies.

We repeat, then, that Dr. Bushnell's scheme has a tendency to betray men into a new life (so called) that shall be without a new birth. We grant fully, and have no wish to disguise it, that in his chapter on regeneration he speaks of the change as a great and decisive one, and one in the accomplishment of which the divine power of the Spirit is necessarily required. We are glad that he does so; but we cannot on this account modify the judgment already expressed. In that chapter Dr. Bushnell does not enter into any investigation of the mode or measure of divine interposition. His plan does not lead him to do so, for he occupies himself with tracing the conscious processes of mind through which the experience of regeneration may be reached and realized. Let those processes be carefully considered as he describes them. There is a process of self-clearing; there is also a process of searching after God, as revealed in Christ, that the light may fill and influence the heart. Here true and touching things are said of Christ as the revelation of God. And yet, after all, it is a process of regeneration without the cross of Christ. Dr. Bushnell's convert finds no especial use for this. The offence of the cross is not in it; and, therefore, we fear it is a kind of conversion to which the flesh may be reconciled. The true offence of the cross does not consist merely or mainly in the mortifications, in the detailed self-denials, which Christianity implies. It consists, first, in the bowing of the soul to seek peace by the blood of the cross; and then in the peculiar spirit and character which that imparts to all the subsequent labours and crucifixions of the old man. This offence of the cross, we deeply regret to say, we do not find in Dr. Bushnell's account of regeneration.

And hence, while we cordially appreciate all that Dr. Bushnell has said, often so well, of fellowship with Christ, of the closeness of the believer's intimacy with him, and the transfiguring grace that passes from the Lord to his followers, we are not satisfied that the influence even of these statements will be always so happy as he desires. It is well for him who has truly yielded himself up to Christ, to have the largest and most cheering views of what he may expect from the society and the self-revelation of that exalted Friend. But Christ is present with men only in a way and on a footing consistent with his own character and his own truth. And it is not well that men should assume that Christ will be present with them in loving and elevating influences, to sanction and endorse their religious aspirations, unless those are aspirations which they have learned of him.

Hence, also, we are not surprised to find that Dr. Bushnell gravitates, by a necessity of his system, towards representing the transition from nature to grace as neither so decisive nor so supernatural as he seems to admit it to be in some passages. In the chapter on regeneration he explicitly refers to the agency of a supernatural power. But then it is a maxim of Dr. Bushnell's religious philosophy to bring the natural and supernatural, as much as may be, into "the same plane." And, accordingly, in his book on Christian Nurture, we find the tendency of his scheme becoming manifest. With many true and just statements as to the gradual development of Christianity to be expected in the case of children trained in Christian homes, and as to the possibility generally of conversion being realized without very signal conscious crises in the experience, positions are laid down which must be simply and strongly controverted. The dependence which he places on "natural laws inhabited by supernatural agencies," and the way in which he discourages dependence on anything else, is really consistent with nothing higher than Pelagianism.

If the bearing of Dr. Bushnell's teaching on the outset of Christian life is thus practically defective, its bearing on the course and progress of that life must be exposed to similar objections. Our space only admits of announcing this, without dwelling on it. We feel that it may seem ungrateful to say it. There is so much that is instructive and edifying in this department, and in particular, so fine a glow is given to the treatment by the earnestness with which the believer's union to Christ is urged and pleaded for, that one would willingly forego criticism. And yet we must say we miss one thing about the Life, as its springs and its growth are here unfolded, —and that is the Bread. "The bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." The food of the new life, without which it pines away, is that which the Lord's Supper holds out. It is not even Christ as he may be imagined and represented by those who choose to think of him as a wondrous teacher, or as a mighty quickener, or as a patient sufferer under the offence of human provocation—as this and no more. The food is, his body broken for me, and his blood shed for me. We cannot afford that this should be taken away: neither can we suffer that to be represented as the true life which is able to live without this food, or with a shadowy substitute for it.

But we have already exceeded reasonable bounds. We have felt called upon to express ourselves frankly in reference to the practical tendency of these works. They may be read with profit by those who carry along with them, and supply, the corrective which they require; but they are not to be circulated with blind and indiscriminate confidence. They are fitted to be suggestive and interesting to a considerate and well-grounded Christian: they may possibly awaken reflection in the minds of some who would repel sounder teaching; but the points in which they go astray, and lead astray, are fundamental.

"THE EARNEST LABOURER."*

SUCH is the title of a brief, unpretending, but most interesting memorial sketch, lately brought under our notice, and which we believe our readers will thank us for introducing to theirs. In this world of trial, we often find comfort from the recorded experience of those whom a faithful God has enabled patiently to glorify him by suffering according to his will. But yet more cheering, more encouraging, is every instance of what a believer may be graciously enabled to do for Christ, in a life, long or short, devoted to his service. When the good and faithful servant is permitted, even on earth, to see the fruit of his labours, as in the case before us, those who look on, or look back, may well "thank God, and take courage." From such a history we rise refreshed, ready with new strength to run with patience the race set before us.

The story of Basil Patras Zula, as written by a brother minister of kindred spirit, reads almost like a romance. He was a son of Greece, worthy of having lived in her days of ancient glory. Born to the rank of chieftain in one of her noble families, he inherited all the physical beauty still characteristic of his race, along with much of the mental energy and elevation from which they have often so sadly degenerated. But his lot was cast in evil times. He was under five years of age when his father died of fever, brought on by excessive fatigue and anxiety during the warfare of independence then waging between the Turks and the Greek patriots. He had resolved, if possible, to secure for his son a more peaceful life, and to bring him up for an honourable position in the Church. The widowed mother naturally wished to carry out these intentions, and gave her boy every advantage of education suited for this purpose.

"He was not, however, permitted to pursue this peaceful course; for when he arrived at the age of eleven years, the chiefs of his tribe demanded that he should either be placed at their head, or resign his pretensions to another. Thus urged, the widow arrayed her boy in the splendid costume of his fathers, and committed him to the care of those who were henceforth to be his counsellors. His position was now altered indeed. The school was exchanged for the field; and exercised in an almost Spartan mode of life, he became a thorough master of all the rude tactics which had enabled his people so long to preserve a precarious independence."

Such a life was surrounded by many dangers. A price was set by Ali Pacha on the boy chieftain's head, and every art used to gain possession of his person. One evening, when his mother was paying him a visit, the terrible cry, just at hand, "The Turks! the Turks!" struck terror into every heart. There was no time to make preparation for defence, nothing could be attempted but instant flight. Mother and son escaped to the mountains, where they wandered about for fifteen days, living on wild herbs and fruits. At length they reached Parga in safety, and considering it impossible to return to Roumelia, the next two years were spent in Italy, and chiefly devoted to study. In 1822, at the age of eighteen, Zula returned to his fatherland, and gave all his energies to rousing the spirit of patriotism among his countrymen. "Some time after, he was found acting as the agent of a kind of warlike Diaspora, labouring to gather the dispersed of Greece to the support of their country's cause. In this character, he traversed Russia, Poland, Turkey, Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Persia, and Egypt, to the very borders of Abyssinia; and his mission being ended, he hastened home, to take part with the patriot band in suffering and success."

Terrible scenes followed, "in which Turk and patriot seemed striving who most could please him who was a murderer from the beginning." Yet even here, we are told, Zula did not sink to the common level. He was ever merciful to his enemies, and full of tenderness to his own men. "Thus he won the love of the soldier in his beloved Greece, as he afterwards won the affections of the peasant in Kilwarlin, his adopted home."

Then came the ever memorable siege of Missolonghi, defended during fifteen months with Spartan courage and heroism. Surrounded by Turkish legions on land, and blockaded by the Ottoman and Egyptian fleets by sea, the unfortunate inhabitants preferred death in any form to surrender. When at length their city was reduced to a heap of ruins, and they had themselves endured the last extremities of famine, those who could still carry arms determined at least to perish in an attempt to escape, while the more feeble resolved to embrace death rather than fall alive into the hands of their merciless foes. Early one morning, five thousand men—Zula one of them—making a sudden sally, forced their way into the midst of the enemy, who, taken by surprise, were slain in numbers; and although half of the heroic band also fell, the remainder succeeded in clearing the lines. A few hours after, a cloud of mingled smoke and fire rising above the devoted city, proclaimed the fate of those left behind. "They, and some thousands of Turks who had entered the place, perished in one terrific explosion. The heart-stricken survivors turned from the sight to meet new perils, and to seek for other homes." Zula, though dangerously wounded, escaped with life, but never could shake off the impression of horror left by the scene, nor allude to the subject without the most painful feelings.

The evil passions of both parties were now roused to the utmost. Zula's gentle disposition and high sense of honour were alike shocked, by the desperate acts of revenge and retaliation on every side, and the atrocities committed in the name of patriotism. At last, after remonstrating in vain, on one occasion, against the cold-blooded murder of a band of captive Turks, "he retired in disgust from the barbarous contest." Soon after, in 1826, Sir William Eden met with him in Smyrna, and entered into engagements with him as a travelling companion. His acquaintance and relationships among the chiefs of Western Greece enabled him, as Sir William testified, to render essential service.

In 1827, when sailing up the Nile, Zula, for the first time, appears to have bestowed serious attention upon the subject of religion, and made many inquiries regarding the Scriptures and the Protestant faith, as distinguished from the Greek and Roman Churches. But the great crisis of his spiritual history was yet to come. Next year the travellers returned to Britain, and after a short residence in England, crossed over to Dublin. Zula "entered that city a self-made exile, without country, religion, or friends; but, being led by an unseen hand, he was there to find them all."

"The proprietor of that highly respectable establishment in Sackville Street, the Bilton Hotel, unlike most men engaged in the same calling, maintained the honourable position of priest in his own house. He duly presided at family worship, to which all under his roof, whether inmates or passing strangers, were invited. On the present occasion, Mr. Bilton being absent on important business, an Irish lady, a visitor in the family, was requested to conduct the service. The English gentleman and his Grecian friend were present. Zula had devoutly called upon the Virgin for aid in times of danger, and was no stranger to the solemnities of Greek and Romish Churches; but such a prayer as was offered on this occasion he had never heard before. Who could she be that uttered it, and to what people did she belong? She was a Moravian Sister, connected with a small congregation of United Brethren in the city. 'Moravians—United Brethren: who were they? If they were like her they must be Christians.' Such thoughts and questions were stirring in Zula's mind, when, upon his table, he found a 'Brief Narrative,'—a short history of the Moravian Brethren. He took it up and read, 'The Church of the United Brethren originally descended from the Sclavonic branch of the Greek Church; which is supposed to have received the gospel through the immediate agency of the apostles and their contemporaries. See Rom. xv. 19; 2 Tim. iv. 10.'

The interest and attention thus awakened never slumbered again. He went to hear the Sabbath services in the Brethren's congregation in Bishop Street; and there the Holy Spirit opened the lonely stranger's heart, like that of Lydia of old, to receive the truth as it is in Jesus. It frequently and naturally happens, that an individual suddenly brought to know and embrace the gospel, unites with that branch of the universal Church whose ministry has been the instrument of bringing the glad tidings home to his soul. So it was with Zula. With characteristic decision and ardour, he devoted himself to the service of Christ among the Brethren, and the Greek chieftain had henceforward no higher ambition than to become a Moravian "labourer."

Following the advice of his new Christian friends, Zula now spent some time in retirement, at the Moravian settlement of Gracehill, in the north of Ireland, where he employed himself in diligent study of the Scriptures, the English language, and the history and constitution of the Church of which he had become a member. His manners and accomplishments made his society sought after by the best circles in the neighbourhood; but all temptations of a worldly kind were resisted, while he made rapid progress in grace and knowledge.

"Up to this time he had been a soldier, a Greek partisan, gentle to his friends as was the youthful shepherd of Bethlehem; but like him, a hater of his country's foes. Often had he maintained in argument, 'the Lord Jesus and his apostles would have shown no mercy to the Turks. What! were they not the bloodthirsty tyrants—the base plunderers of Greece?' One day, the young minister under whose instruction he had placed himself, was surprised to see the soldier student enter his room in great agitation. 'Come now! come, I see it now!' and hastily leading the way to his room, he pointed to the text, Matt. v. 44, exclaiming, 'Love your enemies! Love your enemies! I see it now!—even the Turks! It bids us love our enemies, even the Turks! even the Turks! Another anecdote connected with his stay in Gracehill must not be omitted, as it shows his zeal for God, and the boldness with which he upheld what he felt to be right. At church, a number of young men had taken their place during public worship in front of the gallery. Sunday after Sunday they remained sitting while the assembled congregation prayed the beautiful Morning Litany. Zula's eye was fixed upon them with the same glance with which in other days it had turned upon turbaned enemies. At length he could restrain himself no longer: walking directly up the gallery stairs, he reached the end of the bench on which they sat:—'Stand up! worship God!' he exclaimed. At once, as if electrified, they rose; he returned to his place: there was no necessity to repeat the lesson."

In 1829, he removed to Dublin, and continued such studies as formed a suitable preparation for the ministry. Here another event of importance occurred in his personal history.

"Early on the 19th of April 1829, Bishop Street witnessed a scene of cheerful bustle rather unusual to the quiet Moravian chapel in that dull street. The population of the neighbourhood had evidently something more pleasant than ordinary to engage their attention. Windows were thrown open, and smiling groups were gathered round the entrance gate. A bridal party comes forth: no one could mistake that noble figure, that manly bearing—it was Zula; and she who walks beside him, calm, reflective, cheerful, is the same Moravian Sister whom he had first met with at the Bilton Hotel. 'She it was,' he afterwards said, 'who first was the instrument in leading me to the Saviour. I had nothing to bestow in return; I offered myself, and was accepted.' Certainly he never had reason to regret his choice; nor had she any cause to repent of her confidence in him; his union with her was undoubtedly a great means of his subsequent success in the ministry."

His one object, henceforward, was preparation for usefulness as a preacher of the gospel. Difficulties were gradually removed, and after a visit to Herrnhut, in 1832, he returned to Ireland cheered and strengthened, more than ever desirous fully to follow and serve the Lord.

He obtained permission from the Church to make trial of his powers as a preacher at Kilwarlin, seven miles from Ballinderry, where, seventy years before, a promising Moravian congregation had existed. From a variety of causes, the work there had completely declined, till all that now remained was a desolate burying-ground, a ruinous chapel, and six individuals who still professed adherence to the Church of the Brethren.

Zula, along with the Brother who was minister at Ballinderry, waited upon the Marquis of Downshire, to know if he would consent to the revival of the Moravian congregation on his estate. He was not at home, and his agent spoke most discouragingly. "It were useless to call upon the Marquis about that business, as his lordship had already determined to take the place from the Moravians, and give it to others, who were not likely to manage it worse than they had done." Zula, however, declared his determination to take an answer only from head-quarters. Not even a chilling interview with the nobleman himself, whom they met on the road, could extinguish his hopes. He made an engagement for a meeting on the following day.

"Next morning found him at the castle gate: the door was opened, and in a few moments the Grecian stranger stood once more in the presence of Downshire's noble Marquis. His lordship had called together a committee of respectable farmers, as the persons who were most concerned, to consider the subject, and they had come to their final determination; 'which,' said his lordship, 'is as follows: We see no reason why the place should any longer be left in the hands of a people whose members are at once so few and so old that they cannot long survive. We have decided that the ground shall be offered to the Church of England.' So the case was closed, and would have been closed for ever, if our representative had not been Br. Zula. But who shall describe the look of astonishment with which that respectable committee regarded the stranger, as he started to his feet, and spoke such words as these:—'My lord, I thought I was coming to speak to a nobleman of independent spirit, who would control his own affairs; and I am surprised to find that you have called in these men, to be ruled by them.' He ceased: there was silence for a moment. Had the Marquis of Downshire been an ordinary character, he would have felt himself insulted. But he was a nobleman of truly independent mind, quite capable of ruling his own affairs, and of appreciating independence and capacity in others. He immediately arose, held out his hand to Br. Zula, saying, 'The place is yours; do what you like with it.'"

No time was lost in following up the advantage thus gained. A few more days saw the minister and his wife settled in Kilwarlin; which, from that time, was their adopted home, the centre of all their hopes and wishes. Into the details of their work, as given in the Memoir, we shall not here enter; but a few sentences from Zula's private journal will show the spirit in which it was begun and carried on:—

"Yes, my Lord and gracious Master, I pray with fervour of spirit, that all within me may be wholly resigned to thy unerring guidance, and especially my endeavours to do thy work. The weapons of my warfare now are not carnal, but I feel that they are mighty to the pulling down of the strongholds of sin."

"What am I, O my God, or what my father's house, that thou shouldest honour me to help to build the old waste places. From a far country have I journeyed, and found rest here; and at thy altar do I anew dedicate body, soul, and spirit, to be devoted to thy glorious service. Enable me, O my Lord, to sink self in the care of those who surround me; to sympathize, to pity, to have a fellow-feeling of their wants, joys, and sorrows, and to be truly concerned for the spiritual welfare of all."

His first sermon was preached September 14th, 1834, in the old church, but its state was so utterly ruinous and miserable, that to continue services there was absolutely dangerous. The energetic minister determined at once on the erection, first of a new school-house, and then a place of worship. To accomplish this, he gladly devoted alike his worldly substance, and his personal efforts of every kind. He narrowly escaped a fatal accident while superintending the taking down of the old building. Stepping upon a rotten beam, the whole roof gave way, and he was only saved by having presence of mind and agility to spring back upon the wall. His own dwelling was of the humblest description, and he refused an offer from the marquis of a comfortable house in Hillsborough; expressing his determination to remain among his own poor people, and the fear that greater domestic comforts might distract him from his work.

The new church, when opened in March 1835, was well filled by an attentive congregation, and in the afternoon, at a communion love-feast (the first in Kilwarlin for sixteen years), twenty-six persons were joined as new members to the society; while the hearts of the minister and his assisting brethren overflowed with joy and thankfulness.

Hitherto Zula had only been what we would call a probationer, labouring in a mission station. But in January 1837, at the earnest request of his increasing flock, he was ordained to be their regular pastor, "a Presbyter of the Protestant Church of the Brethren," by the Bishop Hans Peter Hallbeck, then on a visit to Ireland.

He went on and prospered, for the Lord was with him. The great secret of his success seems to have been, not so much preaching talents, as earnestness in all that he did. He was "instant in season, out of season," ready at every call, speaking of Jesus to every one whom he met with. His actions, as his words, came from the heart, and the warm-hearted though ignorant peasantry among whom his lot was cast, were not slow to appreciate such a friend.

"If the sword of the Spirit, which the Captain of our salvation had given to our late dear Brother to wield, had neither a spangled sheath nor an ornamented hilt, it had a point. If his object in preaching was not to deliver a good sermon, it was something far better, it was to speak to sinners for their good. His was not the artificial fire of a practised orator, but the genuine warmth of a pious heart. He believed, therefore he spoke with energy; he prayed, and therefore his energy was prospered. When from his opening lips there came the words, 'My dear brethren and sisters,' the hearers knew that the words meant something; every day's actions said they were dear to him. The very plainness he used, the startling abruptness with which he attacked some sin or deprecated some error, gave a reality to his discourse. People thought, 'Surely some one is about to choose the evil and refuse the good; Brother Zula knows it, and he is hastening to prevent the harm before it comes.' Many were almost persuaded that such a man as he 'could certainly divine.' 'Yes, Brother Zula,' they would say, 'you spoke the truth to me yesterday, I did such and such a thing last week, but I will not do it again.'

"Often, as he felt the powers of the world to come, would the tears roll down his cheeks, while he besought men 'by the mercies of God to present their bodies to the Lord, which is their reasonable service.' 'Ah!' he would say, 'the time was when I did not think those hearts worth a musket shot that I now see cost the blood of Christ.'"

In the course of a few years, the congregation which he found with only six members in all, numbered a hundred and twenty-nine in full communion, besides many non-communicants and children. But we must not estimate the extent of his usefulness by the statistics of his regular flock. He was doubtless blessed to very many others, who did not feel themselves called on to join the Moravian Church. The nobleman and his son, whose confidence Zula so quickly gained, continued to the end his kind friends and helpers; and his biographer says: "We have often hoped, while thinking of this noble family, that perhaps the stranger from Greece may have brought to them that pearl whose price is above rubies, free forgiveness of sins from the pierced hand of Jesus."

But, in the mysterious providence of God, this faithful servant's period of labour was to be a brief one. No evening twilight of long suffering or inaction was appointed for him; his sun went down while it was yet day. In September 1844, he left Kilwarlin on a visit to Dublin, to plead the cause of some home mission work requiring aid at Gracehill. He felt unwell immediately after his arrival, and next morning, while attending church, was taken so violently ill during the service, that a physician had to be hastily summoned. He at once pronounced the complaint to be serious, though for some days no dangerous symptoms appeared.

"Calmly resting in the Lord, and submitting everything to his will, the patient was at peace. 'It is the Lord,' he would say, 'my God, thy will be done.' During the whole time of his sickness, he displayed the firmness of his original character, chastened by the gentleness and meekness of Christ. He had learned the lessons of his Lord so well, that even in burning fever the peace of God appeared to govern his whole being—he had rest in his Saviour. He gratefully acknowledged every kindness of friend or servant; even the practised nurse, accustomed as she was to the chambers of sickness and death, declared she had never attended such a patient; so calm in danger, so gentle in suffering, so holy even in delirium. As in health, so in sickness, Kilwarlin and the brethren and sisters there were the subject of his thoughts. Engaged almost constantly in prayer and singing, a blessed intercourse was thus maintained between him and the friend of his soul—Jesus was always near at hand to sustain his servant. His confidence remained unshaken, so that he could often rejoicingly exclaim, ‘O Lord, my trust is in thee: I am thine, do with me as seemeth right in thy sight.’”

All that medical skill and fond affection could do to arrest the progress of disease, was done, but in vain. On the eighth day the fever evidently assumed a malignant form. “The fears of the Kilwarlin congregation were increased. It was not sufficient to tell one or another what news had come from Dublin,—the letters were read at the door to crowds of brethren and sisters. ‘Is he not better to-day?’ old sisters would say; ‘he must get better, surely he cannot die.’” Alas! the will of the Lord was otherwise. On the morning of October 3rd, it was too plainly seen that the last hope of recovery was gone. “He had passed through the battle of life, he had fought the good fight, and the victory was won, through the blood of the Lamb. Deep silence reigned by that bed of death and life, as imperceptibly, without a struggle, the spirit of Basil Patras Zula entered into the joy of his Lord.”

The grief of his own people may be better imagined than described. “They were still indulging hope when Sister Zula returned. The sight of that place, the sad reflection of her loneliness, and the bitter recollection of her beloved, the desire of her eyes, taken away as with a stroke—overpowered her. She entered the house; but could only exclaim: ‘He is gone! he is gone!’”

“As the sad tidings spread from cottage to cottage, a blight seemed to have fallen upon everything around. There was but one unmingled feeling of sadness;—women wept, and stout-hearted, hard-working men threw down their spades in the field, and wrung their hands for grief.”

The coffin with the precious remains was soon brought from Dublin, and deposited in the church, where during the next few days, numbers of the people loved to linger around, singing their favourite hymns. On the 8th October, in the presence of a crowd of mourners, “from the noble marquis to the poorest cottager,” among whom Sister Zula was “for a time almost forgotten in her grief where all were grieving,” the beautiful Burial Litany was read and sung, and the beloved dust committed to the grave. “Every eye was dimmed with tears, but never did a multitude of mourners more fervently respond to the concluding prayer:—‘Keep us in everlasting fellowship with our brother Basil Patras Zula, whose remains we here inter, and with the whole Church triumphant; and let us rest with them in thy presence from our labours. Amen.’”

And so he rests in hope, far from the classic shores of his loved fatherland, and the tombs of his ancestors;

yet, shall we not say, in a more honoured grave than theirs? For when the names of earth’s proudest heroes shall be forgotten, that of the Greek Moravian pastor shall be in everlasting remembrance. Then “they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever.”

Oh, for more of such earnest labourers as Zula, in all the Churches of Christ; and not in the ministry alone, but in each department of the great harvest field! Then, on every side, as at Kilwarlin, we should see the “old waste places” restored, and the moral wilderness begin “to rejoice and blossom as the rose.” Each Christian reader’s heart will respond to the wish; let him consider in what respect he can act upon it—in what sphere he, too, may “go and do likewise.”

DOUBTERS.

[In reviewing a recent rationalistic work Henry Rogers says:—]

THE way in which our author disposes of the miracles, is essentially that of an indiscriminating, unphilosophic mind. There have been, he tells us in effect, so many false miracles, superstitious stories of witches, conjurers, ghosts, hobgoblins, of cures by royal touch, and the like; and, therefore, the Scripture miracles are false! Why, who denies that there have been plenty of false miracles? And there have been as many false religions. Is there, therefore, none true? The proper business in every such case is to examine fairly the evidence, and not to generalise after this absurd fashion. Otherwise we shall never believe anything; for there is hardly one truth that has not its half score of audacious counterfeits.

Still our author is amusingly perplexed, like all the rest of the infidel world, how to get rid of the miracles—whether on the principle of fraud, or fiction, or illusion. He thinks there would be “a great accession to the ranks of reason and common sense by disproving the reality of the miracles, without damaging the veracity or honesty of the simple, earnest, and enthusiastic writers by whom they are recorded;” and complains of the coarse and indiscriminating criticism of most of the French and English Deists, who explain the miracles “on the supposition of the grossest fraud acting on the grossest credulity.” But he soon finds that the materials for such a compromise are utterly intractable. He thinks that the German Rationalists have depended too much on some “single hypothesis, which often proves to be insufficient to meet the great variety of conditions and circumstances with which the miracles have been handed down to us.” Very true: but what remedy? “We find one German writer endeavouring to explain away the miracles on the mystical (mythical) theory; and another riding into the arena of controversy on the miserable hobby-horse of ‘clairvoyance,’ or ‘mesmerism;’ each of these, and a host of others of the same class, rejecting whatever light is thrown on the question by all the theories together." Our author therefore proposes, with great and gratuitous liberality, to heap all these theories together, and to take them as they are wanted; not withholding any of the wonders of modern science—even, as would seem, the possible knowledge of "chloroform"—from the propagators of Christianity!

But, alas! the phenomena are still intractable. The stubborn "Book," in its very structure, baffles all such efforts to explain it away; it is willing to be rejected, if it so pleases men, but it guards itself from being thus made a fool of. For who can fail to see that neither all nor any considerable part of the multifarious miracles of the New Testament can be explained by any such gratuitous extension of ingenious fancies; and that if they could be so explained, it would be still impossible to exculpate the men who need such explanations from the charge of perpetrating the grossest frauds! Yet our logical ostrich, who can digest all these stones, presumptuously declares a miracle an impossibility, and the very notion of it a contradiction.

There are, no doubt, some minds amongst us, whose power we admit, and whose perversion of power we lament, who have bewildered themselves by really deep meditation on inexplicable mysteries; who demand certainty where certainty is not given to man, or demand for truths which are established by sufficient evidence, other evidence than those truths will admit. We can even painfully sympathise in that ordeal of doubt to which such minds are peculiarly exposed—with their Titanic struggles against the still mightier power of Him who has said to the turbulent intellect of man, as well as to the stormy ocean, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further,—and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." We cannot wish better to any such agitated mind than that it may listen to those potent and majestic words: "Peace—be still!" uttered by the voice of Him who so suddenly hushed the billows of the Galilean lake.

But we are at the same time fully convinced that in our day there are thousands of youths who are falling into the same errors and perils from sheer vanity and affectation; who admire most what they least understand, and adopt all the obscurities and paradoxes they stumble upon, as a cheap path to a reputation for profundity; who awkwardly imitate the manner and retail the phrases of the writers they study; and, as usual in such cases, exaggerate to caricature their least agreeable eccentricities. We should think that some of these more powerful minds must be by this time ashamed of that ragged regiment of most shallow thinkers, and obscure writers and talkers who at present infest our literature, and whose parrot-like repetition of their own stereotyped phraseology, mingled with some barbarous infusion of half-Anglicised German, threatens to form as odious a cant as ever polluted the stream of thought, or disfigured the purity of language. Happily it is not likely to be more than a passing fashion; but still it is a very unpleasant fashion while it lasts. As in Johnson's day, every young writer imitated as well as he could the ponderous diction and everlasting antitheses of the great dictator; as in Byron's day, there were thousands to whom the world "was a blank" at twenty or thereabouts, and of whose "dark imaginings," as Macaulay says, the waste was prodigious; so now there are hundreds of dilettanti pantheists, mystics and sceptics, to whom everything is a "sham," an "unreality;" who tell us that the world stands in need of a great "prophet," a "seer," a "true priest," a "large soul," a "god-like soul," who shall dive into "the depths of the human consciousness," and whose "utterances" shall rouse the human mind from the "cheats and frauds" which have hitherto everywhere practised on its simplicity. They tell us, in relation to philosophy, religion, and especially in relation to Christianity, that all that has been believed by mankind has been believed only on "empirical" grounds; and that the old answers to difficulties will do no longer. They shake their sage heads at such men as Clarke, Paley, Butler, and declare that such arguments as theirs will not satisfy them.—We are glad to admit that all this vague pretension is now but rarely displayed in conjunction with the scurrilous spirit of that elder unbelief against which the long series of British apologists for Christianity arose between 1700 and 1750; but there is often in it an arrogance as real, though not in so offensive a form. Sometimes the spirit of unbelief even assumes an air of sentimental regret at its own inconvenient profundity. Many a worthy youth tells us he almost wishes he could believe. He admires, of all things, the "moral grandeur," the "ethical beauty" of many parts of Christianity; he condescends to patronise Jesus Christ, though he believes that the great mass of words and actions, by which alone we know anything about him, are sheer fictions or legends; he believes—gratuitously enough in this instance, for he has no ground for it—that Jesus Christ was a very "great man," worthy of comparison at least with Mohammed, Luther, Napoleon, and "other heroes;" he even admits the happiness of a simple, child-like faith in the puerilities of Christianity—it produces such content of mind! But, alas! he cannot believe—his intellect is not satisfied—he has revolved the matter too profoundly to be thus taken in; he must, he supposes (and our beardless philosopher sighs as he says it), bear the penalty of a too restless intellect, and a too speculative genius; he knows all the usual arguments which satisfied Pascal, Butler, Bacon, Leibnitz; but they will do no longer: more radical, more tremendous difficulties have suggested themselves, "from the depths of philosophy," and far different answers are required now!

This is easily said, and we know is often said, and loudly. But the justice with which it is said is another matter; for when we can get these cloudy objectors to put down, not their vague assertions of profound difficulties, uttered in the obscure language they love, but a precise statement of their objections, we find them either the very same with those which were quite as powerfully urged in the course of the deistical controversies of the last century (the case with far the greater part), or else such as are of similar character, and susceptible of similar answers. We say not that the answers were always satisfactory, nor are now inquiring whether any of them were so; we merely maintain that the objections in question are not the novelties they affect to be. It is necessary to remember this, in order to obviate an advantage which the very vagueness of much modern opposition to Christianity would obtain, from the notion that some prodigious arguments have been discovered, which the intellect of a Pascal or a Butler was not comprehensive enough to anticipate, and which no Clarke or Paley would have been logician enough to refute. We affirm, without hesitation, that when the new advocates of infidelity descend from their airy elevation, and state their objections in intelligible terms, they are found, for the most, what we have represented them. Indeed, when we read many of the speculations of German infidelity, we seem to be re-perusing many of our own authors of the last century. It is as if our neighbours had imported our manufactures; and, after re-packing them, in novel forms and with some additions of their own, had re-shipped and sent them back to us as new commodities. Hardly an instance of discrepancy is mentioned in the "Wolfenbüttel Fragments," which will not be found in the pages of our own deists a century ago; and, as already hinted, the vast majority of Dr. Strauss' elaborate strictures will be found in the same sources. In fact, though far from thinking it to our national credit, none but those who will dive a little deeper than most do into a happily forgotten portion of our literature (which made noise enough in its day, and created very superfluous terrors for the fate of Christianity), can have any idea of the extent to which the modern forms of unbelief in Germany—so far as founded on any positive grounds, whether of reason or of criticism,—are indebted to our English deists.

THE FORGOTTEN SHEAF.

SOME weeks after the close of harvest, when all the grain had been ripened, reaped, and safely stored, I was walking with a farmer across one of his own bare stubble fields, when suddenly in a hollow spot we came upon a single sheaf of corn lying on the ground alone. The owner of the field, yielding to a habit, which operated like an instinct, of preserving with scrupulous care every portion of the precious food of man, instantly stooped and grasped the sheaf, with the intention of carrying it home. Somewhat to his surprise, it did not come easily to his hand, as it would have done in harvest. Thereupon he seized it with both hands and pulled; but it stuck fast and resisted his effort. The reason was soon made plain. In the hurry of that busy sunny day when the dried corn was carried from the field to the stack-yard, this sheaf had accidentally dropped from the cart and lain in the hollow unseen. After the harvest, showers had come; and after the showers, heat. Although the sheaf had been once dry and ready for safe preservation in the granary, it had not continued in that condition, when left lying on the ground. Exposed first to the moisture and then to the warmth, and not turned over or moved for many days, the grains of corn in the sheaf began to smell the ground again. They swelled and burst, and sent down some small roots as if to feel their way. These penetrated into the earth, and tasted its sap, and so grew stronger. Others followed, and now thousands of strong fibres were deeply bedded in the soil and greedily drinking up its moisture. The whole sheaf was glued to the ground, and wholly spoiled. It could not now take its place in the garner; it was unfit for either seed or food. It must needs be cast away as chaff.

The sight was a sad one; the farmer seemed to sigh as he wrenched it violently from the ground, examined its hopelessly corrupt condition, and then threw it away as useless. The kind of the loss more than the quantity, grated harshly upon the instincts of the husbandman. The sight of good grain, that had once been almost saved, turned into corruption again by lying too long on the ground and too close to it, seemed to cast the shadow of a greater sorrow heavily over his heart.

The image of that once rich and promising, but now fallen, ruined, outcast sheaf, remained in my mind all the day; and at night when I was alone, it occupied and absorbed my thoughts. The Lord Jesus, when he was here on earth, often walked through cultivated fields at various stages of their progress; and he seems never to have allowed any prominent fact or feature to pass away, without reading off for his disciples the spiritual lesson which their dead letters contained. When portions of seed fell on the way-side, he warned them against a heedless hearing of the word; when grain that had quickly sprung on shallow ground, was seen withering in spring for want of deepness, he pointed out that the early goodness of unbroken hearts soon fades away before temptation; when the stalks that grew among thorns were seen in harvest, standing tall, but white, chaffy, worthless, he spoke of the worldly cares and wealth that choke the word and undo the man; when the fields were lying round him ripe, he lamented that the lost souls were so many, and the winners of souls so few. By his own method in his ministry, I see clearly the lesson that the Lord would have taught, if he had seen the sheaf once ripe, but now rotting because it had fallen back and cleaved again to the ground.

Of late the harvest has been plenteous, and the labourers not very few. Much precious fruit has been safely gathered. Great numbers have repented and turned to the Lord. But God who has given us many souls, expects that we should strive and pray as earnestly to keep them as we have striven and prayed to get them. Beware of backsliding! The path is slippery; the pilgrim feeble; and hidden snares abound.

Converts, remember that sheaf of corn, once rustling ripe and dry, a beauteous, yellow, golden treasure, filling the husbandman's bosom, and gladdening his heart,—lying outcast in the furrow now, a black decaying heap. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

Ah! young converts, fruits of a revival, you are not done with danger yet! The world has a proverb for you, good and useful in its own place,—“Do not halloo till you are out of the wood;” and the Scripture has also its own proverb prepared for your case,—“Let not him that putteth on his armour boast himself as he that putteth it off.” When you grow careless or confident, you will certainly stumble. Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation. The dangers are many and various, but the one which is perhaps most to be dreaded, and to which our attention is at present specially called, is the insinuating, enticing, and deadening power of the world.

The danger of the young convert is like the danger of the sheaf of corn. You have passed through deep waters. Your sins, while you felt they were not forgiven, so pressed you down that your heart within you melted and became as water. After you had lain a while in a horror of great darkness, you were led at last into light and liberty. Christ came to you, and his coming was like the morning. At his appearing the shadows flew away. Having no righteousness of your own, you grasped the righteousness of God by faith. Trusting in the blood of Christ for pardon of sin, you enjoyed peace with God.

Well: but perhaps it is a year or two years since you passed, as you believe, from death into life; and you walk less tremblingly, less watchfully, less prayerfully, than at first. Worldly company becomes pleasant again, and you begin to think you may enjoy it without sin. Young people near you, who have neither felt their own sins a burden, nor tasted the redeeming love of Christ, go freely into pleasures from which you stand aloof. The old appetite revives. Christ's yoke seems heavy; and you secretly envy the liberty of the world. At that moment, perhaps, some one suggests that you might allow yourself more liberty and yet be safe. When you have, at your own hand and without seeking to know your Lord's will, tasted one of the world's sweets, a thirst for more secretly springs in your heart, and that thirst soon finds its gratifications. Ah, you are growing into the ground like the forgotten sheaf. A little more of that, and your very soul will cleave to the dust, a spectacle to men for a while, and the object of divine judgment at last.

Do not cling very close to the world, or drink deeply of its joys: lie loose, and turn often over: lest you grow into it, and become like it, and perish with it. Let your treasure be in heaven, and if your feet must needs lean on earth, keep them busy in a walk with God, and a work for men. Be diligent in business, instant in prayer, and joyful in hope. When weak in yourself, you will be strong in the Lord. “He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved.”

TRUST.

O LORD my God, what can I fear
When thou art near?

I will in thy sweet love confide,
And ever hide

In thy dear breast my troubled heart,
When Satan's art
Shall try to tempt me from thy side.

I know that thou with men dost dwell,
And all is well;

When in my soul I hear thee speak,
To one so weak,

Of love that never dies away,
But still will stay

With every lowly child and meek.

I know that I can trust thee, Lord,
For in thy word

I find sweet promises of love,
Sent from above;

Which, all fulfilled, still prove my King,
When angels sing,

True to his saints while here they rove.

It is myself, not thee, I doubt,
When all about

The world is stirred, and 'mid its din,
My soul by sin,

That blinds my eyes, is made to choose
What all must lose,

And go astray, forgetting Him.

But O my God, I will not fear,
If thou'lt come near;

I will in thy sweet love confide,
And ever hide,

In thy dear breast, my troubled heart,
When Satan's art

Shall try to tempt me from thy side.

WHEN WILL YOU BE READY?

EVERY minister of Christ must have been often saddened by the tendency of men to postpone present duty. Procrastination characterizes all classes, more or less strongly, in whatever pertains to their immortal interests. Some, because they are not fit; some, because they imagine that circumstances hereafter will be more favourable, and all because they are not now ready, are allowing day after day, and year after year, of their precious and ever-shortening season of probation to pass away unimproved. Multitudes of this class readily confess their obligations to discharge this or that duty, but they are not ready to discharge it. Death is constantly thinning out their ranks; and death-beds, full of bitter and unavailing regrets, often warn them. But still they do not deliberately and seriously set themselves to do what they know they ought to do without delay. When will they be ready?

Here is a man who has, for years, hesitated to take a decided and consistent stand as a Christian professor. The vows of God are upon him. He assumed them voluntarily. He knows that he cannot shake them off. He is not a trifter; there is nothing in his external character that gives a decided lie to his profession; he is regularly in his place in the sanctuary, perhaps also in the room of conference and prayer. But he has never attempted deliberately and in humble reliance on God, to take an open and active part in the discharge of known and obvious Christian duty. Ask him why he has not done this, and his invariable reply is,—“I do not feel ready to do it.” Ah, yes, my dear friend, I understand you, but will you answer this question,—When will you be ready?

Not far distant from me is an inquirer after salvation. His mind has for years been tenderly impressed, and tears of solicitude often steal, uninvited, down his thoughtful face. Again and again has he been urged to go to Christ at once. He always wishes he was “ready” to go, but has not yet been ready. If this article should meet his eye, will he ponder this question,—When will you be ready?

Yonder is a man who says he has never felt any special anxiety upon religious subjects. He believes in the reality and necessity of religion, knows he must possess it or perish, and means to seek it before he dies, but he is not “ready” now.

That he is not ready now is, alas, too evident; but, if I had his private ear, I would like to propose for his consideration that important question, as yet unanswered,—When will you be ready?

UNCONSCIOUS DANGER.

I HAVE just been reading an account of the defeat, forty years ago, of the troops of a distinguished general in Italy. Having taken their stand near Terni, where the waters of the river Velino rush down an almost perpendicular precipice of three hundred feet, and thence toss and foam along through groves of orange and olive trees toward the Tiber, into which it soon empties, they attempted, when pressed by the Austrians, to make their escape over a bridge which spanned the stream just above the falls. In the hurry of the moment, and all unconscious of the insufficient strength of the structure, they rushed upon it in such numbers that it suddenly gave way, and precipitated hundreds of the shrieking, and now despairing men, into the rapid current below. There was no resisting such a tide when once on its bosom. With frightful velocity they were borne along toward the roaring cataract and the terrific gulf whence clouds of impenetrable mist never ceased to rise. A moment more, and they made the awful plunge into the fathomless abyss, from which, amid the roar of the waters, no cry of horror could be heard, no bodies, or even fragments of bodies, could ever be rescued. The peril was wholly unsuspected, but none the less real, and ending in a “destruction” none the less “swift.”

May we not see in this the picture of a great throng of immortal men in respect to their moral end? It seems generally to be assumed that, in our relations to eternity, there is no danger except that of which we are distinctly conscious,—which we see, or hear, or feel. But there cannot be a greater delusion. It would be equally rational for the blind man, who wanders among pit-falls, or on the trembling brink of some frightful precipice, to infer that there is no danger because he sees none. Insensibility to danger is, in fact, one of the most startling characteristics of the sinner's condition by nature, just as insensibility in a mortal disease is one of the most alarming symptoms of the disease itself. The danger is none the less real, none the less dreadful. And the only true wisdom is in providing for every exigency in the way prescribed by the great Physician of the soul. The believer's Surety can alone give security against all possible danger. The gulf, which is bridged by genuine faith, will never bear away upon its tumultuous bosom him who possesses that faith. The grace of Christ never fails to be sufficient for him who implicitly trusts to it, whether he is conscious or unconscious of the dangers which threaten him.

Fellow-traveller to eternity, are there are no possible dangers in the path you propose to pursue, for which you have made no provision?

WORK FOR CHRIST.

“THE life of a Christian is a life of labour: ‘Go, work in my vineyard to-day.’ It is necessary work, excellent work, profitable work; and it is good to be at it when young.”

“Do what you can, and do it while you can.”

“Consent to be often wearied in Christ's service, but never wearied of it.”

“Luther's motto was, ‘Work on earth, and rest in heaven.’”

“With the love of Christ shed abroad in the heart, all labour in his service seems light.”

“He may do a great deal who is never idle; and he may go a great way, who never goes out of the way.”

“Do what you can, when you cannot do what you would.”

“Hold up your little twinkling light boldly and honestly; then God will pour in the oil, and make it like a blazing torch.”

TREASURY PULPIT.

THE SCORNER.

"Surely He scorneth the scorner."—PROVERBS III. 34.

BY THE LATE J. W. ALEXANDER, D.D.

THAT mode of irreligion which the wisest of kings so often stigmatizes under the name of scorning, makes itself known in every age. It is the derision of that which is good, and has its origin in ignorance, folly, and sin. The contempt, sometimes producing ridicule, which scoffs at wisdom and holiness, is begotten of that pride which "was not made for man," and which is hateful to God. To despise that which is heavenly is not a lower degree of wickedness, but passes the borders of the flagitious. Hence we should regard the very beginnings of such a temper with great jealousy, and should be willing to examine its signs and nature, in order to secure ourselves against its contagion. In treating the subject, we shall find it profitable to begin with lower degrees of the evil, and thence to trace its progress. To laugh or jeer in regard to that which displeases us is from a disposition which needs no artificial fostering. The opinion of Lord Shaftesbury, that "Ridicule is the test of falsehood," will find few serious defenders in our day. The laughter's side is not always the side of reason; as we might show by referring to the ridicule heaped upon many a great enterprise and improvement in science and art; the satire lasting in almost every case until it was put to shame by manifest success. That form of impotent contempt which we call sneer, belongs by pre-eminence to those who are to some extent conscious of being least armed with reason. Many a mischievous hand can fling the fire-cracker or the squib, which could neither wield the sword nor aim the rifle. Those were not all heroes who "called for Samson out of the prison-house," that he might make sport for them. All the world over, the derisive portion will be found the weakest; and this upon solid principles. The love of truth and practice of goodness, always allied, have a certain pure simplicity and candid uprightness which disincite the mind to take pleasure in the inferiority of others. Whatever in us is unselfish and benignant revolts against making spoil of a neighbour's delinquency. And with reverence be it said, the trait is divine, for "God is mighty and despiseth not any" (Job xxxvi. 5). But ridicule cast on our fellows proceeds from contempt, and contempt is a mode of pride. Hence the lower down we go in the scale of morals and civilization, the greater fondness do we find for the language of scornful raillery. Little minds, incompetent to forge or handle massive links of argument, find a petty satisfaction in teasing, cavil, and sarcastic ireny. The number of such minds is greater than that of powerful reasoners and men of insight, and we must be content to leave them in the enjoyment of their characteristic warfare. Their buzzing assaults on religion are perpetually reminding one of the lesser but annoying plagues of Egypt. And such characters, fond of vexatious sayings, and growing in piquancy as they fall into the "sere and yellow leaf," need much grace to keep them from becoming scoffers.

The evil of ungenerous contempt and acrid censure becomes more imminent where there is some pretension to wit or humour. Very few of a thousand possess wit; scarcely one of the thousand does not sometimes attempt it. Perhaps there has never been an age which so overvalued the ludicrous in speech and literature as this of ours. The popalace cries out for what is comic on the stage, and on the platform; and the periodical journal is incomplete, unless, like noble houses in the olden time, it maintains its clown. The wise man had this in his eye, when he said: "As the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool. This also is vanity" (Eccles. vii. 6). We would contentedly leave the jester to wear his motley, if he confined his witticism to his own ring; but when he brings his gibes and grimaces into the sanctuary of God, and seeks to provoke mirth with holy things, we must silence and debar him. And yet how common is it to connect divine subjects with the ludicrous, and even the burlesque! As true wit involves some surprise, some unexpected turn, some sudden apposition of opposites, that which is false finds a certain spurious zest in low, trivial, even vile suggestions, forced into contrast with ideas of eternity and God. Therefore, as a liar will swear in his common talk to add credence to his doubtful word, and a fool will throw imprecations into the scale to give weight to his feeble reasoning, so your vulgar jester resorts to profane abuse of religious objects, that he may startle the scrupulous, or extort laughter from the stupid. A verse of Scripture, a psalm or hymn, the text of a discourse, or some chance expression in a sermon, serves such a once, even with repetition, as a counterfeit coin serves a sharper. The mental poverty, the irreverence, and even the lewdness, of such pretenders, render them, sooner or later, disgusting to all whose judgment is worth asking. But their folly and degradation are less to be regarded by us than their sin; for we violate the third commandment when we trifle with God's name, titles, and worship, or when we profane his word by associations which are ludicrous. So that I would solemnly charge it upon those who do not wish to destroy souls, that they shun with pious fear all tales, anecdotes, and jests, which defile by their touch any Scriptural passage, and that they avoid the intercourse of those debased minds who descend to such resources.

The great adversary of souls has so many snares for the feet of pilgrims, that we cannot be too wary in regard to the imperceptible passage from what seems innocent or venial, to what is really wicked. From idle words about God's holy Scripture, youthful heedlessness is beguiled, step by step, into by-paths of positive impiety. Satan's emissaries are generally near, ready to help on the error. Seducers try their victims first by milder approaches; and he or she who listens without protest or indignation, is believed to invite further liberties. If your unclean but amusing friend finds you tolerant of his ridiculous parody on a prophet and apostle, or the Lord himself, he will make bold to vent a sneer at doctrine, at principle, at law, at the gospel,—at the very cross of the blessed Jesus. Beware, my youthful friend, how you cross the threshold of irreverence. The conversation of wicked persons is dangerous, their intimacy is defiling, their settled friendship is destructive. Walk not "in the counsel of the ungodly;" stand not "in the way of sinners," lest at length you come to sit "in the seat of the scornful."

The beginnings of all transgression are remote, and the descents gradual. The soul would fly back in horror if those extreme turpitudes were proposed, to which it will nevertheless come at length. Hence the derision of heavenly things must be presented at first under some less appalling form. For example, nothing is esteemed more lawful and acceptable in society, than ridicule of professing Christians. Their preciseness and supposed hypocrisy, their alleged breaches of engagement, their singularities of life or devotion, especially their real failings, backslidings, and sins, become almost the stock in trade of the small dealer in church scandal. One might readily think, from the censor's complacent chuckle over the inconsistencies and falls of Christians, that every such delinquent was a scape-goat to bear away his own sins. Every successive generation has had its several crop of disparaging or opprobrious names, by which to designate God's children, in the dictionary of the scorner. They are the "Zealots," "Devotees," "Precisians," "Puritans," "Methodists," the "Saints," the "Godly." "They that sit in the gate speak against me," says the psalmist, "and I was the song of the drunkards" (Ps. lxi. 12). The gatherings of ungodly men, in all ages, have been enlivened by the grateful strain of a derision aimed at serious and conscientious persons; and the playhouse, a synagogue of Satan, shakes with vociferous mirth, when the scruples of pure minds are held up to contempt. The prophet declares his separation from such assemblages: "I sat not in the assembly of mockers, nor rejoiced" (Jer. xv. 17). If there is any meaning in what Scripture says of God's special regard for those who trust in him, let mockers beware how they choose them, in their religious character, as objects of indignity.

Ministers of the gospel, though in a sense public representatives of Christ's cause, are individually as open to criticism as any persons on earth. Not only are they compassed about with human infirmity, they are made by their very post peculiarly conspicuous. It is not wonderful that they have sustained showers of scolding. Especially if they have upheld the majesty of law,—if they have denounced vice,—if they have run counter to the fashionable, licentious, apostate Christianity of the day,—if they have preached the sovereignty of God and the gratuity of salvation, they have had obloquy and contempt for their lot. Many a shaft is aimed at the heart of religion, through the person of the ministry; for he who would be afraid to reproach Christ, may attain the same end by satirizing his servants. Let the ambassadors of God lift up their voice against any prominent abuse, and straightway the journals, which reflect the baser interests and grudges of society, will beset their path with greetings like those which David received from Shimei, the son of Gera, who "came forth, and cursed still as he came, and cast stones at David" (2 Sam. xvi. 6). And if the preachers of the word were more fully to discharge their function in declaring that gospel which is foolishness to the unenlightened and a stumbling-block to the proud, they would be yet more "filled with the scolding of those that are at ease, and with the contempt of the proud" (Ps. cxliii. 4).

Upon further inquiry, we shall find, however, that all this opposition to the persons of Christians has a deeper origin, in hostility to the spirit, principles, and life of religion. The pride, the scorn, the contemptuous laughter, the malignant sneer, which are a sort of persecution, directed against those who uphold Christ's cause, are immediate products of depravity, and of the carnal mind, which is enmity against God. The antagonism is one of ages; nay, it is one pointed out by prophecy: "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed." Cain and Abel are types of the scoffing world, and the suffering Church. The first-born man "was of that wicked one, and slew his brother. And wherefore slew he him? Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous." To which the loving apostle adds the caution: "Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you" (1 John iii. 12, 13). A similar allusion to a typical pair of brothers, is indicated by Paul, when he says of Ishmael and Isaac: "But as then, he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so it is now" (Gal. iv. 29). The mutual repugnance is radical, being between contraries infinitely remote,—that is, holiness and sin. The modes of exhibiting this proud hostility are various. One of the most frequent, and that which we are now concerned with, is the arrogant derision of what is good, as evinced by manner, gesture, language, act, or the silence of bitter contempt.

The great standard of right is God's perfect law, in which all moral excellence is summed up, as light is gathered in the sun. Holy minds admire and love the law, feeling themselves sweetly and unconstrainedly in union with it. Unholy minds are conscious of a secret opposition between their natural tastes and the intense spirituality of the divine law. Restraining grace, religious training, and the common or special influences of the Holy Spirit, keep this enmity in a certain abeyance, in those cases where sin has not pushed its victim towards the brink of positive impiety. But this brink is often fallen over, or at least looked over, by the thoughtless, the impure, and the abandoned. A large part of the world's sceptical and cavilling attack on the code of Christian morals arises from personal immorality. Proud selfishness kicks against the goads. What though the enemy wears a comic mask? his Sardonian laugh is that of hate. The strict requisitions of the holy commandment are so distasteful to the self-pleasing offender, conscious of a crookedness which this plummet reveals, that he tries to laugh off the restless sentiment of obligation; and, but partially succeeding in himself, he makes the attempt with others. Ridicule of God's commandments, or of the just fears, scruples, and tender doubts, of our neighbour, is a sign that the soul harbours inward hatred of the law. "It was a severe retort which a young man lately made to an infidel, who was speaking against the divine legation of Moses. He had made many objections to the character of that holy man; and the young Christian said to him: 'There is something in the history of Moses that will warrant your opposition to him more than anything you have yet said.' What could this be? 'He wrote the ten commandments.'"^{*} Read parallel proofs of the immoral soil out of which scoffing grows, in the unholy lines of Voltaire, Rousseau, and Paine.

This uneasiness of conscience, in regard to precept and prohibition, when it concurs with self-conceit, haughtiness, and a low talent for impudent reply, constitutes the genuine scoffer of Solomon's photograph. You see his demeanour under criticism, advice, reprimand, and expostulation. Pride causes him to take his friend for an enemy; he is regardless of the truth uttered; inimical to the parent, the minister, the brother, the elder associate, the wife of his bosom; if any one of these dares to touch his sore, he resents the supposed affront with words of bitter ridicule. Behold thy likeness, O misguided sinner! "A scorner heareth not rebuke." "A scorner loveth not one who reproveth him." "Reprove not a scorner, lest he hate thee." "He that reproveth a scorner, getteth to himself shame" (Prov. xiii. 1, ix. 7, 8). In all these, and in other places cited, the same Hebrew word is used. It involves the notions of vanity, mocking, treating with mimicry and illusory speeches, satire, sneer, sarcasm, irony, and reckless disregard. The counterpart of this picture is in many a household, as many a disappointed father, many a heartsick mother knows full well. Up to a certain age, children, unless precociously vile, yield themselves in docile compliance to the parental voice. But, alas! except where grace has early wrought, there comes a disagreeable crisis, of greater or less duration. Family training arrives at the stage first of shyness, then of forwardness, sometimes of bitterness. The foolish boy, governed more by companions of the school or the street, than by his wisest, dearest protectors, sets up to be wiser than his father. The frivolous, vain, selfish girl, corrupted by the daughters of the ungodly, from whom she takes her tone at some fashionable but heathenish school, turns upon the mother who bore her, and tosses the head, with imaginary knowledge of the world, and disgust at old-time maxims of modesty.

It were well if intolerance of rebuke were confined to childhood and youth; but we encounter it in every stage of life. Though one of the sincerest acts of true friendship is the bringing into the right way of one who has strayed, it is nevertheless true that, in things moral and religious, scarcely any one relishes attempts to lead him back from wandering, or to prevent his flying from the track. Tell your neighbour that his house is too gaudily furnished, that his children are sadly perverse, or that he himself drinks too much wine, and is drowsy and muddled after dinner, and you run the risk of losing an acquaintance for your pains. If to this you should add serious admonition respecting his eternal state, and the need of preparation for death, you would be likely to have in return severe jesting, if not scoffs.

"Fools make a mock at sin." The enemy of souls continually allures them towards the persuasion that it is a small evil. Who can believe that yonder timid youth, flushing with the colours of virtue, will one day laugh to scorn the reprovers of his profaneness or his dissipation? Yet we see such changes every day. Society is always suffering from perverse banter and coarse humour directed against rigid morals. The thefts, defalcations, peculations, forgeries, fraudulent escapes from obligation, full living on other men's money, and filthy purchase of votes and verdicts, which are at once the opprobrium and the rottenness of certain classes in modern society, are fostered and brought into development by what young men hear in the houses where their business lies; by jokes, which imply that a clever operation is worth some moral risk; by pleasantries about lying and stealing, under decent names; and by contemptuous pity of tortoise-like habits of a former age. Let us in justice observe, that we have, in the highest places in the world of trade, men whose names are unsullied, and whose voice, authorized by experience, would, if permitted, chastise the sharper and the villain, under whatever garb of mocking and persiflage he might lurk. Such animadversion is useful to those who look on; as, indeed, is the detection of every arrogant pretender. "Smite a scorner, and the simple will beware; and reprove one that hath understanding, and he will understand knowledge." And again, "When the scorner is punished, the simple is made wise." The public award is generally right and final, in respect to one who has distinguished himself by sneer, sarcasm, and arrogance ; for, as Solomon says, "The scorner is an abomination to men" (Prov. xxiv. 9).

It is not easy to stop upon the downward slide of sin ; and hence he who begins with trifling and badinage upon subjects of duty and grace, will descend, unless divinely stayed, to the degree of undervaluing his own danger, and making light of God's threatenings. This is the foolhardiness of transgression. There is a sublime silent delay about the Divine justice, which leaves rash sinners under the delusion, that, against a Lawgiver so long-suffering, they may offend with impunity. If every Cain were marked the very instant he shed blood, and every Ananias struck dead upon the utterance of his lie, scoffing at judgments would be impossible. But the awful tread of justice is slow, and so the depraved soul grows bold. "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil." Conscience sleeps, and therefore the sinner thinks the sin is not on record. "He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten : he hideth his face : he will never see it" (Ps. x. 11). In Ezekiel's time, the idolaters who polluted the very temple chambers by secret imagery, said, "The Lord seeth us not ; the Lord hath forsaken the earth." The same folly and wickedness bear like fruits in later days ; and when these depraved tempers find vent in words, and corresponding demeanour, we have the scorner named in divine threatenings.

Unbelief and unholy daring may attain such a height as madly to try their strength not only with menaced, but with actual wrath ; and creatures have been found, who, amidst the falling bolts of judgment, have stood out against the Creator and Judge in arms. A cheat, of course, is in such cases put upon one's self, as if there were a chance of escape after all ; or as if these inflictions were not judgments for sin ; or, which is more common, as if infinite mercy would at length remit. When scornful offenders laugh at war, famine, pestilence, and other tokens of divine displeasure against sin, whether national or individual, denying all providence in such events, and baring the head to receive any storm from such quarter, they only re-enact the part of ancient unbelievers, who cried, "The evil shall not overtake nor prevent us" (Amos ix. 10.)

But on whatsoever side we turn, we find exposures of the fundamental evil, on which all these contempts repose, as all later formations on the primitive base. It is depravity of mind and heart in regard to Almighty God ; disbelief of his being ; derogation from his attributes ; forgetfulness of his presence ; disregard of his infinite purity ; hardihood towards his awful justice ; in a word, it is practical atheism which makes the scorner. "Wherefore doth the wicked condemn God ? he hath said in his heart, Thou wilt not require it" (Ps. x. 13). Every form of sin involves something of the horrid evils just named ; for who could sin under the thorough and constant influence of right views and feelings towards the Divine Majesty ? "Thou God seest me," so far as it sinks into the heart, is a preservative against transgression. But sin begets sin ; yea, one sin begets numberless sins, and one violation of law and conscience leads to other violations, and these to more, till the fearful progression ends in open profligacy, insult to the Eternal King, and speedy destruction. No one knows, when initiated into some lower degree of Satan's lodge, whether he may not penetrate to the highest. This makes it dangerous to parley with temptation. Judicial blindness befalls those who voluntarily put out the light of education and conscience. One sin, in God's awful judgment, becomes the punishment of another. The crime which the youthful sinner now looks at with shuddering, as it stands before him in his path, he may one day see behind him, among the dim, cloudy beginnings of his career, the earliest steps of his enormous transgression. It is a greater evil to scoff at the religion of others than to be simply irreligious ourselves. Many ties must be rent, many walls overleaped, and many guards cut down, before the race of evil attains to open derision of truth and duty. Opposition to God's spiritual agency, and ascription of Christ's words to the Evil One, accompanied with deliberate utterance of the same, in scoffing language, constituted that blasphemy against the Holy Ghost which hath no forgiveness, either in this world or that which is to come. And he who treads under foot the Son of God, and counts his blood unholy, "hath done," so it is written, "despite unto the Spirit of grace" (Heb. x. 29). Those, therefore, who are tempted to make merry with divine realities, with the word of salvation, with the work of the Holy Ghost in the revival of Churches and the conversion of sinners ; especially those who, from levity, folly, inconsideration, deference to bad example, or temporary gusts of pride and passion, indulge themselves in ridiculing such as begin to seek the salvation of the soul, should beware in time, lest, abandoned to themselves, they make shipwreck of all principle, and find their lot among hopeless scoffers. "Judgments are prepared for scorners, and stripes for the back of fools." Having thus tempted Satan, they may be led by him into an incapacity of believing ; having sneered at all that is pure, august, and heavenly, they may, amidst the ruins of their faith, be haunted by spectres of multiform doubt ; having challenged God to forsake them, they may spend their decline in ever learning, yet never coming to the knowledge of the truth ; for, "a scorner seeketh wisdom, and findeth it not." And these are cautions peculiarly needful at times when the Spirit of God manifests his agency in the Churches, humbling and melting believers, and convincing the impenitent ; and when, likewise, Satan, in his prime character, as adversary and arch-scorner, is busy, breathing into his children, at the corners of the streets, in the haunts of vice, and alas ! in the editorial chair, foul blasphemies, which may turn away men from the great salvation. We have no fear for the Church of the living God, from the mocking laughter of surrounding foes ; though "they return at evening," "make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city" (Ps. lix.) The people of God will still rejoice in his power, which shall lead them on to triumph. But, for the scoffers themselves we tremble ; and are ready to address them in the words of Paul at Antioch : "Behold, ye despisers, and wonder and perish ; for I work a work in your days, a work which ye shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you" (Acts xiii. 41). It is a dreadful fall, from haughty scorning of God's ways, down to grovelling vice and drivelling falsehood : such contrasts have we seen. The freethinker and the heretic, after deriding the mysteries of Scripture and the inspiration of prophets, have sat down to prate of endless, unintelligible dreams, and to sit at the feet of spiritual mediums, so named in their jargon. Safer, my brethren in the Lord, is it to trust in Him "that frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad ; who turneth wise men backward, and maketh their knowledge foolish" (Isa. xli. 25). O pray to God, beloved hearers, that he would keep your conscience tender, and your mind reverent, lest from one degree of profane scorning you proceed to another, and at length reach the point of those who crucify the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame. At present, you think this acme of impiety far from you, and so I trust it still is. But consider, I pray you, who it is that holds you back from such enormities, and shrink from every form, or sentiment, or speech, which could grieve that Spirit of grace. "Quench not the Spirit," in yourselves or in others. And that you may make all sure, turn your back upon the world, the flesh, and the devil, and, going to the Lord Jesus, take him as your Saviour, Teacher, and King.

"AND THY HOUSE."

ACTS xvi. 31.

THERE is a certain connection which God has established between you and your household. For example, it is upon you that God has made to depend their enjoyment of the good things of this life. They receive from God their daily bread ; and they receive it through you as his minister. So far you are to them the minister of God for good. In order to be so, you cheerfully give your strength of body and mind, you plan and scheme, you toil and moil, from year's end to year's end. So far from grudging this burden, you feel it to be truly a "burden that is light;" you feel that the dependence of your babes on you gives wings to your soul, and strength to your heart, that their participation in the benefits is a daily blessing of God on your daily toil. Well, it is declared in God's word that you are intimately connected with your household, not only in temporal respects, but in respects that are spiritual and eternal.

Thus, in the address to that Philippian jailer, it is declared that the salvation of the household is in some way bound up with the faith of the householder. In the rite of infant circumcision, we see that the families of believers are in some way bound up with them in the covenant of grace. In exhorting the Jews to repent and be baptized, Peter gave this reason, "For the promises are to you and your children." The very youngest of your children, the very babe that is yet unborn, may, through you, be partaker of the salvation which is offered to you. This salvation is one of the blessings for which we have a right to pray, for which we are bound to pray, on behalf of our children. Now, if you believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, you receive power to deal with God as his Son, for all true blessings to you and yours, to offer for your children the "effectual, fervent prayer of a righteous man, which availeth much." But if you be no believer, you can utter no true prayer; you cannot speak to God as your father, for you have not known him as the Father; you cannot speak to him through Christ as your Redeemer, for you have not received Christ as your Redeemer. Here, then, is one way in which your faith is connected with the salvation of your household ; in which you are bound to be to your children a minister of God ; and in which you can discharge your duty only through faith. He who believes possesses, in the privilege and grace of prayer, one qualification for bringing salvation to his house, which he who believes not does not and cannot possess.

Again, as the minds of children open up, they become able to hear and understand the truth. "Faith cometh by hearing." In order to their salvation, they need to be instructed in the truth. For this instruction, there is the public ministry of church-officers. But there is also the private ministry of the heads of families. In the case of young children, this private ministry is by far the most important. You are constantly with your children ; you know their habits of thought, and mode of speech ; you are acquainted with a thousand avenues to their hearts of which a stranger is ignorant ; and, above all, you have a strong hold of their heart's affections, enabling you powerfully to draw them whither you will, "by the cords of a man, and the bands of love." It is true that the saving blessing of God's Spirit can alone make this instruction effectual to salvation. This is true in regard to all ministries, public no less than private. But it is also true that the blessing is bestowed upon the use of appropriate means, and that the most important means of filling the minds of children with the saving truths of God's word, is the fireside instruction of their parents. Now, how can you give such instruction unless you be yourself a believer ? You know that an unbelieving public ministry is usually no blessing, but a curse—that he who speaks from the pulpit without faith speaks without heart, fire, power, and usually succeeds only in making his hearers weary of the gospel,—much more so, in the close dealing of a private minister or parent. If you believe not, you can have no heart for the work,—you will soon give it up; or, though you should persevere in it, your children, with their fine, swift instinct, will feel that you do not really believe what you teach them, and will learn from your instructions only to disbelieve and despise the word of God. Surely it is a sufficient motive to faith, that faith and faith alone can qualify you as God's minister for feeding the souls of your children with the bread of everlasting life.

Once more, family instruction is only one department of family religion. Family religion includes family worship, prayer, and praise. But it includes a great deal more than this. It includes a family living unto God, a habitual consecration of the whole family, in all its life and labours, unto God, as the only God and Saviour. This daily living unto God constitutes in a family, so to speak, a religious atmosphere, fragrant with heaven, which begins to mould the spirit of the child almost as soon as he has begun to breathe, and surrounds him, as he grows up, with a perpetual solicitation to godliness, an invisible shield against temptation, subduing and awing the carnal lusts that war against the soul. Although there should be family profession, family instruction, without faith there can be no true family religion. There is no family life of godliness, but only spiritual death. The unbelieving parent by his daily life teaches the child to live for the world; the believing parent, and he alone, can by the silent teaching of a godly life move the child to live for God. If you believe, the whole influence of your life is lent to raise the child to heaven; if you believe not, the whole influence of your life is lent to drag him down to hell.

Experience confirms these views of your place and power as God's minister, for good or evil. On the one hand, it is true to a proverb, that piety, though it does not run in the blood, runs in the line; from age to age, the great mass of true Christians are trained up in Christian families by the blessing of God on the prayers, and instructions, and godly example of believing parents. On the other hand, though nothing can limit the grace of God, yet, ordinarily, the children of unbelievers grow up unbelievers; the children of formal professors, who live a manifestly inconsistent life, are often seen to grow up very giants in wickedness, as when the sons of God intermingled by marriage with the fair daughters of men. This is one of the ways in which Jehovah, the jealous God, frequently visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation. What a motive to faith! What a warning against unbelief!

And this is a reason why you should believe now, instantly. Suppose that God had promised you, what he has not promised, a life prolonged, and opportunities perpetuated, that you may at any future time believe for your own personal salvation. Yet now, every day and hour, your wicked life is working for the destruction of your children. They are being confirmed in their habits. They are leaving your fireside. At any hour this one or that one may be removed from the world. Suppose that one of these is lost through your delay in believing, and that you at some future time should repent and be saved. Still, your repentance cannot recall the irrevocable past; your child is lost, lost through your delay; on the last day he shall be on the left hand of the Judge, and must be torn away from your view,—lost, for ever lost, through your fatal delay. Ah! what a joy your delay is stealing from you,—the joy of being doubly the parent of your babe, of being instrumental in his new birth into God's everlasting kingdom, so that you shall rejoice over him with joy and singing, as one whose soul you have turned unto righteousness, and on account of whom you for ever and ever shall shine with the stars. AUTUMN VOICES.

Voices of autumn, I hear you again,
Through the dark forest, across the wide plain,
Deep in the valley, and high on the hill,
In the old places all murmuring still.

Leaves slowly falling, and streams rushing fast,
Evening breeze moaning, or night's fitful blast,—
All the old voices again I can hear,
Summer has passed away, winter is near.

Once, oh! how mournfully sounded each tone,
Telling of happiness ended and flown;
Youth and hope vanishing, joys passing by,
Age stealing forwards, or death drawing nigh!

Now it is over, that sadness and pain,
With the old voices it comes not again;
He who is gladdened by morning's bright ray,
Thinks not of starlight then fading away.

Since the "glad tidings" spoke peace to this heart,
All life's dark shadows have seemed to depart;
All nature's voices one story have told,— Goodness unchanging, to-day as of old.

Autumn winds sweeping o'er fields brown and bare,
Echo the reapers' song lingering there;
Autumn floods rushing by garner and store,
Tell me of treasures in danger no more.

Flowers in their fading, and leaves as they fall,
Long days of brightness and beauty recall;—
Why should I sorrow that these are now past?
Heaven's cloudless summer for ever shall last.

Oh that life's autumn, like nature's, may bring
Some precious harvest from summer and spring!
Fruits, which the Master may deign to approve,
Laid on his altar, in meekness and love!

CHILDREN'S TREASURY.

JOE BENTON'S COAL-YARD.

JUST imagine the loveliest May morning that ever was made; the sun so lately risen that his long golden hair still trailed on the hill-tops, and the robins singing such extravagant songs, that the violets opened their blue eyes as wide as possible, and asked a neighbouring lilac-bush if he ever heard of any one getting drunk on sunshine. There must have been something very curious in the air that morning, for when little Joe Benton sprang out of the back door with hair as golden as the sun's, and eyes as blue as the violet's, and voice almost as sweet as the robin's, he took one long breath, shouted a vigorous hurrah! but seeming to grow just as crazy as the birds, he didn't feel at all relieved till he had climbed a tree, turned three somersaults, and jumped over the garden fence.

"Saturday, too," he said to himself, as he rested upon the other side. "Was there ever anything so happy? Now I'll just have time to run down to the brook before breakfast, and see if our boat is all right. Then I'll hurry home, and learn my lessons for Monday, for we boys are to meet and launch her at nine o'clock, and the captain ought to be up to time."

So Joe's small feet clattered vigorously down to the little cave where the precious boat was hidden. But as he neared the place, an exclamation of surprise escaped him, for there were signs of some intruder, and the big stone before the cave had been rolled away. Hastily drawing forth his treasure, he burst into loud cries of dismay, for there was the beautiful little boat which Cousin Herbert had given him with its gay sails split into a hundred shreds, and a large hole bored in the bottom.

Joe stood for a moment, motionless with grief and surprise; then, with a face as red as a peony, he burst forth,—"I know who did it, the mean fellow! It was Fritz Brown, and he was mad because I didn't ask him to come to the launch. But I'll pay him for this caper," said little Joe through his set teeth, and hastily pushing back the ruined boat, he hurried a little further down the road, and fastening a piece of string across the footpath, a few inches from the ground, he carefully hid himself in the bushes.

Now the good honest sun was afraid something was going wrong, and he held a little cloud handkerchief over his eyes, but Joe did not notice it. He only knew that he was very angry and miserable, and he wondered that he had ever thought it was a pleasant morning.

Presently a step was heard, and Joe eagerly peeped out. How provoking; instead of Fritz it was Cousin

Herbert, the very last person he cared to see, and hastily unfastening his string, Joe tried to lie very quietly. But it was all in vain, for Cousin Herbert's sharp eyes caught a curious moving in the bushes, and brushing them right and left he soon came upon Joe. "How's this?" cried he, looking straight into the boy's blazing face; but Joe answered not a word. "You're not ashamed to tell me what you were doing?"

"No, I'm not," said little Joe, sturdily, after a short pause; "I'll just tell you the whole story," and out it came, down to the closing threat, "and I mean to make Fritz smart for it."

"What do you mean to do?"

"Why, you see, Fritz carries a basket of eggs to market every morning, and I mean to trip him over this string, and smash 'em all."

Now Joe knew well enough that he was not showing the right spirit, and he muttered to himself, "Now for a good scolding," but to his great surprise Cousin Herbert said, quietly,—

"Well, I think Fritz does need some punishment; but this string is an old trick. I can tell you something better than that."

"What!" cried Joe, eagerly.

"How would you like to put a few coals of fire on his head?"

"What, and burn him?" said Joe, doubtfully. Cousin Herbert nodded with a queer smile. Joe clapped his hands. "Now, that's just the thing, Cousin Herbert. You see his hair is so thick he wouldn't get burned much before he'd have time to shake 'em off; but I would just like to see him jump once. Now tell me how to do it, quick!"

"If thine enemy hunger, feed him; and if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head," and the Lord shall reward thee," said Cousin Herbert, gravely; "and I think that's the best kind of punishment little Fritz could have."

Joe's face lengthened terribly. "Now I do say, Cousin Herbert, that's a real take-in. That's just no punishment at all."

"Try it once," said Cousin Herbert. "Treat Fritz kindly, and I am certain he will feel so ashamed and unhappy, that he would far rather have you kick or beat him."

Joe was not really such a fierce boy at heart, but he was now in a very ill temper, and he said sullenly,—"But you've told me a story, Cousin Herbert. You said this kind of coals would burn, and they don't at all."

"You're mistaken about that," said his cousin, cheerily. "I've known such coals to burn up a great amount of rubbish,—malice, envy, ill-feeling, revenge, and I don't know how much more,—and then leave some very cold hearts feeling as warm and pleasant as possible."

Joe drew a long sigh. "Well, tell me a good coal to put on Fritz's head, and I'll see about it."

"You know," said Cousin Herbert, smiling, "that Fritz is very poor, and can seldom buy himself a book, although he is extravagantly fond of reading, but you have quite a library. Now suppose,—ah! well, I won't suppose anything about it. I'll just leave you to think over the matter, and find your own coal, and be sure and kindle it with love, for no other fire burns so brightly and so long," and with a cheery whistle Cousin Herbert sprang over the fence and was gone.

Before Joe had time to collect his thoughts, he saw Fritz coming down the lane, carrying a basket of eggs in one hand and a pail of milk in the other.

For one minute the thought crossed Joe's mind, "What a grand smash it would have been if Fritz had fallen over the string," and then again he blushed to his eyes, and was glad enough that the string was safe in his pocket.

Fritz started and looked very uncomfortable when he first caught sight of Joe, but the boy began abruptly, "Fritz, do you have much time to read now?"

"Sometimes," said Fritz, "when I've driven the cows home, and done all my work, I have a little piece of daylight left; but the trouble is, I've read everything I could get hold of."

"How would you like to take my new book of travels?"

Fritz's eyes danced. "Oh, may I, may I? I'd be so careful of it."

"Yes," answered Joe, "and perhaps I've some others you'd like to read. And Fritz," he added, a little slyly, "I would ask you to come and help sail my boat to-day, but some one has torn up the sails, and made a great hole in the bottom. Who do you suppose did it?"

Fritz's head dropped upon his breast, but after a moment he looked up with a great effort, and said,—

"I did it, Joe; but I can't begin to tell you how sorry I am. You didn't know I was so mean, when you promised me the books."

"Well, I rather thought you did it," said Joe, slowly.

"And yet you didn't!"—Fritz couldn't get any further, for his cheeks were in a blaze, and he rushed off without another word.

"Cousin Herbert was right," said Joe to himself; "that coal does burn, and I know Fritz would rather I had smashed every egg in his basket, than offered to lend him that book. But I feel fine," and little Joe took three more somersaults, and went home with a light heart, and a grand appetite for breakfast.

When the captain and crew of the little vessel met at the appointed hour, they found Fritz there before them, eagerly trying to repair the injuries, and as soon as he saw Joe he hurried to present him with a beautiful little flag which he had bought for the boat with part of his egg-money that very morning. The boat was repaired, and made a grand trip, and everything turned out as Cousin Herbert had said, for Joe's heart was so warm and full of kind thoughts that he never was more happy in all his life. And Joe found out afterwards that the more he used of this curious kind of coal, the larger supply he had on hand,—kind thoughts, kind words, and kind actions. "I declare, Cousin Herbert," said he, with a strange twinkle in his eye, "I think I shall have to set up a coal-yard."

The little school-boys, who saw that Joe was always happy, studied the secret, too; and at last if any trouble or dispute arose, some one would say, "Let's try a few of Joe Benton's coals," and it was astonishing to see how soon all the evil passions were burned to ashes, and how quickly the young hearts grew warm towards each other. Come, little Tom, Dick, and Harry, who have ever so much rubbish to be burned, whose hearts are all in a shiver with the cold unloving looks you gave each other this morning, won't you try just for once, to find out the happy secret that lies in little Joe Benton's queer coal-yard?

THE FADED FLOWER.

WILL IT BE SWEET AFTER IT IS FADED AND DEAD?

WHEN the wise man says, that "childhood and youth are vanity," he must mean, that they pass so soon and are so insensibly and so much taken up with trifling pursuits, that there seems to be nothing real about them; for there is a season, as we all know, in which childhood and youth may be considered the most important period of life. They shape the character of the man or woman that is to be. Impressions made then are never forgotten. Habits formed then, last all the way on to gray hairs and the grave.

Childhood and youth are seasons of enjoyment. Care and anxiety are scarcely felt; the heart is all joyous and buoyant; and new and beautiful flowers spring up in their path with every rising sun. Who would sadden their glad faces, or check their merry laugh and ringing shout? Not we. Let them enjoy what they may of these sunny days, only taking care that they lay up nothing for self-reproach in the time to come.

It is not needful, however, to the true enjoyment of these early years of life, that they should be given up to mirth and laughter. There are soberer joys, that even childhood can relish. The world around is full of beautiful sights and sounds, which give pleasure to the youngest of us. They invite our thoughts upward to a still more beautiful world, where the great and glorious

God of all dwells, and where all who love and serve him hope to have an eternal home.

Let me tell a little story of what happened to some little friends of mine. They were walking about on a summer's morning upon the green bank of the river. Their mother and aunt had become quite engaged in conversation, and had left them loitering behind. They had found a bed of wild flowers, almost concealed in the soft meadow-grass, and were now selecting their favourites for a nosegay, and expressing their preference with no little positiveness.

"Oh, I will have this—I like this best—This is sweetest," as they plucked from the bush those they thought the prettiest.

"Now, I like this," Susanna said, "and I have a reason why."

"What reason? Mine is certainly much more pretty in the colour."

"But mine is so sweet!"

"So is mine sweet; smell it."

"But mine will be sweet after it is faded and dead—yours will not."

"No, I know that."

"Then yours is like the things of this world. Mine is like the things of heaven."

Will our young friends look upon their present pleasures as flowers, and choose those that will yield the most grateful fragrance when they are past and gone?

THE GOOD FIGHT.

"Rouse, oh, rouse thee, little soldier!

For the night is nearly spent,
And thy crafty foes are stealing
To thy fair unguarded tent."

And the little soldier springeth,
Arming him as best he may,

For it was the Captain calling—

"Wake! oh children of the day!"

"Ah! the foe is just upon me;

Help!" the little soldier saith;

"Clasp my helmet of salvation,
Bring my shining shield of faith!"

Oh! it was a dreary battle,

And it raged the whole day long,

But the Captain led the army,

And the Captain's arm was strong.

Once amid the wild confusion,

Crept two traitors in the ranks;

But the watchful Captain found them;

To his name be all the thanks!

And he said,—"There is no mercy

Shown to Selfishness and Pride;

String the rebels up together!"

So they hung until they died.

But the soldier still fought bravely,

In his wondrous mail of light;

Pausing not, though faint and bleeding,

Till each foe was put to flight.

Then the victory thrilled the angels,

As the mocking evil train,

Led by Malice, Hate, and Envy,

Fled like shadows o'er the plain.

But another foe approacheth

With a chill and icy breath,

And the little soldier trembleth:

"Dearest Captain," faint he saith,

"Oh, what is this fearful presence,

Making dim my shield of faith!

I am weary with the battle,

Must I also fight with Death?"

"Fear thou not, thou little soldier,

For this foe shall be thy last.

See, thy Captain fights beside thee;

See! the weary strife is past!"

Joy, oh, joy to thee, brave soldier!

Thou hast passed the storm and night,

And thy happy soul encampeth

In the peaceful fields of light!

AUNT SUSAN, AND HER TEN FAIRIES.

FARMER JONES has a large herd of choice cows and a fine dairy, and Susan Pike has the care of it, and it is a treat to go into it and look round at the clean pans and tubs. How pure and white the milk is! How fresh and sweet the butter looks! Susan is not there just now. She is gone, with her pail and her three-legged stool, to milk the cows. Let us go and watch her. Is it far? Yes, some way off, but it is a pleasant walk.

Here we are at last. That is Susan, and that is her favourite cow. Its name is Daisy. How quietly Daisy stands! And yonder is Brindle, lying in the shade!

"Aunt Susan! Aunt Susan!" cry two little voices from behind the fence.

"Ah, Jem, are you there? And Patty, too?"

"Yes, Aunt, we want to walk home with you, if we may stop till you're ready."

"Do you know," said Patty, "Uncle John came to see us to-day, and brought us each a book. Mine is about a little girl called Fanny, who wished she could call a fairy to do her work for her, but her brother told her she had no need to wish that, because she always had ten of them with her wherever she went. Oh, Aunt Susan, can you tell what her fairies were?"

"Were they such as these?" said Susan Pike, setting aside her milking-pail, and holding up her ten fingers.

"Yes! yes! why, how quickly you did guess it! I do believe you have read the story; now, haven't you?"

"No, never, child; never. But I have these ten fairies always with me, and some others besides, whom I call to help me when I go to work."

"How many, Aunt?"

"How many? I must think before I can tell you. Two—four—six—eight—nine—ten; yes, there are ten at least."

"O Aunt; and did you say they come when you call them?"

"Yea."

"Then have they got names? O Jem, come on; Aunt Susan is going to tell us the names of her ten fairies. Will you tell us what they look like?"

"The first is a plain trim little figure, always neat and tidy-looking, not a speck of dust on his clothes, not a thread wanting from his shirt-collar to his shoe-string. He carries a little flag waving over his shoulder, and on the flag is written the motto, 'A place for everything, and everything in its place.' This is the fairy gentleman that I call for before I begin my work, and what he does for me is to find me all I want. You cannot think how quickly he finds it. He knows exactly where to put his finger on everything. His name is Order."

"O Aunt, now I see you don't mean real fairies, after all! But, never mind; I should like to know what all your ten fairies are. I will count them. Order;—that is the first."

"The second is a light-footed damsel. She is here, and there, and everywhere, always busy and always quick. As she flits about, you hear her humming,—

"I am not made for idle play,
Like a butterfly all day;
Busy I must be, and do
What is right and useful too."

This is the fairy that I set to fetch me what I want. She follows where Order leads the way; and when Order points to what I want, Activity brings it to me without a moment's delay."

"Activity! that's the second, then."

"As soon as I have everything about me that I want, I call for a third fairy,—a nimble-fingered little thing. Her name is Diligence. She wears a garland round her head, and twined round the garland is a scroll on which these words are worked, 'Do it with thy might.' She never forgets the words on that scroll. She does one thing at a time, and does it heartily. Her eyes are fixed on what she has in hand. As soon as she puts her fingers to my work, you would be surprised to see how fast it gets on. I have to watch her, though, to see that she does not go away before the work is finished. When I think she is likely to leave off too soon, I call for another of my helpers,—a sturdy, firm-set, stout-built, determined-looking fellow, who keeps the work going. His name is Resolution. He comes steadily up to the side of Diligence, and whispers something into her ear, and her fingers again begin to move like lightning. Once I heard him say to her, 'Well begun is only half done; ' another time he said, 'Wish it not done, but do it.' He is very sparing of his words, but what he says is always to the purpose."

Aunt Susan stopped half a minute as if she were thinking, but before Patty or Jem had time to speak, she was ready to tell them something more. "You have seen what are called fairy-rings. You know how fresh and soft the grass looks in those beautiful rounds, just as if fairy feet had been dancing there. One of my fairies leaves a velvet track wherever he goes. His name is Good-humour; and he brings a little sister-fairy with him, called Cheerfulness; and as they dance together, the sister, with her sweet clear voice, sings such a number of lively airs that she makes my work go on pleasantly and joyfully."

"My seventh fairy is a charming little cherub, with silver wings, who flies to do whatever has to be done. He carries in his hand a magic wand, round the top of which his name is written, a name of only four letters, Love. When he has a heavy burden to lift, he touches it with his wand, and the burden becomes light. Or if he has to handle anything rough, he lays his wand across it, and it becomes soft. I like to have his help, because he makes my work so easy. Once he opened his little wand, and showed me that it could divide into two parts, and each had writing inside. On the one was, "Love one another with a pure heart fervently." On the other, "Love Him who first loved thee." If either half of the wand was used alone, I found it did much to lighten my task; but it was when both parts were put together, that my task became lightest. This little cherub never comes alone. He brings with him a fair-haired, blue-eyed companion, whom he calls Hope. She carries a little anchor in her hand, and sometimes she fixes this anchor, and leans on it with one hand, while with the other hand she points forward and upward, still repeating,—

"If you find your task is hard,
Try, try, try again:
Time will bring you your reward,
Try, try, try again."

But Hope might fasten her anchor in an unsafe place; and then she would fall to the ground. So I call for another of her sisters to come with her. This sister of her's is Faith. Faith has a book which shows her what ground is safe, and what is unsafe for Hope's anchor to rest in; and Faith has a strong hand with which she helps to fix the anchor deep into the good ground, which is always within sight of the Cross. She holds her book open at the page where it is written, "I will help thee," and then she whispers to Hope,

"On thy Father's help rely;
Trust, and try—trust, and try"

Love, and Faith, and Hope, make my work easy, and prosperous in the doing."

"One more, please, Aunt Susan, to make up the ten; I counted them on my fingers."

"We are at the bridge now; so I must only tell you that her name is Perseverance. A pleasant smile she has, when she tells me that my work is done at last."

"I wish these fairies would come to me," said Patty.

"Call them, my dear; and call again, till they come; and keep on calling, till they come and stay."

So saying, she bid good-bye, and went on her way with all her ten fairies gambolling around her, while Patty and Jem went home planning how they could sometimes get such help as they saw Aunt Susan always had.—Episcopal Recorder.

LIFE AMONG THE ROSES.

In a large garden there grew a little rose-bush. It never aspired to the high places which the "Queen of the Prairie" filled over the bay-window of the library. It was not as rich as the hundred-leaved rose. It had none of the delicate scent of the sweetbriar. It was only a little monthly rose, and very happy at that; for had it not the blue sky overhead, and the warm smiles of the sun, and the dew-drop, and the south wind, and the garden fence? And what could a little rose-bush need more!

To show its gratitude, it put forth a bud. To be sure, "Morning-glory" shut her eyes to it, and the "Queen of the Prairie" looked down; but the rest of the flowers were as smiling as could be, and the little bud grew bigger every day. By-and-by the gardener came among the flowers with his pruning-knife. He soon spied the little bud. Rose-bush thought it would please the gardener. But what did he immediately do? He clipped the bud off. Oh, it was so cutting!

"What have you done to deserve such cruel treatment?" cried the Pinks and the other Roses in a great huff. The little Rose-bush did not know; it did not ask; only it was comforted by their pity. And as for the old gardener, if he heard, he did not condescend to explain. Nor was this all. The next time he came he fetched a great spade, and stopping before the little rose-bush, eyed it with his great grey eye. It fluttered and quivered, very likely; but it asked no questions, nor complained when he seized and tore it from its bed, and putting it into an ugly pot bore it off.

"What has it done to deserve such cruel treatment?" cried the Pinks and the other Roses; but they did nothing. South Wind followed the poor little Rose-bush, and did what it could to revive its drooping; for, you may well think, it was quite down at leaving the beautiful garden and the side of Sweetbriar, to live—where do you think?—in a dark hole under the piazza, where the sunbeams, admitted everywhere else, were shut out, nor could they get in any way. It was as much as South Wind could do to get in. Poor little Rose-bush, how could it help drooping? By-and-by it took heart, and tried to stand humbly up, for it will not dive into the mysterious science of "whys" and "wherefores," but only thought, "The sky is so high there must be a great deal I can't understand; yet South Wind steals in and kisses me, so I know love is under it."

After a while South Wind began to take leave, and North Wind came roughing it into the garden. He brought with him Jack Frost. Oh, what havoc they made with the beautiful flowers! Not satisfied with stripping them naked, they bruised and broke them. Robin and Blue-bird took wing; the bees kept at home; and there was nothing but sighing and howling among the trees. It was really awful.

Meanwhile, how did it fare with Rose-bush? Worse off than ever? No. It came out of the dark, and was carried to a lady's chamber. She gave it a warm welcome indeed. It was given a seat of honour at the south window. It is bathed in sunshine. It drinks daily, not dew, but sparkling water-drops from little hands. Winter-king, perched on a branch outside, sings in its hearing a cheerful "pee-dee" to the great Creator. Good days, bright days for the little Rose-bush. It is as happy as can be, and its love will overflow in a bud, for love can't help doing. It does not harbour resentment, and say, "I won't try again." It thinks gratefully, "I can but try;" and soon the lady and the little child exclaim joyfully, "A bud! a lovely bud!" And they watch it daily, the little child thinking of the rose hid in its bosom, and the lady with an ever sweet reminding of the Rose of Sharon.

Do you suppose it is ever sorry now for what had happened to it?—Child's Paper.

CHILDREN IN PRISON.

At one of our late visits to the Prince Alexander Galitzin, he related to us an interesting circumstance that occurred lately in Finland. Some children from seven to nine years of age, were so brought under the sensible influence of the Spirit of God, convincing them of their sins, that on their going to or from school, they retired into the woods, and there put up their prayers to the Lord, with many tears. By degrees their number increased. The parents of some of them found them thus engaged, and with rebukes and stripes dispersed them; but the parents of others, who had noticed the increased sobriety and good behaviour of their children, encouraged them to meet together in their houses, and not to go out into the woods. The children did so; and some of these parents, observing their religious tenderness, and hearing their solemn prayers to the Lord, the Redeemer, and Saviour of sinners, felt themselves strong convictions of sin. They joined their children in their devotions, and a great reform took place in that part of the country. This excited the angry feelings of the priest, who was a bad man and a drunkard. He went to the magistrate to enter his complaints against both children and parents. The prosecution issued in their all being sent to prison.

They had seen some months in confinement, when the Prince Alexander Galitzin heard that children were in prison on account of religion. He thought it so strange an occurrence that he sent confidential persons to inquire into it. They found so much religious sensibility and tenderness in the children, that they were greatly surprised, especially at the simplicity with which they related how they had been brought under trouble because of their sinful hearts, and how they had felt that they must pray to the Lord Jesus Christ, who alone could forgive them and enable them to live in a state of acceptance before God. Being inquired of if their parents or others had not put them on doing this, they said that so far from that, they were afraid that their parents or any one else should know how it was with them, that they retired privately in the woods to pray and cry with tears unto the Lord. The parents also stated that the children had been the instruments of bringing them to a sense of their sinful lives, and to seek the Lord that he might give them a new heart and pour forth his Spirit upon them. Moreover, it was found that the conduct of these people and children had been such during their imprisonment, as to comport with their Christian profession. The prince ordered their release, and had the priest and the magistrates severely reprimanded and removed from their offices. The emperor having heard of all this, and of the great sufferings to which these families are reduced in consequence of their long imprisonment, which took place last year before harvest, ordered that all their losses should be liberally made up to them, making ample provision, also, for their present support.—Friends' Review.

"A HOME BEYOND THE TIDE."

"We are out on the ocean sailing,
Homeward bound we sweetly glide;
We are out on the ocean sailing
To a home beyond the tide.
All the storms will soon be over.
Then we'll anchor in the harbour
We are out on the ocean sailing
To a home beyond the tide."

SWEET voices had joined in singing this beautiful hymn. They were those of a choir of Sabbath school children. As the last notes died away, the superintendent rose, and having expressed the wish that all the dear ones before him might at length safely reach that home, he called upon a teacher to offer the closing prayer.

The Sabbath-school concert for prayer was over. It had been a pleasant hour. Kind and earnest words of counsel and warning were spoken to the children. Prayer went up from full hearts for the "lambs of the flock;" and it shall be known, when the records of eternity are opened, of how much importance and value were the influences of that holy hour to all who were within their reach.

Little Grace went home with her mother. She loved the Sabbath school, and always enjoyed the "concerts;" but nothing had ever interested her more than this hymn. "Mother," she asked, as she stood beside her a few minutes before being taken to bed, "what does it mean—'We are out on the ocean sailing?'—and what is the 'home beyond the tide?'" We are not out sailing anywhere, and yet it must mean us, for Mr. Barnard said he hoped we all should reach that home. Am I sailing, mother, and do you think I shall reach a home beyond the tide? I don't quite understand the hymn, but I do love to sing it."

"Do you remember, Grace, what dear sister Helen said about her voyage home last summer? How she used to count the days and the hours, and, toward the end of the voyage, the minutes too, when the captain told her how many days it would be before the ship would reach the harbour and she would be at home? How she longed to be here with us once more, though she felt she was going home to die? And do you remember, darling," continued her mother, gently drawing little Grace nearer to her side, "what Helen said just before she left us,—'I was so glad to reach home safely, after crossing that stormy sea, and now the Saviour has guided me almost across the sea of life, and I shall soon reach another home?' Have you forgotten?"

Little Grace remembered, though she had never thought of her sister's words in connection with this favourite hymn; but she and her mother had often talked together about that sister, who was called to be with Jesus and the angels, and she was now beginning to understand the hymn she so much loved.

"Life is often compared to a sea, or ocean, my daughter, and I am sure, you can now see why it is said in your song, that we are all out on that ocean. If we love Jesus, are we not 'sweetly gliding homeward' every day? And cannot you tell me now what that home is 'beyond the tide?'"

A smile and a kiss were Grace's answer, and after she had been left alone that night in her little bed, her mother heard her singing more joyfully than ever,—

"We are out on the ocean sailing
To a home beyond the tide."

Little voyagers on the sea of life! many loving hearts are praying that the great and good "Captain of our salvation" may bring you safely through all dangers, into the peaceful harbour of heaven. But remember that he waits to hear your prayers for guidance, and from such prayers, from those who trust in him, he never turns away.

LOOK.

"Look!" Not run, but look; not go, but look; not stop, but look—look! A great deal depends upon looking.

A boy once had a fine knife, with a Sheffield blade, a present from his uncle. He went into the woods one day and lost it. Not till he reached home was it missed. The poor little fellow felt bad enough. Besides the loss, he was ashamed of his carelessness. What could he have been thinking of? "Go back and look," said his father.

"It's no use, I know," said the boy.

"Look, look!" repeated his father.

He went, and after a careful search the knife was found under a sassafras-bush. Looking found the knife.

A packet ship crossing the Atlantic was nearing the coast. For some days the weather had been lowering. Neither sun nor stars were visible, and no observation had been taken. There was a heavy swell. The log was carefully noted, but the exact whereabouts of the ship could not be ascertained. The mate took soundings, and a sailor was aloft on the look out. "Breakers ahead!" shouted the man from the mast-head. "Ready about!" thundered the man at the helm. The ropes rattled, the sails flapped heavily while the bow swung round to the larboard, and the noble ship plunged off from her perilous course. Night set in. Anxious eyes were strained towards the dark and gloomy horizon. The captain consulted his chart. There was a light he ought to make. Where was he drifting to lose it? "Light!" shouted the look-out from the mast-head. A distant glimmer was discovered. The ship's bearing was ascertained. Alarm and anxiety gave way to hope and joy. Looking saved the ship.

The Bible says, "Look!" Look, where? Look, to whom? Look, why? "Look unto Me, and be ye saved." Who says this? Who is Me? Moses? No; for he says, "I can no more go out or come in." David? No; for he says, "My flesh and my heart faileth." Who? Solomon, the great king? No. "Look not unto me," he says; "put not your trust in princes." Who? John? No; for he says, "He that cometh after me is preferred before me." Who? Paul? No; for he says, "I am less than the least of all saints." Who then?

Moses declares, "The Lord is my strength and my song, and he is become my salvation." David answers, "In the Lord do I put my trust. He is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." John says, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." Paul adds, "I can do all things through Christ strengthening me. I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ my Lord." "Me!" Who? It is the Lord, our King and Saviour. "Look unto me," he says, "and be ye saved."

And everybody who has looked says he can make good his promise. He can save from sin, for his "blood cleanseth from all sin." He can save from hell, for he whispers to every dying penitent, "To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise." He can save us from feeling troubled, for he says, "My peace I give unto thee." He can save from discouragement and giving up, for he says, "My grace is sufficient for thee." He can save us from being lonely when our dearest friends go away or die, for he says, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

What a Saviour we have to look to! You have found, dear children, if you think at all, how many things you have looked to, have failed and disappointed you already. Everything in this world will, sooner or later; but Jesus never, never will. Oh, how sweet to have such a friend to look to, and to look to him for everything. Our dear parents and friends can only distribute what he gives.

Take home then to your hearts to-day this one little word, "Look." "Look unto me, and be ye saved." (Isa. xlv. 22).

LITTLE HANNAH'S TROUBLE.

"Oh, I wish, how I do wish I could find a bird's nest or two!" cried Jamie Haynes; "Hannah, if you see one about the garden, come and tell me, will you?"

"Yes, I will," replied little Hannah; then, recollecting some of her brother's mischievous pranks, she added earnestly: "But you won't hurt the birdies, will you, Jamie?—what do you want to do with them?"

"Oh, that's none of your business!" said Jamie rudely; "you must tell me if you see one though—you promised!"

"Oh dear! I wish I hadn't promised," sighed little Hannah as Jamie ran off; "I'm so afraid he will hurt the birdies. But I mean to try not to see any; I hope I shall not!" And in this hope little Hannah rested.

But the very next day, as she was playing ball in the garden, her ball bounded off into some bushes, and as Hannah was searching for it, she came upon a nest of little fledglings. "Oh dear! oh dear me!" sighed Hannah once more. "Poor little wee birdies, I wish I hadn't seen you! Now I must go and tell Jamie, because I promised, and perhaps he will kill the birds!" And tears filled the eyes of the tender-hearted child.

Replacing the branches, she slowly walked back toward the house, thinking to herself whether it would be very wrong not to keep her promise this one time; but she knew that if Jamie should ask her she must tell the truth, and then it would be worse, for he would be vexed with her. "I wish mamma were at home," she said to herself; "what shall I do?"

Just then a sweet verse came into her mind, that she had learned a few days before, which tells us that not a sparrow falls to the ground without our Father. Hannah felt comforted;—"Then our heavenly Father cares for the birdies; I can go and tell him about it," she murmured, with a brightening face. She went up to the nursery; no one was there; and, shutting the door, the child knelt down and prayed: "O heavenly Father, I have found some poor little birdies, and I must tell Jamie; please, God, give Jamie a kind heart, so that he will not hurt God's little birds. Amen."

No one was in the room, I said; but Jamie was in the closet getting some twine; and he heard his dear little sister's prayer. Jamie felt very strangely, for, although he had been as carefully taught as Hannah, he did not often feel that God was so near, and that he might pray to him at any time. He felt sorry, too, that he had been so naughty and cruel; indeed, Jamie's heart was much softened. He kept quite still in the closet, until he heard Hannah leave the room, running down stairs, as he knew, to find him; then he followed her.

"Jamie," said Hannah when she saw him, "I have found a bird's nest, do you want me to show it to you?"

"Yes," replied Jamie, hardly knowing what to say.

So Hannah led the way, and showed Jamie where the nest was. She leaned over his shoulder, as he sat for some time looking at them, and, gathering courage from his quiet manner, said at length, "What did you want to see them for, Jamie?"

"I did not want the little birds," said Jamie; "I wanted the eggs to put on a string. But I don't want them now, Hannah," he added, his face growing red as he spoke. "I shan't hurt the birds' nests again, ever!"

Little Hannah looked up in surprise, delighted at these words; and deep in a grateful little heart she treasured the remembrance of her answered prayer!

THE LABRADOR MISSION FLAG.

ON the dreary coast of Labrador waves a huge flag, seen distinctly by homeward-bound vessels. It was sent there with the silver given by children's hands for the sake of God's dear Son. It flutters on a bleak shore, in the icy wind.

You would not like to live where no roses grow, no fruit-trees blossom. When some frozen Norwegians, sailing to a warm southern country, first saw red roses, they dared not touch what they supposed were trees budding with fire. So the people of Labrador are accustomed to see snow and ice many months in the year. Beautiful flowers, growing wild or in garden-beds, would be to them a strange sight. If you should send them papers of flower-seeds, or bulbs, or plants, they could not grow there, it is too cold.

What can you do, then, to help the Labrador children? The poor half-frozen people there do not know about your Lord. They have no idea of your Saviour. Would you not like to send them some tiny hymn-books like your own, or little Bibles suitable for childish hands?

Some kind people have sent a Christian man to tell them about these heavenly things, and a Christian woman has gone to that desolate place to teach mothers the love of Jesus. On their house a flag is fastened, the flag that was given by Sunday-school children.

You cannot imagine how astonished the sailors were who first saw there a real house. There are no white houses on the shore shaded by green trees; no rows of handsome buildings; the people live in dirty huts half under the ground, and this house, which contains a church also, seems like a palace in their eyes. Under that kind roof some little orphans live, and they are learning,—

"While here below, how sweet to know
That wondrous love and story,
And then through grace to see His face,
And dwell with him in glory."

During eight long months in the year no tidings can reach the missionaries; boats cannot go among the fearful icebergs, and the sound of the railway has never been heard on that barren shore.

How much we miss papers and letters if they are detained one day! Then think of that lonely house to which they cannot come for weeks and months. What can they read? When they grow home-sick, and long for some news, they open God's letters to them in his word, and these delight their souls. They know that their heavenly Father remembers them, and loves them with an everlasting love, and that Christ is preparing for them mansions not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

The good missionary cannot drive about in a carriage, or ride on horseback to visit his poor parishioners, for he lives on an island; and as he must visit the mainland, some ladies have sent him a fine boat, in which he can row to the neighbouring shores, carrying with him tracts, Bibles, and the story of the cross.

When these missionaries were going to Labrador, they were exposed to great perils from icebergs drifting very near the ship; but God took care of them. Sometimes the bay is full of fishing-boats, and these fishermen need to be told of a heavenly Pilot, who will guide them into a harbour of rest.

When you are sitting in your nice church; when you are standing by your teacher's side in the pleasant Sunday-school room; when you are reading by the bright grate, think of perishing souls in Labrador and other frozen or sultry climes, and you will not regret that you have helped to scatter the words of Jesus in lands where Sabbath bells do not ring.

OUR HARRY.

A TIMID boy is our Harry; afraid of the dark, afraid of horses, dogs, and strangers, afraid of the sound of his own voice, and never liking to go far from the shelter of mother's wing.

"Harry," said Aunt Mary one morning, "if you will carry this note to Mr. Locke's and bring home my skates, you and I will go down on the ice, and you shall have a ride on your sled while I am skating. Harry's eyes sparkled at this, and away he danced for his cap, coat, and comforter, saying courageously as auntie put them on for him, "I shall go right along, and God will take care of me, won't he?"

It was but a few minutes, and back came poor Harry, walking slowly, with his head down, the sparkles all gone from his eyes, and tears there instead. "There were horses coming," he whispered, "and I was afraid God wouldn't take care of me!"

Ah, little Harry, many children of a larger growth can trust God in the sunshine, but not in the dark; trust him when their way is clear, but not when "the horses are coming."

When Harry was four years old and his baby brother only two, they were playing together one day in the nursery, when they thought of some playthings down stairs that they wanted. Now, mamma was in the nursery, and it was bright and sunny there, but down stairs there was nobody, and the rooms were shut up quite dark, so that as Harry leaned over the banisters and peeped down, it looked very gloomy to him there, and his courage failed. "Freddie," he said to the baby who had run after him, "you go down stairs and get the cart, and God will take care of you, you know;" so down stairs, baby-fashion, backed the fearless little curly-pate, calling out as he went to the God of whom Harry told him, "Are you down here?" And though Freddie saw him not, surely God was there, holding up the little feet that they should not slip, keeping the little heart that it should fear no evil.

Since Harry learned to read, he has been very fond of the little Testament with red covers and a bright clasp, that his father gave him for a birthday present, and the verses he loves best are those sweet ones in Revelation, about the new heavens and the new earth. "Mamma," he said the other day, putting his arm around his mother's neck, and laying his cheek against hers, "will God wipe away the tears from my eyes, if I can't find you when I get up to heaven?"

THE TWO CUCUMBERS.

"MOTHER, don't you think it is strange, when God made the world, he made so much naughty in it?" asked Jemmy Taylor.

"God didn't make the naughty," answered his mother.

"Well, he lets it," said Jemmy.

"What naughty are you thinking of?" asked his mother.

"Why, all the boys tell fibs, and they swear so, and they call stealing fun."

"I hope you don't," said his mother; "I hope my boy isn't so wicked." The tone frightened Jemmy; his face grew red. "I hope my boy isn't so wicked," she repeated.

"I don't want to be," answered the little boy humbly. He was sitting at the table where she was ironing, and where she put his bowl of bread and milk for his supper. But Jemmy did not feel very hungry. There was something on his mind; he wanted to tell what. He began to open the door of his heart; but it shut to. He had not courage to open it wide, lest his mother mightn't understand just how things stood there. So, not a great while after, he trudged off to bed, carrying his little troubles with him.

What was the matter? There was a garden near the school-house full of fruit, and the boys had made a hole in a rotten board at the corner next the school-house, through which they used to squeeze and steal cucumbers, gooseberries, currants, and whatever they could lay their fingers on. "It's wicked and it's mean," Jemmy said. Some of the big boys got angry with him for it, and that day had pushed him through the hole, and made him rob for them. "Now," said they, "we've got the whip-hand of you, old fellow. Dare say a word and we'll inform against you. You're as bad as we."

Jemmy felt very much hurt about it. He was angry, and indignant too. Different thoughts came, and gave him their different advice. One said, "Pooh! what's the use of troubling yourself about it? it's nothing; boys must have their fun." Another said, "You are dreadful squeamish. You can't expect to get along without doing a great many wicked things; 'tis a wicked world." Another said, "Sleep it off; you won't mind it to-morrow." Conscience said, "Right is right, and wrong is wrong, little boy." And the Holy Spirit whispered, "How unkind for strong boys to pilfer the hard earnings of a poor old gardener. God's law is, love and help one another."

Jemmy had been very constant at Sabbath school all winter, and the kind and faithful talk of his teacher had sunk deep in his soul. He felt he had a soul—a soul to be saved or lost—a soul to be the home of God, or the home of hard, wicked thoughts. Oh, he'd a great deal rather have it the home of God. Jemmy, therefore, when he went to bed, was in great trouble. He wanted somebody to tell his mind to. He was afraid his mother wouldn't understand it, and would blame him more than he could bear just then. His teacher was a good way off; besides, Jemmy was rather shy. Jemmy cried, he felt so alone. He wet his pillow with his tears just as a great many older people have done under similar circumstances since the world began.

"Oh," sobbed the little fellow, "O Saviour, won't you help me? You were once a boy, and know how I feel. Won't you help me? You died on the cross to save us. Won't you please save me from being wicked? Please make me forgiving and strong, and forgive me my sins." This was the substance of Jemmy's prayer. It was all he could do, leave the matter with his Saviour; and I am sure it was the best thing, for the Lord Jesus knows us perfectly, therefore he can understand our case perfectly; and he is "mighty" to save also,—a very present help in time of need.

The next morning, when Jemmy awoke, he thought of a threepenny piece he had, his own, and he determined to pay the old gardener with it for the two cucumbers he took from his vines the day before. On his way to school he met the old man wheeling a barrow full of vegetables to market. "Sir," said Jemmy, stopping, "here is threepence to pay for two cucumbers I took from your vines. I'm very sorry I took them;" and before the old gardener quite made out what it all meant, Jemmy was off.

"Jemmy," said his mother that night, "what a happy whistle you've got!"

"Have I?" said Jemmy, "Isn't it too loud? does it not disturb you?"

"Oh no," answered mother; "it sounds pleasantly."

And when Jemmy went to bed, though it was a dark night, with a storm brewing in the sky, everything looked beautiful and shining in his little room. There seemed to be a presence in his little chamber—a holy and comforting presence, and it seemed to fill his soul and his room, and reach away off up to heaven.

"O God, my Saviour," prayed the little boy, "I thank you; I praise thee. Forgive me more and more; help me every day and hour and minute to be a good boy. I want to be; I love to be. Amen."

When his mother passed through his room two hours later, there was such a happy smile on his sleeping face, that she said to herself, "Jemmy looks as if he was dreaming of the angels."

Children have their trials, their conflicts. Right and wrong, grace and sin sometimes have sharp fights in their little bosoms; and nobody, dear children, can give you the help you need, the grace to overcome sin and make the right victorious, but Christ your Almighty Saviour, your best Friend. And when your feelings are wounded and your hearts are torn in the conflict, he can fill, and he will fill your bosoms with his sweet peace, that makes you forget it all.

CHILDREN'S ANSWERS.

A poor, wild Irish boy, taught in a mission school in Ireland, was asked what was meant by saving faith. He replied, "Grasping Christ with the heart."

A female slave in Travancore, at a public examination of candidates for baptism, in reply to the question, What is meant by the words, "Thy kingdom come?" (when the silence of others made it her turn to speak), modestly said, "We therein pray that grace may reign in every heart." The most learned divines could not have answered the question better.

JEWELS FROM THE LIPS.

GRACE had been wishing all the afternoon to ask her mother something, but several friends had spent the day with the family, and her mother was so much occupied that she had to wait until bedtime. Her mother was accustomed, after gently arranging the pillows and making everything pleasant for the night's rest of her little girl, to sit a few moments at the bedside, and have their "little talk," as Grace called it.

The longed-for opportunity came at last. "Now, mamma, I want you to tell me if you ever saw a little girl that had jewels dropping from her lips when she spoke. I know there is a fairy story about it, and you have told me fairy stories are not true; but to-day, in the school, Mr. Ellis said he had seen more than one little girl and boy who had something worth more than jewels, that dropped from their lips when they spoke. He said he had heard them fall. How could it be, mamma? Mr. Ellis wouldn't tell a lie, and he said if we didn't find out about these jewels before next Sabbath, he would tell us then."

"You have been a good little daughter this afternoon," said her mother, "and I shall be glad to answer you.

A jewel is always something very precious; but the word does not always mean that which is to be worn as a part of the dress. I might call you my 'jewel,' because you are my darling child. But Mr. Ellis told you he had 'heard them fall' from the lips of children. So have I."

"Oh, mamma!"

"Yes, I have indeed. One day last week I was passing the park, and I heard a company of school-boys on the other side shouting across, 'Ragged Dick, halloo! Ragged Dick, how's your father?' Two boys were just before me, and I knew the shouts were meant for one of them. They were good little Willie Fernald, and Richard Lane, ragged enough, to be sure, poor boy. His father is a drunkard. As I went by them, I noticed that tears were falling from Richard's eyes, but jewels were dropping from Willie's lips."

Grace opened her eyes wide, and looked wonderingly at her mother.

"These were the jewels: 'Never mind, Dick, I love you. Don't you care about them, nor mind what they say. We'll have a real good time up at my house. We can play in the yard; and then I've got a new book that my father gave me, full of pictures, and we can look it over together;' and I noticed that Dick wiped the tears away, and was comforted."

"Yesterday, as I was going through the hall, near a certain nursery door, I heard a little girl talking very pleasantly to her baby brother, who had begun to worry. I know he was quite uneasy, for his mother had been out some time; but his sister was so gentle, and her words and voice so sweet and free from all impatience, that he soon became quiet again. He heard the jewels fall from her lips."

Grace's cheeks were glowing, and her eyes glistened for that little patient girl was herself. Mr. Ellis's strange remark was explained. Kind words were the jewels. As her mother bent over to kiss her, she said, "I hope such jewels will fall from your lips every day, dear little Grace. Jesus will always help you to speak thus, if you ask him."

NO "TILL" IN ETERNITY.

"O MOTHER, I do not know how to think of eternity, for there is no 'till' in eternity—till next year—till to-morrow—till New Year's."

Yes, there are measures for time; we know none to measure eternity. It is enough for us to know that heaven and hell are there. One of these will be our final home. How can we reach the one? how escape the other? Jesus says, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." "I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me." If you reach heaven, there will be no fear of a "till" to disquiet your perfect peace; if you are among the lost, there will be no hope of "till" to end your sorrow. Do not delay to choose the better part till it be for ever too late.

TREASURY PULPIT.

THE INFALLIBLE WORD.

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

"It is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than one tittle of the law to fail."—LUKE xvi. 17.

THE "law" stands here, as in some other places of Scripture, for the whole revealed will of God. The heavens where, after the lapse of many thousand years, the stars are burning as bright as the day they were kindled; and the earth, whose hoar mountains look down unchanged on successive generations flowing on to the grave, like the river that washes their feet to the sea, stand here the symbols of perpetuity. And thus, by declaring that heaven and earth shall sooner pass, these hills be levelled with the plain, these stars drop, that sun be blotted from the sky, than God's word fail from the earth—any part of it fail of fulfilment—our Lord by the boldest figures and in the strongest manner asserts its perpetuity.

This law or will of God has been revealed to us in two ways,—

First, By conscience, as beautifully set forth in the ring which, according to an Eastern tale, a great magician presented to his prince. The gift was of inestimable value, not for the diamonds, and rubies, and pearls that gemmed it; but for a rare and mystic property in the metal. It sat easily enough in ordinary circumstances; but so soon as its wearer formed a bad thought or wish, designed or committed a bad action, the ring became a monitor. Suddenly contracting, it pressed painfully on his finger, warning him of sin. Such a ring is not the peculiar property of kings—all, the poorest of us, those that wear none other, possess and wear it—for the ring of the fable is just that conscience, which is the voice of God within us; which is his law written, not on Sinai's granite tables, but on the fleshy tablets of the heart; and which, enthroned in every bosom, commends us when we do right, and condemns us when we do wrong. But conscience, as an expression of the law or will and mind of God, is not now to be depended on. True to its office in Eden, it was shattered and overturned by the Fall; and now lies, as I have seen a sun-dial in the neglected garden of an old, desolate, ruined castle, thrown from its pedestal, prostrate on the ground, and covered by tall, rank weeds. Instead of being still an infallible directory of duty, conscience has often lent its sanction to the grossest errors and greatest crimes. Did not Saul of Tarsus, for instance, hale men and women to prison, compel them to blaspheme, imbrue his hands in saintly blood, while conscience approved the deed—he judging the while that he did God service? What wild imaginations has it accepted as the oracles of God! and, as if devils and fiends had taken possession of a God-deserted shrine, have not the foulest crimes, as well as the most shocking cruelties, been perpetrated in its sacred name? Read the Book of Martyrs, read the sufferings of our own forefathers; and, under the cowl of a monk, or trappings of a churchman, you shall see conscience persecuting the saints of God, kindling the fires of the stake, and dragging even tender women and children to the bloody scaffold. With eyes swimming in tears or flashing fire, we close the painful record, to apply to conscience the words addressed to Liberty by the French heroine, when, passing its statue, she rose in the cart that bore her to the guillotine, and holding up her arms, exclaimed, "O Liberty, what crimes have been done in thy name!" And what crimes in thine, O Conscience! deeds from which even humanity shrinks; against which religion lifts her loudest protest; and which form the best commentary on these awful words, "If the light that is in you be darkness, how great is that darkness!"

So far as doctrines and duties are concerned, not conscience, but the Book of Revelation is our one only sure and safe directory. "Search the Scriptures," says our Lord, "for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." "To the law and to the testimony," says another, "if they speak not according to these, there is no truth in them." However honest people be, with whatever halo piety surrounds them, whatever zeal inspires them, though they walk the world in robes of light, speak with the tongues of angels, give their goods to feed the poor, nay, giving their bodies to be burned, die martyrs for their principles, if they speak not according to these, there is no truth in them. Men's willingness to suffer for their principles proves their sincerity, but does not prove their soundness. The law, therefore, that word on which my text pronounces this high eulogium, that form of the word which, amidst life's rudest tempests, and death's swelling waters, has proved an anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast, is the Bible—that revealed word which holy men of old spake or wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. Now let me,—

I. Set forth some general observations on this word or law of God. How many things could I say which should raise it in your esteem, and, enhancing its value, win for it a larger share of your time,—a closer and more prayerful study! Not that I suspect any of you of entirely neglecting it, or treating it, as in Josiah's days, when the one copy of the Bible in the whole land was swept with cobwebs into a corner, among the old lumber and useless furniture of the Temple. No. Thank God, more Bibles are in circulation than copies of any other book. To illustrate this single volume more pens have been worn, more researches made, more books written, more days and nights spent, than on all other books besides. It might well be so. It is the first of books; beyond all others the most venerable for its age, and the most valuable for its matter. Apart from its divine authority, there is more glowing eloquence, more noble sentiments, more melting pathos, more beautiful poetry here than anywhere else. From its pages moralists have borrowed their noblest maxims, and poets their finest thoughts. What can be said of no other has been well, and justly, and beautifully said of this book. It has God for its author, truth without any mixture of error for its matter, and salvation for its end.

This book has done more to bless the world, to promote its brotherhood, commerce, happiness, and liberty than any other book, and all other books together. How true the poet's glowing exclamation,—

"He is a freeman whom the truth makes free,
And all are slaves besides."

If swords are ever to be beaten into ploughshares, if their shackles are ever to be struck from the limbs of slaves, it is by no other instrumentality than the Bible. And if, amid the shouts of joyful nations the form of Liberty is one day to rise on every shore, it shall find no firm pedestal to stand on but the word of God. At once the support and ornament of free countries and evangelical Churches, like the symbol of God's presence in the desert, it is light in the form of a pillar.

It is the wealth of the poor, blessing poverty with that contentment which makes it rich. It is the shield of wealth, protecting the few that are rich against the many that are poor. Wondrous book! it levels all, and yet leaves variety of ranks; it humbles the lofty, and exalts the lowliest; it condemns the best, and yet saves the worst; it engages the study of angels, and is not above the understanding of a little child; it shows us man raised to the position of a son of God, and the Son of God stooping to the condition of a man; it heals by wounding, and kills to make alive. It is an armoury of heavenly weapons, a laboratory of infallible medicines, a mine of exhaustless wealth. Teaching kings how to reign, and subjects how to obey; masters how to rule, and domestics how to serve; pastors how to preach, and people how to hear; teachers how to instruct, and pupils how to learn; husbands how to love their wives, and wives how to obey their husbands; it contains rules for men in all possible conditions; is a guide-book for every road; a chart for every sea; a medicine for every malady; a balm for every wound; and a comfort for every grief. Divinely adapted to our circumstances, whatever these may be, we can say of this book, as David said of the giant's sword, "Give me that, there is none like it." Rob us of the Bible, and our sky has lost its sun; and in other, even the best of other books, we have naught but the glimmer of twinkling stars. My text crowns all these eulogies—like the keystone of the arch it gives the rest their power and value; for what were all the promises and prospects of this volume unless we knew that they could not fail, and were assured by Him who is the Truth, as well as the Way and the Life, that it were "easier for heaven and earth to pass, than one tittle of the law to fail."

II. My text is true of the Bible as a book divinely inspired. I know a castle that, rising in old days from its rocky platform, once looked proudly down on the rolling sea. Ichabod is written on its walls—the glory is departed; and all that now remains of its ancient grandeur is a shattered curtain, and some old grey towers that are nodding to their fall. The rock where it stood, so long defiant of time and man, yielded at length to a power which, retiring yet returning with every flowing tide, kept up a ceaseless warfare, wearing away its base, and hollowing it out into sounding caverns. Then some wild, winter night, when ships were sinking, and wives were weeping, and men were drowning, the sea came on in the full swing of the storm and breached its mighty walls, sweeping masonry and rock out into the foaming deep. And now I have seen the waves break and the fisherman's boat sailing over that old castle's foundations; while the billows, playing with what they had conquered, rolled them smooth and round amid the shingle of the sounding beach.

In the Bible our religion stands on a rock—but not like that, a ruin of other days. Still, if our faith is not a ruin, a majestic ruin, if the Christian Church does not stand in the world, like the deserted temple of a worn-out superstition, it is not because the word of God has not been doubted, denied, attacked, and vilified. It has been reviled, but never refuted. Its foundations have been examined by the most searching eyes. In Hume, and Gibbon, and Voltaire, and La Place, to pass such coarse and vulgar assailants as died in Tom Paine and Carlisle, and may still be found in a few living followers, the greatest talent, the sharpest wit, the acutest intellects, have been employed against it. To make the Bible appear a cunningly-devised fable, philosophers have sought arguments amid the mysteries of science. Travellers amid the hoar remains of antiquity; geologists in the bowels of the earth; astronomers among the stars of heaven; and, after sustaining the rude assaults of eighteen hundred years, there it stands, and shall stand, defiant of time, of men, of devils—illustrating the glorious words of its divine Founder. "On this rock have I built my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

Since those eighteen hundred years began to run, Time has seen revolutions rise; the oldest monarchies overthrown; the dawn of truth chase away the darkness of a long night; the maxims of statesmen, and the theories of science shift like the wind; and success crown the boldest innovator on all established systems. Jove is gone, but not Jehovah, the Hebrews' God. The temples of Jupiter stand on Grecian headlands and Roman hills in mouldering ruins; but temples sacred to Jesus are rising on every shore. Since John wrote in his cell at Patmos, and Paul preached in his own hired house at Rome, the world has been turned upside down—all old things have passed away; all things on earth have changed but one. Rivalling in its fixedness, and more than rivalling in its brightness the stars that saw our world born and shall see it die, that rejoiced in its birth and shall be mourners at its funeral, the word of our God stands for ever. Time that weakens all things else, has but strengthened its position. And as, year by year, the tree adds another ring to its circumference, every age has added its testimony to this truth, "The grass withereth, and the flower fadeth, but the word of the Lord shall endure for ever."

III. For practical application of my text, I remark,—

1. It can be said of the threatenings of the word that it is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than one tittle of the law to fail.

If there are more blessed, there are more awful words in the Bible than in any other book. It may be compared to the skies which hold at once the most blessed and the more baneful elements—soft dews to bathe the opening rose, and bolts that rend the oak asunder.

"He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." For example,—The wicked shall be cast into hell,—Flee from the wrath to come,—Whosoever believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him,—Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish,—Their worm dieth not, and therefore is not quenched, and these awful words which I cannot think of Jesus pronouncing over any one he would have saved, and, in a sense, died to save, but with slow reluctance,—Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. What a sentence!

What words from the lips of Him who bent looks of tenderest kindness on a weeping Magdalene! Every word a stunning, crushing, killing bolt. "Depart from me—ye cursed—into everlasting fire—prepared for the devil and his angels." They fall like thunderbolts, but where? I have read how a ship that rode the waters with a broadside, enough to sink any common craft, in chase of another vessel, pointed her guns so as to send the death-winged ball crashing through the other's rigging, or leaping on the deep before her bows; her purpose not to sink the flying sail, but wing her, and compelling her to bring to, make her captive. She might have sunk, but in thundering at her she sought to save her. And so does God with those that madly flee from him.

Therefore the Bible threatens and thunders—not otherwise. But why flee? Vain the flight where God pursues! Worse than vain! He is willing to forgive, and what madness to fly till, divine patience exhausted, he ceases to follow? What then? The bolt, at first sent wide of the range, is shot right to the mark. Judgment, long delayed, overtakes us; and we learn, but learn too late, that whether he threatens or whether he promises, as a God of truth "his word shall stand for ever." "Hath he said, and shall he not do it, hath he spoken and shall it not come to pass?" "Oh, that men were wise, that they would consider this in the day of their visitation!"

"The wicked," says the Psalmist, "contemn God, because he saith, he will not require." "Where," they insolently ask, "is the promise of his coming?" Ah, they forget that it is as true of his threatenings as of his promises, although he delay, he does not deny them.

A reprieve is not a pardon. It defers the execution, but does not cancel the sentence. And does not many a man in business, hard pressed for money, and tottering on the edge of bankruptcy, know too well that the bill which he has got the banker or drawer to renew is not thereby paid? that, however often renewed, it has still to be paid? and that the oftener it is renewed, with interest added to the capital, the debt but grows the larger, the payment grows the heavier? So, if you persist in rejecting the Saviour whom I offer, every day of mercy here will but aggravate the misery of hereafter—the reckoning-day, by being long of coming, will be the more terrible when it comes—as that storm roars with the loudest thunder which has been the longest gathering.

In the light of my text then, if the offers of the gospel are most winning, how full of warning are its threatenings! Men may play with your fears. I have seen a cunning, but foolish nurse, frighten her little charge into obedience by bugbears—stories of fleshless spectres and hideous monsters, the creations of her fancy, but the terrible object of its fears. God, however, plays neither with our hopes nor with our fears. He neither mocks; nor flatters; nor deceives. "He is not a man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent." "Hath he said, and shall he not do it, hath he spoken, and shall it not come to pass?" Believe me, that Paul had never wept, nor Jesus died for sinners, except that their worm never dieth, and their fire is never quenched—except that, in its threatenings as much as in its promises, heaven and earth shall sooner pass, than one tittle of the law shall fail.

2. In regard to its promises. The traveller in the desert has heard that, far across the burning sands, a river rolls. He has seen, or read, or heard of those who have sat on its willowy banks, and quenched their thirst, and drank in life there, and bathed their fevered frames in its cool crystal pools. So, though with bleeding feet, and sinking limbs, and parched throat, and dizzy brain, led on by hope, and already in imagination quenching his thirst, he stoutly fights a battle for life, and reaches the brink at length. Alas! what a sight meets his fixed and stony gaze! He stands petrified. No wave, glittering in the sunbeams, ripples on the shore and invites the poor wretch to drink. The channel is full; but full of dry, white stones. The rains have failed; the river has vanished. It saved others, him it cannot save. Victim of the bitterest disappointment, he lies down to expire, losing life where others found it. To such an accident, to hopes so fair but false, none are exposed who, rising to the call, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink, seek life in Jesus,—salvation in the grace of God. Have I been a wilderness unto thee, saith the Lord. No, the stream of mercy which has its channel in that word, has its type in those waters which, springing to the rod of Moses, gushed from the smitten rock—which the sun never dried, and the sand never drank as they followed Israel through her desert wanderings on to the green borders of the promised land.

"He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." For example,—Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters; and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; buy wine and milk without money and without price,—Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest,—The Spirit and the bride say, Come; and let him that heareth say, Come; and let him that is athirst come, and whosoever will, let him come and take of the waters of life freely,—Whosoever cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out,—Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved,—Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth,—Fear not, for I am with you, be not afraid, for I am thy God,—My grace is sufficient for thee,—I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

How many thousands on earth, and what a countless multitude crowned in glory, can set to their seals that these promises are true! Their light, how steady has it burned in the stormiest, how clear has it shone in trouble's darkest night. By help of these promises, the saints of God have quenched the violence of the fire; and stopped the mouths of lions; and trodden the serpent in the dust; and plucked the crown from the brow of death; and raised by the grave the shouts of victory; and—still greater triumph—confronted and conquered a world in arms. Joyful thought! there is not one promise of the gospel which is not as good and true as on the day it was made. None of its offers are withdrawn. It is a medicine which does not grow useless by age; a fountain that does not run empty by use; a bank that, fearing no panic, nor ever suspending payment, stands before the world with open doors, ready to honour its largest bills, and meet your greatest drafts.

Crowding every avenue under an alarm of impending judgment, let this congregation, this whole city, every inhabitant of our land, the wide world, with death and hell at their heels, make for the door of mercy; each man in tones of agony crying, If there is mercy to spare, be it mine—God were as happy as he is able to meet the wants of all, and make good the promise, Whosoever cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out. You cannot come too many or too often; too urgent, too needy, or too guilty; and, I will add, or too soon. Come! Roll thy guilt on the back, and weep thy sorrows out on the bosom of the Saviour. When I look to the height of his love, lost above the stars of heaven—to the depth of his consolation, descending lower than the pit—to the kindness of his heart, fuller than the brimming ocean; to the crown in his hand gemmed with stars; when I see him afflicted in all our afflictions; and while he leaves pearls to drop from kingly crowns, and stars from shaking heavens, gathering his people's "tears in his bottle," may I say with the great apostle, "My God shall supply all your wants out of the fulness of his glory in Jesus Christ." Cast all your cares—cares for yourself, and yours—cares for this world and the next, on him. He careth for you.

In a noble passage of Isaiah, the prophet tells us, how "all flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof as the flower of the field." And does not every week, each passing day, and fleeting hour, illustrate that solemn truth? Death lays his sharp scythe in among the grass; and to his stride and sweeping arm it falls in long broad swathes. I have seen the reapers in the harvest-field sit down on the fallen sheaves to wipe the sweat from their sun-browned brows, and rest awhile; but who ever saw this grim reaper sitting on the churchyard hillocks to rest himself and repair his strength. It can be said of him as of God, "He sleeps not, neither is weary." See how he advances on us—every day, every hour the nearer, as before an eye that expresses no pity, and an arm that is never weary, and a scythe that never blunts, fall the tallest grass and fairest flowers! "All flesh is grass!" A few more years and these sparkling eyes shall be quenched in death, a shroud around every form, on every lip the seal of dusty death, and all of us shall lie mouldering beneath the grassy sod in the silent grave—saved, or unsaved—our souls in heaven or in hell. We shall be gone; but not gone with us, with the grass and summer flowers, the word of God. Never shall it be said of it, The place that now knows it shall know it no more. That word shall endure for ever. Blessed truth! Take it home with you. No such balsam for a wounded heart—no such pillow for an aching head—no such brand for a battle-day—no such staff for manhood's hand, or crutch for tottering age. And what an anchor for the soul, sure and steadfast, amid death's swelling waves, when storms are roaring on the shores of time; and wearying to be gone, crying, How long, O Lord, how long, we wait the signal to cast loose our moorings, and enter the haven of eternal rest to learn, in crowns and thrones, the smiles of the redeemed and the Well-done and welcome of the Redeemer, that, "it is easier for heaven and earth to pass than for one tittle of the law to fail."

STUDIES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND CHARACTER.

JOHN CAMPBELL OF KINGSLAND.

UP to so late a period as 1840, a date so recent that to very many now living it must seem like yesterday, there was often to be seen walking along Shacklewell Lane, toward the Kingland Road, a little old man, who was well known in the locality as the Independent minister of the district. The congregation to which he ministered has, since his death, built a large and magnificent place of worship on the opposite side of the street from where he preached, but the Old Chapel, now occupied as a Birkbeck school, still holds its ancient position, and is to not a few, from its associations, one of the sights of London. The person to whom we refer is, John Campbell, once ironmonger in the Grassmarket of Edinburgh, afterwards missionary traveller to Lattakoo, and at his decease senior pastor of the Congregational Church at Kingland. The great city is proverbially a changeable place. Every ten years a district generally sees itself occupied by an entirely new set of inhabitants. But in this suburb there do still linger some who have hovered about it for the better part of their lives, and to them the appearance and appearances of Mr. Campbell seem to be peculiarly fresh and vivid. This present paper is written on the spot, in the house of friends who are connected with what was once his congregation; and the copy of his Life, from which any extracts which follow may be taken, is the property of one who actually received the bread of life at his hands. How wonderful and how encouraging does this last fact make the more recent chapters of the history of religion in this country. Here, in the year 1861, when the gospel is preached almost everywhere in Great Britain, and all the Churches are taking part in missionary enterprises, we have, pervading a district not simply the memory, but, as it were, the very presence of a man who lived and laboured when evangelism was struggling for existence; who sat in the same church with Sir Walter Scott, as a hearer of Dr. John Erskine; who itinerated with the Haldanes; who was the friend of the good old Countess of Leven; and who was long the correspondent in Scotland of John Newton, Thomas Scott, William Wilberforce, and many others of that noble company to whose efforts, under God, is due in a great measure the revival of religion in the present century. It used to be said by Lacroix of Calcutta, that the oldest missionaries were the most hopeful. We can easily believe it, and we can easily believe, in addition, that the most hopeful ministers at home must be those who have lived the longest in the world. For what had John Campbell seen in the course of his pilgrimage? He was born when not a single missionary society existed; when the Church of Scotland, to which he belonged, had its shining lights only here and there; when Sabbath schools, and tract distribution, and the innumerable agencies for good doing which are now in operation, were unknown; when darkness, deep as death, brooded over almost every part of the land. When he died the fountains of the great deep had been broken up. The Church of England, the Church of Scotland, and all the dissenting bodies in the country had their representatives in heathen lands. And although still, even in our immediate neighbourhoods, there remaineth much land to be possessed, the progress of evangelical religion in England had been such that, when he sat down to think of it, he must have felt sometimes as if he dreamed. What may we expect during the next sixty years, when, within one single lifetime, the aspect of the religious world so completely changed.

John Campbell was born at Edinburgh, in March 1766. His father, a native of Killin in Argyleshire, being at the time a grocer in the Cowgate. His parents died, however, when he was very young, and he and his two brothers were brought up by an uncle, a Mr. Bowers, whose godly life and conversation appear to have been the means of seriously impressing the minds of all his nephews. On comparing notes together previously to their partaking of the Lord's Supper for the first time, they found that, "reflecting on the uniform, consistent, and upright conduct of their uncle, led each of them to think seriously about the salvation of his own soul." The fact is well deserving of particular mention, illustrating, as it does, the arresting influence of a holy example! It was not, however, till he reached the age of twenty-nine, in the year 1795, that Campbell passed the crisis of his spiritual experience. Long before that, indeed, he was known and he acted as a religious man. Many of the good enterprises, in and around Edinburgh, with which he was long so prominently associated, had already been commenced, and Newton was writing to him as a regular correspondent. But in this earlier period of his religious history there were, according to his own account, some serious defects both in his life and in his doctrine. With regard to the former, it is enough to say, that he was naturally of a social, happy disposition, and being, moreover, a good singer, he was now and then seduced into spending his evenings in so frivolous a manner as to wound his conscience and deaden his sensibilities. And with regard to the latter it consisted not so much in any positive disbelief of the truth, as in an inability to perceive the simplicity of the gospel. It may be useful to some if we give in a few sentences the history of his experience in relation to this point. Those whose most distinct conception of John Campbell is that of a happy, useful, single-minded Christian, can scarcely realize that the dawn of his life as a religious man was cloudy and troubled in no ordinary degree. And yet so it was. For a number of years he alternated between rapture and despair, and as the moment of his deliverance approached, he at one time thought he should be under the necessity of applying to spirituous liquors for relief from his tormented mind. The fatal error which, like the fly in the ointment, affected in an evil way all his endeavours, lay here. He could not see that Christ, with all the blessings of salvation, was offered to him in the gospel freely,—offered to him simply as a sinner,—and that he simply as a sinner was warranted and entitled to put forth his hand and take the gift. A young girl, whom Mr. Campbell found dying of consumption, made a deep impression upon his mind by telling him that she was happy in trusting simply to Christ. This account of her faith, united to the composure with which she fell asleep in Jesus, struck him; but “the once poor, now rich orphan,” suited his taste better. He took its salvation as a “shining” proof that “God has not forgotten Scotland, and that Edinburgh and Leith were not out of date in heaven yet.” He actually rioted in imagining the change heaven had made upon that child in the twinkling of an eye. “The only thing,” his biographer goes on to say, “it did not suggest to him was, what he most needed, the duty of receiving the kingdom of heaven ‘as a little child.’ That he never thought of, although nothing is more frequently taught by Christ! It was only as a child of God, or as a new-born babe by regeneration, that he would venture to lay hold upon the hope of eternal life for himself. In fact, the gospel was nothing to him except when he felt himself to be something else than a sinner. He wanted to believe, not as a mere little child, but as an elect child, who had a legitimate right to appropriate Christ and the promises. The idea of believing on Christ in order to become a child of God, or in order to be warranted to reckon himself one, never seems to have crossed his mind.” This being the case, no wonder he laboured on in darkness and distress, for he was trying to have to begin with, and as a qualification for coming to Christ, what can only be attained to by coming to him in the first place. “Upon the evening of the twenty-sixth day of January, 1795,” however, he himself tells “the Lord appeared as my deliverer. He commanded, and darkness was turned into light. The cloud which covered the mercy-seat fled away! Jesus appeared as he is! My eyes were not turned inward, but outward! The gospel was the glass in which I beheld him. When our Lord first visited Saul upon the highway, he knew in a moment that it was the Lord. So did I. Such a change of views, feelings, and desires suddenly took place in my mind, as none but the hand of an infinite Operator could produce. Formerly I had a secret fear that it was presumptuous in me to receive the great truths of the gospel; now there appeared no impediment. I beheld Jesus as the speaker in his word, and speaking to me. When he said, ‘Come,’ I found no difficulty in replying, ‘Yes, Lord! thy pardoned rebel comes.’” “I now stand,” says he again, “upon a shore of comparative rest. Believing, I rejoice. When in search of comfort, I resort to the testimony of God; this is that field which contains the pearl of great price. Frames and feelings are like other created comforts, passing away; but the word of the Lord endureth for ever. What unutterable consolation is it, that the foundation of our faith and hope is ever immutably

the same! the sacrifice of Jesus acceptable and pleasing to the Father as ever it was! To this sacrifice I desire ever to direct my eye, especially at the first approach of any gloom or mental change.” These sentences contain unspeakably important truth. The case of John Campbell is very far from being a singular one. Thousands are living under the delusion that the way to progress towards the light is by giving assiduous and anxious attention to their frames and feelings. These are important in their place, and are not to be neglected, but all scripture and all history testify that if a sinful man wants the darkness to flee away, he must turn his face directly to the Sun. The foundation is without us, and not within. “This is the record that God hath given us eternal life, and this life is in his Son;” and “to as many as receive Christ, to them he gives the power to become the sons of God, even to those who believe in his name.”

From this date commenced the era of Mr. Campbell's real usefulness. In benevolent endeavours for the relief of the poor, and sick, and sinful in Edinburgh; in the organization of Sabbath schools; in the diffusion of religious information by means of the press; and, after a time, in the direct work of preaching the gospel in the neglected villages and districts of his native land, he made himself so conspicuous, that, though his station in life was comparatively humble, and his means and education far from remarkable, his fame as a centre of evangelistic influence extended throughout the whole country, and into the highest circles of society. The Grassmarket has various points of interest; and not the least is, that in it were erected the scaffolds on which many a Covenanter sealed his testimony with his blood. But if the reader of this paper should ever happen to pass through it, let him not forget to look out for that ironmonger's shop which once played such a prominent part in the revival of religion within the present century. Here letters were written to and received from all the then great champions of the faith; here were planned those preaching tours which, under the conduct of the Haldanes and others, contributed to the awakening of Scotland from its slumbers of spiritual indifference; and here might have been seen now and again, consulting over the affairs of the Redeemer's kingdom, such men as Charles Grant, the chairman of the East India company; Governor Macaulay from Sierra Leone; Charles Simeon, Rowland Hill, Andrew Fuller, besides a host of nearer neighbours as Dr. John Erskine, Dr. Davidson, Dr. Colquhoun, and Dr. Black. In the revivals which, about this time, were occurring in Wales, and in the formation of the various missionary societies which were contemporaneously springing into existence, Mr. Campbell, of course, took the deepest interest. He had even consented to become one of that devoted band, which Robert Haldane proposed to send at his own expense, to preach the gospel to their fellow-subjects in India, and was only constrained to withdraw from the enterprise by the strongly expressed opinion of John

Newton, that he was calculated to be most useful at home, and that the devil would only be too glad to get him out of the field. The issue of all this involvement in ecclesiastical affairs, especially at that period, might have been anticipated. It was the time when lay-preaching became fashionable—when the Established Church, being too inert to guide the movements originated by the more earnest of their members, were forced to see their work done for them in an irregular manner, by individuals and “unauthorized” associations, and when Mr. Haldane and his friends had been brought directly to face the question of how the numerous “tabernacles” which had been built were to be supplied with preachers. It was inevitable that a man in Mr. Campbell’s position should, in such a juncture, begin to have serious thoughts of devoting himself entirely to the work of the ministry. He did finally decide to do so; and having become at this time an Independent in principle as well as in practice, he found it comparatively easy to carry out his purpose. Having given up his business in Edinburgh, he studied for a session or two under Mr. Greville Ewing in Glasgow, and his gifts as a preacher being, of their kind, unquestionably high, he was very soon invited to accept the pastorate of the church at Kingsland, and was settled there in the year 1804. “He did not acquire much science whilst a student in Glasgow, but he made a good use of what he got, and was for ever on the outlook for more. Indeed, next to the holy unction which rested upon his spirit, his habits of observing man and nature were the secret of his charm as a preacher. He had always something new to say in his own way, and fresh from the works of God. There was also a witchery in his telling old and familiar things, which made them seem new. In fact, he was not comfortable in the pulpit, unless something hit his fancy, which he had looked at on all sides with his own eyes, and for himself. Accordingly, his preaching at Kingsland, if it never rose far above its standard, never sank below it, long as he was there. It was full of vivacity and originality from first to last.”

The world, however, is less acquainted with him as a minister of the gospel than as a missionary traveller. Upon the death of Dr. Vanderkemp in South Africa, it seemed to the directors of the London Missionary Society desirable that some person of weight and observation should be sent out from home to make a special survey of the work which he had been carrying on in that country; and Mr. Campbell was the party whom they resolved upon inviting to undertake this service. As it happened, the application came to the right quarter. Africa was a country in which the minister of Kingsland had long had a deep concern. His intimacy with Newton, “the old African,” as that good man often called himself, was perhaps one of the earliest causes of that concern; but while yet in Scotland he had interested himself in the well-being of the coloured race very directly. He had been a director of the Scottish Missionary Society, which had chosen Africa as the field of its operations. When the Sierra Leone Mission failed on account of the unhealthiness of the climate, it was he who suggested the plan of bringing over some African children to England with a view to their being educated and then sent back as a little leaven to leaven the lump. And when that plan was actually carried out, it was with him that Governor Macaulay first communicated on his arrival with his living cargo; and the earliest distinct picture we have of this new and interesting philanthropic service is that of the worthy ironmonger from Edinburgh crossing Clapham Common with five and twenty young negroes at his back. No wonder, then, that Mr. Campbell was asked to go to Africa, and no wonder he consented. One visit in 1812 was followed by another in 1819. Accounts of both have been published by himself; and though his Travels in that dark land have been so far thrown into the shade by the exploits of more recent explorers, his story has a charm in the manner of the telling which will give it an interest even after the map of the continent has become as full and complete as the map of France or Great Britain. And this reminds us that there is yet another thing to be considered, if we would form a perfect conception of the character of Mr. Campbell’s life. It is that he was a most attractive writer, especially for the young. He had little learning, of course, and his mental powers were not remarkably strong or great; but he had a lively fancy, and had the Goldsmith gift of a plain, pure, and interesting style. His books, accordingly, are all particularly readable; and they are besides, so well fitted to profit that we should be glad to hear of our children being better acquainted with their contents. It is so long since we have happened to stumble upon “Worlds Displayed,” and the “History of the Old World,” and “African Light,” that we begin to wonder if they are not out of print altogether.

From 1821, up to the time of his death, Mr. Campbell continued to live and labour among the people of his first and only charge at Kingsland. By them he was much beloved, and with all the fervour of his warm heart he reciprocated their affection. But more than that, he was, we are told, “greatly honoured by God in the conversion of many, of some, too, who were remarkable for their former rejection of the gospel.” Six months before the close of his long and useful life he began visibly to decline; yet with the decay of his outward man there was marked progress in the prosperity of his soul. “His whole deportment evinced increased spirituality of mind in an eminent degree.” His last public service was in the second week of March 1840, when “there was an unction about the address which struck most of his people,” and a fear was then expressed that they should see his face no more. Nor was the fear groundless. After that date his strength weakened with great rapidity, and on the 4th of April he entered into his rest, having attained the patriarchal age of seventy-four years. “I told him,” says his successor, Mr. Aveling, who was at his bedside during his last illness, "I told him his people prayed very earnestly and affectionately for him. The tears came into his eyes, and he said, 'O sir, I need it! I need it! I'm a poor creature!'" 'Oh,' he said on another occasion, I love to be near the blood of sprinkling! All I want is to feel my arm round the cross." When his mind a little wandered he talked of Africa, and missionary meetings, and friends with whom he had been associated in them, and on the day of his death, after giving expression to his own quiet confidence in two sayings addressed, the one to his co-pastor, the other to his wife, 'You see me in peace;' 'Don't grieve, there's nothing melancholy in dying and going to glory,' he was heard exclaiming with that inextinguishable evangelistic zeal which had been the animating principle of his whole existence, 'Let it fly! let the gospel fly!'" Let us echo the cry of the departing missionary. "Even so: come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." N. L. W.

THE DISCIPLES OF JESUS AND THE APOSTLES OF CHRIST.

It was a warm summer afternoon, and the roar from the distant sand-ridge filled the happy air. Outside the well-remembered room the branches of the lime (most beautiful of trees!) swayed and tossed in the wind, each leaf instinct with graceful life. Through the open window came the fragrant breath of the solitary lilac, whose purple clusters waved below. I had been thinking of the extraordinary personal influence of great men—men great in intellect or moral power—upon their followers; and how that influence is thus transmitted to others, who share, though at second hand, in the benefit. From this general truth it was natural to turn to the greatest instance of it—to the Galilean Teacher at whose feet the world now sits in school, and those few disciples through whom alone we have any historical knowledge of Him. And at this point there flashed upon me a circumstance so remarkable, that my first feeling was one of extreme astonishment that I had never noticed it before, and had never heard it remarked by any one else. Years have passed; but I still think it a most note-worthy circumstance, and one which (as a small crevice of fact may let in the whole ocean of truth) might lead a man to important results.

It is told of the founder of one of the ancient philosophies, that such was the reverence cherished towards him by his disciples, that in quoting his opinion, they never mentioned his name as they would that of another man, but always used the phrase, "The Master said," and their familiar "Ipse dixit" has become a proverb to this day. A better known instance of the same sort of thing is to be found in the relations of Socrates to his disciples, and especially to Plato. Socrates, the noblest of men who lived outside the circle of Christian revelation, has not left us a syllable of his own writing. But his disciples have done little else than record his conversations and discourses; so that he is known to many in the present day as a more familiar friend than their nearest neighbours. Plato in particular, of whom a recent writer says, "To this day, all philosophic truth is Plato rightly divined; all philosophic error is Plato misunderstood;" Plato, himself a man certainly superior to Socrates in intellectual power, though inferior morally, has thrown his whole grand philosophy into the form of dialogues and discussions, conducted by his revered master. Plato never speaks, Socrates says all; even where it is well known that the doctrines advanced are modifications by the younger thinker of what the elder had really taught. So those old disciples bore about with them the words of the masters whom they loved; so they rejoiced to proclaim them to all around. Now turn from them to those other disciples, and to that greater Teacher whom they called Master and Lord, and did well, for so He was. It is an extraordinary, almost an incredible fact, that THE APOSTLES NEVER QUOTE THEIR MASTER AT ALL. Throughout the whole range of their epistles, written by so many different men, at so many different times, on every subject of importance to the Church, at so short a time after He had left the world, we do not find one clear instance where they quote His words or rely on their authority.

But to feel the full force of this we must look more closely into their circumstances. In what relation did they stand to Jesus Christ?

In the first place, they were continually with him through all his active life on earth. They "compared with him, beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that he was taken up." They were with him on the shores of Galilee, and in the streets of Jerusalem, in Chorazin and Bethsaida at the first, in Bethany and on Olivet at the end. They were with him in the holy mount, and thought it good to be there. He brought them even to the dark garden, that they might watch with him that one hour. In public they formed the immediate circle around him; and when the multitudes departed, he and they were always left together. And he was the only centre of that little circle. He was the only speaker; they were all able listeners. Their original desire had been to "see Jesus." His original call had been simply, "Follow me." Day by day they "sat at his feet and heard his word." No teacher ever occupied such a position of authority as he did. They owed all to him. Unlearned and ignorant at the first, they were slow of heart to the end. The disciples of Socrates were able and accomplished men, learned in other philosophies besides his. The disciples of Jesus were absolutely nothing except his disciples. They hung upon him. They clung to him. "Unto whom can we go?" Their hearts burned within them while he talked to them. Often they durst not even ask him any questions. Never did they venture to discourse with him. (There are no "dialogues" in the Gospels.) But they drank in his voice with open ears and hungry hearts. And they venerated and loved him,—not his words, but himself. No teacher since the world began had such an intense and wondrous personality as Jesus. As he said himself, his sheep followed him, not because they admired his words, but because they "knew his voice." For his words (alone of all words spoken on earth) were authentic words. However great and glorious they were, they never lost their personal quality; they were still, if we may so speak, all voice. Never did a human soul so truly express itself in words; never did words so wondrously express a human soul. We remember the words of those who have departed from us, because they recall to us themselves. But Christ's words were, we might almost say, a part of himself—steeped in his wondrous personality. How must they have clung indelibly to the minds of those for whom he died, who, with all their faults, loved him unspeakably, and cherished the remembrance of him as the very life of their life!

But Jesus was more to them than "The dearest soul

That ever looked with human eyes."

We know from their own writings how they thought of him. They trusted that it was he which should redeem Israel. They confessed him as the Son of God. From his first disciple, who declared him to be the taker away of the sins of the world, the very day after he began his work, to Thomas's "My Lord and my God," uttered among those who ate and drank with him after his rising from the dead, there is a continual acknowledgment of the Holy One of God, the Son of the Blessed. These men, always with him, knew well what he claimed to be. They heard those dread utterances, each of which might shake creation. "I am the light of the world." "I am the bread of life." "I and the Father are one." "Come unto me." There was now no question with them as to the value of the words he uttered. "I came out from the Father, and am come into the world. The word which ye hear is not mine, but the Father's that sent me." "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." In the words of their Lord, spoken to them familiarly in the house and by the way, were wrapped up all counsel, grace, guidance, wisdom, joy, forgiveness of sins, direction in duty, meetness for eternal blessedness. Well might they lay up such sayings in their heart! well might they ponder the words of such a Saviour!

And now the time was come that he should depart. Having loved his own that were in the world, he loved them even unto the end. It is meet for men to remember the words of a dying friend. It is right that the disciple should cherish and disseminate the words of his Master. It is the work of messengers and ambassadors to rehearse the message of their Lord. It was their office to testify of the things which they had seen and heard, to all nations of men. We know too that the words of our Lord are generally in the form of pregnant and comprehensive utterances, embracing far more than they at once reveal. And even his plainer discourses to his friends, to whom it was given, as it was not to the multitude, to know the mysteries of the kingdom, those friends were as yet too dull and unbelieving to understand. The full harvest of the words of Christ was to be gathered after the "ear of corn" should fall into the ground and die. And so his last promise was his Spirit, to "bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."

Now look at the apostolic epistles. The fact is marvellous, but it is plain; they never quote their Master at all. Christ, and the doctrine of Christ, is their constant burden; but they never seem to draw that doctrine from his lips. They are continually deciding doubtful questions; but they never resort to his authority whom they glory in as the Wisdom of God, their Counsellor, and their King. They speak of him throughout in terms of profound and deathless affection; but there are no personal reminiscences of him who loved them with such a love. They preach not themselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord, yet they never bring the Churches to their Lord's own words, those words which, but twenty or thirty years before, had given life to their souls. Paul, who, as one born out of due time, had only "seen that Just One, and heard the words of his mouth" on the occasion when he received his commission as apostle, might be supposed to have even a more devouring passion than the others for the words and person of him of whom he had seen so little. Yet he ranges like an archangel through all regions of Christian doctrine and practice, building it up all from Christ, in Christ, through Christ, to Christ, but never resorting for light or for authority to his words whom he preaches as the first-born of every creature, in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Once, at Miletus, we know that he told the elders of the Church to "remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.'" But we have no other utterance of this sort, even in the Acts of the Apostles; and in all those mighty epistles—never. James, in his trenchant letter to the tribes scattered abroad, never seeks to fortify his authority by referring to the doctrine of Him in whose name he speaks so tremendously, and whose companion he had been through the days of his humiliation and exaltation. Peter, the ardent, affectionate, old man, writing to the strangers in Asia Minor, bursts into an ecstasy at the thought of him "whom having not seen, ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory," and goes on in the richest strain of apostolic instruction and consolation, yet none of it drawn from the well-remembered words of Christ, of whom he says, "We were eye-witnesses of his majesty." He quotes even our "beloved brother Paul," but never Him, who once, "casting his eye upon Peter, broke his heart, and saved his soul." And last, that most familiar and beloved friend of the Lord, once the young, but now the aged John, while like all the others founding his apostleship, and beginning his message with, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of Life," never throughout his epistles founds upon, never even refers to or relates, the words of Him upon whose bosom he had lain.

At present we wish only to bring out the fact clearly, and have no room either for full explanations or many inferences. Doubtless there are many parts of truth which cast light upon this, and receive illustration from it in return. Does it not remind us, for example, of that striking declaration of Christ, when in answer to Peter's fervid confession of him as having the words of life, he answered solemnly, "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven?" Yes, there was more in the relation between them, even when he was on earth, than the mere tie of reverence, however profound, between wondrous teacher and enthusiastic disciple. And as to that subsequent marvellous sinking of their personal connection which we find in the apostolic Epistles, we have the pregnant words of Paul, speaking for himself and the other apostles, "Henceforth we know no man after the flesh; yea, and if we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more." But there are two special uses of the subject which we should like to make.

First, let us speak one word to the sceptic, who declines or delays to have anything to do with Christianity at all. What do you make of those Greek books which have come down to our time, and which our children read in English as the epistles of Paul, and John, and others? Whatever you think as to the value or authority of these books, you must acknowledge one thing about them. Never were disciples so profoundly attached to their master, or so utterly dependent upon him. These men profess to owe everything to him; it is their common language that their whole life is lived in him and to him; he is to them the greatest and wisest of beings—the only wise and the only good. You have read of many disciples in different lands who revered their masters, but never anything like this. Then open them again. These disciples never quote their master, never retail his ideas, never seek his authority, act independently of him, for whose sake and in whose name they do all things. It is the strangest paradox in the world,—absolute dependence, complete independence. How do you explain it?

Examine the books candidly, note this and a thousand similar and astonishing circumstances. There is nothing to unite or explain them except the Divine.

And now to another class. In the present day the evidences of Christianity have shifted their position; or rather, in this age of hurry, men have become weary of the old regular approaches to the citadel of truth, and demand a breach in the wall through which to rush to life.

Accordingly it is Christ himself, his personal appearance in this world, his life, character, and history, which most men feel as the great miracle which authenticates Christianity. Such a man could be no less than what he claimed to be; his form is the form of the Son of God.* And we believe there are thousands, especially of the young, who have reason to bless God for what we may without irreverence call this "new and living way," towards a conviction of the truth. They found it hard to believe the Bible, as a means to believing in Christ; but believing in Christ as a being historically set forth to us eighteen hundred years ago, they find it easy to "hear his words." It is well, so far; but do not the facts which in this paper we have been considering suggest something more? It is good to sit at the Master's feet; yet let us remember also his words to his apostles, "He that receiveth you receiveth me," even as "he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me." And to this, as we have seen, accords the bearing of the apostles themselves. After his death, they cowered together in the city of Jerusalem; himself and "his words" being gone, they were utterly without strength. But on the Pentecostal morning the promise was fulfilled, "which," said He, "ye have heard of me," and they were "endued with power from on high." The fire touched them, and those weak ones sprang up and became the very thunderbolts of God. Henceforth we find them ruling in the Church, not as the companions of Jesus, not as his favourite disciples, but by Divine authority, the authority not of the departed teacher, but of the living Lord. And so too they wrote those divine epistles, in which they regulate all matters of faith and practice for the whole Church of Christ for ever, and that with such a plenitude of inspiration and authority as never once to adduce the additional authority of Christ himself. Therefore, let him who hears the voice of Christ hear his apostles too. His words are divine, and claim to be so. Their words are authoritative, and claim to be so. And the same self-evidencing power which proves to us the divinity of the one, may prove to us the divine authority of the other.

THE CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN.

PART III.

THE rise and progress of the Reformation in Germany was joyfully hailed by the Moravian Brethren. They saw in it an answer to many prayers, and a fulfilment of the dying hopes and predictions of their great fore-runner, Huss. In 1522 they sent a deputation to visit Luther, and express to him their sincere congratulations, and the joy and thankfulness which they felt at the success with which God had already crowned his labours. The deputies met with a most cordial reception; and next year, while repeating the assurances of friendly interest, they ventured to represent the expediency of introducing a stricter degree of discipline among the new converts. Luther agreed in the truth of this advice, but said that things in Germany were not yet far enough advanced to admit of his following it. On this subject the Brethren were peculiarly sensitive and solicitous, and they felt unable in conscience to unite with the Reformed Churches, until more strictness was introduced among them. They saw besides that their own congregations were in danger of suffering loss, both in respect of numbers and spirituality, from the example of those around them, who now professed to hold equally sound doctrine along with comparative laxity of discipline.

They, therefore, continued to complain and remonstrate, till Luther became offended, and for a time their mutual cordiality was interrupted. But in 1532, after receiving a copy of the Bohemian Confession of Faith, Luther, with Christian frankness, acknowledged his error in having yielded to feelings of coldness or suspicion, and made the document be printed at Wittenberg, with a preface from his own pen, warmly recommending the Brethren and their doctrines to the love of all true Christians. In 1542, when, for the last time, a deputation waited upon him, to ascertain whether it might not be possible to come to an agreement on the disputed points, so as to allow of the Churches being united, he promised to take the subject into serious consideration, and at the close of the Conference, giving the deputies the right hand of fellowship, dismissed them with the words, "Be ye apostles to the Bohemians,—I and my fellow-labourers desire to be so to our own countrymen. Labour diligently in the work of Christ in your native land, as you have opportunity, and we will do the same here, as God shall enable us."

At another time he writes, "Although they, the Bohemian Brethren, do not exceed us in purity of doctrine, for all the articles of faith are taught by us plainly and clearly, according to the Word of God, yet they far exceed us in the observance of regular discipline, whereby they blessedly rule their congregations, and in this respect they are more deserving of praise than we. This we must concede to them for the honour of God and the sake of truth; for our German people will not bend under the yoke of discipline."

Melancthon, Calvin, and other Reformers of that memorable period, were equally decided in their expressions of Christian sympathy and approbation. Bucer writes from Strasburg, "I am persuaded that you alone are they that at this day are found, in all the world, amongst whom only flourishes sound doctrine, with pure, edifying, and wholesome discipline. I have perused the Confession you sent me, rejoicing very much to find amongst you so great a lustre of the truth, and such order and purity in your administration. . . . Truly we are much ashamed of ourselves, when we compare at any time our Church with yours."

Luther died in 1546, and about the same time commenced the war against the Protestants, when the Bohemians, as a nation, having refused to assist their sovereign Ferdinand in fighting on the Catholic side, this conduct was attributed greatly to the influence of the Brethren, who were consequently exposed anew to persecution. Those of rank and wealth were banished and their property confiscated; many others were thrown into prison, the churches were shut up, and the common people ordered either to conform to the Romish ritual, or quit the country in six weeks. Many tried to compromise by joining the Calistines, but a large body, along with their bishop, Matthias Lyon, emigrated to Poland. From that country they were soon expelled, and found refuge in Prussia.

George Israel, an eminent minister, was imprisoned in the castle of Prague, and treated with much severity. A large ransom was demanded for his liberation, which his people offered to advance, but he refused to accept it, saying, "It is enough for me to know that I have been ransomed once for all by the blood of Christ, I have no need to be redeemed over again by silver and gold; keep your money, for you will have much need of it in your own approaching exile." He did escape, however, in a remarkable way. Putting on the ordinary dress of a clerk or book-keeper, with some paper and an ink horn in his hand, and a pen behind his ear, he walked boldly in broad daylight through his guards, out of the castle, and by the good providence of the God in whom he trusted, passed unsuspected.

He escaped first to Prussia, and in 1551 was invited to Poland, where the good seed sown by the Bohemian exiles, during their brief sojourn, was already bearing fruit. Some small congregations of United Brethren were forming, but at first under circumstances of much trial and opposition. In Posen, when George Israel arrived, they could only venture to meet in private houses, blocking up the windows with pillows and mattresses, to deaden the sound of the hymn of praise, or the preacher's voice. Every effort was made to take George prisoner, no fewer than forty men, it is said, being engaged for this purpose. He only used the precaution of frequent change of dress; and alternately disguised as a courtier, a waggoner, or a mechanic, went openly through the streets, while strengthening and comforting his fellow-believers. He must have been a man of no ordinary courage and presence of mind, as well as strong faith.

He lived to see his beloved Church take root and flourish in the land of her exile. Before his death, forty congregations were established in Poland. The doctrines of the Reformed German Church were also making great progress in this and adjoining countries; and after a variety of negotiations, into which it is unnecessary here to enter, the Lutherans and United Brethren in Poland joined together, so as to form one body of Protestant Christians. In regard to this movement, various opinions have been held; and it is to be feared that the advantage gained in point of numbers and unity was more than counterbalanced, on the Moravian side, by a decrease in strict discipline and spirituality.

Meanwhile a change of sovereign on the imperial throne of Germany led to better times for the sufferers in Bohemia. Maximilian II., soon after his accession, rescinded the edicts against the Brethren. Their places of worship, closed for nearly twenty years, were re-opened, and many a weary exile returned with thankful heart to his father-land. And an attempt to revive persecution, in 1565, was frustrated in a remarkable manner. The chancellor of Bohemia having gone to Vienna, and by importunity obtained from the emperor a new persecuting edict, was drowned, just as he left the city, in consequence of the bridge over the Danube giving way; and the casket "which contained the death-warrant of many thousand innocent persons," was carried away by the stream, a loss which the Emperor never consented to repair.

A period of repose followed, which the Brethren's ministers sought to improve for spiritual edification and the good of their people, and also availed themselves of for undertaking a more complete translation of the Scriptures. Several divinity students were sent to the universities of Wittenberg and Basle, to acquire more knowledge of Hebrew and Greek; and after finishing their studies they met in the castle of Kralitz, where a printing-press was established by the proprietor, a Moravian nobleman, and there, under the superintendence of several bishops, they carried on their important work, and produced, in six successive volumes, during fourteen years, a valuable translation, which has passed through many editions.

At the beginning of the seventeenth century, the Brethren in Bohemia appear to have been at the height of worldly prosperity, both as to numbers and position. Their synods were attended by princes and noblemen—they had colleges for the education of their own students for the ministry—the church in Prague where John Huss, two hundred years before, had preached the gospel, was publicly given over to them, amidst popular rejoicing, and free leave granted to erect another when required, in the same city. But prosperity, to churches or to individuals, is in itself a trial which few are able to sustain without injury. We need not be surprised to find that much of the earnest, spiritual, devoted piety, which had become only more firmly rooted during many a storm, now faded in the sunshine.

"The purity of doctrine" (to quote from Holmes), "and simplicity of morals which had hitherto distinguished the Brethren, though not totally lost, were considerably diminished. It is no wonder, therefore, but should rather be considered as a gracious correction of our heavenly Father, that in the subsequent persecution of the Protestants, and complete loss of all their religious liberties, the Brethren had their full share, and even suffered more severely than others; nor can their sufferings, in every case, be said to have been purely for the gospel's sake."

Their time of prosperity, however, was comparatively brief, and the days of darkness were at hand. The famous "thirty years' war" commenced; and the Protestants in Bohemia, exasperated by various acts of oppression, rose in arms against their sovereign. This gave an excuse for their popish enemies to consider them as rebels and traitors; and the United Brethren, though probably less involved than others in the actual fault, shared most deeply in the distress that followed. We shall not enter into details regarding these sad years. But after June 21, 1621, on which day twenty-seven Protestant noblemen, including some of the best patrons and members of the Brethren's Church, suffered death on the scaffold, such was the relentless severity of persecution in Bohemia and Moravia, that we are told, in the short space of ten years "no Protestant church or school was to be found in all these countries;" whole districts were depopulated, many thousands of families seeking refuge in other lands; and of two hundred ministers of the United Brethren, ninety-six only were left alive, and these so "hunted down," that only by stealth, and at the most imminent peril, could any one venture to remain at home.

The words of their celebrated Bishop, Amos Comenius, will best describe this time of sorrow.

"The Lord visited them" (the United Brethren) "as with a tempest, and carried away, as by a midnight flood, their ancient and beautifully planted garden. He gave their nobles into captivity, and the blood of their elders to be shed like water. Of the many hundred churches that had been the joy and rejoicing of their heart, they had not one left. The pastors were driven from their stations, and the shorn and shivering flocks consigned over to hirelings. Those who survived persecution were lost by being driven from their country. Nearly all the ministers of the churches, all the elders, bishops, superintendents, assistants, and superior helpers are gone, and I only am left, except that I have one colleague remaining in Poland."

Does this not sound like a lingering echo of the Hebrew prophet's lamentation of old? "They have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, even I only am left, and they seek my life, to take it away."

But "the Lord God of Elijah" has never left himself without witnesses on the earth. Nor could the most persevering energy of Popish persecution utterly destroy the chosen remnant in Bohemia. For nearly a century, however, little light can be thrown on their history, as they were compelled in every respect to seek the greatest concealment and obscurity. Multitudes of the brethren emigrated, along with other Protestants, to more friendly countries, especially to Poland, although this was attended with many difficulties. Their faith and zeal, under such discouraging circumstances, gradually declined, and from a variety of causes, as Holmes remarks, "in the beginning of last century, the name of the Bohemian Brethren was nearly forgotten among the other Christian denominations."

We shall soon see in how striking a manner it pleased the Lord to send a time of revival, and "renew their days as of old." Meanwhile let us glance at a few facts in the history of the remarkable man already mentioned, Bishop Comenius, who may be considered as the connecting link between the ancient and restored Church of the Brethren.

John Amos Comenius was born on March 28, 1592, at Komua, in Moravia. From his early years he devoted himself to God, and desired to serve him in the ministry. He studied at the Reformed Universities of Herborn and Heidelberg; and, being conspicuous for talents as well as piety, was at an early age appointed principal of the governor's school of Prezerow, and in 1618 chosen as minister of the congregation at Fulnek, the chief settlement of the brethren in Moravia.

The dark clouds of coming trial, even then beginning to gather, soon burst in storm on his Church and people. Only six years after his ordination all Protestant ministers were banished the country. He found a place of concealment in the mountain castle of a friendly nobleman, and was enabled to pay occasional visits to his flock; but this refuge soon failed, as the nobility themselves were driven into exile. Then Comenius, along with many of his people, finally left their country and emigrated into Poland. On the summit of the Bohemian mountain boundary the sorrowful band of exiles paused to take a last look at their native land, and knelt around their pastor while he offered up a fervent prayer, that the Lord would not suffer the light of his holy word to be for ever extinguished in Bohemia and Moravia, but would preserve there a seed to serve him in days to come. The memory of that prayer has never been lost in the Church on earth, and an abundant answer was granted from above "after many days."

Comenius fixed upon Lisso as his place of residence; and there, at a synod held in 1632, was consecrated Bishop of the Bohemian and Moravian branch of the Brethren's Church, now so widely "scattered abroad." He devoted much of his time to literary occupations, and published several educational works, which gained for him a high reputation, and invitations to visit other countries, England among the rest. During his many journeys he omitted no opportunity for pleading the cause of his oppressed, afflicted Church. Deeply did he bewail her outward tribulation and spiritual decline.

When, at the Peace of Westphalia, in 1648, no provision was made for the relief of the Moravian Protestants, it seemed as if all hope from man was vain; but he never relinquished his hope in the Lord, that in some unlooked-for way deliverance and restoration would yet come. He did what he could, in trustful faith, to make preparation before hand for better days. In 1649, he published a History of the Brethren, with an appendix, stating his own views for the reformation and improvement of their discipline, and a dedication, as his "last will and testament" to the Church of England, solemnly bequeathing to her care these memorials of his people. "Should it please God," he writes, "at a future period, to educe good from our present afflictions, we, in that case, commend to you our beloved mother, the Brethren's Church, that you may take care of her, whatever it may please God to do, whether to restore her in her native land, or, when deceased there, to revive her elsewhere. . . . If there has been found in our Church anything true, honest, just, pure and lovely, anything of good report, any virtue and any praise, care ought by all means to be taken that this may not perish with us, but that the foundation at least may not be so entirely overthrown in the present ruin as not to be discoverable by succeeding generations. Into your hands, therefore, we commit this precious deposit, and thus, by your care, make provision for posterity."

In 1661, Comenius published a Catechism for the spiritual edification of his people, dedicating it "to the scattered sheep of Christ, especially in Fulnek." This, by the divine blessing, proved of much benefit to those for whom it was intended by the pious author.

As his latter days approached, he felt great anxiety at the prospect of the Episcopal order of his beloved Church dying with him. To prevent this he used every effort for the appointment of a successor; and in 1662, at Mielencin in Poland, two new bishops were duly elected and consecrated,—one for the Polish congregations, the other for the dispersed Bohemian and Moravian members; and by this means the Episcopal succession was preserved when the time of their revival came.

The residence of Comenius latterly was at Amsterdam, where he supported himself chiefly by private tuition; and there, in 1672, at the age of eighty years, forty-four of which had been spent in banishment for the sake of Christ, this good and faithful servant closed his eyes in peace.

"Our fathers trusted in thee, O Lord; they trusted, and thou didst deliver them. They cried unto thee, and were delivered; they trusted in thee, and were not confounded." c. c.

BIBLICAL TREASURY.

"A PRAYER OF MOSES, THE MAN OF GOD."

"Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations," &c.
—PSALM xc.

THIS is the oldest of the Psalms. It was written five centuries before David—written, as its title informs us, by Moses, the man of God. And as it is the oldest Psalm in the book—one of the most ancient poems in the world, it is certainly one of the most sublime—full of the loftiest conceptions of God's character and attributes, and of the sovereignty and righteousness of his dealings with the children of men.

There is strong internal evidence that this Psalm was composed by Moses during the period of Israel's wandering in the wilderness—a very mournful era of their history, and of which, in its details, little is known, but over which this Psalm casts, as we think, a cheering light. For it is to be borne in mind, that awful as was the dispensation of divine judgment, by which the Israelites were doomed to wander in the wilderness, till the whole of the unbelieving generation—some hundreds of thousands—should have died, yet the dispensation was at the same time a merciful one, for they were not cut off immediately in their sins, but space was given them for repentance; and that many of them did turn to God we may hope from the simple fact, that Moses, acting by divine direction, indited such a prayer as this for their use, and which was probably often sung by them during those weary wanderings. Should it not invest this Psalm with a new interest to us, whenever we read or sing it, to think that in all probability it was first sung by the Israelites in the wilderness; and that we may therefore regard it as a venerable memorial of the Hebrew worship during those sad and weary years. If some traveller through that desert were now to find in it—written on the side of one of its rocky valleys, or in some old time-worn manuscript—a song bearing to be sung by the Israelites when there, what an interest the discovery would excite. Such a song we have here, only with this difference, that by giving it a place in the Bible, the Lord has taken a far surer method of preserving it and handing it down from age to age.

Let us look for a little at the Psalm, first, in this aspect of it, as written for the use of the Israelites in the wilderness, and as actually sung by them. And in this view, how appropriate are the opening words, "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations," as if they would say, We never had any other dwelling-place. Our fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. At thy word they went from one place to another, not knowing whither they went. We ourselves were bondmen in Egypt, and now we are in the wilderness with no other home than this. But though we and our fathers have been strangers and sojourners before thee, yet thou wast with us, in every time, and in every place, our fathers' God, and our God, our dwelling-place in all generations.

Equally appropriate, when we consider their circumstances, seems the allusion to the mountains in the following verse. Everywhere mountains suggest the idea of everlasting duration and unchangeableness, and naturally raise men's thoughts to God.

Much more amid the awful solitudes of Sinai, where he who journeys feels that the hand of time, during many centuries, has made no appreciable change, where the traveller of the present day sees all things much as they were seen by Israel. These, he says to himself, are the hills on which they looked, with whose forms their long sojourn in the wilderness must have made them familiar. Yonder they saw the sun rise, and yonder set; and the stars which appear in the firmament at night are the same stars which shone on them. What a change it was to the Israelites when they passed into this wilderness from such a country as Egypt, with its fertile fields and wonderful river—its busy people—its kings and armies—its magnificence and pomp! What a difference it must have made, when they were brought from these into the desert, to be as it were alone with God; and how well might the scenery of that wilderness, its mountains so changeless and awe-inspiring, raise their thoughts to the Eternal One, who "before the mountains were brought forth, and ere ever he had formed the earth and the world, is from everlasting to everlasting God."

How must they now also have felt themselves in the power of this Almighty One,—a power against which, as they learned at last by sad experience, it was infinitely vain for them to contend. And what an awful display of that power had they, in the gradual but sure accomplishment of the sentence pronounced against them, and which was every day fulfilling before their eyes, when God turned them to destruction, and said, "Return, ye children of men." The very delay in the execution of that sentence—the conviction that there they must wander up and down, until it was accomplished, must have only made them more deeply feel it, as they saw one after another of their comrades disappear—must have made them feel how certain was the dissolution which awaited them, how irrevocable the doom, how unfailing the word of Him on whose purposes the lapse of time effects no change, in whose sight a thousand years are but as yesterday when it is past and as a watch in the night.

The similitudes employed in the following verses to set forth the shortness of life and the certainty of death, are such as might, in these circumstances, naturally occur.

The winter rain torrents of that desert, which come so suddenly, swiftly, and irresistibly, might readily suggest the first of these emblems, "Thou carriest them away as with a flood." The comparison of human life to "a sleep," of which we are unconscious till it is over and we awake, is, of course, equally appropriate to every place. But "the grass, which in the morning flourisheth and groweth up, and in the evening is cut down, and withereth," carries our thoughts again to the wilderness, and to the verdure which at certain seasons springs up hastily in parts of its barren valleys, and again as rapidly decays. Certainly no language could more strikingly describe the condition of the Israelites at the time: "consumed," or gradually wasted away as they were by the ordinary processes of decay and dissolution, and not only so, but visited also with other out-breakings of God's indignation, and manifestations of his displeasure against them for their sins—as when many of them perished in the rebellion of Korah by the earthquake and the fire, or when, as on other occasions, thousands were destroyed by venomous serpents, by pestilence, and by war. So that they were thus not only consumed by God's anger, but troubled also by his wrath, and made to feel in their inmost apprehensions that he had set their iniquities before him, and that even their secret sins, their pride, and murmuring, and unbelief were in the light of his countenance. How well might they say then that all their days were passed away in God's wrath, that their days did he consume in vanity, and their years in trouble; that they spent their years as a tale that is told; and what an affecting view of their condition, during these years, is suggested by the following verse! We are to remember that those of them who were sentenced to die in the wilderness were such as were twenty years old and upwards at the time of their leaving Egypt. In so vast a multitude there must have been many of all ages, and as the period of their wandering was just forty years, many must have died in the ordinary course at sixty or under—the extreme term and limit of their life being seventy, or at furthest eighty years. It is affecting to think of these old men wearing out in the wilderness, seeing their equals and comrades, one after one, drop off, waiting all the days of their appointed time till their own change should come; for there, they knew, they must remain till the very last man should have passed away; and these were, therefore, not inappropriate, though plaintive strains in their song—a song which from these stillnesses and solitudes, may have often arisen audibly to heaven—"The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow: for it is soon cut off, and we fly away."

Yet their song had also a more cheerful strain. The picture is dark, and deeply shaded, but rays of light from heaven fall down upon it, for there are various considerations, which warrant us to hope that God's judgments were not sent on them in vain. There is, as already stated, the fact that they were spared so long. Why should this have been, but to give them an opportunity of repentance. Then, during all these years they enjoyed the ministry of Moses, the man of God. During these years also were observed the solemn services and sacrifices of the tabernacle, by which they were taught, that God, though justly angry with them, was willing to be propitiated, and in which they could see Christ's day afar off. It was then, too, that one of the most beautiful of all the Old Testament types of Christ was exhibited among them, the serpent lifted up by Moses, and through which, as they looked upon it, they not only received a bodily and temporal healing, but in which we cannot doubt many of them saw, however indistinctly, a more glorious salvation shadowed forth.

That they did profit by all these lessons and visitations, we may infer also from another circumstance—the piety of their children, of the generation which immediately succeeded them, and under Joshua entered the promised land. It is impossible at least thoughtfully to read this Psalm, without perceiving how entirely it harmonizes with such a view. It is a Psalm for all time. But we cannot fix on any other period of the Old Testament history which could more naturally have given occasion for its being penned; and the very fact of such a Psalm having been composed for the Israelites then, casts, as already observed, a cheering light on that period, otherwise so dreary and dark. There is, as became it, an air of deep sadness pervading this Psalm, but in its tone submissive and reverential in the highest degree. The language is that of penitent and contrite hearts, weaned and broken off at length from well-nigh incurable guilt and folly, and brought to submit with a true resignation to God; and the prayers with which it concludes, that they might be taught to number their days aright, and satisfied early with God's mercy, are the prayers of men who hoped for a better life beyond the grave,—who believed that though they themselves must fall in the wilderness, the glory of God would appear to their children, when they should be brought into the pleasant land,—and who thus, in preparing their children for the glorious things which awaited them, and preparing themselves to leave the world, felt that they had "a work" to do—a work which redeemed the otherwise miserable remnant of their life from its utter vanity—a work which they could ask the Lord to establish and confirm. TRUE PRAYERS NEVER LOST.

BY REV. THEODORE L. CUYLER.

It is hard to believe that the fervent prayer of the righteous man is ever lost. The answer may be long delayed. It may come in a manner wholly unlooked for. The return of the prayer may be such that it may not be recognised by the devout soul who uttered it. But it is not lost.

1. For example, there are some prayers which we cannot expect to see answered immediately. I was at a monthly concert last evening, where God's people were pleading with him for the conversion of the world. None of that praying company had any expectation of living to see the day when the last heathen nation should surrender to the victorious Jesus. Yet their petitions will never be forgotten. Those pleading disciples will yet behold the glorious fulfilment of their desires from the battlements of heaven. For in our own experience we have seen many a prayer manifestly answered long after the saint who breathed it into the ear of the Saviour has gone to lay his weary head on that Saviour's breast.

A dying mother commits her beloved boy to a covenant-keeping God. She has often borne that child on the arms of faith to the mercy seat. He has been the child of many prayers; and in the feeble utterances of her passing spirit another and a last petition is breathed forth that Christ would have mercy on his soul. Years roll away. The sod has grown green, and the rank grass has long waved over that mother's tomb. In some distant land—mayhap hundreds of miles from that spot—a full-grown man, who has long been ripening in sin, is seen bowed in prayer. He is crying out of an agonized heart, God be merciful to me a sinner! Behold he prayeth, and his prayer is the answer of the fervent petitions which his dying mother uttered many long years before. Her requests were recorded in God's book of remembrance; and but for them we know not that the prayer of that penitent son would have ever ascended there. Let praying fathers and mothers never grow faint of heart. Let desponding Churches—long unvisited by revival blessings—only close up their ranks more compactly about the mercy-seat, and besiege heaven with new importunity. For above the dark cloud of their discouragement is written, as in the clear, upper sky, "He that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened."

2. Other prayers are answered at the time of their utterance, but in a way so unlooked for that he who offered them is inclined to think that the very opposite of what he asked for has befallen him. One individual prays, for instance, that he may be enabled to glorify God. Ere he is aware, some tremendous calamity comes crashing down upon him, prostrating him to the dust. His fortune is swept away. Or his schemes of promotion are blasted. A favourite child is missed from the cradle or the hearthstone. His hopes are withered like grass. God has answered his prayer, but has answered it, as the Psalmist says, "by terrible things." From under the overwhelming pressure of affliction he flees to Jesus, his divine comforter, and oh, how his love is kindled by the contact! How his latent faith is called forth! How he glorifies God in the furnace of trial which is purging away the dross of selfishness and worldliness, and making his pure gold to shine with tenfold brightness!

We once saw an earnest inquirer who was praying most importunately for faith in Christ, and for peace to his troubled soul. But while he prayed a cloud of darkness gathered across his horizon. And against that cloud, which swung like a funeral pall before his vision, played the sharp lightnings of the Almighty's wrath. The thunders of God's law roared against him. Instead of peace came only the sword. Instead of the calm he sought came the fearful tempest; and, under the stress of its terrors, the poor baffled soul betakes himself to the "covert" which Christ has raised on Calvary. There he finds the peace he so earnestly prayed for. There the long-sought confidence in Jesus pours its fulness through the soul. His prayer was answered—first by terrible things, but at last by the very blessings which he desired. And without that storm the true calm would have never come. Had the sinner not been led to that frightful view of his own guilt and condemnation, he might never have gone to Christ, and thus could not have known true abiding peace. As he looks back over the dark valley of sorrow through which the divine hand has wondrously led him, and sees that no other way would so surely bring him to the cross, he feels a renewed assurance that no true prayer is ever lost; he now knows that he that asketh aright will always receive, and he that seeketh will surely find. His experience is worth all it cost him.

3. Once more, let us remark that the petitions of believers are often answered according to their intention, and not according to the strict letter of the request. The utterer of the prayer sought only the glory of God, but, in his ignorance, asked for wrong things. God hears and answers him; but the blessing granted is something very different from what the believer expected. The case of Paul is a beautiful illustration of this. He is sorely afflicted by a "thorn in the flesh." What the precise nature of the affliction was, we know not. Perhaps it was a severe malady; perhaps a besetting sin; perhaps a mortifying deformity of body or of character. He beseeches God in three earnest petitions that this "thorn" might depart from him. His prayers are heard. They are answered. But, instead of the removal of the thorn comes the cheering assurance, "My grace is sufficient for thee." The Lord does not take away the trial, but gives him all that is needed to make it endurable; thus the divine glory and Paul's spiritual well-being were more certainly advanced than if the prayer had been answered strictly according to its letter.

The prayer was not lost. That God hears every sincere prayer, who can doubt? The sceptic must seal his vision, lest, coming to the light, he shall be persuaded against himself. He must mutilate or destroy the shining record of God's providential dealings with the children of faith. He must erase from the Bible the animating narrative of Jacob's midnight struggles, the thrilling scenes of Elijah's wrestlings at Carmel and at Zarephath, the "evening oblations" of Daniel, and the angelic deliverance of Peter from the prison cell. He must destroy many a leaf from the Christian's diary, on which devout gratitude has written, "This day I learned anew that my heavenly Father hears and answers prayer." He must give the lie to omniscient love, which has uttered in the ear of all the needy, sorrowing, guilty household of humanity, "Ask and ye shall receive; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened to you." "And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son."

FRAGMENTS.

If God demanded less than the heart, it would argue that there was a good independent of himself.

Those who have life are conscious of the ebbs and flows of life.

The grace of God can enable the lame and the halt, the maimed and the blind, to go through the land and possess it.

THE TRANSLATION OF ELIJAH.*

BY THE LATE REV. HENRY ANGUS.

"And it came to pass, as they still went on, and talked, that, behold, there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven."—2 KINGS II. 11.

WHERE is the world of spirits? Where is it not? Up, down, within, and around us. We are prone to conceive too materially, and, therefore, too much as of a locality circumscribed by certain limits, of it; as we too materially, and, therefore, too much as one who occupies such a locality, of God himself. We are ignorant of the conditions of spiritual existence; and of purely spiritual action, movement, and enjoyment. Why may not this invisible essence, which is within me, which thinks, and feels, and wills, and is most properly myself, when once it has been but enfranchised from its present earthly obligations, find a home and happiness, be with God, and in his glory, without going on any long journey for them? There is a mystery of our own being which, while it would be folly to expect that any of us can comprehend, it is unbelief, and a kind of atheism not to know; taking, perhaps, certain forms of speech respecting the world of spirits, and its denizens, in a too great literality, as many appear to do, using the veil of parable, weakly or perversely, in like manner as some of the hearers of Christ's personal preaching did to conceal the truth which it was mercifully intended to reveal. Of that world, as of its glorious Sovereign, might we not put the question, and give the answer, Whither shall we go from it? whither shall we flee from it? If we ascend up into heaven, it is there; if we make our bed in the abyss of the unseen, behold, it is there; if we take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there we shall still be in it.

Without prejudice to any part of this, there is a heaven—a place where most immediately God is; where his glory most directly and illustriously shines; where the blessings of his loving-kindness are most munificently conferred; where sin and sorrow are not, and cannot come; where his holy angels, and many who have been redeemed by him from among men, already reside with him; and where all his holy family, at once the unfallen and the reclaimed, shall at length reside with him for ever. We do not know the position of that place with relation to the rest of the universe. We speak of it, and it has been spoken of to us, as up; because we associate, naturally, the light-some, the glorious, and the divine with that which is above us; and just as naturally that which is beneath us, with degradation and destruction, with the kingdom of darkness and of death. We cannot discourse of its topography. We cannot pretend to say how it is to be ultimately arranged: what spaces or provinces of the creation it is, or is not, destined to comprehend and how its necessary vastness is, or is to be, rendered compatible with its perfect and equally necessary concentration. But the place, and the most important, and, as we ought to find them, the most interesting, features of the place are undeniably a revelation to us in the word of God. Under some of those features we have sought already to bring it before you; and we have taken them all, as you must be aware, in their spirit, if not in their very letter, from various pages of the Book. We have such explicit words as those of Jesus on the subject; and, while they are, no doubt, accommodated in part, as all words on the subject must be, to the verbal usages, and to the ordinary conceptions of mankind, it is impossible to explain them away into the extravagance of poetry, or into the dreaminess of a merely scenic symbol. "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go away, I will come again, and receive you to myself, that where I am there ye may be also. And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know." Where is Enoch, the old-world patriarch, whom God took? When Elijah was translated, whither was he borne? Two these, undoubtedly, not spirits of just men, but just men made perfect, in the realms of glory. What are the third heavens? what is the paradise to which the apostle Paul was afterwards caught up, in a vision or revelation of the Lord, there is no doubt, and, therefore, differently from the actual rapture of the two Old Testament saints, but surely in a vision or revelation which was intended to make known the existence of a reality to him, and to us? And, above all, where is the Lord Jesus Christ now? Whither did he go when he ascended, out of the midst and in the sight of his disciples, from Mount Olivet? Where is he now, not only in his divinity—in respect of which he was in heaven, he said, even when he was on the earth—but in his glorified humanity also, body and soul? Yes, we acknowledge that it is the ascension of Jesus Christ, as he was when he had risen from the dead, which principally by far necessitates—thrice welcome, and thrice blessed necessity!—our belief in the existence of heaven, as of a place which is the home, even now, of two complete humanities, besides his own; and which is ordained, when the ages of time have fulfilled their round, to be the home of all his saints.

The gliding of a spirit from earth, what time the shackles of immortality have been loosed from off it, God showing it the path of life, and leading it in at the gates of glory, is a thing sufficiently obscure to us. But, "behold I show you a mystery," writes the apostle, "we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." We may complete, from another epistle, the prophetic narrative of the last day, "Then we," the changed, "shall be caught up together with them," the risen, "in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." Now, if that will be a mystery, undoubtedly a great one, when the course of nature shall be remarkably changed, and when the very structure of nature shall be extensively dissolved or altered, the term will be not less appropriate certainly, but more so if we apply it to the translation of Elijah, when, with the exception of the comparatively rare miraculous occurrences of which we read, one of them only of the same kind, that course of nature was not disturbed, that structure of nature was not interfered with; when sin was demanding peremptory payment of its wages, and when the earth was receiving the earthy. How shall we account for it? Verily, how but by the almighty power of God; a power which that man unpardonably limits who believes in the creation of all things by its fiat, and in the subsistence of all things by its continuous agency, and who does not at the same time believe that it cannot only rule the mind, but make, and shift, and order the matter of the universe just as it wills. The least we can say about the wonderful event which is here recorded is, that the divine power was necessary for it; and also, the most, that the divine power was easily able for it. Now, if it had been simply stated that God translated Elijah, or even if it had been only stated about Elijah as it had previously been about Enoch, that he was not, for God took him, we should have had nothing more to do than to receive the mysterious but well-authenticated fact as true, and then to use it as it was meant we should. But, in the case of Elijah, we see the power of God employing a supernatural machinery, and working that machinery for the bringing about of its purpose, through successive stages, so to speak. This was, first of all, in order that Elisha's eye might rest with something of leisure on the occurrence which he was witnessing; and, next, that our minds might rest with reverent studiousness upon this record of it; trying to understand the words, in so far as it is competent for us to do so; trying to picture to ourselves, truly and vividly, the event; and setting ourselves then to what we will find to be a more accessible subject of thought—the purposes and lessons of the event.

I. Looking, then, at the event itself, we have—

1. Elijah and Elisha still going on and talking.

They had travelled in each other's company from the neighbourhood of the Jordan to Bethel, and back again to the Jordan, taking Jericho in the way. Being who they were, and knowing both of them, what was before them, we may be sure that they had much conversation all the while; and that the topics of their conversation were both important and seasonable. The impending event, towards the last at all events, the faithfulness of God, his Church's trials, and her defections, what he had done for her in the days of old, the still greater things he was to do for her in the years to come; it may be they talked in a similar strain, although more obscurely, as this very Elias afterwards did, with Moses and the Master of them both, on the Mount of Transfiguration, of the decease which should be accomplished at Jerusalem. When they had conferred about the double portion of Elijah's spirit, and when they had passed through the channel of the river, by the miracle of the division of its waters, they continued to walk on, and not in silence. Their conversation would rather increase now in earnestness and importance. They likely did not know the precise moment of their separation. It was to come upon them while they walked still on and talked. How much is often crowded into a few remaining moments of friendly intercourse on earth! Too much is left, in general, to be crowded into them: and sometimes, then, the pain and the langour of the dying is a dire obstruction to what would be said and heard. But there was nothing of that here. To what useful purpose, to each other, as travellers to eternity, might we turn our intercourse—often mercifully protracted, and madly abused, if we would only think of it! O that we might so conduct it, that, when the journey of life is done, we shall be in some measure of condition to hear the question, "What manner of communications were those which ye had one to another, as ye walked?"

2. The sudden and glorious appearing, on the plain beside them, of a chariot of fire, and horses of fire. The equipage which now drove up to them, the stately car, with its befitting steeds caparisoned and yoked to it, may not have been composed of fire. The meaning may be that they had the appearance like as of fire. Fire is the frequent symbol, both in word, and vision, and miraculous occurrence, of the power and purity of the God of Israel. When the dismaying host of the King of Syria, with his chariots and horses, encompassed, afterwards, the host of Israel, a young man, whose eyes had been opened for the purpose, saw the heavenly array prepared to act in the defensive—the mountain full of horses and chariots of fire. "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels." "He maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire." The idea which we are intended to receive from these sayings of Scripture probably is, that the angels are the ministers, or vehicles of God's glorious power; and that, in their movements and operations, they are rapid, subtle, and resistless, as spirits, which indeed they are, and as fire, which they resemble. But can we tell what shapes those angels may or may not themselves have taken, at the divine command? that they may not have taken this one, among others, of a chariot of fire, and horses of fire? Why not that, as well as others, under which we are not afraid to imagine and represent them? The ministering angels were certainly present. We fill up the delineation, from the exclamation of Elisha, as he was looking up, "My Father, my Father, the chariot of Israel, and," not the horses, but, "the horsemen thereof"—bright-harnessed angels, therefore, the drivers and the guards. What a sight it must have been! What an inimitable combination of the graceful with the grand! How far surpassing all the classic models of this same thing—a kingly car with its prancing steeds, that have either been thrown on canvas by the painter, or chiselled in marble by the statuary—among the finest things, confessedly, that human art and genius have ever done! Yes, Elijah, who has laboured, and has had patience, where there were many and powerful adversaries, must be taken to heaven in the King's own chariot! Yes, the warrior must leave the field of his protracted agony as a conqueror going to his triumph!

3. The parting of Elijah and Elisha asunder by the chariot of fire, and the horses of fire. How easily did they glide between them, however closely linked, or even claspingly embraced, they may have been, placing the one to this side, and the other to that. This one but stands to gaze, while that one is handed or lifted in to sit by the attendant spirits—for so we cannot fail to think. And if we, as friends, are ever to be parted, as so we must, not by thy iron mace, O death, but by thy glowing chariot, and by thy kindly angels, O Lord of hosts, my King and my God, let this thing be!

4. Elijah going up into heaven. The archangel Michael disputed with Satan about the body of Moses; and there have been many disputes about that dispute. But Moses died; and the Lord buried him in a valley in the land of Moab. Earth has his dust; although no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day. But, indisputably, if it is possible to understand, and right to credit the Bible, Elijah left but his prophet's mantle behind him on the earth. He shuffled not off his mortal coil when he went up in his fiery chariot; but the mortal did, even then, put on immortality. It was swallowed up of life. He was changed; he did not sleep. He was translated; he did not expire.

5. Elijah going up, BY A WHIRLWIND into heaven. You will have observed that, in the first verse of the chapter, it is to the whirlwind, in the way of instru-mentality, that the rapture of the prophet is ascribed. This is the heading of the wonderful narrative. "It came to pass, when the Lord would take up Elijah into heaven by a whirlwind." Neither the chariot with its horses, nor the whirlwind was indispensable in order to the result. God could have taken his servant without either. I would suggest, but diffidently, that the fiery chariots and horses were added, in order to give in the best and amplest manner, the token to Elisha, of which Elijah had spoken in replying to his request about a double portion of his spirit, namely, his seeing him when he was taken from him; after which he could not but know that his request was granted. And could not, then, that chariot have borne him up to heaven's gate of itself, although there had been no whirlwind? Undoubtedly, if so it had been willed. It would be to consider too curiously, and to conclude without good reason, that it, with its contents—the spiritual body, but still the real, and, therefore, the ponderable body of Elijah—needed the force of the whirlwind to bear it up. But the whirlwind, as part of the visible machinery, had something to do as well as it. Perhaps in part to veil the mystery; perhaps to be in keeping with the awaking and fear-inspiring character of the dispensation to the history of which it belongs; certainly to impress with a sense of the awful presence, and to intimate that there was judgment as well as mercy in the event of which to sing. "Help, Lord; for the godly man ceaseth!" "The righteous is taken away from the evil to come."

6. Elijah's mantle falling from him as he went up. We dip into the context, but only a short way, in order to find this particular. But it was an important one in the scene of the translation; and it is necessary in order to the completeness of our view of that scene, that we should here just take it in. It had been the symbol of his prophetic office and qualification. Take it up, Elisha! It is a solemn heir-loom. It is thy call renewed to thee. It is thine investiture repeated to thee. Clad in that mantle, rough and emblem of the roughness thou must use, and the roughness thou must encounter; clad in that mantle, forth to what work and warfare thou must go. But it is also thy pledge. Thou hast asked a double portion of thy master's spirit, and now thou hast not only seen him as he was taken from thee, but received his mantle dropped at thy feet. Here is whence the proverbial and well-understood expression, about the mantle of one man falling on another, has come into use.

There are two objections or scriptural difficulties. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." "No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven." Shall we need to meet them? Not at any length. No more did flesh and blood inherit the kingdom of God when Elijah was taken up to heaven. On the earth his body was a natural body; in the fiery chariot—it is not for us to pretend to say how—it was turned into a spiritual body. And no man has any more ascended up into heaven, but the Son of man which is in heaven; the translation of Elijah nevertheless. He did not ascend. He was taken up. He did not go up as the head of a ransomed retinue, or by his own power. He was himself a part of the ransomed retinue of Christ, although, in respect of time, he went before the forerunner. So, really, no man has ascended up to heaven but Christ: and no man will rise from the dead but Christ.

II. The purposes and lessons of the translation of Elijah. All supernatural occurrences are, necessarily, very unintelligible as to their essence; but their moral purposes, and their religious lessons, are, on the contrary, just as ascertainable and plain. But, that we might see these and profit by them, we may be sure the power of God would never have brought them about. We can say exceedingly little about them, under their former aspect; under their latter, we can say a very great deal. We may consider the purposes and lessons of the translation of Elijah:—

1. As they respect himself. His work was done. The programme of his life, as God had laid it down to him on Mount Horeb, was now filled up; and what for him, therefore, should there now remain but his removal? The rage of persecutors might have again awaked against him. Hide him now, O God, in thine immediate pavilion! Take him out of the world, that he may thus be more effectually kept from the evil thereof! But all this does not seem to give us a sufficient reason for his removal to heaven in this particular way. It must have been meant for the putting of a singular honour on the man, for his singular services; and to make him, to all the ages that were to come, an instance, memorable and influential, that those who honour God, God will honour. Where is Ahab now, with all his pride and luxury? Dead, and designated with the seed of evil-doers, who shall never be renowned! His chariot, filled with his blood, had borne him, a dying man, out of the field of his last battle—last and lost. And where is Jezebel now, with all her paint and harlotry? Gone, literally, to the dogs! But now is the hour of Elijah's triumph. Now he hath "dominion" over them, and all their craft and cruelty. He tastes not death. He rides to heaven in the royal equipage. Make way, make way, ye celestial circles! Take him to thy bosom, Abraham! Put him chief among thy princes, Moses! Give him thy peculiar welcome, Enoch! Take him by the human hand, thou old immortal. Bring thy brother to the King! Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord!

2. As they respect Elisha. How now would his faith strengthen, his love burn, his spiritual heroism lift his head and expand his bosom! Yes, the sight of his master, when he was so taken from him, would prove to him, not only a token that a double portion of his master's spirit would be upon him, as he was told it would, but a principal channel through which it was conveyed. His preparation for the arduous task which was now before him would be completed when he gazed upon Elijah in this glorious manner, acknowledged by the Lord of both, and going up into his rest. So have many servants of God received their first impulse, or their full equipment, when they have been witnessing the parting moments of the great and good.

3. As they respect the Church of those days. he translation of Elijah was, in itself, a theology to that Church. More particularly it was a foot-print of grace, as it was marching forward steadily to a brighter consummation, and a clearer manifestation in a future age. It showed itself amidst the wreck of our humanity which sin had made, and cheerfully proclaimed—Where sin hath abounded grace doth superabound; that, as sin hath reigned unto death, so might grace reign, through righteousness, unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ the Lord. There is hope and help for this dying world. Moreover, it was a proof of the life and incorruption, before they should be brought to light most clearly by the gospel. There is a heaven. Was not Elijah taken into it? There will be a resurrection. On any other supposition, would his once mortal body have been conserved, immortalized, and glorified? And, finally, it evinced, demonstrated God's care of religion and of his Church—a care which could not fail, but be efficient for their preservation and prosperity, whatever might hinder, whoever might assail. "The gates of hell shall not prevail over them." The Jews have some unwarrantable notions about Elijah; how he still walks the earth; how he is present at some of their ceremonies; and so on. But was not this really a part of the design of God, by his translation, to let the world see that the work to which he had been devoted would never terminate, and that the spirit in which he had prosecuted that work should never evaporate! Hence, in so far as that work and spirit are concerned, he was predicted to come, and came, in the person of John the Baptist; he was one of the august assembly, at what we may call the rehearsed inauguration of the kingdom of heaven, on the mountain of transfiguration; and there is an evident allusion to his life, and the triumphant manner of his removal, in what we read of the two witnesses—their faithfulness, their pain, their sufferings, their martyrdom, their redemption, and their ascending up to heaven in a cloud, in the book of the Apocalypse.

4. As they respect the Church of these days. Of course, in all these points of view, they have not lost their value, and never will till the end of the world. Only, as an old and comparatively obscure theology, they have been followed up, and, in a manner, superseded by a new and better one. In all these points of view we could afford now well to do without the teaching of Elijah's translation, having the advent and the death, the resurrection and the ascension, of his and our Lord.

Blessed be the God and Father, not so much of Elijah, as of our Lord Jesus Christ.

5. As they respect ourselves individually. It may seem that we can derive no personal lesson of consolation, with regard to our own departure, from the acknowledged and all but solitary miracle of Elijah's. But oh, how it does really speak to us of God's most tender interest in his people, and of his gracious superintendence of everything connected with their life and death! There are ministering angels around the deathbeds of believers; and celestial welcomes for the righteous the moment after death. If we are Christians, the bitterness of death will soon be over with us; and, when we look back upon it, it will not seem much. "Wherefore comfort one another with these words." Amen.

TRAVELS TO THE LAND OF THE MORMONS.

SECOND ARTICLE.

If our readers have been at all interested in the sketch we have given of the rapid rise of the Mormon Church, they will be asking now, with double curiosity, What are the tenets of this body, that in little more than a quarter of a century, has attracted nearly a quarter of a million of adherents from all countries of the world? We do not profess to give a complete answer to the question; but what we are to advance may throw some light on the subject, and serve to indicate, in some degree, wherein the strength, and, at the same time, the danger of this system lies.

What, then, is Mormonism? In a word, it is belief in Joseph Smith, and submission to him and to his successors as authorized teachers and rulers in the Church of God.

But how come such multitudes to believe in Joseph Smith? Anything in the form of external evidence in favour of this man is so palpably unsatisfactory, that we must seek for the secret of his popularity in his system itself. What, then, is there in his system that is so attractive, and enables his missionaries to achieve such success?

In the first place, Mormonism makes a great profession of returning to the system of the apostles and the early Church, in all its integrity, and it claims for Joseph Smith the honour of having been employed to re-establish this system on the earth, after eighteen centuries of unbelief and neglect. The whole range of offices in apostolic times—apostles, bishops, elders, teachers, deacons, and so on; the whole powers and prerogatives of the early Church—gifts of tongues, miraculous healing, expulsion of devils, and foretelling of the future; the glories and privileges of the early Church, including the presence of Christ and of the Holy Spirit, were not intended (it says) for one age, but for all. An unbelieving Church failed to realize this; hence, ere the second century, it degenerated; and for eighteen centuries it has been a feeble, broken, divided, wrangling community, that has not enjoyed peace itself, and has not been a blessing to the world. This state of things would have gone on indefinitely had God not revealed to Joseph Smith the miserable cause of it, and, at the same time, the glorious remedy. In the Mormon Church, the grand machinery of the Apostolic Church, enriched, too, by diverse Old Testament institutions, being set up in all its sublime completeness, shall in due time realize the glorious ends of the gospel. The richest gifts of miracles and prophecy shall again be enjoyed, and a corresponding increase shall be witnessed in the faith and graces of believers. Ere long, the saints of the first century and the Latter-day-saints (that is, the Mormonites), and they only, shall be made partakers of the first resurrection, and Christ himself shall return to reign with them over the earth. A marvellous change will be effected by the presence of Christ; the earth will be blessed with prosperity and glory; all nations shall be united in one great brotherhood; and the whole world shall become a Paradise. Evidently there is something very flattering in the conception, that Mormonism is the destined instrument to repair the errors of eighteen centuries, and realize at last the triumph of the gospel. And it is not difficult to understand how this imagination should prove very attractive to many. There is a feeling in the breasts of not a few persons that Christianity has not done for the world all that a divine religion might have been expected to do. It flashes on their imagination that the cause of this and the remedy are revealed in Mormonism. This notion takes a firm grasp of the imagination; it establishes itself there; and already there is a disposition to believe in miracles, gifts of tongues, and all the other things that seem to others so preposterous. It is felt to be glorious to be connected with a cause which is to enjoy so sure and so universal a triumph. Reason has no power to dispossess the fancies of the imagination. The Mormon disciple is captivated—fascinated; a spell is cast round him, from which he very seldom escapes. Having embraced this one notion, he is ready to embrace any number of absurdities that may be presented for his acceptance.

Another attractive thing about Mormonism is its pretensions to great liberality. While declaring that all Christian sects from the second century to the nineteenth, have departed from the true idea of the Church, it yet holds out that there is much that is good and true about them all. Joseph Smith declared that he was no bigot—that he was ready to recognise and adopt truth wherever he should find it, and that he allowed the same liberty to all his followers. Such deference to the spirit of "comprehension"—to the notion that there is truth in all religions, rather more perhaps in some than in others, is attractive to many. It is pretty much their own idea, and they are disposed to think favourably of the men who proclaim it so boldly.

Mormonism also makes much pretension to the spirit of brotherhood. Its members, in their own territory, are to enjoy the protection of equal laws, full scope for their energies, and benevolent consideration and kindly assistance when poverty or difficulties press upon them. The system of English poor-laws, for example, and all the miseries that afflict the poor in a community like ours, will be unknown. Live and let live, peace and plenty, are given out as the mottoes of their Promised Land.

So far as we have yet gone, it is evident, that the attractions of Mormonism arise from its alleged contrast to the defects and evils that prevail in Christian sects, and under nominally Christian governments. There is no doubt that on these the missionaries of Mormonism dwell much. They furnish ample material for declamation. They come home to the convictions or to the lurking thoughts of very many. Confidence in all existing systems being thus overthrown, the mind is somewhat prepared for the bold but wild pretensions of Mormonism. All the old religions and governments having been weighed in the balances and found wanting, the only alternative that remains is Mormonism or blank despair. What may the Churches learn from this? Perhaps it is God's purpose to use this new heresy as an instrument of reproof to the Church, for her divisions, her bitterness of spirit, her want of love, activity, and self-denying devotedness, and her long neglect of those classes of the people from among whom Mormonism draws its recruits. Doubtless, too, this new heresy may lead us to think of the evil and loss involved in every departure from primitive Christian usages, so far as these were designed for permanent use. But, certainly, the remedy is not to be found in an attempt to set up the entire machinery of the Apostolic Church. In the epistles to the seven Churches of Asia, we have several sketches of the falling off from primitive purity that prevailed towards the end of the apostolic age. But the last of the apostles was not commissioned to teach that this degeneracy was caused by neglecting to elect new apostles, in room of the old, or to exercise, in faith, the gifts of healing and speaking with tongues. Very different was his view, both of the evil and of its remedy; and very different will be the course of the Churches if they wish to enjoy again the glory and privileges of the early age.

But we must hasten now to let our readers hear something of what Messrs. Remy and Brenchley actually saw in the land of the Mormons.

It was on the 25th September, 1855, that our travellers entered "the New Jerusalem," commonly called Deseret, or Great Salt Lake City. Though it was but eight or nine years since its site formed part of the desert, they found it a large and apparently very flourishing city, three miles in diameter. A river, called the Jordan, bounds it on one side; and the city is spread out on a hill that rises, in the form of an amphitheatre, above the river. Streets more than a hundred feet wide; houses distant twenty yards from the streets, and each surrounded by a garden; running streams on each side the streets, brought ingeniously from the neighbouring hills, show that its founders, wise in their generation, have provided well against the evils of overcrowding and filth which are so pernicious in most large towns. The whole aspect of the people was that of busy industry. No one, not even the president of the Church, is wholly exempt from manual labour. Idlers are unknown. "Neither grog shops, gaming tables, nor brothels are to be met with. . . . There is never any disturbance in the streets, brawling is unknown; criminal charges also are very rare; and the courts, by the admission of the federal judges, have scarcely anything else to do but settle disputed debts."

The man who has organized this large town, and brought its heterogeneous inhabitants into such a state of activity and order, must be no ordinary person. Brigham Young, Mormon Pope, Prophet, and recognised Governor of Utah, "is a man of fifty-four years of age (A.D. 1855), fair, of moderate height, stout almost to obesity. He has regular features, a wide forehead, eyes which convey an idea of finesse, and a smiling expression of mouth. His general appearance is that of an honest farmer, and nothing in his manners indicates a man of the higher classes." Brother Brigham, as he is called among his people, is the husband of seventeen wives. His influence over the whole community is immense; probably greater than that of any other potentate in the world, civil or religious.

According to the account of our travellers, the polygamy of the Mormons has not, as yet at least, produced those disastrous effects which we should have been disposed to anticipate. The truth is, the system has not had time to develop itself, and it would be absurd to judge of what it may yet become from what ten or twelve years have revealed of it. For, in reality, it is only since the people took up their abode in Utah that they have had it in their power to give full scope and swing to their system. It would require two or three generations to develop all its fruits. Deseret mar, according to the testimony of our travellers, be a quiet and orderly place to-day; but what will it be thirty years hence, should it last so long? When a new generation has grown up; when the children reared in the seraglio have become young men and women; when the example of the fathers has had time to tell upon those who come after them, what will the result be then? The Mormon missionaries will, no doubt, allege that the system is not a pernicious one, and that abominations that prevail in other places are not found in Utah. But there are already the seeds of moral putrefaction, and when they have had time to bear their fruit, the poisonous results will be but too apparent.

This singular practice is justified by the authority of the Old Testament. Joseph Smith alleged that a revelation from God commanded him to do the works of Abraham, the father of the faithful, and one of these works was marrying more wives than one. The example of Jacob, and of David, and of Solomon, is urged as pointing in the same direction; while the sad moral,— in the family strife, and spiritual declension that followed the indulgence,—is wholly disregarded. The practice is further encouraged by the notion, that the more wives and children a man has, the higher will be his place in the kingdom of heaven. He is to reign over them as Abraham reigned or ruled over his household; and if he become a literal "Abraham," or "father of many nations," so much the greater will be his future eminence and glory.

Every person married to a first wife, and desirous of having another, must, before he makes a proposal of marriage, consult the supreme president of the Church, and obtain through him a revelation, in which God is supposed to manifest his pleasure on the subject. If the revelation be adverse to the proposed marriage, the affair ends. If it be favourable, the petitioner must next get the consent of the parents or guardians of the woman. If they refuse, the marriage is broken off; if they agree, and the woman likewise, the marriage may go on. The first wife cannot stop the second marriage; she may complain to the president; but if he is not satisfied with her objections, the affair will proceed.

In some cases, all the wives live in the same house, and have their meals together, either with or without their husband. In other cases, each wife has a separate house, and the husband spends day about with each of his families.

The extent to which the practice prevails may be gathered from the fact that in Utah nearly four thousands persons are polygamists, and of these about eleven hundred have five or more wives each.

It is singular, indeed almost incredible, that (according to the testimony of our travellers) this system, so abominable and disgusting in our eyes, finds favour with several of the wives themselves. They at least declare themselves happy, and maintain that the system works well. But, on the other hand, facts leak out that show depths of misery unspeakable. Even our travellers, who are too fond of painting Mormonism in fair colours, cannot shut their eyes to these. One day, on the banks of the Jordan, they met two women plunged in the deepest grief. It was a mother and her daughter. The mother, an educated Englishwoman, and a widow, had contracted a second marriage with a Mormon priest and missionary. This man had conceived the abominable design of making the daughter his wife also. The daughter, an interesting and beautiful girl of seventeen, could not bear the thought of becoming the wife of her mother's husband. She withstood the proposal to the last, in spite even of the influence of the president himself. When the missionary saw that the case was hopeless, he went and married a vulgar woman, who succeeded, through the power of hatred, in exciting her husband to treat with savage cruelty the mother and her daughter. On the morning of the day when our travellers met them, they had been so grossly treated that they were compelled to abandon the roof which their industry had assisted to build and ornament.

It is admitted, too, that the mortality among children in Utah is singularly great. Of the descendants of Joseph Smith only one survives; and though Brigham Young has had thirty wives, he has not more than thirty children living. In a moral point of view, too, the children are far from promising. "They appear to us very often to deserve the imputation of being godless, licentious, immodest. . . . This evil exists; the parents themselves to a certain degree confess it, . . . but in what appears to us to be depravity and libertinism, they see no more than a precocious maturity which is by no means disagreeable to them." It is far from pleasant to us to dwell on this subject; but it is the little cloud, not bigger, perhaps, than a man's hand now, that will one day break in disaster over Utah, and convert the settlement into a den of infamy. The sanctity of home cannot be invaded with impunity; the unity of the family cannot be broken up without mischief; woman must have her own place, and that place it has heretofore been esteemed one of the glories of Christianity to give her. The day cannot be far distant when it shall be seen that the pretended revelation of July 1843 was a blunder as well as a crime, and that Emma Smith did a far wiser thing than her husband, when she committed the document to the flames.

It is instructive to mark the connection between this gross feature of Mormonism and certain other peculiarities of its religious state. We have remarked that Mormonism was hatched amid dreams and visions, and that it has a wonderful power of fascinating the imagination. In fact, it would probably be found that its adherents are largely persons of high nervous susceptibility, corresponding to a class in the Irish revival, who were among the "stricken down," and had their senses and imaginations powerfully impressed for a time, without affording satisfactory evidence of real conversion. Even in the last year of his life, Joseph Smith could use very strong language as to his religious experience, which can hardly be ascribed to pure hypocrisy. To twenty thousand of his followers assembled for conference, he remarked, "I feel that I am in more immediate communion with God, and on a better footing with him than I have ever been in my life; and I am happy to appear among you under these circumstances." Many of these Mormons, we are told, narrate their conversions with a sort of ecstatic delight, dwelling with exceeding rapture on every circumstance of the marvellous or the mystical they can recall. "The recital," says M. Remy, "will sometimes continue for hours; but the beatified look of the narrator, the visions, the revelations, the miracles of which his narration was full, so captivated my attention that I never knew what it was to be fatigued." In fact, conversions to Mormonism are often attended with a great amount of those sensuous experiences which have mingled to some extent with the present revival of religion, but which the Churches are more and more convinced are nowise essential elements, but rather morbid and undesirable accidents, of a true work of grace. It is the man who has undergone some remarkable experience of this kind that is the most attractive and successful missionary of Mormonism. With all the emphasis of sincerity he narrates the marvellous origin of his faith, and his hearers are at once interested, impressed, astonished. "They return eagerly to the banquet which is always going on, and soon become enamoured of the highly-seasoned viands which stimulate and tickle their palate. Their imagination, excited by this highly-stimulating food, soon gives itself full play; it riots day and night, until it comes to confound dreams with realities; then these dreams assume a singular and prophetic character, which throws the revellers into a state of inexpressible anxiety, and disturbs their rest. To these dreams succeed wonderful illusions, which toss the visionary's mind about like a ship at the mercy of the waves. There are apparitions of gods, cherubims, angels, spirits, phantoms, patriarchs, ghosts which flit near them in the deep recesses of a wood, which brush by them on the edge of a solitary path, and pursue them to their very homesteads. Sometimes there is a little bird perched on the top of a tree, which is suddenly metamorphosed into one of the beasts of the Apocalypse. . . . To these signs succeed others still more marvellous, inasmuch as they assume a vocal character, address admonitions in all possible languages, and with a loud voice reveal your most secret thoughts. You are perhaps quietly intent upon your work, thinking of nothing, or next to nothing; suddenly a cold shiver you cannot account for comes over you, goes to your very heart, and a voice, issuing you know not whence, commands you to go at such an hour and to such a place, to be present at a manifestation of divine power. Overwhelmed by this imperious order, the half-convert, covered with cold sweat, flies precipitately to the place indicated, and there, with his own eyes, sees the Mormon priests,—those magi that herald a new Messiah,—operate, by the force of their prayers alone, the healing of a cripple, of one that is deaf, or blind, or dropsical, or possessed with a devil, or cataleptic; and even resurrection from the dead. From this moment all doubt and further resistance become impossible." The person is baptized. "From this moment a thorough change has taken place in the feelings; the old man has disappeared. A delicious calm succeeds the tempest; the moral and physical forces of the new converts are increased tenfold; the celestial happiness which is diffused around them beams in every feature; the earth for them is transformed into a rich enchanted palace, the delights of which are everlastingly renewed by the magic ministrations of unseen genii" (vol. ii. pp. 208–209).

Nothing could show more clearly the danger of mistaking a mere excitement of the imagination and senses, or a mere mesmeric or magnetic influence, for true religion; and nothing could give a more ominous warning than the history of Mormonism, of the tendency of such experience towards sensuality and gross licentiousness.

It is the property of true religion to influence "the whole man,"—the understanding, the will, the conscience, the desires, the affections, and not merely or chiefly the imagination or the senses. And the great and only valid test of true religion is that which our Lord enunciated, in ever-memorable words, in the Sermon on the mount: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven."

It is not at all surprising that the Mormons should show extraordinary zeal, and make extraordinary sacrifices in behalf of their religious system. What with the "revelations" which require them to do so, the fanatical and fervent nature of their experiences, and the intense esprit du corps which a new sect in circumstances so remarkable cannot but have, their zeal and liberality are very great. It is a law of Mormonism that every convert contributes one tenth of his whole property to the cause when he enters the body, and one tenth of his yearly income besides. There seems to be no difficulty whatever in collecting this tribute, nor in obtaining funds for a magnificent temple which is in the course of building at Deseret, nor for any other purpose for which money is required. In this, as in some other points, the Mormons are an example to us. The singular spirit of devotedness, which makes every Mormon ready to go forth as a missionary to any part of the world at the bidding of his chief, may well reprove the coldness and self-indulgence of many a Christian. The activity, and order, and peacefulness of their settlements, and the patience with which they have borne extraordinary trials, are additional features from which all may derive a profitable lesson.

We have no space to go into more detail, either as to their creed or as to their worship. Both of these are in a very unsettled state. There are notions about the nature and being of God prevalent among some of their leading men, that are very revolting and blasphemous. It seems not unlikely that they may go back one day to practical polytheism, and regard God, or rather the gods, as but deified men, with all their passions and propensities. As to their worship, it is very singular that while even the New Testament is not advanced enough for them, they show a strong tendency to go back to the Old. When the great temple at Deseret is completed, animal sacrifices are to be resumed. Two great orders of priesthood—that of Melchizedek and that of Aaron—have been for some time in operation. The public services consist at present of prayer, singing, and preaching; but it is likely that by-and-by they will be modelled after a more sensuous type. It is another instance of the meeting of extremes, that the Christian body with which they feel they have most in common is the Church of Rome,—although they believe, at the same time, that Popery is the Babylon of the Apocalypse, and that its destruction is one of the services that the Latter Day Saints, under the leading of Christ himself, shall have ere long to render.

It is a remarkable circumstance that England is the best recruiting field for the Mormon missionaries. They make few converts now in America, and in Papal countries their success is very small.

Mormonism lies under very strong inducements at the present moment to behave itself well, and is thereby led to put a great restraint upon all disorderly and immoral tendencies. Even polygamy itself is under strict control, and any deviation from the regulations applicable to it would be severely punished. The Mormons feel that their character is on its trial before the world, and for years to come they will struggle hard to maintain a fair appearance in Utah. They know that their opponents have a strong tendency to bring against them the most horrible charges, and that the world is disposed to believe in these. They have suffered once and again from these charges, even to the extent of being driven from their settlements and forced to seek a new home in the distant desert. They found, when the Federal forces were encamped in their territory, and the foulest charges were circulated against them over the world, that emigration to Utah received a most serious check,—nay, was brought almost to a stand still. It is in every way their strongest interest to bear a good character before the world. This is what they are now striving, heart and soul, to acquire. Their very existence depends on their succeeding in this. It is no wonder, therefore, if peace and good order, industry and self-control, prevail among them now. But the true tendencies of their system will not always be disguised by this restraint. The tree will at last be found bearing its true fruit. A class of sceptical writers will doubtless point to Mormonism and say, "See the influence of a system of imposture! Has Christianity done more for man than Mormonism? Is Christianity itself not, therefore, to be traced to the same origin?" It remains to be seen what Mormonism has done or will do for man. The system that has begun by corrupting the family has yet to be tested. The pretended miracles of Mormonism have no witnesses but their own dupes; even M. Remy, long though he was among them, witnessed none. Christianity has been tested for eighteen centuries, and though its best and brightest era is yet future, the roll of its past benefits is a brilliant record.

The destiny of Mormonism is revealed in our Lord's words, "Every tree that my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." The lesson taught by Mormonism to the Christian Churches is, "Walk as children of the light." Let the good tree be known by its good fruits.

B.

CONFORMITY TO THE WORLD.

"I ONLY wish I knew," says a quaint and deep-sighted believer, "what the old saints in heaven think of modern spirituality; whether they think a spirituality so pleasant, unoffending, moderate, contented, polished, civilized, is so much as safe." But inasmuch as the saints do not tell us what they think, save by that low and inarticulate voice whereby their holy lives and imperishable testimony still vibrate through the air of the Church, what do we think of it ourselves? Do we so much as stop to think? Has not worldliness contrived to insinuate itself a considerable way into the very seats of religion? Has it nothing to do with the dressing of the child at the baptism, with the choice of churches, with the furnishing of pews, with the reputation of preachers, with the management of charities, with the manners and conversation of Christians? And is it likely that the power and grace of Christ among his people are to gain anything by further concessions to this worldly spirit? In fact, have we, as Christ's witnesses and friends, any more immediate and pressing work on hand, than to gather up and concentrate our forces of resolution and prayer, our personal and ecclesiastical energies, at just this point—the threatened secularization of our holy things—the tendency to "conform" even the interests of worship and faith to the fashions and standards of this world?

It will be no sufficient defence to say that the world is a very good institution, honoured as the workmanship of God, consecrated by the Saviour's footsteps, and containing on its varied territories a great many noble people and admirable articles. That is an evasive playing upon words. It is one of the shrewdest pieces of satanic suggestion that the "Prince of this world" has used to sophisticate the self-indulgent compromisers between God and mammon. A recently departed preacher, in a graceful and discriminating discourse, illustrates whatever truth there is in the notion that this world is not to be held in contempt. The forbidden world, as he justly says, is not the world of physical order and beauty, nor the men, God's children, who are in the world, nor the lawful occupations of men in the world. Our age scarcely needs to have this line of demonstration extended or repeated. Let us not waste time and strength in fighting the phantoms of former centuries—as if the troops in Lombardy had turned from the living foe to assail the sculptures of Milan, or batter down the mailed images of old warriors in the palaces and galleries of Pavia. We are not in imminent peril from asceticism. Our people take cold too easily, and are too much afraid of chronic rheumatism for that. We are not even in deadly danger from misanthropy, nor from sloth. The gates where we are to set our watch are those where elegance and taste, wealth and ambition, social competition and superficial accomplishments, and other such Shechemites, apply for admission to parley with conscience and devotion about some treacherous mixtures. It needs that we should guard more carefully our seasons of devotion; reserve a longer place for contemplation and self-scrutiny as a preparation for private prayer; strive and entreat for more indifference to those despotic customs of dress, expenditure, furniture; deny ourselves more pleasures; dwell more in wholesome and sober retirements; substitute the quiet sociabilities of the family for the showy and heated publicities of general company. Nor can very much improvement be expected till professors of religion of both sexes are willing to practise, for Christ's sake, a stricter self-denial; to adopt voluntarily a simpler style of appearance; to forego fine fabrics and luxurious appointments; to educate children into a wholly different estimate of what the world prizes and admires. For this expression, "the world," has, after all, a definite and specific meaning, which is not to be winked out of sight. The apostle John knew it perfectly when he wrote, "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." James knew it perfectly when he wrote, "The friendship of the world is enmity with God." "If you dance till two in the morning, and go to communion at ten, I do not believe in your abiding sorrow for sin. If you are in the theatre till midnight, I do not credit the compunction of your morning's meditation."

It is this guilty "conformity" which gains over and carries away into the far country so many souls which ought to "shine as lights in the world." The lofty protests of conscience are taken down. The doors of her castle-sanctuary are unbarred. Worldliness bears some people more fatally from the kingdom of heaven than intemperance or anger. It strikes into the core of character. The business of every disciple is to maintain, with the aids of the Holy Spirit, against all these conforming influences a religious independence, steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. Without this, every added refinement of outside condition is only an embellishment of servitude. The prosperous man then only lays up goods to be engrossed and fettered by them. The master of enterprise becomes its bondman. He constructs machinery to render himself "independent," but it turns out that he is only chained to its wheel, and must go round with its revolutions. He elaborates social elegance only to feel it cramping his limbs, tying his tongue, torturing him with the maladies of excess. The subduer of the earth is hungry at his own feast. Petulant at every little abatement of his comforts, a victim of conformity, he finds that civilities, ceremonies, conventions, have put their rigid harness on him, and no emancipator on earth but the spirit of faith in the Lord can make him free. How deep, how real, this misery is! In how many houses around us it is working! A man whose fortune has outgrown his moral sense looks round on his children. He sees their dangers, feel their exposure, dreads their getting enfeebled by the very opulence his worldly painstaking has piled together; and, some day or other, he makes to himself the mortifying confession that he ought to have had either a smaller estate or a larger soul.

Sometimes, to disturb this false habit of worldly living,—as has been seen in so many households during the season just past,—the hand of bereavement is stretched forth among them and the earthly parent's sorrow for the loss of the child is made a solemn prophet of God's sorrow for the spiritual death of the soul. It is as if that heavenly Father said, "I have brought them up as children, and they have rebelled against me. Here are worldly mothers; money-making fathers; they have forgotten me. Lo! I will put them—for the love I bear them, and because I cannot bear that they should perish—into the school of a sober chastening. They shall learn the meaning of those holy names,—gratitude, obedience, faith, love. The abundance of their joy, the guilelessness that lives on their infant's lips and forehead, the sunshines of the glowing eyes, the grace of early movements, the melody of childhood, all the ecstasy of gladness that the presence of that dear young life awakens,—these have not moved them. They have not paused in their haste and eagerness of pleasure to think whose gift it was. As they have come in at night from their gay excitements, and bent over that beauty, and listened to the soft breathing, they have not remembered that this immortal life was not born altogether of the earth; they have not knelt and prayed heartily that it should be something better than such a poor piece of conformity to the world as they are. They have not been changed and born again themselves. This goodness has not led them to repentance. And now since they love the world better than their Redeemer, I will reach down in pity, and in my own arms, by the touch of fever or accident, I will lift the little one up, and their affections shall follow. The musical voice which rang through their dwelling, and made them more content with the earth, shall ring from the skies and make them discontented for heaven."

With other discipline, infinitely varied, other hearts are tried and taught. The conflict goes on. We contend against our peace. How deep-seated and malignant that disorder of conformity must be which requires such searching surgery! Why will we not fall into more tranquil and lowly ways with God? Why will we not repress the eagerness, still the passion, renounce the aggrandizement, cut off the indulgence, which cause us to offend, and so, in the glorious transformation, cease to be conformed to this world?

"Soul! couldst thou, while on earth remaining,
A child-like frame be still retaining,
With thee, even here, I know full well,
God and his Paradise would dwell.

Dear comforter! Eternal love!
If thou wilt stay with me,
Of lowly thoughts and simple ways
I'll build a house for thee!"

WANDERINGS OVER BIBLE LANDS AND SEAS

TYPE.

FROM Bint-Jebail we turned again towards the sea-coast. We were gradually leaving the Holy Land, yet the sacred chain of Bible memories seemed still to sweep forth into the secular history of Phœnicia, as the spur of the Lebanon branch out into the strip of fertile lowland edged with golden sands which forms the Tyrian territory.

On Friday, July the 4th, after our day of thirteen hours of bewilderment and fatigue, we rested until nearly noon. Our road for many miles lay over a rich and picturesque mountain district, among evergreen trees and coppice, through green forest glades flickering with the July sunlight, which fell in burning flakes through the full dark foliage waving in the mountain breeze. The wild flowers were lovely, hiding like their shy English sisters amongst thick leaves in the shade, or glowing in masses of bright colour, or festooning the trees; fragrant clematis, brilliant poppies, sweet familiar brier-roses, delicate aristocratic cyclamens, and countless others that we could not stop to examine, and probably could not have named if we had.

It was a delightful, shady, varied, woodland ride, and in an hour or two we alighted for our mid-day meal in a pleasant dell shaded with thick trees, and green with grass and herbage. Near us was a well, which supplied us and our horses with good cool water; and altogether, after the perplexities and toils of yesterday, we felt in luxurious ease. We had ample experience of the different effects of the same scenery, the same beauty, the same fatigues, when we know the port to which we are bound, and when we do not. In our heavenly pilgrimage we are not surely intended to experience any such weakening and perplexing doubts. Our warfare is not "uncertainly," not as one that "beateth the air." We know the enemy, the promised aid, the glorious end. Our pilgrimage should be made "not uncertainly." We know the Guide, and he knows the way and the better country to which he is leading us.

After our rest we rode for some time along a road (or a dry water-course), low in the valley, and piled with many layers of stones. On the brow of a hill above the coasts of Tyre, we passed what is called "the Tomb of Hiram,"—a massive, simple, square structure, consisting of a large plain stone sarcophagus, supported on a few gigantic hewn stones. This one name which links the history of Tyre in friendly and not corrupting association with that of Israel, made an interesting link between the land of promise we were leaving and the land of commercial greatness we were entering.

We encamped on the sandy hill outside the walls of modern Tyre. Wolfish-looking dogs, which belonged to no one, prowled about us, as usual, "outside" the city." We kept one in pay by giving him the bones from our dinner-table; and he was at once (by the process adopted, I believe, in Greece) transformed from a thief into a police-agent, conscientiously keeping off all his brethren from any share in his spoils.

Is it the influence of Christianity extending its law of kindness to the lower animals, or something in the nature of northern dogs and northern men, which makes dogs among us Anglo-Saxons, and all the associations connected with them, so entirely different from what they are in the East? Imagine the effigy of an Oriental saint reclining with its feet on a dog, like that of William the Silent, the heroic Prince of Orange, on the faithful spaniel which rescued his life in the night attack of the Spanish troops, and like so many a sculptured knight of mediæval times! The very presence of such an image would, in Oriental eyes, be the greatest desecration an enemy could inflict on a sacred edifice. And in the Bible how exceedingly contemptuous, and how inapplicable to civilized English dogs are the terms employed in describing canine habits: "They grin like a dog, and go about the city, and grudge if they be not satisfied"—"Outside are dogs." What possible resemblance is there between such a description and the grave dignity of a Newfoundland; the sagacious, acute expression of a terrier; the wistful, almost human eyes of our house spaniels? But here at Tyre, as in most Eastern towns, the familiar words came to us with all their true and forcible meaning. The wolfish, hungry, masterless dogs which "go about the cities" (of Alexandria, for instance), gathering in packs like jackals, prowling about for offal, and grudging if they be not satisfied; or the famished outcasts, like our dogs at Tyre, prowling "outside" the city; to these we may indeed apply the highly unfavourable definitions of Scripture; which every Englishman and Englishwoman must indignantly disclaim on behalf of the loyal, faithful, patient creatures who watch beside our homes like sentinels, and guard our flocks like shepherds, and welcome us with ecstatic joy when we come home again, and sometimes will even die rather than desert a master's grave.

The next day, Saturday, July the 5th, we went with an intelligent guide around Tyre. Our encampment on the sand-hill was, we were told, nearly on the site of the earlier city, the Tyre which was "Ancient Tyre" to the early Greeks. That Tyre has literally disappeared, and the dogs prowl, as I have said, on the "outside" sandy wastes, where once the queenly city stood.

It was New (or island) Tyre, which Alexander converted into a peninsula by a causeway connecting it, which we explored that morning. This is a poor Turkish town, enlivened by a little faint commerce carried on in an easy, Oriental way, in tobacco from the neighbouring hills, and in hard lava millstones, transported from the volcanic districts of the Hauran to Tyre, as the sea-port for Egypt.

We saw the ruinous cathedral, an edifice of the middle ages, with a spiral staircase; and near it, inclined or prostrate, some fine columns of an earlier date with broken shafts and carved capitals. We afterwards took a boat, and skirted the bay from one tower of the fortifications to another on the opposite point of the island or peninsula. The most interesting ruins lay either close beside or beneath the waves. We passed a pier built of ancient columns, inserted at all angles,—upright, reversed, leaning in various directions, half covered by the sea, or entirely exposed. We also noticed two ruined towers, with huge Phœnician-looking foundation-stones, which reminded us of those in the wall of the Temple enclosure at Jerusalem. But beneath the sea were the most impressive ruins of all. We looked far down through the clear, still water, and saw large granite columns lying there. Sea-weeds and zoophytes had been clothing them for centuries, for millenniums, not knowing them from rocks. And to us their age seems more to be measured by geologic than by human dates.

After our ramble and boating expedition around the city, we rested and drank lemonade, iced with snow from Hermon! The associations of the place were bewildering, in the extent of time they covered, and the variety of race, religion, and civilization to which they point.

The prophetic doom of the great commercial power, and also of the queenly maritime city, has indeed been fulfilled, whether we regard it as referring to the ancient continental city, where now not a column stands nor a human being dwells, or to the clever, active, mercantile race, the founders of Carthage, which has passed away for ever from these shores. The doom was not on the buildings, but on the builders, or only on the buildings for the builders' sake. And yet if we regard only the external, visible stone city, rather than the luxurious sin-laden, extinct, human city, what more striking fulfilment of prophecy could we look for than that which meets our eyes here? The ancient Tyre is gone, literally razed from the face of the earth it polluted by its cruel idolatries and degraded social life.

The poor Turkish town which now stands in the place of island Tyre, is as little a continuation of the splendid city clothed with purple and scarlet, as the languid inhabitants—Syrian, Christian, or Metawali—are of that prosperous, energetic community, whose merchants were princes, and whose traffickers were the honourable of the earth.

The existence of this poor town near the site of Phœnician Tyre seemed to us to interfere as little with the fulfilment of the Scriptural denunciations, as if a similar doom had been pronounced on London, and, centuries after every Englishman had been swept from England, and every vestige of church, exchange, or dwelling, had disappeared from the banks of the Thames, a colony of apathetic Hottentots were to build for themselves a village of half-excavated, half-thatched kraals on the wilds of Hampstead Heath.

THY WILL BE DONE.

We see not, know not, all our way
Is night, with Thee alone is day.
From out the torrent's troubled drift,
Above the storm our prayer we lift,
Thy will be done!

The flesh may fail, the heart may faint,
But who are we to make complaint,
Or dare to plead in times like these
The weakness of our love of ease?
Thy will be done!

We take with solemn thankfulness
Our burden up, nor ask it less,
And count it joy that even we May suffer, serve, or wait for Thee,
Whose will be done!

Though dim as yet in tint and line,
We trace Thy picture's wise design,
And thank Thee that our age supplies
The dark relief of sacrifice.
Thy will be done!

And if, in our unworthiness,
Thy sacrificial wine we press,
If from Thy ordeal's heated bars
Our feet are seamed with crimson scars,
Thy will be done!

Strike, Thou, the Master, we Thy keys,
The anthem of the destinies!
The minor of Thy loftier strain
Our hearts shall breathe the old refrain,
Thy will be done!

RELIGIOUS AWAKENING.

WERE the Christian Church in a healthy state, there would be no need for special services to waken up the dormant energies of professors, and no room for them. The action of the Church itself in its Church capacity would overtake all the work to be done, and would do it through its own legitimate and appropriate agencies. A Christian Church in a state of healthy activity would not leave its pastor burdened with duties which belong to the whole membership as well as to their officers, overseer and instructor. It is his duty to visit the sick, to help the weak, to comfort the sorrowful, to show sympathy with the bereaved, the troubled, the perplexed; but it is not his duty exclusively. Every member of the Church should share in the duty and privilege, according to the injunction, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." The same remark applies to other classes of duties which devolve on the pastor, but in which also he should have helpers among his own people. In Paul's Epistles honourable and grateful mention is made by the apostle of both men and women who "helped him much" in the Lord's work. And surely it is not less the duty of a Christian people now to aid and cheer their pastors, lightening their burdens, and sympathizing in their cares.

To effect this, organization may be useful; and it is left to the wisdom and considerate judgment of Christian people to devise and put in operation such methods of working as may be best adapted for rendering efficient their kindly-meant endeavours to help. A wise past-will enlist the practical aid as well as the Christian counsel of the best of his people, in carrying out plans of usefulness, working the Lord's work, and striving to make full proof of his ministry.

Were all pastors and all congregations so minded, and so co-operating, their time and energies would be taxed to the utmost. They would be unable to endure any further strain, and so additional services would be impracticable, and would be uncalled for. The machinery already in motion would exhaust all the working power, and a higher pressure might endanger the safety, or at least the permanent efficiency, of the whole concern.

Sometimes the pastor is deeply in earnest. Prayer and effort fill up his days. Nothing is left undone he can do to promote the Lord's work. In public and in private; from day to day; from house to house; in season and out of season, he labours among his people. But he is left to labour alone. He has no one "like-minded" to care for their state; and he finds neither sympathy nor assistance in his work among them.

Another case may be this: The Church contains warm-hearted, zealous Christian people. Their hearts are set on doing good to one another, and to the world around them. They are ready to devise liberal things. But their pastor, who ought to be their leader and encourager, is a drag upon every effort. He objects to his people intruding into work that he thinks belongs to his office. He will not head their schemes, nor lend his influence to promote them; and objects to the people acting without his leadership and authority. Thus evil is done, and good is left undone. The pastor will not do the work himself, and those who would do it he discourages and hinders. The godly mourn, and Satan rejoices over the scene.

If this state of things, or something like it, prevails over the Churches of a district, a general apathy and deadness will wrap them in the folds of formality and routine. The services of religion will be kept up, but devoid of life, power, or influence.

When anything approaching to this is the condition of the professing world, it demands an awakening, and the bare statement of the case suggests the remedy to be applied. A people sunk in formality must be addressed with heart-stirring appeals. They must be warned of their sin and danger. They must hear the call, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life." Their folly, their inconsistency, their evil example, their noxious influence, must be exhibited. Their sin must be exposed to view in all its naked deformity. Around every Church there is found a mass of outlying worldiness, either in the shape of a cold, formal profession of religion, without the power of it, or in the shape of open disregard of all religion. Whether there be latent or avowed infidelity, or mere stolid indifference to truth and error, the character is substantially the same—it is "without God and without hope in the world."

Now, here is a field for Christian exertion, which no Church ought to leave uncultivated. One sure sign of a dead or dormant Church is its leaving the mass of irreligion in its neighbourhood to go on its way unquestioned, untaught, unproved, uncared for; and one of the first symptoms of a Christian community awaking to its duties and its privileges will be its zealous concern for the practical ungodliness of the surrounding population. It may be—as we often see it in this country—that while vital Christianity is at the lowest ebb, profession is almost universal. The habit of church-going, and sacrament-frequenting is kept up, and a measure of external propriety, such as may satisfy the world's very moderate standard, is observed. But all this only renders the spiritual slumber more profound, and demands that efforts to break it be made with equal wisdom, zeal, and perseverance.

Now is the time for the exercise of all the wisdom and prudence of them that fear God, to devise and execute plans of true reformation; and now is the time emphatically for prayer and self-denied effort to restore a state of spiritual life and soundness. The people of God will instinctively be drawn to the throne of grace; and the same spirit which disposes them individually to go to their closet, and shut their door, will also dispose them to unite their prayers at stated times and places, and others will join them, and so prayer will be made without ceasing for the spiritual blessings which must come from God himself. All this may result in action as well as in supplication. But the spirit of prayer must pervade all the Christian activity called forth. Here a twofold danger may be referred to in passing. It needs only to be stated. There may be danger in so conducting prayer meetings as if they were to supersede Christian activity. The idea may be cherished (though not in as many words expressed) that the petitioners devolve upon God himself the whole work of enlightening the ignorant, arousing the careless, reclaiming the backslider, and comforting the cast down; whereas, while God's power and mercy are acknowledged, the earnest prayer should be for grace and strength, wisdom and faithfulness to go forth to the discharge of duty in instructing the ignorant, warning the careless, calling to the backslider to return, and so—to every class—acting the part of faithful servants of Christ. The other danger referred to is the opposite of this. It is the busy, bustling, ceaseless activity that takes no rest, and will give no rest, going round with admonitions, warnings, expostulations, earnest and importunate, but conducted in a spirit of defiant resolution, as if men's hearts could be taken by storm, or changed and purified by human words or logical arguments, all the while that God is practically ignored by the restraining of prayer, and a forgetting to give to him the glory due to His Name.

The sum of this is, that neither should there be effort without prayer, nor prayer not followed up with corresponding effort. Both are essential to success. Here we may interpose a remark before proceeding further. It is, that the parties who move in such a crisis, and seek to act upon the inert mass of formality, or the more hostile mass of avowed irreligion, must lay their account with every form of discouragement and opposition. Some will object to their doing anything—will brand their efforts as officious and offensive, meddling with what does not concern them; others will object to their measures—will deprecate the noisy proceedings of these disturbers of their quiet routine services; others, again, will prophesy all manner of evil as likely to spring out of such movements. They are morbidly afraid of extravagance, enthusiasm, too many meetings, and too much preaching and praying. It is curious to mark how a religious movement in the community serves to bring out the latent characters of religionists, both of the clergy and the laity. Some are so excessively conservative that the slightest inroad upon use and wont is resented and resisted as a dangerous innovation. What an outcry some have raised on the score of late meetings, and denounce all services continued later than ten o'clock at night as utterly repugnant to good manners and sound principle: all the while the very same parties may patronize the theatre and the ball-room, and say nothing of the crowds at such places remaining beyond the midnight hour!

It might serve to abate the critical and fault-finding spirit of some, who raise objections to the noisy zeal of leaders and patrons in religious movements to reflect that, whether upon grounds, real or imaginary, those persons have the solemn conviction that multitudes of their fellowmen are spiritually asleep, and need to be awakened out of that deadly slumber. If so, their uncereemonious knocking at people's hearts and consciences may be excused. The end in view is so good and so important, that it is ridiculous to raise an outcry against the means employed to arouse men, on the mere score of taste or politeness. The apostle Peter did not blame the angel who smote him on the side when he awoke him from his prison slumbers and set him at liberty. And we never heard of any true Christian convert who thought the Christian minister or friend, who had used means to convince him of his sin and danger when in an unconverted state, had dealt harshly with him. No, it is merciful faithfulness, it is the faithful wound of a friend, not the deceitful kiss of an enemy, that is needed to awaken the sinner; and when his eyes are opened, and he sees what he is and where he is, he will thank the instrument that prevented him from sleeping the sleep of death, harsh as might have been the method of awakening him.

Again, when and where a "revival" is really needed, there must have been a previous state of guilty coldness and declension. Any movement, then, with a view to revive religion in a Church or a community, is a tacit confession of spiritual deadness. The measures to be taken, therefore, are measures in a state of disease for the recovery of health. They imply an abnormal condition, and must have a remedial character. If so, a revival is not an agitation that is to be perpetuated. When the occasion for it has passed away, things revert to their ordinary course, but that does not mean that the previous state of deadness is to be again experienced. No. When the patient is restored to health, the regimen, the medicines, the attendance then required will be discontinued, but the reinvigorated health will remain so, the Church or community restored to spiritual life and activity need not fall back into deadness when the movement has passed.

It must never be forgotten that a real religious awakening is the work of God's own Spirit operating on the hearts of men. Whatever may have been the human agency employed—the prayer meeting, or the public preaching of the Word, the faithful dealing with individuals, or some providential occurrence arresting men's minds and awakening them to the realities of another world—whatever may have been the means, they are only means by which the Holy Spirit works in beginning; and carrying on his own saving operations. Whenever the means are regarded as sufficient to create a "revival," without the presence and power of the Spirit of God the result will be either utter failure and disappointment, or a spurious excitement and short-lived extravagance, soon subsiding into apathy and silence—the silence of death.

Casting an eye over the Churches, and observing that, among all denominations, there has been more or less of spiritual deadness, lethargy, weakness, the desire may properly arise in a devout mind to resort to some measures fitted to awaken the slumbering multitudes. If many sympathize in this impression of something being greatly needed to be done, they may meet and consult, devise some plan of procedure, and seek direction from above, as we have already indicated. Here the question will naturally arise, Should contemplated efforts to revive those who are supposed to need revival, be efforts put forth within the Church for its own spiritual quickening, or should they be efforts proceeding extra, and directed as from without on the slumbering Church?

Without presuming to give an answer that might cover every supposable case, we are safe in saying, that evangelistic efforts originating in the zeal of individuals or societies not connected with the locality where they propose to work, should, if possible, be conducted in conjunction with ministers on the spot. Their sanction and co-operation not merely bring additional means to bear on the people, but give assurance that the foreign agency is of the right kind, supported by the people's own spiritual instructors, and their friends and helpers in the Lord's work.

Moreover, if evangelists are wise as well as zealous, they will everywhere allow the ministers of the place to take the lead in special services, unless they prefer to retire to the background and allow the strangers to take the prominent place. Sometimes the incompetency of the minister of the place for conducting services out of the common routine of duty, may render it proper for him to give way to others better qualified for the duty; but it is, generally speaking, not expedient to resign the management and control of such meetings to others. It is putting the stated minister out of his place, and putting the evangelist into one which is not his. Much prudence and attention to many little things may be requisite to prevent evil being mixed with the good attempted to be done, and evil that may remain after the good has passed away. It sometimes happens that an evangelist is so acceptable to the people, so deeply impresses their hearts, and gathers fruit in the hopeful conversion of not a few, that the services of the stated minister are thrown into the shade. The stranger has done more in a few days than he has done for years. The people make comparisons between the old and the new, perhaps the aged and the young minister, to the disadvantage of the former. They, therefore, henceforth listen to their own minister with indifference, and he can never regain the influence he has lost by the temporary services of another. The excitement his presence and preaching occasioned soon passes away, and is followed by a spiritual collapse as deadly as the state of things previously existing; and, from this second lethargy recovery is next to hopeless. Such a result is greatly to be deprecated, and great care should be taken to prevent it. Perhaps a safer course would be to engraft any extra services which an evangelist might originate upon the ordinary work of the ministry, and so identify them with it that they should rather appear to grow naturally out of the pastoral work of the minister, than be viewed as something extraneous and separable from it.

To illustrate our meaning, we may take the instance of a congregation accustomed to meet twice on the Sabbath—forenoon and afternoon. Were a preacher to come with a view to set on foot revival services, he might have the evening of the Lord's day for his special meeting. But it would be better to have the third service conducted by the pastor, with such occasional assistance as he might be able to command, and so not be made dependent on the continuance or acceptableness of the evangelical revivalist.

One cause of the reaction after a continuance of daily or nightly religious services, is the very frequency and exhausting effects of them. As they cannot be made permanent (they are too spasmodical for that), their discontinuance sometimes makes people feel that the ordinary services of the sanctuary are insipid. The exciting meetings are stimulants. The ordinary services are common food; the spiritual appetite is perverted; and the proof of this is found in the disrelish of the word and ordinances of Christ's own appointment.

Much might be said of the objectionable addresses sometimes given at meetings for revival; the exaggerations of statement as to the good done in other places; high-wrought descriptions of scenes of awakening, "striking down," and dreams, and visions. That such things have taken place is, without question, matter of fact; but that they are necessary concomitants of a religious awakening, few will maintain. By far the greater number of cases of hopeful conversion have been unaccompanied by any physical manifestations; and it is certain that persons who had been "stricken," have afterwards proved to be still unconverted.

Whatever may be the philosophy of these "manifestations," we may safely conclude that they are neither desirable as features of a revival, nor ought the absence of them be regarded as a token that the work of God is not going on.

What is technically called a revival of religion has hitherto been chiefly confined to America, although not wholly unknown in this country. After much reflection on the subject, and availing ourselves of all the information accessible to us concerning the history of revivals, their characteristics, their results, their more remote consequences, and their bearing on the general progress of the Saviour's kingdom in the world, it is our conviction that their advantages have been exaggerated, the evils and drawbacks connected with them very serious, and that, therefore, the American idea of their importance and necessity requires to be considerably modified. We should regret exceedingly if the opinion gained ground among us that revivals of religion were essential to the prosperity of the cause of God.

The necessary effect of exalting the importance of revival movements, is to depreciate the instituted ordinances of the gospel. A regular standing ministry of the word is Christ's own institution. The formation and working of a Christian Church ought to contain all the machinery for sustaining and spreading the gospel. The organization cannot be improved by the wisdom of man. If the pastors, evangelists, deacons, and memberships do their duty in their respective spheres, there will be no lack of appropriate agency, and no room for anything extraneous or irregular. If these official and private members of the Church fail in their duties in their appointed spheres, it is not likely that they will do better under some self-invented or gratuitous mode of putting forth Christian effort. Let them do their duty in their ranks, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, and not attempt to make up for failures there by going out of their ranks and inventing for themselves offices and services, of which the Church has no cognizance and no control.

When a Church or a circle of Churches has fallen into a state of spiritual apathy, no time should be lost in adopting measures for its resuscitation. But whence shall the power come adequate to the emergency? Surely from within the Church. Amidst prevailing defection there may be found some faithful ones; amidst the smouldering embers some sparks of living fire. These should in the first place operate on the cold and dead mass immediately around. Efforts to awaken should begin at the nearest point; not wander to some distant extremity, and try to do good there. Were this course followed, then the dead or languishing Church on which this reviving influence was exerted, would, when quickened into new life, operate on neighbouring Churches, and so from one to another the work would go on till all should be brought to a state of healthy action and true spiritual enjoyment.

Surely this is far better than the fitful, desultory, and often ill concerted efforts of persons whose zeal carries them to some point of action chosen without discretion, and occupied without any consistent or permanent scheme of activity.

AFTER A SILENT MEETING.

WRITTEN BY A LADY—A MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

SILENT! Then ye heard not My Beloved's greeting!
Knew not how we kept our tryst,
The parting and the meeting.

Heard ye not my moaning
As I told my sorrow?
Nor his blessed words of hope,
"Joy cometh on the morrow!"

Heard ye not the whisper
Of my soul confessing?
Nor His faithful "I forgive,
Peace to thee, and blessing?"

Then indeed was silence!
Surely you could hear it,
With its low "Amen! Amen!"
Falling on my spirit.

The Amen grew louder,
Like an anthem pealing,
As it answered to the voice,
All His will revealing.

Will—that I should suffer,
Share his crown of sorrow!
Loving service give to-day,
Reign with Him to-morrow!

Heard ye that "To-morrow!"
As the angels o'er us
Sang in halleluiahs loud
The triumphant chorus?

Heard ye that "For ever!"
As in holy vision
My Beloved bore my soul,
Far to faith's fruition?

Heard ye His low promise:
"Never will I leave thee;
Be thou faithful unto death;
A crown of Life I give thee!"

Oh, then, call not "silent"
Hours so full of singing!
Even now from wall to wall,
Hear the echoes ringing!

GOD AT THE HELM.

On the coast of Norway, there is a fearful whirlpool, known as the Maelstrom, which, at certain stages of the tide, rages with terrible violence, and sweeps into its vortex the vessels which approach it unwarily. For many years it was supposed that it was impossible to pilot a ship safely across this whirlpool, but skillful pilots now at certain conditions of the tide make the passage with safety. To the voyager unused to its dangers, however, the passage, though under the guidance of the most accomplished helmsman, seems full of horrors; on one side yawns the dark abyss, toward which the circling tide seems hurrying him; before and on either side are huge black rocks against which the waves break with fearful violence, and the contact with which would hurl his ship to swift destruction; around him, too, the waves rush madly, while the vessel, careering by the force of the current, seems ready to plunge headlong downward; if now the pilot's grasp upon the helm relaxes, or the ship yields not instantly to it, death is inevitable. But while he gazes thus, almost transfixed with terror, the waters suddenly grow smooth, the roaring of the waves ceases, and the vessel, righting itself imperceptibly, glides out upon the smooth, untroubled sea.

So is it in the affairs of our mortal life. There are times when we seem ready to go down into the depths of woe and anguish, when before us is the abyss ready to swallow us up, and, around us on every hand, obstacles oppose our progress and threaten us with destruction. Our souls are almost palsied with fright; for it seems as if the very next moment we might be ruined for time, and, perhaps, for eternity. All the precious freight of hopes we have so long borne in our bosoms, now burdens our spirits, and, almost in despair, we exclaim, How shall we escape from these impending dangers? Who shall guide us amid such perils? Fear not, saint of God, thy FATHER is at the helm. He knows every obstacle, every danger. His eye never grows dim, his hand never falters, and both the winds and the sea obey him. Even while thou art gazing in terror on the dangers around thee, his hand shall guide thee to the still waters—and, spanning the gulf that thou hast dreaded, thou shalt behold the bow of the covenant—the token of the fulfilment of his promises.

"SEEK, AND YE SHALL FIND."

THE ETHIOPIAN TREASURER.

ARE sudden conversions safe and sure? Can they be counted on for standing the strain of temptation, and enduring to the end? Are they more to be desired, or less, than those which come slowly, as the dawn struggles by imperceptible degrees onward into day? These questions are to the point at present. They touch to the quick two classes of persons who have passed through different experiences, and stand in different positions. It is a characteristic of true disciples to be jealous over themselves with a godly jealousy; the question, "Lord, is it I?" indicates the tendency and direction of their inquiry. Those Christians who hardly know when and how they were brought to Christ are led, especially in a time of many sudden awakenings, to put the question whether they have really passed from death unto life, seeing they were not brought in a day from a horrible darkness into glorious hope. On the other side, those who have by a short work of the Lord, in a time of revival, been guided into peace, are sometimes troubled with fears lest it should be all a delusion. The very rapidity of the passage makes them giddy, and they are disposed to put anew the question, "Am I his, or am I not?"

The search is salutary: "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith." But while the examination proceeds, it may be of use to both classes to be told that while the difference between slow and quick conversions is real, it is not nearly so great as it generally appears to be. There are, indeed, "diversities of operation" in the ministry of the Spirit, but they are smaller than they seem. Like the radii of a circle, they lie more widely apart at the circumference, but come more closely together as you trace them to the centre where they spring. The cases that were gradual and imperceptible in their progress had a turning point, although it was not observed; the cases that seemed to begin and end in a day had lines of preparation running unseen through many days. The period of the one conversion was not so long, and of the other not so short, as was supposed both by the subjects and the observers of the change.

We are concerned at present with those cases that seem sharp and sudden; and we desire to point out that there is always a process of preparation, more or less protracted, more or less discoverable, leading the way to the decisive result. On a bright spring morning the children come in from the garden shouting, in a chorus of eager happy voices, that a certain flower, much loved and longed for, has sprung through the ground suddenly in a single night. In the evening it was not; and now many outstretched fingers are pointing to the spot, and many twittering tongues are telling of the prodigy. There is no prodigy in the matter. The roots have been struggling through the hard clods for many days: after they had struck well downward, and spread well around, the stem began to shoot upward slowly for some time beneath the ground; and on the morning when the children made the discovery, it had burst the scale upon the surface, and exposed itself to view. Every true living plant has a root unseen beneath the ground before the stem appears. The same law holds good in true conversions. The springing of the plant may be sudden, but, if the plant be living and true, it has sprung from a root that has been for a longer or shorter period growing out of sight.

Even Saul of Tarsus is not an exception to this rule. How short and awful the work seems to have been in his experience! He was struck down on the road a rebel, with arms in his hands, and rose again a loyal subject of Christ's kingdom. That was the turning point; no track has been left of the path which led to it; but a path led to it notwithstanding—a path which the day shall declare. It may have begun by punctures scarcely perceptible, in the conscience, while Gamaliel, according to his light, was expounding to his students the meaning of the Mosaic sacrifice. The lines already begun may have been deepened and widened at Stephen's death. Perhaps in the clearer light of heaven the saved man may observe better, and tell more fully now, how the martyr's meek endurance, and forgiving prayer, and upward look, and glistening countenance stirred a strange tumult in the persecutor's heart, which he endeavoured to quell by hastening toward Damascus, and keeping his hands busy with the work of blood. When such a swelling of stifled conviction is struggling within, the Lord, timing his visit with wisdom infinite, meets the man by the way and finishes the work. It will be found, when the books are opened, that many who seemed bold blasphemers up to the very moment of their final conversion, were, for some time previous, anything but bold. Perhaps the man blasphemed more loudly because he felt his courage giving way. When the slave of Satan submitted to Christ, the act seemed wonderfully sudden; but it is only the crowning step of a process that has been advancing in secret for some time before.

The history of the Ethiopian treasurer enables us to throw light on these cases. From one point of view his conversion was sudden, and from another it was slow. These two men meet in the desert—the one a sinner, uneasy, seeking a Saviour; the other a called and qualified minister of Christ. The one is a thirsting soul, and the other is a "chosen vessel" charged with the water of life. The one offers, the other receives Christ. They part again, Philip to pursue his ministry, the Ethiopian rejoicing in the Lord. They met and parted in a day, perhaps in an hour. At the beginning of that interview the Ethiopian was timidly asking, "What must I do to be saved?" at the close of it he resumed his journey a Christian, in the full assurance of faith. They came from different places on converging lines, until they met in a point like the letter \triangleright ; but as soon as they met, they crossed and separated again like the letter \times , and never saw each other in the body more.

Mark now the two lines, rising like rivers in far distant hills, and converging to that point in the desert between Jerusalem and the border of Egypt. And, first, the course of the Ethiopian.

Late in the preceding or early in the same year, while the mild winter of that region kept mornings and evenings cool, a commotion might have been observed one day in the principal street of the Abyssinian metropolis, at the departure of a caravan for the north. It is the grand vizier of the queen starting on a religious pilgrimage. The bystanders do not exactly know the reason of the journey, but one has heard a neighbour tell that the chief treasurer had been of late much taken up with stories which he had learned from traveling Jewish merchants, about a great God who dwelt at Jerusalem, and a righteous King who would soon set up there the throne of universal empire. The treasurer was going all the way to Jerusalem to worship the God of the Jews, and look for the coming of their expected King.

We lose sight of the Ethiopian grandee, alike on his toilsome journey by the Nile's bank and through the wilderness; we never get a glimpse of him among the crowds, native and foreign, who congregate in Jerusalem to worship at the feast. Where he was, and how employed during the events which signalized that pass-over, we cannot tell; but we know that after waiting long and inquiring much, he called his servants and ordered his waggon, and started on his homeward journey, while the longing of his soul that had brought him so far, remained still unsatisfied. He was thirsty; he came to the place where the springs were opened; and yet he went away still athirst. There has not been such a revival meeting since on earth, as that one which took place in Jerusalem while the Ethiopian was there; and yet he came away sorrowful. On that day of Pentecost the Holy Spirit was poured on many, but not on him; at least so he thought and felt. After he has come so far, it is sad to see him returning without his errand. Yet it is written in the Scriptures, "Seek, and ye shall find;"—can the promise—can the Promiser be true? Yes; and this case is a conspicuous example of his faithfulness. This Ethiopian, secretly and sovereignly taught of the Spirit, did not limit God to times or places. As he left Ethiopia and went to Jerusalem seeking, so he left Jerusalem and went toward Ethiopia still seeking. He departed from the temple, but he still communed with God. When the period of public worship had passed, he persevered in private searching the Scriptures.

Mark this man: he has not given up: the whole meaning of that sable chief as he pores in silence over the parchment is, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." It is true he has not obtained what he wanted at Jerusalem, so as to be satisfied when he departs; but he has heard something at Jerusalem which is of use to him now. Although his want is not supplied, he knows better now what his want is. As that thirsty soul blindly gropes his way for water, he is coming nearer the place where the fountain has been opened. There is an instinct astir within him, as true as that which directs the infant to his mother's breast. He is feeling for the sufferings of Christ. Before he saw Philip, or got any help in his study, the place of the Scripture which he read was this, "He was led as a lamb to the slaughter." All things are now ready. That man will be born there. In that desert place Ethiopia is stretching out her hands to God, and shall not stretch them out in vain.

But we must leave the treasurer there, and trace the route by which his teacher was led to his side at the critical moment. How, and when, and where Philip became a disciple of Christ, we cannot tell; but soon after the Pentecost revival he was so full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, that the whole company of the disciples fixed their eyes on him, along with Stephen and five others, when it became necessary to set apart some to relieve the apostles of a portion of their work. The overflowing of the Spirit in Philip soon carried him far beyond the department of labour to which he had at first been called, and he glided from the serving of tables into the ministry of the word. When the persecution which culminated in the martyrdom of Stephen had made Jerusalem unsafe for his associates, Philip went down to the city of Samaria, "and preached Christ unto them." When he had gotten many souls for his hire there, the opposition slackened, and the door opened at Jerusalem again. To Jerusalem, accordingly, Philip returned, preaching all the way; but strange to tell, no sooner had he returned, with his heart full to proclaim mercy to its giddy multitudes, than a message reached him from his Master, requiring the devoted minister to leave the teeming city, and retire to the desert! Probably Philip was surprised; but he was not disobedient,—he arose and went. Like Abraham he knew not whither he went, but he knew whom he followed. Sometimes a minister is suddenly silenced, and laid aside: both himself and his friends wonder why the Master should have taken his servant away from a large and needy place, and turned him aside into an eddy on the edge of life's great stream, where there seemed to be neither door of utterance nor door of entrance. But all is well; the reins of government lie in the Almighty's hands; he will make all these things work together for good. The Master has something for his servant to do in the desert, otherwise he would not have sent his servant away from the city. And now Philip has passed beyond sight of human habitation; he is threading his way over broken stones and shifting sands, and doing his best to keep by the track that other travellers have left. He is afloat on the land-sea, without a camel to serve him as a ship; and he is like those master mariners whom the sovereign sends across the ocean without making known the errand on which they are sent. The ship-master in such a case carries out sealed orders, and opens them only when he has reached the spot. Learning there what his sovereign desires him to do, he does it, and passes on. So came Philip to this spot in the desert, and when he is there he learns the errand on which he has been sent. "Behold, a man of Ethiopia was returning." "Then the Spirit said unto Philip, Go near, and join thyself to his chariot."

On this point, then, the two converging lines have met, and this is the turning-point for eternity for an inquiring soul. What hath God wrought, and how wonderfully he hath wrought it! If his purposes in creation require the meeting of two circling worlds at some period in the evolutions of time, he will so arrange that the two shall approach and touch each other at the very point in space which he has designed. The same might and the same wisdom have been at work to arrange a meeting, wherever and whenever one earthen vessel charged, bears Christ, and another earthen vessel empty, receives Christ at a brother's hand. How frequent these meetings are in our own land at present, and how many messengers run to and fro, each bent on fulfilling his own commission,—each bent on getting a neighbour's soul for his hire! How thickly the royal couriers pass and repass in these days! If our eyes were opened, the whole mountain would seem full of these chariots of fire and horses of fire. "See that ye walk circumspectly, and not as fools;" ye know neither the day nor the hour when the messenger charged with the word for your conversion shall cross your path. The place whereon you now stand may be the holy ground for you,—the birthplace of your soul. On the right hand or on the left; in humble station or in high; in the house of God or on the public street, the messenger may appear whose word will win you to Christ. Brother unconverted! if a message be out from the King Eternal,—a message of special mercy,—a message of forgiving love to you, it would be sad to miss the bearer in the busy throng of life. Would you grieve if he should go by? Ah, fear not; they who desire to meet him will not miss him. That vacuum in a longing heart would draw the messenger and his message into your bosom, although they were at the utmost end of the earth. Though the place was desert, and the path but dimly traced, and the time not told at all, Philip and the Ethiopian met with all the exactitude of the tides and seasons. "Seek, and ye shall find." Fear not; the Promiser is true.

"The Lord of us hath mindful been,
And he will bless us still."

See, on a map—for the actual landscape is too wide to be comprehended in one view—the track of two converging rivers, from their several sources on separate mountain ranges to the point of confluence in the intervening valley. Observe, there are many windings in their courses. At some places, indeed, they seem to be flowing away from each other, and sometimes back towards their springs; but, in spite of all these partial and temporary divergences, on the whole the two streams come, slowly but surely, to a common meeting place. So spring far apart the life-courses of two persons, and so these life-courses come together. God, who made the mountains and valleys, and bade the rivers run among them, brought their lives into being, and guided their flow. He brought them together; and he brought them together for a purpose of his own. Stand in awe of the meetings and the partings of life. Reverence the friendships which you form, and the farewells which you pronounce. When one is Christ's, and the other is of the world still, the Master meant by the meeting that grace should find its way, from the vessel that grace had filled, into the vessel that was empty. Vessel filled! freely you have received, freely give: vessel empty! although all good comes from Christ the head, much good comes through Christians the members. The one should strive to bless, and the other to get a blessing.

These meetings, long prepared and graciously arranged in providence, are sometimes lost through obstinate unbelief. What a meeting was that, in Herod's judgment hall at Cæsarea, between Paul and Felix! How far up the lines of preparation for it ran, and how skilfully they were held in the hands of the Omniscient, until the missionary of the cross and the Roman ruler met at last! The Roman listened, and the preacher began. Now, Felix, now is your time; now or never. But he hardened his heart, and turned away. He cast out the arrow of conviction, after it had gone more than half way through the searing of his conscience. "Go thy way for this time:" he thought he was only politely putting off the Christian; but he was in reality rudely rejecting Christ. To lose such an opportunity may be to lose your soul.

That Ethiopian, on the contrary, being thirsty, welcomed the cold water to his parched lips. He received the kingdom of God as a little child, and the kingdom was all his own. He believed to the saving of his soul, and went on his way rejoicing. If any place in this world can remain consecrated more than another in the memory of the saints in rest, that spot, in the untrodden desert between Gaza and the confines of Egypt, is a sacred spot to one of the saved multitude who stand round the throne to-day in white clothing, for there he was born to the inheritance which he possesses now.

"SMITH OF THE WICK."

SOME forty years ago I visited for a few months the springs at Malvern Wells. The season was peculiarly fine and dry, enabling me to make many a stroll in the long evenings of June and July among the various villages and hamlets which are scattered at the foot of the Malvern Hills. I found them, for the most part, inhabited by a very degraded and untaught people; many could not read, and few seemed to know anything about religious truth. This made it very desirable that gospel tracts should be distributed to those who could read.

Strolling one evening for this purpose with a friend, I came to a little hamlet. It was a beautiful summer's evening. Two groups of men and women with their children were seated at their cottage doors, resting after their day's work. My attention was soon attracted by one who in appearance was superior to those around him. He seemed about forty years of age; his features were intelligent, but expressive of a harsh and determined character. As he rose on our approach, his tall erect form and military air showed that he had been a soldier. We spoke, hoping for an opportunity to give a tract. He mentioned that he had served in the Spanish peninsular war, and had been in several battles; that, a wound unfitting him for active service, he had been employed as clerk in the commissariat department; had quitted that situation and returned to England; had married, and had settled with his wife and children in this little hamlet. In speaking of his campaigns and the commanders under whom he had served, he became very animated and eloquent, but soon accompanied his narration with such oaths and profane expressions, that we were glad to hasten away, and feared to give a tract.

We made some further inquiries elsewhere respecting him, and learned that he was generally known in the neighbourhood as a very violent character and a dreaded disturber of the little hamlet, particularly on Saturday, when he was accustomed to go to market for his weekly provisions; and returning home invariably intoxicated, would beat his wife and children, and behave violently to all who came near him. There were, at that period, very few resources at Malvern Wells. We often wished to hire a horse, in order to procure the various articles we needed from a distance; but there was no horse in the immediate neighbourhood but that of "Smith of the Wick," as this man was called. But any further communication with him seemed quite out of the question.

I could not, however, but feel deeply concerned for his immortal soul, and often thought what a blessing might result to those around him, were that intelligent, energetic mind once spiritually directed. But on expressing a wish to send him some appropriate tract or book, my friends became alarmed, and strongly dissuaded me from doing so, saying, that I was not aware to what annoyance I might be exposed should he be offended. I yielded to their advice, though I now feel that I ought not to have done so. "Our times are in His hands," who says, "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation." I ought to have taken the most prudent means, and left the results with God. A future day might have been too late to save an immortal soul; but the Lord tenderly considered the weakness of his erring servant.

On leaving Malvern and returning to my home, I hastened to convey to him (through a friend at Great Malvern) the "Life of Colonel Gardiner." She sent it through her washerwoman, whose little boy was desired to take it to his cottage, and hastily disappear. Smith was outrageous; he traced the boy, and then the mother, and threatened her with great violence if she did not tell him the name and residence of the person who had sent the book; he added, that, could he but know from whence it came, he would be revenged by sending per coach a large heavy hamper of brickbats. The poor frightened woman, who was aware that the book was not sent by the lady from whom she received it, assured him she did not know whence or from whom it came; he left her still vowing vengeance.

About a week after he again visited her. He came with the book in his hand, and his manner was quite changed; he expressed sorrow for his late conduct, and asked her pardon. He said it was an excellent book, offered to lend it to her, and urged her to read it.

The following Saturday he went as usual to market, and returned perfectly sober and quiet. On Sunday, to the astonishment of every one, Smith appeared at church. From that time a complete change took place in his life and character, indicating that he was "born again."

Encouraged by the letters of my friend at Great Malvern, I some time after sent him in the same circuitous way, a set of "Burder's Village Sermons," which he so appreciated, that he used to assemble the cottagers around him in the evening to hear them read; and this habit of reading to them these sermons and the word of God he steadily pursued. He now became a good husband, father, and neighbour. He was, in short, "a new creature" in Christ Jesus; "old things" had "passed away," and "all things" had become "new."

The year following, I paid a farewell visit to my friend at Great Malvern, previous to my departure for the Continent. I lost no time in visiting the little hamlet. Smith was not at home, but I was welcomed by his wife, whose placid countenance bespoke her happier lot. She hastened to tell me of the change in the character of her husband since some kind person had sent him a book; he longed, she said, much to know who it was, that he might express his thanks.

A few days after, I again visited the hamlet. I found Smith working alone in his garden. He requested me to walk in and rest in his little humble cottage, and soon began to speak on the subject which now filled his heart. It was evident that he had indeed realized in his inmost soul the preciousness of Christ his Redeemer, and he "loved much," for he felt how much had been forgiven him. He spoke with much humility of his past life, and the circumstances of his conversion, and expressed an earnest wish to learn to whom he was indebted for the precious book which had been the means of so much blessing to his soul. As I truly desired an interest in the good feelings and prayers of this devoted Christian, I at length told him the secret. His expressions of pious gratitude were quite affecting; and as I took my leave, my last leave of him, he accompanied me to the gate, following me with blessings.

While on the Continent I did not lose sight of this interesting convert, of whose life and conduct my friend continued to write most satisfactory accounts.

Between two and three years after my last visit to Malvern, Smith was attacked with a lingering illness, which, in a few months, terminated his earthly course. I was still on the Continent, when my friend wrote to me of his death. When he was confined to his bed, she was enabled sometimes to visit him. He always requested she would read the Scriptures to him; this was his great comfort. She spoke of his peaceful, happy state; but having much else to relate, could not in her letters enter much into details. On my return, she too had passed away; but she had not witnessed his closing days and hours.

Perhaps some humble chronicler of the little hamlet may still survive to tell, in all the details of pious gratitude, of the godly life and happy departure of this devoted Christian; of all he said, and all he did in faithful and grateful testimony to those around him; but the record is in heaven, treasured up in God's book of remembrance, and with it also the mention of the results of his efforts. Blessed results there doubtless were. Many souls, perhaps, converted through his instrumentality, will for ever bless the Lord for the precious seed sown by this single believer.

About fourteen years ago I met a pious lady, who had recently been at Malvern. On questioning her respecting the state of the poor around those hills, she said she had found but little life among those she had visited, with the exception of a little village called the Wick, where the cottagers were in the regular habit of assembling to read the Scriptures. Oh, how forcibly was I struck with the faithfulness of God! My prayerful wish had been answered, not only in mercy bestowed to one individual, but on the little circle around him.

Two things especially deserve to be remarked in this little narrative, in which my endeavour has been to keep strictly to unadorned facts:—1. The invincible power of the grace of God; 2. The simplicity of the means God condescends to bless.

May these encourage any child of God who may peruse this narrative to seek, notwithstanding every hindrance, the salvation of souls. Reader, perhaps you can say, "I also was once travelling the broad road which leadeth to destruction, heedless of many a warning, of many a gracious call, until at length constrained to listen to that heavenly voice, saying, 'I am the way, the truth, and the life.'" If you have found Him to whom these blessed words apply, go in faith and commend him to others. Feeble as you may be as an instrument for effecting God's work, the Spirit of God through your words can turn sinners "from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God."

Should this account fall into the hands of any who are still thoughtless and unbelieving, may the strong evidence it contains of a new transforming heavenly work on a perishing sinner find its way to his or her soul! Surely to "Smith of the Wick" the words may be applied, "He being dead yet speaketh."

"OUR LIPS ARE OUR OWN."

THESE are the words which inspired wisdom puts into what it calls "flattering lips," and "the tongue that speaketh proud things." Those who say, "Our lips are our own, and who is lord over us?" it seems, say quite too much. For God says he will cut them off. He gives us to know that there are limits, even to freedom of speech, and this is very important for our consideration, at a time when so much is said about the sacredness of this kind of freedom.

Freedom of speech, of conscience, and of thought, under proper limitations, is an invaluable blessing. Both the Church and the world are vitally concerned for its preservation, and its conveyance to those who have it not. Those who have it are bound to guard it with jealous care. But in order intelligently to guard it, we need first to understand well what it is. God, in making each of us moral and responsible beings, has given us a conscience to guide us in the formation of thought, speech, and action. That conscience, in the regulation of thought, speech, and acts, he designs to leave to a free play, within the limits which his law and Providence and our relations to our fellow-men prescribe.

So our freedom of speech, or thought, or act does not involve the idea that we are not responsible, either to God or man, for what we think, say, and do. Our freedom being primarily that of the conscience, carries with it our responsibility to God, covering the whole of that which we do so freely. We are free, in that God leaves us to our own will, whether to do or not to do, and then approves or condemns, according as we have chosen to do the right or the wrong. So for every free act, word, or thought, we are responsible to God, and responsible because we are free. Many, in their boasts of freedom, seem to assume that because they are free to speak and act, therefore none can call them to account for what they say and do amiss. Whereas, it is the very fact that God has endowed them as free agents which makes them accountable to him. If they were mere machines, and not allowed to exercise their own will, they would be as irresponsible as machines.

* Abridged from a Tract, just published, by the Religious Tract Society.

There is another common error about this—many mistake their freedom from responsibility to man for freedom from responsibility to God. Reprove a man for casting down some plain principle of the Bible, or for trampling upon the Sabbath of the Lord, and his answer will be—That is wrong only in your opinion; my opinion about it is different, and I have a right to my own opinion. The conclusion which that mind really rests in amounts to this, that he has a right to form what opinions he will about any matter of truth or duty, and to act according to them; and then the fact that such are his opinions clears him from blame in any course of conduct. That is, he has the right to form the opinion, for instance, that it is harmless to take the life of his neighbour, and then to suit the action to the word, and justify himself on the ground that in his opinion it was right, and he had a right to his own opinion.

The fallacy lies here; he takes the fact of his not being responsible to man for his opinions, and extends it into his not being responsible to God. You say that you have a right to hold such an opinion even if it be a wrong opinion, and having a right to hold it, you have a right to utter it, or, in any way, to act according to it. But in what sense have you a right to your own opinion? You have a right to it in the sense, that no man has a right to take it from you by coercion. But that makes you no less responsible to God for all the wrong involved in that opinion, and for all the practical mischiefs which it begets. You are responsible to no man for the conclusions which you form in your own mind, as long as they lie unuttered in the mind, and are not let forth into practical mischief. But to God you are responsible for every thought; and for that whole treasure of evil in your heart, if you are the evil man who, out of the evil treasure of the heart, is ready to put forth evil things. And though other men may be deeply injured by the pernicious opinions which you utter, since evil communications corrupt good manners, other men have no power to restrain your utterance. They must leave to God the right of punishing you for the mischiefs which you do. In this sense, also, you may be said to have a right to your opinions.

Yet even this thought has its limits. If your uttered opinions affect the civil and social rights, and those temporal interests of other men, of which civil laws take cognisance, you have not a right to utter them. If you unjustly take up the opinion that a certain neighbour of yours is a thief, a murderer, or an adulterer, you have no proper right to that opinion; you have no right whatever to utter it. Your speech in that matter is not free, and if you utter it the civil law takes you to an account. But there is a class of opinions that affect purely moral interests, and opinions which are of a mischievous and deadly tendency which, so far as human or legal restraints are concerned, you have a right to utter. As God himself claims to be the Lord of the conscience, he has committed to no man the authority of coercing the conscience of another. In mere matters of conscience—in mere matters of religious truth and duty, he holds every one exclusively responsible to himself—not because other men are not injured by the false and pernicious opinions which we hold or utter, but because man is incompetent to extend his jurisdiction over the inner man of his fellows. There is no greater pest to human society, no greater offender against the most vital interests of man, than he who diffuses doctrines that are subversive of the gospel of Christ. But God has committed to human society no right of force to resist such assaults. The weapons of this warfare are not carnal, but mighty in their proper sphere. If with the gospel of the Son of God in our hands, we cannot silence the ignorance of foolish men, and expose the cunning craftiness which lies in wait to deceive, we must refer the matter to Him who causes the wrath of man to praise him, and who restrains the remainder.

This does not imply that as before God any one has a right to vent what opinions he will, and do what mischief through them he may desire; but that his account is to be rendered only to God. God will hold him to a fearful account. If for every idle word which men shall speak, they must give an account to God, what shall be said of those whose words have gone forth, as troops from the realms of night, to lay waste and destroy—those whose lives have been spent in setting in array their mightiest force of words, against the truth and cause of Christ? Every pernicious opinion which one conceives in his evil heart of unbelief, and defends and propagates with the mental force which God has given him, will stand charged against him as a sin, and sinful in proportion both to its power of mischief, and to the preciousness of the truth which it impugns. And while we contemplate the mischief done by it, beyond our power of resistance, and ask, "O Lord, how long?" we hear him say, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay it."

Here it may be seen in what sense it is true that every one has a right to his own opinions. It is simply this, that he has a right in certain cases to stand clear from coercion by other men in matters of opinion, and not that false opinions do no injury, and not that he can do the injury that flows from his opinions, and be brought to no account for it. There is a responsibility of solemn import attaching to us for all the conclusions which we form in our minds, touching that testimony which God has given us of his Son.

OUR LATEST SISTERS OF CHARITY.*

POPISH countries have long been familiar with Christian woman's work. In her wisdom, Popery has rejected no agency that could startle, win, or touch human hearts. If, in her wide circle of agency, she has powers of darkness for deeds of darkness, within the same circle stands the Sister of Charity, whose walk is the hospital, whose life is a ministry to the sick and the dying, or a life-long service in the nurture and discipline of youth. For ages the organized sisterhood has been an institution of the Romish Church, and woman's work presented in the regenerated form in which Rome loves to discipline her troops. In vindicating our Protestant freedom, we failed to graft on our new stock Rome's experience of woman's power in the mission of the Church. Suspecting whatever had grown in the Pope's garden, we cast it forth as a weed. Rejecting, on principle, woman's ministry at large, we bound and restricted her to the domestic circle. With the fall of the monastic system, and its associated institutions, she retired into the family, and if there she had neither object nor scope for her Christian heart, our stern antagonism to popish usages forbade her entering into wider fields.

* "Life Work; or, The Link and the River." By L. N. R. author of "The Book and its Story," and "The Missing Link." London: James Nisbet and Co., Berners Street.

The recent renewal of woman's mission in the lanes and alleys of our large cities, opens a dark chapter in the history of our modern social life. It is a product of the conditions of that life, has grown out of its necessities, is the balm for its hurt state, the remedy for its wounds. In tracing its rise we are led into the depths of our social evils, we go down into the pit where lie the victims of society's neglect, and of their own improvidence, intemperance, and crimes; and, as we gauge the deepest depths of its misery, we there find woman's work and its triumphs.

We do not repeat the sketch we have given in a previous paper, of the rise of "Woman's Bible Mission," and of the fruits that have sprung from its labours amongst the lowest strata of the London poor. Without claiming for that mission the originating of Protestant woman's work, it is opening a field in which the extremes of female society—the poor Bible-woman, and the affluent Christian lady, young and old—may meet as fellow-workers for the moral and spiritual elevation of their miserable and poverty stricken sisters, that are buried in the "dens and rookeries" of the metropolis, and other great cities of the empire; whilst it promises in its progress, without the formality of an organized sisterhood, to gather into its service every willing-hearted woman whose home lies in contact with the objects and scenes its charity embraces. Female district visitors—female tract distributors—female collectors for benevolent societies, have been long recognised as amongst our most valuable agencies. In spite of the repression under which Protestant ideas had placed woman's energies, they have been struggling into action. Yet their agency has been rather accepted as a necessity, and turned into channels of immediate need, than chosen from a discernment of their special gifts, and of the sphere of their natural action. If male agency could have been substituted for woman's work, in the departments in which it has hitherto been employed, Christian benevolence would not have suffered from the exchange. Her activity has chiefly found scope for benevolent action, where man or woman might have indiscriminately occupied the field. Her distinctive sphere remained to be discovered—the sphere in which she alone could do the work that was needed—the division of benevolent labour that belongs to the Sisterhood of Charity. Singular that that sphere should be amongst "the sunken sixth," and that the "Life Work" of the gentlest of human kind should have its appropriate range amongst the roughest and rudest of our social materials—amongst its castaways—a beautiful fresh proof that the cord that draws all hearts is LOVE!

That in this new field the British Sisterhood may find scope for its most diversified gifts, the experience of the last four years has already proved. The characteristic of this domestic mission is not only its extent, affording means of usefulness for all who will, but its comprehensiveness, yielding to all the employment suited to their gifts. Starting with the labours of the Bible-woman, her experience in the progress of her work developed the necessity of a lady superintendent as a co-worker, whilst, as their united work grew, it developed the necessity of further helps in administration of the social remedies brought in the progress of the mission to bear upon its objects. "The first year," as L. N. R. writes in "Life Work," "taught the power of the poor woman with the poor; the second, the imminent necessity of finding her a sister in effort from the class of her superiors, who should be minutely responsible for all money transactions and who should share the labour of love as the heart of a loving lady can share." It was not to be expected that a poor uneducated Bible-woman, pressed upon by hundreds of applicants with the pertinacity of old St. Giles, could keep clear accounts of the clothing, bedding, shoe, coal clubs, &c. which grew so large immediately that the opportunity of cheap, gradual purchase was known. There was an error in listening to her inexperienced supposition that she could deal with it all, or in yielding to her fear that the visible entrance of a lady on the work would spoil it all, as "from a lady they would only beg." The greater danger was, that the Bible-woman, amidst the pressure of business accounts and club-management, and the manifold worrying necessities of a clamant and ever-needy district, would be turned aside from her simple, proper, Christian work, or in her weakness be overborne to relax her rules, and to open to the poor dependence on other sources than their own provident self-denial. Experience quickly proved that a large clothing club required to be managed by a lady who should take that department only,—the purchase of material, the cutting out of garments, the receipt of pence, and the sale of clothes. The motto of the mission by its second year hence became, "Ministering women, two and two;" and that not two Bible-women, but a Bible-woman and her lady, who in harmonious co-operation should exemplify how the far apart classes of society might be brought together, and the world benefitted by the power of their united love and prayers. Fears might have been entertained as to the practicability of the harmonious working of fellow-labourers so far removed in sympathy of class from each other. The testimony of L. N. R. dispels that apprehension. Those higher sympathies, engaged in a common work, have been their bond of union. From letters daily received from the superintendents, L. N. R. is assured of the kindly and sympathizing spirit in which the common work is done. With the three hundred sisters, rich and poor, that are engaged to help each other to explore and to reform those endless succession of courts and alleys and yards walled in from the light of day, which hide so many thousand little worlds of sin and suffering behind London's lordly squares, the work proceeds happily and successfully,—the lady superintendent proving not only a worker but a watcher, watching over her Bible-woman for her soul's good, that she may minister more successfully to the souls of others; and the Bible-woman pioneering the way and introducing her lady superintendent to scenes and works from which alone she would have shrunk.

The manner in which these sisters of charity, of high and low degree, work to each other's hands, and help each other that they may be more helpful to the poor, is well illustrated in the following communication from one of their number. "I determined," says a lady writing to L. N. R., "to try the experiment of visiting one day in the week with my Bible-woman; and asking guidance and wisdom from above, we started together. She took me at once into the very worst part of the parish. I have been a district visitor in Bloomsbury these ten years, but I never saw anything like this; and two hours' work made me so sick, I thought I never should forget the miseries and the smells. We groped our way into dark houses, up stairs without any banisters, and with great holes in them requiring careful steps, and we entered rooms which looked as though they had never been scoured since they were built. Beds seemed wholly unknown. Here and there we found a bedstead with some filthy rags upon it, but oftentimes it was a small litter of straw with a black cloth thrown over it. In almost every room we heard the same story, 'No work, and no food.'" Notwithstanding this repulsive condition of the district, with the Bible-woman by her side, the lady superintendent went deeper and deeper down into its real state, exploring its want, misery, vice, and starvation, that she might learn the true kind of help it needed. In prosecuting this work she had frequent occasion to remark the difference of her reception amongst the families of the poor as superintendent of a Bible-woman and as a district visitor. In the latter character the women visited usually felt it necessary to utter a few religious sentences, as they knew it was the district-visitor's errand to communicate religious instruction, though they valued the visit chiefly for the ticket the lady might be induced to leave for bread or coals, which, as soon as she had gone, was most probably exchanged for gin. But visiting as the superintendent of a Bible-woman, the families realized the fact that they were known, from the access of the Bible-woman to them at all hours, and from the thoroughness of her knowledge of their individual histories, and they ceased in consequence to make attempts to deceive.

It is such a combination of rich and poor, of Bible-woman and Christian lady, that the able author of the article "Deaconesses," in a recent number of the Quarterly Review, desiderates when he writes of the inadequacy of the Bible-woman's mission from the absence of this feature, which is now its prominent characteristic; and which, even at the period the following paragraphs were written, it had developed. "The Bible-woman plan," writes the Quarterly, "has its weak points; or rather there are strong points which do not and cannot belong to it. Leaving aside the question of payment, it excludes in the first place from its direct agents all those who are of a social grade above the lowest. There is some risk lest it should leave people to mistake for a truth a most mischievous fallacy, namely, that only the poor can work beneficially among the poor. The truth is, that the poor have peculiar advantages in dealing with the poor, and the wealthy and the educated have peculiar advantages in dealing with them also. Our object is not merely to descend to the lowest levels of our population, but as regards religion to bring up the lower strata to the level of the higher. Besides the professional employment of poor women, we require the professional employment of those who have a higher culture and a higher social position. If the two were properly organized, each would assist and strengthen the other."

Most cordially do we subscribe to the truth that it were a most mischievous fallacy "that only the poor can work beneficially amongst the poor;" but the Bible-woman's mission, as it has developed since its first year's operation, proceeds in opposition to this fallacy. Its completeness is its comprehensiveness. It has a place for all ranks, a work for all kinds of workers. It drafts its agents from the lowest class, sending back the rescued to repeat on others the saving impressions that were wrought on themselves; it drafts them from the highest, uniting the Christian lady that is willing to lend her higher culture and the influence of her position with the rescued Bible-woman. And for those neither capable of taking the position of Bible agent nor lady superintendent, it has a place in the administration of the various measures of social amelioration that circle around the Bible-woman's track, or in some one of the many ministries to the sick, the young, the rescued or exposed girl, that multiply in exploring the wants of a long sunken and neglected city district.

How truly such an agency is adapted to its chosen work may be gathered from the grateful reference to its operations by the rector of St. Giles, in whose parish from its commencement it has found an appropriate field. We refer more especially to his testimony from the important statistical facts it embodies, and which of themselves demonstrate the self help to which the mission is so nobly training the most abject of the poor.

In his annual address for the present year to his "Friends and Parishioners," the rector thus speaks:—"Of the Bible and domestic female mission I seem always to have something to say. Unprecedented in the rapid hold it has taken of the public sympathies, it almost stands by itself in the simplicity and unobtrusiveness of the method by which, under God, it has made its way. Barely four years have elapsed since the first Bible-woman entered Church Lane, but during that time upwards of twenty thousand Bibles have been sold to the poor of London by these women, whose number now exceeds a hundred and fifty. During this space of time £1706 have been paid by the poor for those Bibles; £5013 have been contributed by them towards the purchase of clothing, beds, and blankets, and the public have given upwards of £13,000 towards the general purposes of the mission. We have now three Bible-women at work within our parochial limits, one stationed in Dudley Street, one in Short's Gardens, one in Store Street. I am anxious to see a fourth settled on the western confines of the parish, in Crown Street, the very place contemplated in the idea of the missions. Before I leave the subject I wish to make it quite clear at what precise object it aims. In some points, no doubt, as could hardly be prevented, it works in parallel lines with existing agencies. In other points, it holds ground never occupied before. Women before now have done a most useful work in collecting pence for Bibles, but they have been gentlewomen, not of the poor. The clergy, Scripture readers, city missionaries, do their work of direct evangelization by the word of God and prayer. But as, in our own affairs, guided by an unerring instinct, we go to men for strength, and to women for sympathy, so man's work in spiritual things is rather argumentative, authoritative, admonitory; woman's, persuasive, suggestive, sisterly. In temporal matters the boundary is yet more distinct. To cut out a frock, to mend a coat, to make a cup of broth, to boil a pudding, to tidy a room, to wash a shirt, to dress a baby, are not exactly the things in which men feel qualified to give advice, and by no means enter as a matter of course into the personal experience of the district-visitor. But here the Bible-woman is on her own ground; she is able at once to win her way to gratitude and confidence by hastening to instruct the enormous ignorance of the poor in the commonest duties of life; while, as she smooths the pillow of the sick mother, she can soothe the heart with words of Jesus Christ, and through tact and kindness prepare the way for the gospel, in trying to be a saviour of the body. The system is now spreading its network over the chief provincial towns; with some modifications it will probably be introduced into villages; and I even see more reason, not only for introducing it as an integral element in my own parochial system, but of considering it, even with ragged schools and refuges, as among the chief discoveries of the age."

And why should it not continue to extend its operations from the metropolis to the provincial towns, and from the provincial towns to our evergrown and long neglected mining and factory villages? There are no want of agents, rich and poor, for the work. It but requires to be brought into contact with the untold thousands of Christian women longing for scope for their energies, and for occupation for their Christian hearts. They would and could work, were but the right object presented, and the obstacle broken down that has hitherto bound them to inaction. The conventionalities of society, or the false Protestantism that has excluded the Christian lady from her sphere of healthful, benevolent activity, has done more than withheld from good. If it has left the homes of the poor unvisited, and the fallen to sink into a lower depth, it has suffered hearts that would have been made joyful in a service of benevolence, to pine in vacancy, or to dissipate themselves amidst objects that could neither interest nor fill up the desires of an earnest mind. "No evenings in the week," is the testimony of the ladies who preside over the mothers' meeting, "are like these;" and no temptations of pleasure can induce them to forego their engagements with them. In a life without a purpose, Rome has often made for herself an easy conquest. The vacant female heart, consuming itself, has found relief in a strong master subjecting it to rule, and presenting day by day its "tale of brick." We ask not for the Protestant sisterhood the mechanism of Rome, its rules or orders; we ask not that woman's work be under a Church organism. The genius of Protestantism demands freer methods. We shall be satisfied that the sisterhood take for their rule the Word, that, in the language of L. N. R., the missing link be riveted to the Scriptures, and that its mission be that of the divine book to the souls of the poor. In one thing only we ask to emulate the Church of Rome, in the art of which she has so often shown herself the master, of turning; all talents to account, and in allotting to every gift its sphere.

In the new field which "The Missing Link" and "Life Work" open to woman, the sphere, whilst large as the necessities of the city and village poor, is still essentially woman's. The work is domestic, the family its scene, woman's converse with woman its object. Neither the Bible-woman, nor her lady-superintendent, nor any of their associated agents, are preachers. Their aim is not to bear upon masses. Their walk is from house to house; and the mission-room is their widest arena for speech. It is through intercourse with and power over individual mind that the work of the Domestic Female Mission is done. There are women who possess the gift of utterance, and the power of addressing and interesting numbers; and such violate no law of their sex when, alone with women, they speak even to assembled hundreds for God and his truth. Such gifts are rare, and the wise occasion for their exercise rarer still. It is to the great silent work always at hand, which none can gainsay, and for which every woman has her faculty, that the Bible-woman's mission calls,—it is to the service that helps one person at a time, and which, through the leavening of individuals with better principles, leavens masses.

We agree with the sentiments so well expressed by L. N. R. when she says, "We do think that the mark of true woman's work for God in Scripture and in life is its individuality. Her being naturally tends towards the inner circle of the 'home,' and all her education should fit her to make that home a nursery for heaven. When her energy ranges beyond it, it is well that it should make other homes, and shed around her the influence of the Book, that law of the Lord which rules by her own fireside. She is safe under the shadow of the Bible and the Home. She forsakes no quiet womanly aim in dealing with individualities and seeking to bring souls one by one to Christ. We are inclined to maintain, very strongly, that this individualism is woman's natural element. Man's voice and nerve and mould of intellectual power fit him to deal with generalities and masses; and if woman, as his help-meet in the work of God, prepares his way in detail, she fulfills the office appointed to her. A man will almost always take the best general view of a subject, and a woman will work it out in its distinctive features."

Let the Bible-woman's Mission adhere in its progress to the "dealing with individualities," and it will escape the rocks that are ahead of its future; it will awaken no jealousy in other agencies, lay or ecclesiastical; it will provoke no opposition from the alarmists at all woman's work, or render their opposition as powerless as their fears. It will be "safe under the shadow of the Bible and the Home." There it will preserve woman in her own sphere and at the "life work" to which she is called by nature, providence, the necessities of our social state, and the apostolic word, "I will that she guide the house;" whilst it places her under a guide more safe than has yet been found in ecclesiastical surveillance.

EVENING HYMN.

(FROM THE GERMAN.)

THE day departs;—
My soul and heart
Long for that better morrow,
When Christ shall set his people free
From every care and sorrow.

The sunshine bright
Is lost in night;—
O Lord, thyself unveiling,
Shine on my soul, with beams of love,
All darkness there dispelling!

The noise of life,
Labour and strife,
Have come to calm cessation;
Let me thy work of grace review,
In holy contemplation.

Now on my bed
I lay my head,
My weary eyelids closing;
Thus sweetly, Lord, my soul would rest,
On thy sure love reposing.

Be thou still nigh,
With sleepless eye,
While thy poor child is sleeping;
And angel guards, at thy command,
Afar all danger keeping.

This sun and moon,
This night and noon,
When shall their course be ending?
When shall the day eternal dawn
Whose sun has no descending?

The land above
Of peace and love,
No earthly beams need brighten;
For all its borders, Christ himself
Doth with his glory lighten.

Oh, to be there,—
That bliss to share,
These halleluiahs singing!
With all the ransomed evermore
My joyful praises bringing!

Lord Jesus, thou
My refuge now,
Forsake thy servant never!
Uphold and guide, till I may stand
Before thy face for ever!

THE CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN.

PART IV.

For many years after the death of Comenius, history throws little light upon the scattered remnants of his Church and people. Multitudes, as we have already seen, had sought refuge from popish tyranny and oppression in other lands. Those who escaped to Poland could unite there with the Polish branch of the Brethren's Unity, but the emigrants to other Protestant countries do not seem to have attempted to keep up their own forms and discipline. "The first settlers," says Cranz, "did not obtain permission for this, nor were they very much intent upon it, because they always entertained hopes of returning, some time or other, to their own country, and regaining the liberty they had lost. In the meantime, they lost themselves more and more among other nations and religions," &c. Even in Poland new troubles arose. The Roman Catholics, at the beginning of last century, gained the ascendancy, and the Brethren, as a separate Church, were in danger of extinction.

It is pleasant to think that our own country was not unmindful of the solemn bequest of Comenius. Twice, in times of great extremity (in 1683 and 1715), the Polish Brethren appealed to the Church of England for assistance; and on both occasions our Government authorized measures for their relief, acknowledging them as a Reformed Episcopal Church, which had preserved unimpaired, through much tribulation, the apostolic rites and doctrines.

The descendants of the ancient Church who still remained in Bohemia and Moravia were in most cases outwardly conformed to the Romish ritual, from fear of death and imprisonment, and weakness of faith. But, especially in Fulneck and the adjacent villages, there were many who in secret studied the Scriptures, and met together from time to time, with every possible precaution, for conference and prayer, even occasionally celebrating the communion. While Comenius lived, he used every effort to send them messages of encouragement and consolation, together with hymn-books, catechisms, and other evangelical works, which, after his death, were still means of keeping up among them some degree of spiritual life and knowledge.

One of the chief promoters of these secret meetings, in the village of Sehlen, was George Jaeschke, a genuine descendant of the Brethren's Church, a man of strong faith and ardent piety, looked up to for counsel and comfort by all the believers within his influence. His daughter, Judith, married to George Neisser, had five sons, whom their grandfather delighted to teach the way of salvation. When far advanced in life he married a second time, and to one "son of his old age," named Michael, he was deeply attached. In his last illness, when sensible of approaching death, he summoned his whole family circle around his bed, and bestowed upon them an almost patriarchal benediction, assuring them of his confident expectation that ere long the Lord would deliver and revive the Church of the Brethren, either in that or some other land, and exhorting them all to be ready, when the time came, to cast in their lot with the people of God, and to take care, wherever they went, that his beloved "Benjamin" should not be left behind. He expired, soon after this affecting scene, at the age of eighty-three, in 1707.

His family were not forgetful of his dying exhortations and prayers. They continued to meet in secret for devotional exercises, and the Spirit of God, about this time, seemed to awaken not themselves alone, but others of the Brethren's scattered descendants, through Bohemia and Moravia, to deeper interest and anxiety in regard to salvation. Meantime, the Hearer of prayer was preparing for them an instrument of deliverance in a remarkable individual, whose history deserves special notice.

Christian David was born of humble Moravian parents in the village of Senftleben, on December 31st, 1690. He was brought up in the Roman Catholic religion, and his naturally ardent spirit entered warmly into all its superstitions. But in no self-righteous duties, or self-mortifying penances, could he find rest, as his mental powers developed, for an uneasy conscience and awakened soul. While following in various places his trade as a carpenter, he came in contact with "heretics," who rejected the errors of Popery, read forbidden books, and patiently endured suffering and imprisonment rather than deny their own opinions. He also met with Jews, equally opposed to Romanism. He was surprised and perplexed by these things; and hearing both parties speak of the Old Testament and one of the New as the word of God, he became earnestly desirous to read for himself those sacred Scriptures.

In his twenty-first year he succeeded in obtaining possession of a Bible. He studied it with all the ardour of an intelligent and earnestly-inquiring mind, and as he read, gradually doubts and difficulties gave way, and the glad tidings of great joy, free and full salvation through a crucified Redeemer, became unfolded to his understanding, and brought peace and joy in believing to his heart. He taught himself to write, by copying the characters of the sacred volume, and pored over its pages with such unwearied diligence, that in later life he might be called "a living concordance," and his ordinary conversation is said to have been almost entirely biblical.

He travelled to Berlin in the exercise of his trade, and joined a Lutheran congregation there. Being disappointed by the carelessness and indifference of the generality of professing Protestants, and their opposition to serious religion, he next enlisted as a soldier, from the rather singular expectation of finding the army more favourable for spiritual improvement. In this also he was disappointed, and did not regret when, after the siege of Stralsund, he received a discharge. He resumed his former employment, and at Goerlitz in Upper Lusatia, he at length found a truly gospel ministry and Christian society. He married a pious young woman, and had every prospect of a happy earthly home. But the more he felt the love and grace of Christ in his own soul, the more was his heart filled with compassion for the souls of others, and regardless of the risk to himself, he undertook frequent journeys to Moravia, to carry the gospel to his own countrymen.

On one of these occasions, in 1717, in his native village or its neighbourhood, he met with the Neissers, and became deeply interested in them. They listened with wonder and eagerness to one whose exhortations recalled those of their departed grandfather. They confided to him all their spiritual trials, and entreated him to find for them an asylum in some Protestant land, where they might worship God in liberty and peace. He promised to do what he could towards this, and meantime encouraged them to be steadfast in the faith, and as often as possible to attend the nearest Lutheran Church.

Five years after, on Whit Monday, 1722, their new friend brought them the good tidings that after repeated disappointments in seeking to fulfil their wishes, he had, in providence, been led to apply to Count Zinzendorf, a pious nobleman, who agreed to receive them on his estate of Berthelsdorf, not far from Goerlitz.

Two of the brothers at once saw in this message the command of God, which they resolved to obey. The others were more doubtful or timid. Their situation was indeed trying;—they were all engaged in a profitable business, with every home comfort and many friends, and it was not easy to “forsake all” for the gospel’s sake. It was agreed that Jacob and Augustine Neisser should go first, and if God prospered them the rest should follow.

They now recollected their young relation, Michael Jaeschke, and the promise made to their dying grandfather, that whenever they were called of the Lord to another land, Michael should not be left behind. They felt bound in conscience to inform him of their intention, though with much anxiety, lest he should oppose it and betray them to the Jesuits. To their agreeable surprise, they found that he also was under much spiritual concern, and joyfully agreed to a step which in secret he had long been wishing to take. They told him to conduct his business next day as usual, and come to their house at night.

Michael kept his appointment, as did Christian David. And, under covert of darkness, the little pilgrim band started on a journey, more formidable to them than we can well realize. The party consisted of Jacob and Augustine Neisser, their wives, four children (a boy of six years, a girl of three, and twins of three months old), Michael Jaeschke, and Martha Neisser, sister of Augustine’s wife. They travelled slowly, by unfrequented paths, under the guidance of Christian David, and by the good providence of God all reached their destination in safety.

Count Zinzendorf was then absent from home, but his grandmother, when told the case of the poor emigrants, desired that they should be accommodated at first in the village of Berthelsdorf, and that Mr. Marche, tutor in the family, should look out a suitable site for their building a house for themselves. Mr. Marche was a Christian man, and after serious consideration and prayer, he was led to fix upon the Hutberg, a wooded hill, across which the main road to Zittau passed. To this spot he conducted the Moravians. It was a dreary solitude then, covered with forest and bog, and we cannot wonder that the faith of some was ready to fail, and that the wife of Augustine, looking around on the gloomy prospect, and thinking of the pleasant homes left far away, exclaimed despondingly, in the language of a doubter of old, “Where shall we find bread here in the wilderness?” Mr Marche replied, with pious confidence, “If thou wouldst believe, thou wouldst see the glory of God.” And Christian David, striking his axe into a tree, exclaimed, “Here, the sparrow has found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts, my King and my God!” (Ps. lxxxiv. 3.)

They set vigorously to work, and by the end of October, were able to enter a dwelling of their own building. Mr. Heitz, steward of Count Zinzendorf, assisted at a religious service, in which the new house was solemnly dedicated to God. He gave to it the name of Herrnhut, and wrote thus to the count, “We have called this place Herrnhut (the Watch of the Lord), to remind us, on the one hand, that the Lord is our protector and helper; and, on the other, that it is our duty to stand in the watch tower and keep ward.”

A few weeks after this, a travelling carriage passed along the high road, containing Count Zinzendorf on his way home from Dresden, with his newly married wife. Surprised to see a human habitation among the trees on this lonely hill, he inquired the meaning of it; and being told that this was the house built by the poor Moravian refugees, he at once alighted, and entering, assured them in the kindest manner of his hearty welcome and protection. He then knelt down, and earnestly implored for them and their undertaking the blessing of the Lord. This unexpected visit must have greatly encouraged and cheered their hearts.

Such was the humble beginning of what proved in the end the Renewed Church of the Brethren. Thus was sown the grain of mustard seed, which quickly sprang up into “a tree of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he might be glorified.” All concerned seem to have felt a solemn impression on their minds, that their work was far more important than it actually appeared, and one on which the special blessing of God was to rest.

Meanwhile, the three Neissers who remained in Moravia found themselves exposed to great difficulties and dangers, being required to account for the sudden disappearance of their brothers. They were imprisoned, and when, on being released, they requested permission to emigrate in their turn, were even threatened by the Jesuits with the Inquisition. They therefore quietly absconded, leaving all their property; and along with their families, eighteen persons in all, arrived in spring at Herrnhut, where they were gladly welcomed by their relatives, and obtained permission to build houses for themselves. Being all good tradesmen, they easily gained a maintenance by the work of their hands.

Towards the close of the same year, 1723, Christian David, full of zeal for Christ, and love for the posterity of the ancient Brethren, ventured again to Moravia on a missionary tour. He had singular gifts as a preacher, and his earnest proclamation of gospel truth, together with his report of the little Christian community forming at Herrnhut, created quite a sensation among his countrymen. A real spiritual awakening was the result. The night meetings for worship were crowded, and even during the day the voice of praise or prayer might be heard wherever several persons were at work together; while it is specially recorded how much the “little children" were impressed by the love of Jesus, as in the revivals of our own day. All this could not go on long unobserved by the Jesuits, who were particularly powerful in that district. The persecuting measures of former ages were renewed, and sufferings of many kinds inflicted upon all who were convicted of reading Protestant books, or attending the meetings of the "bush preacher," as Christian David was called.

Five young men, of genuine Moravian descent, rendered themselves peculiarly obnoxious to the priests by their zeal and piety. Their names were three Davids Nitschmanns, John Toeltchig, and Melchior Zisbergen. They were summoned before the magistrates, on May 1st, 1724, and threatened with imprisonment if they did not give up their religious meetings. The following night they left their homes together, and when fairly beyond the village, falling on their knees, commended themselves and the believing friends they forsook to the care of their God and Saviour, and then, setting out on their pilgrim way, joined in singing a well-known hymn, often sung a century before by their exiled ancestors:—

"Blessed be the day, when I must roam, Far from my country, friends, and home,
An exile poor and mean,
My father's God will be my guide,
Will angel guards for me provide,
My soul from dangers screen," &c.

Their intention was to go to Poland, hoping there to find some congregation of the Brethren; but in the first place they resolved to look in upon the little colony of Herrnhut, and see the dear friend, Christian David, who had been such an instrument of blessing to their own souls. Travelling by mountain paths, they reached Herrnhut on the 12th of May.

They arrived at an interesting moment. Count Zinzendorf, and several of his friends, had assembled with the Moravians to lay the foundation of a large building, intended to serve various benevolent and religious purposes, and which finally became the general meeting-place for public worship. The solemn services, and the earnest prayers offered up on this occasion so impressed the strangers, that they felt convinced this was the place where the Lord intended they should pitch their tents. Full of zeal for the ancient Church of their fathers, their arrival, and that of relatives and friends who soon found means to join them, was a special providence for the good of the new settlement, and greatly contributed to the measures afterwards adopted for constituting the community as the "Renewed Church of the Brethren."

It would be impossible, within the limits at our disposal, to attempt anything like a detailed account of the further progress of the congregation at Herrnhut, and the important results to which it gave rise. Yet, at the risk of somewhat taxing the patience of our readers, a few more facts must be added, to prevent what must after all be an imperfect sketch from being altogether incomplete and unfinished.

THE TANK AND THE WELL.

In India, rain does not fall now and again, as it does here, all the year round. It comes down during one particular season, known, in consequence, by the name of the rainy season. At that time, however, the water descends literally in floods; the ground that had been intensely dry before becomes saturated with moisture; and the rivers, overflowing all their banks, make the vast plains look like inland seas. Now, as the people are well aware that this abundance of the precious element does not continue beyond a certain period—as they know that very shortly the fields will become as parched and withered as they were before the heavens were opened—they endeavour to make provision against the drought that succeeds, by erecting large tanks in which a supply of water is preserved, and out of which they draw for many purposes, and among others, for irrigation. These tanks, accordingly, form a very important feature in Indian gardening and farming; and that man would be very foolish who had the means of procuring one, and yet who neglected to do so. At the same time, it must not be supposed that the people are entirely dependent on the supply of water that reaches them in the rainy season. They have wells likewise—wells that never, in the hottest seasons, run dry, and which send forth perennial, cool, and clear, and refreshing streams.

Now, there was once a ryot, or Indian farmer, who had a large piece of ground to cultivate. His living depended upon the field. If it produced plentifully, he had bread enough and to spare; if it was barren, nothing but death by famine stared him in the face. He had, therefore, the strongest possible interest in seeing the land well cared for; and as the soil was rich and the climate bountiful, there seemed no reason to doubt that he would have as large a return from it as he desired. But a great deal—we may say all—depended on the field being properly watered; and to see to that specially was his business. Well, there were two quarters from which, at first sight, water might be expected. In one part of the field was a tank, which either he himself or his father had erected to preserve some of the rain when it fell in the rainy season; but this tank had somehow been badly constructed—it leaked sadly, and do what the poor ryot could, it could not be made water-tight. The consequence was, as he had learned by experience again and again, it was always found to be empty when the time for irrigation had arrived. This, however, as all the farmer's friends thought, was no great matter, for in another part of the field, and equally accessible to him, was a remarkably full and reliable well of living water, out of which he might take as large a supply as he liked, and still it would seem to be as rich as ever. On the ground of his possessing this well, the man was much envied by his neighbours; for they said to themselves, that with such a spring within reach he needed not to fear the coming of the severest drought. He had always that at command whereby his field might be made fertile. But they might have saved themselves the trouble of casting an envious eye upon the ryot's riches, for, strange to say, he turned his back upon the well,—made no use of it,—never drew from it,—let its waters run to waste, while he spent his whole time and efforts in trying to tinker up the old tank, which experience had so often taught him could hold no water. The fact was, the man was mad. No sane man would have acted as he did; and the end of the story is, that the soil being never moistened, the crop failed, and the farmer and his family perished of hunger.

From this case—which I must frankly own is just a parable, for we could not conceive of such a thing happening in common life—we may learn how strangely foolish is the conduct of many men in matters of far higher importance. They are doing spiritually just what we have supposed this man to do in a natural way; they are forsaking God, the fountain of living water, and hewing out to themselves broken cisterns, that can hold no water; and the prophet, in view of such infatuation, and referring not merely to the stupidity but to the wickedness of it, says, “Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this, and be ye horribly afraid, for my people have committed two evils.” Let those who are guilty of this behaviour, trying to find in the world that soul satisfaction which can only be found in Christ, hear and give heed in time to the remonstrances of heavenly wisdom. “Wherefore do ye spend your money for that which is not bread, and your labour for that which satisfieth not? Hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness.”

THE PRAIRIE GRAVE.

THE summer flowers above her breast

Bud, bloom, and fade away;

The winter snow-flakes lightly rest

Upon that lifeless clay.

No heedless footstep may invade

That holy, hillside plot;

A rustic paling, rudely made,

Protects the lonely spot.

No father, mother, sister near,

Her prairie bed to share,

Or moisten with the falling tear

The wild-flowers growing there.

She sleeps in silence and alone—

No guardian angel seen;

For God's own hand hath sealed the stone,

Above that grave so green.

So shall she sweetly, safely sleep

Among the prairie flowers;

While we this grateful memory keep—

“One little bud is ours.”

HOW KNOX AND LUTHER PRAYED.

DURING the troublous times of Scotland, when the popish court and aristocracy were arming themselves to suppress the Reformation in that land, and the cause of Protestant Christianity was in eminent peril, late on a certain night John Knox was seen to leave his study, and to pass from the house down into an enclosure to the rear of it. He was followed by a friend; when after a few moments of silence, his voice was heard as if in prayer. In another moment the accents deepened into intelligible words, and the earnest petition went up from his struggling soul to heaven, “O Lord, give me Scotland, or I die!” Then a pause of hushed stillness, when again the petition broke forth, “O Lord, give me Scotland, or I die!” Once more all was voiceless and noiseless, when with a yet intense pathos, the three-repeated intercession struggled forth, “O Lord, give me Scotland, or I die!” And God gave him Scotland, in spite of Mary and her Cardinal Beaton; a land and a Church of noble Christian loyalty to Christ and his crown. How could it be otherwise?

So Luther, when Germany and the Reformation seemed to be lost, and human help was none; this was the prayer which that second Moses went and laid down at the foot of the eternal throne. “O God, Almighty God everlasting! how dreadful is this world! behold how its mouth opens to swallow me up, and how small is my faith in thee! If I am to depend upon any strength of the world, all is over. The knell is struck. Sentence is gone forth. O God! O God! O thou my God! help me against all the wisdom of the world. Thou shouldst do this. The work is not mine, but thine. I have no business here. The cause is thine, and it is righteous and everlasting. O Lord, help me. O faithful and unchangeable God! I lean not on man. My God, my God, dost thou not hear? My God, art thou no longer living? Nay, thou canst not die. Thou dost not hide thyself. Thou hast chosen me for this work. I know it. Therefore, O God, accomplish thine own will. Forsake me not for the sake of thy well beloved Son, Jesus Christ, my defence, my buckler, and my stronghold.”

But he had not done. Once more the tide of emotion and importunity burst forth, “Lord, where art thou? My God, where art thou? Come, I pray thee; I am ready. Behold me prepared to lay down my life for thy truth. For the cause is holy. It is thine own. I will not let thee go;—no, nor yet for all eternity! My soul is thine. Yes, I have thine own word to assure me of it. My soul belongs to thee, and will abide with thee for ever. Amen! O God, send help! Amen!”

The history of the salvation and sanctification of human souls hitherto is the history of such praying as this, in spirit, if not in these or any uttered words. Such holy earnestness and familiarity never offends the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who through him is the God of all grace and consolation.

"I WOULD—BUT YE WOULD NOT."

MATTHEW xxiii. 37; LUKE xix. 41.

'Tis evening, over Salem's towers a golden lustre gleams,
And lovingly and lingeringly the sun prolongs his beams;
He looks as on some work undone, for which the time has past;
So tender is his glance and mild, it seems to be his last.
But a brighter Sun is looking on, more earnest is his eye,
For thunder-clouds will veil him soon, and darken all the sky;
O'er Zion still he bends, as loth his presence to remove,
And on her walls there lingers yet the sunshine of his love.

'Tis Jesus—with an anguished heart, a parting glance he throws;
For mercy's day is sinned away, for a night of dreadful woes;
"Wouldst thou hadst known, e'en thou," he said, while down rolled many a tear,
"My words of peace, in this thy day; but now thine end is near;
Alas! for thee, Jerusalem, how cold thy heart to me!
How often in these arms of love, would I have gathered thee!
My sheltering wing had been thy shield, my love thy happy lot!
I would it had been thus with thee—I would, but ye would not."

He wept alone, and men passed on, the men whose sins he bore;
They saw the Man of Sorrows weep, they'd seen him weep before;
They asked not whom those tears were for, they asked not whence they flowed;
Those tears were for rebellious man; their source, the heart of God:
They fell upon this desert earth, like drops from heaven on high,
Struck from an ocean-tide of love that fills eternity.
With love and tenderness divine, those crystal cells o'er-flow;
'Tis God that weeps, through human eyes, for human guilt and woe.

That hour has fled; those tears are told; the agony is past;
The Lord has wept, the Lord has bled, but has not loved his last.
His eye of love is downward bent, still ranging to and fro,

Where'er in this wide wilderness there roams the child of woe;
Nor his alone,—the Three in One, who looked through Jesus' eye,
Could still the harps of angel bands, to hear the suppliant sigh;
And when the rebel chooses wrath, God mourns his hapless lot,
Deep breathing from his heart of love,—"I would, but ye would not." Anon.

TOO MANY SUCH.

A YOUNG girl, by family circumstances or some other peculiarity, had but few social opportunities. She fell into habits of excessive self-inspection, and a morbid sensitiveness to criticism. With good gifts, and refined tastes, and careful culture, she began to grow conscious of a kind of superiority to most of those about her. But the absence of lively sympathies fostered reserve and taciturnity, so that few found out or appreciated her real attainments. While her own standard of character was rising, others ceased to care what so indifferent and haughty a spirit might know or be. Presently a sense of injustice began to spring up in her. Each new acquirement only seemed to separate her more and more from her neighbours. Even her equals failed to appreciate the hidden merit. Gradually, as years went on, a silent resentment was kindled. Temper was a little soured. Speech grew sarcastic. Judgment grew bitter. She revenged herself for neglect, by withdrawing further and further from the world. Those of her own sex were alienated. And as to those of the other—to tell the truth, as you, young men will confess—they were a little frightened. Very few men value criticism enough to marry it. And so, every way, society loses, in the person of this fine, capable young woman, an ornament and a strength. Her existence forfeits its beauty, and misses the glorious charm of making others happy. A more unselfish beginning—a genuine love for making somebody good or wise—the oversight of a few poor children—anything that would have expanded the heart and turned self out of doors, would have made this whole treasury of talent and education a noble contribution to the living wealth of society.—*T. BURNING WITH PURE OIL.

It is related in the biography of one who lived to become a devoted Christian man, that while he was yet a little boy, the passage read from the Bible in the family on a certain occasion, was Exodus xxvii. 20, describing the oil used in the vessels of the tabernacle. The meaning and application of the verse was explained by other passages from the New Testament. This boy was then but five years old, and it was not supposed that he could understand or feel the slightest interest in a subject considered far beyond his age. The older children left the room after family worship, but the little boy was detained, as usual, to be taught some simple verses of the Bible by his mother, and to pray with her. He kneeled down at length to pray, and in the midst of his prayer, he paused, and exclaimed earnestly, "O my God, make me to burn this day with pure oil!"

The morning lesson had not been lost upon him; he had understood its import. "Most evidently," says his biographer, "was this prayer heard and answered throughout the day of his life."

How appropriate is this petition for the morning offering of every Christian: "Make me to burn this day with pure oil!" If He who hath all hearts in his keeping vouchsafe a gracious answer to that prayer, the example of the disciple must be one that will glorify the name of Jesus. Such a man will walk with God. No unhallowed fires will be lighted in his bosom. Neither revenge nor hate can burn there. The peace and joy of the believer will fill his soul.

And such a man will be found obeying, through the grace given him from above, the injunction of the Master, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

THE DEAD SEA.

I HAVE repeatedly gazed in silent thoughtfulness upon the leaden surface of the Sea of Sodom. In that deep basin, more than thirteen hundred feet below the level of the Mediterranean, slumber the bitter waters of what the Arab, with more force than appears in the English translation of his words, calls the "Sea of Death." It is all of that. Though it is every moment receiving large accessions from the Jordan and some other smaller streams, it has no outlet, and renders no account of itself. No living creature moves in its waters; no vegetable life appears on its shores. It is a still and awful scene of death—death everywhere—death unbroken by a single lingering sign of life; a picture of desolation never, never to be forgotten by one who, with his eyes fixed upon it, has seriously studied its impressive lessons.

But I have looked upon other scenes, fitly symbolized by the "Sea of Death," which have left on my mind a still deeper impression. We have, indeed, only to look abroad from any stand-point, and in any direction, to behold a sea which, though ever receiving countless and increasing streams from "the land of the living," has never as yet yielded up its dead. It has, to us, rendered no account. It has, to human view, no outlet. It is a dark, still, vast, unfathomable deep, over and around which lingers no indication of life. It is a "Dead Sea."

But the most sadly impressive scene of all is the Dead Sea of human character. How many thousands and millions there are who are "dead" while they have "a name to live!" Deep down in the warning depths of blighted and blasted moral existence, they give no signs of life. They have been constantly receiving the streams of God's providential mercies. Perhaps even the streams of salvation have poured their richer blessings upon them. The word of God, the invitations and entreaties, the promises and warnings of the gospel of Christ, and a thousand little rills of Christian influence have unceasingly come in contact with their moral nature. But, alas! they make no returns to God or man. They give no signs of life. All is desolation, stillness, death. Always receiving, never giving back! Not a word, not a deed, and, so far as appears, not a thought ever tells of that higher life which it is the blessed privilege of every one to live. They are a Sea of Death. How sad the picture! So far as probationers for eternity are concerned, how reckless! How far beneath God's benevolent designs and man's real interests and happiness! Oh, true it is—

"That man may last, but never live,
Who much receives, but nothing gives:
Whom none can love, whom none can thank,
Creation's blot, creation's blank."

THE PAINTED SHIP.

WHILE standing at the wharf of a quiet harbour, looking at the shipping which lay at anchor, we heard a young lady remark to a friend, "That nicely painted ship I would choose for a sail across the sea." He replied, "I would not, but prefer the dark old vessel near it. For that handsome ship is unsafe; her timbers are rotten. She has been newly painted."

Very suggestive, we thought, of practical truth. There are painted ships on all seas. Upon the waters of life they are gaily sailing to eternity with an inward decay which will yield to the storm that awaits every mortal mariner.

In the church, the formalist seems to himself and to others bound to the celestial shores; but alas, he is a painted ship, whose timbers are worthless, and will go down when the tempest comes. Out of the sacred fellowship of the saints, the moralist sails in a similar bark, with different colours only; and hopeless wreck is near.

How much of human existence, hope, and destiny, is represented in that painted ship! How little, by the unpretending and solid worth of the sailor's home, floating on the same tide!

But there comes to the ear no sound of the disaster: as the light forms of decay go down on the lee shore, despair; no shout of welcome and rapture, as the bark of infinitely precious freightage reach their desired haven, where the weary are at rest.

MISCELLANIES.

BY THE LATE MISS HELEN PLUMPTRE.

[A friend has kindly sent us, for insertion in the Family Treasury, the following extracts from unpublished letters of Miss Plumptre:—]

THE GOVERNMENT ON HIS SHOULDER.

1821.

HOW comforting, how quieting, it is to know that the government of every, the least event is laid on the shoulders of Immanuel! The most important events of time assume any real importance only as they are linked with eternity. These four words, "The time is short," stamp such vanity on things which we are too apt to pursue with eagerness! It is our mercy that the Lord has not engaged himself to supply all the wants of his blind, ignorant worms, but all their need, and that not sparingly, but according to his riches in glory, and who shall say what those riches are! How truly gracious have the dealings of the Lord been towards you all, in setting apart for, and leading your brother to, a shepherd so suited for you. He could have brought them together some months since, but faith and patience would have missed of being brightened, promises would have lost much of their preciousness, prayer would have been less importunate, and praise less fervent. His providences are indeed a wheel within a wheel, but how sweet to know, that the mainspring of the whole machine is love.

SECOND THOUGHTS.

For once, my beloved C——, and I fear it is a solitary instance, my actions have exceeded my professions, and you will be surprised at seeing a little tract on the Lord's supper by one who idly declined having anything to do with it. As you were the first and leading instrument of its being written, or of its making its appearance in public, I feel bound to present you with one, though I fear it is not at all the sort of thing you wished for. My conscience could not be easy after your request, and a faithful monitor within was continually whispering, How can you say you cannot do, what you have never tried to do? I trust he who spoke thus was pleased to assist me when I did make the attempt; may his blessing, which maketh rich, rest upon it. May we more and more aim, through his grace working in us, to obtain from the lips of him who knoweth all things, that sweet character, "She hath done what she could." I am still a traveller; I hope I am enabled to feel myself as such. I hope it is my desire to have my heart weaned from everything here, and firmly fixed on the only resting-place.

I have nothing to speak of but mercies; everlasting arms have been underneath me, and I hope I am encouraged to trust my most gracious God for every rough and trying path I may yet have to walk through; I know he will lead me by the right way to a city of HABITATION, and wherever and whenever it will be safe for me, he will give me a smooth path. I do see he does not afflict willingly. . . . From those we love too much proceed our sharpest griefs and pains,—

"For soon or late the heart must bleed,
That idols entertain."

But in the midst of judgment he has remembered mercy, and has shown me that his judgments are right, and that it is in very faithfulness he has caused me to be troubled.

THE BITTER MADE SWEET.

My thoughts have been much with you all of late, knowing as I do in my own poor experience, how busy memory is in opening nature's wounds afresh, and how often the days and weeks, in which we live over again as it were past days and weeks of anguish, have something of peculiar bitterness in them. But I believe I should not say the bitterness is in the days, but in an evil heart of unbelief which does not run so eagerly as it did in the time of real trial to Him who can make bitter things sweet, and from the proud idea that we can carry memory's burden ourselves, and need not so much to trouble our Lord with it. I have seen some of my beloved friends more cast down on the anniversary of the day of trial than they were on the very day. Oh, what moment is there that we can do without our God in all his precious offices and relations towards us! Our sweet child was just lent to us this time last year, and your loved sister was just removed from you; and now—what a wondrous account have we to give of both! They are together, and that—ever with the Lord! Well may we comfort one another with these words, but little, indeed, do we know what is contained in them. When he hides us in the cleft of the Rock, and shows us but the skirt of his glory, there is joy unspeakable. These dear ones are now beholding him face to face, while he is delighting in causing ALL his goodness to pass before them. With us he is too often as a stranger or as a way-faring man that turneth aside to tarry for a night—they EVER with him, without the possibility of a separation or even of losing sight of him again for the twinkling of an eye. Oh, if we loved them, how ought we to rejoice! My dearest sister felt much on the return of her little darling's natal day, but she seemed swallowed up in praise while contrasting the two birthdays of her beloved child. One entering a vale of tears; the other spent where sorrow and sighing are unknown. The Lord hath indeed done great things for us and ours. May everything that is within us bless his holy name! How sweet to remember that all which we admire in faithful ministers is but a little ray from the brightness of that glorious One whom we hope so soon to see; but a very faint shadow of the loveliness of Him whom we may call our Beloved and our Friend! What manner of people ought we to be with such a Father, Husband, Brother, and Friend!

The Lord bless you, my dearest; and grant unto you that you may be satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the Lord.

PRaise.

C. Rectory, Nov. 1, 1823.

We have now been here three weeks, and truly our cup has run over with loving-kindness and tender mercies, and I do trust we can in some measure say, "The Lord is the portion of our cup, the joy of our life, and the life of our joy." How sweet to reflect that when this is our joy, so far from wasting or passing away, it shall be increasing through eternity with the enlargement of the vessel into which it is poured; truly we are only empty, only poor in proportion as we seek supplies from other rills and other treasures. What! what is our heart when it looks for something better than its God? and is not this the language of all our wanderings from him? How wonderful is his faithfulness, that when we "forget our resting-place," he will not forget his, but will follow after us with mercies and judgments till he has brought us to say, "I will go and return to my first (rest), for then was it better with me than now." I sometimes feel as if we should want two eternities; one for the song of Moses, and another for the song of the Lamb. What endless songs of praise will not the opening of the way by which we have journeyed from Egypt, yea through Egypt, ere we knew anything of that Guide who was leading the blind by a way that they knew not, even into Canaan, call forth; again, what eternal halleluiah to redeeming love when the Lamb that was slain is revealed to us in the midst of the throne. Well, we shall not be straitened then by time, by corruption, nor by weariness. May our hearts be more and more enlarged as we journey thitherwards!

I can hardly tell you how happy we are here, though more shut out from fellow-travellers Zionwards than I should like, perhaps, always to be, not having the prospect of seeing or being seen by any one for many weeks; yet, for the present, it is very enjoyable, having plenty to do in our parish, besides much work for indoors. . . . I believe this sort of life is rather dangerous; we are apt to get self-willed, morose, self-opiniative, uncharitable, reserved, and shut up in the bowels of mercies and loving-kindnesses. I say we, but it is, probably, only the case with my own peculiarly vile self. At such a season, a sight of such a traveller as Mr. S— is a real blessing; then we see a largeness of heart,—a spending and being spent for the good of souls; but, especially a sight of S—'s Master, not pleasing himself, was stamped upon his every step through this wilderness. Oh that we may drink into his spirit!

EYES EVER TOWARD THE LORD.

December.

We deeply feel leaving the school, and for the many who are anxiously looking out for our weekly visits. But what is our love, what is our concern, compared with that of the Shepherd who laid down his life for the sheep, but a drop from that ocean he can and will provide; he will feed his flock that they shall lack nothing; he will carry the dear little lambs in his bosom. We have indeed stayed long enough in this place, if we dare to think that our God cannot do without us here. May he graciously forgive, and root out any unwillingness to remove our tent at his bidding! May I drink deeper into the true wisdom of committing my way unreservedly to the Lord, assured that he will wisely, graciously, and unerringly, order every step!

ON THE DEATH OF A LITTLE NIECE.

January 9, 1824.

Our very dear and affectionate friends at W— will be congratulating us upon the recovery of our much-loved child, nor would we check your congratulations. She is indeed recovered. Our own God has sent her perfect health, and a cure, and in tenderest mercy removed her to that blessed land where the inhabitants shall no more say, I am sick. After our medical advisers had told us last Monday that we might expect in two or three days to see her quite comfortable, our heavenly Physician began to whisper the same, only that as the heavens are higher than the earth, so his thoughts and his words seemed to be higher than theirs. He promised health, but it was to be where no sickness could again follow. He promised comfort, not in the arms of poor worms, but in his own most faithful tender bosom. That night croup again returned; on Tuesday she rallied; Wednesday, convulsions and croup once more committed awful ravages upon her lovely little frame; in the evening she appeared more comfortable, took much notice, slept, took food, &c., though I could not but observe to R— that the language of her dear eyes seemed to be, "Cease here longer to detain me." At midnight the Bridgroom came; she was sleeping in dearest F—'s arms, when she started up in another fit, held her breath for some time as usual, and as usual we expected it to return; but she was to struggle & more ; a strange stillness followed ; it was our time to weep, and hers to rejoice ; instead of breaking out again in her heart-rending cries, she was breaking forth with glorious halleluiahs. It was F——'s constant and earnest desire that if she was to be removed, the messenger might find her in her arms ; and her wish was granted in a marked manner, for until an hour before, the dear little sufferer had seldom or ever been out of mine, as I found dearest F—— and the nurse in much need of rest. And now we have two little lambs safely housed, and I hope I may say the Good Shepherd does fill our hearts with praise and thanksgiving that another band is burst off. May we walk more at liberty with the Son of God ! She no longer calls for our prayers, but truly she does call for our praises. Oh that we may be enabled to unite more and more with her in her everlasting employment. I need scarcely tell you how bountifully the parents are supported, for you well know the manner of their God, and what he is to his children in time of trial ; and we have such crowds of mercies to number up. To have our dearest R—— with us is such a comfort, and there are three little voices still left to cheer us ; but spiritual mercies, these are the rich, the countless mercies which make our hearts overflow, I trust, with gratitude and praise. A covenant God—how unspeakably precious ! to know in whom we have believed, and to be able to commit to his gracious keeping with such unreserved confidence one so dear to us. Yes, we could call upon you, and upon everything that hath breath, to praise our God.

MYSTERIES OF PROVIDENCE.

I do not half like your falling into that little bit of "cant" about that good man T. D——. "His troubles," you say, "are an unaccountable mystery of Providence." There is nothing more unreasonable than the talk of what are often called "mysteries of Providence," if by that be meant, that they leave us in any doubt whatever as to the equity and justice of the divine government. The sufferings and calamities which are often allowed to gather round excellent persons, are, in truth (as I will show you in five words), no mysteries at all ; certainly not half so much so as the prosperity of flaunting and triumphant wickedness. That there are great mysteries connected with the divine government I admit ;—so great, that no tool of reason, however fine its edge or hard its temper, can touch the adamant. Our only way of dealing with the objections thence derived, is by showing that there is yet stronger evidence for the existence of a supremely wise and intelligent Ruler of the universe, than for admitting the conclusion to which such invincible objections would lead us,—that there is no such Ruler at all. These difficulties can only be met obliquely, and by an ad absurdum argumentation. Such are the "origin of evil," and some of its consequences ; such the sufferings and death of the brute creation, and of innocent infancy. These problems, baffled reason in vain strives to solve, except in the way just mentioned ; and for any direct solution, remits us to the logic of faith and hope—not of syllogism or induction.

But what are ordinarily called "mysteries of Providence," and about which irreligious men, and sometimes religious men too, make such a hubbub, are none at all to me ; nor, I fancy, to you (if you reflect), in spite of that little bit of current "cant" for which I have ventured to rebuke you ; nay, I will dare to say, they can be no objection to any Theist in the world ; to none who profess to believe in a divine government of the universe at all. As to Atheists,—they need not surely wonder at anything ; nor, of course, can they blame anybody for anything that may befall them. They might, on their theory, as well "bay the moon," or chide the winds for howling, as profess to find anything unaccountable in blind chance or a blind necessity ; for of what, on any such hypothesis, can there be any account ? To them all must be "mystery ;" and perhaps the greatest mystery of all ought to be, that the world jogs on as well as it does ! But to Theists, I say such things as you mention are no mysteries ; and if you ask for my proof, it is this : that I have never met with the man, nor have you, nor has any one else that I ever heard of, who would deliberately lay his hand on his heart, and say, "The dispensations of God have been such to me, that not only I cannot see the goodness and mercy of them all,—which may well be,—but I deny the justice of them. I do not mean that I do not see the connection between this or that trouble and some immediately preceding conduct,—for this may also happen to anybody,—but I dare to say that, on the whole retrospect of my life, the conduct of God has been unjust to me ; that I have on the whole suffered more than I deserved." I repeat, I have never known any man who has been willing to say any such thing ; to affirm, "If I were admitted to plead my own cause with God, I would accuse him of having given me, on the entire balance of my life, more evil than I have merited." Now I say that, unless you can find such a man, there is, practically, an end of "mysteries" in the case. That no man, with even that self-partiality which is the characteristic of us all, will deliberately venture (I will except, if you like, half a dozen madmen in as many centuries) to accuse God of injustice, shows us that there is really no "mystery" in the matter ;—for where is the mystery, if, whatever the sufferings and calamities which befall us, each man for himself is ready to affirm, "I have received less of evil than I have deserved ?"

You may say, perhaps, "Yes, each man may say it for himself, but he finds it difficult to see it in the case of others." Exactly ; but that is the very source of the fallacy ; it is because we judge of others by the outside, and of ourselves by the inside ; of them, by our eyes—by the very little—for it is little—that each man knows of his fellows' interior and far more important history ; and of ourselves, from our consciousness.

This last alone must speak, and if it lets judgment go by default, by declining the challenge I have referred to (as in each man it does), it is sufficient to answer the objection of "mystery !" You see, in the present case, it is your friend Thomas D—— you are thinking of, and not yourself, when you express yourself thus half repiningly. For aught I can see, you suffered just as "unaccountable things" ten years ago, and I lately ; and yet you and I were not at all more disposed, for ourselves, to think our case "hard," as people say, than I daresay T. D—— is to judge his own so.

You will say, perhaps, "But is it not rather an uncharitable thing, when we see great and strangely accumulated calamities befalling any one, to suppose that there is some special concealed iniquity that calls for them ?" It would be, undoubtedly, most uncharitable thus to judge ; but neither is it necessary. It may be (and I doubt not often is), some concealed iniquity, of which the world suspected nothing (for such cases do often come to light), which is at the bottom of the matter ; but as the world knows nothing, the world should say nothing, no, nor even surmise anything ; there are plenty of other alternatives. It may be subtle evils, of which man, till better taught by discipline, thinks little, but which, in the estimate of God, may be of great moment, that require correction ; it may be spiritual, and not social or moral vices, which are thus chastized ; it may be, not flagrant acts, but habits of mind and feeling and temper, for which a man may not be thought much worse by his fellows, but which, unsubdued, may bar heaven's gates against him ; it may be religious apathy, ingratitude, thoughtlessness, which thus need rebuking ; the visitation may be not directly punitive at all, though not inequitable in relation to the man's entire conduct ; it may be designed as corrective of what is still evil in him, or as a means of developing nobler forms of good ; it may be for the mere pruning of a too florid and unfruitful virtue, which runs out into luxuriant foliage of talk and spiritual pride. But still, to return to my first assertion ; as the man himself does not accuse the justice of God, but avows that he believes his proceedings equitable, you, without forming any hypothesis of the special reasons for them, ought to have done with "mysteries." It is not uncharitable to the man to suppose there is no injustice, when he declares there is none ; and as it appears that each of us thinks the same in his own case, we are not uncharitable in thus adopting the man's own estimate of himself ; for it seems, we think no worse of him than we do of ourselves. Excuse this long "prelection," on an expression which I am sure, on reflection, you will see the impropriety of. To judge of God's proceedings towards anybody on earth besides ourselves (so long as the window in each man's breast remains shut), is just as wise as to criticize the sentence of a judge, without knowing anything of the law or the evidence, or to pronounce on the prescriptions of a physician, without knowing either his science or the symptoms of the patient.—Henry Rogers.

ALPHA.

BE Thou my Alpha ! other lords than Thee
Erewhile have ruled this sinful soul of mine,
But now I wholly turn to Thee and say,
Lord, I am thine.

Thou art my first, O Lord, my highest choice !
My will has yielded to thee, and found rest ;
By many a token sure thou teachest me,
I love thee best.

When evening clouds hang clustering round the sun,
And sad sweet memories make my heart their prey,
It swells again exultant at the thought
Of that great day.

When thou wilt come, with clouds that shall have caught
New and surpassing glories from thy light ;
The light that then shalt rise for evermore,
Nor sink in night.

And music in its mystery and power,
That erewhile would have steeped my heart in tears,
Now breathes a promise through its aching depths,
Of those bright years,

That are at thy right hand in joy's own home,
Where the eternal anthem never dies,
But ebbs and flows where music's hidden spring
In glory lies.

All nature that before seemed one deep dream
Of beauty steeped in sorrow, now doth ring
With earnest voices of expectant joy,
That call their King.

Oh, wounded but undying love, we feel
Thy veiled presence is amongst us here :
Unto the longing eyes that seek thee now,
Shine out more clear.

Rule me, my Lord, that love may be confirmed
By glad obedience, and by service due ;
Let me be pliant underneath thy hand,
Meek, docile, true.

CHILDREN'S TREASURY.

"ONE LITTLE EWE LAMB."

2 SAM. xii. 3.

BY THE REV. JAMES BOLTON.

THE parable of which these words are a part is very short and simple; but it broke David's heart, and has smitten many a hard heart since. In this it is like Moses' rod, which was a small and feeble thing in itself, but its stroke shattered the flinty rock and brought out living water.

Here is the whole parable, just as David heard it from the lips of the prophet Nathan:—

"There were two men in one city; the one rich, and the other poor. The rich man had exceeding many flocks and herds; but the poor man had nothing save one little ewe lamb, which he had bought and nourished up: and it grew up together with him, and with his children; it did eat of his own meat, and drank of his own cup, and lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter.

"And there came a traveller unto the rich man, and he spared to take of his own flock and of his own herd, to dress for the wayfaring man that was come unto him; but took the poor man's lamb, and dressed it for the man that was come to him."

You feel indignant at this, and so did David. "He was greatly angered against the man; and he said to Nathan, As the Lord liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die: and he shall restore the lamb fourfold, because he did this thing, and because he had no pity." But Nathan said to him, "Thou art the man!" The "poor man" was Uriah the Hittite, a noble soldier in David's army, now besieging Rabbah. His "one little ewe lamb" was Uriah's beloved and beautiful wife, Bathsheba. David would have Bathsheba;—"he took the poor man's lamb," and contrived to have Uriah slain in battle, that he might keep her for his own.

He deeply repented of these dreadful sins, as the 51st Psalm shows us. We may say that he was never again the same shining "son of Jesse." God forgave him, but he told him that the sword should never depart from his house; and in the sorrows and shame which his own sons caused him, he learned the guilt and bitterness of touching that "poor man's one little ewe lamb."

Now, a lamb—any lamb, whether on the lawn with a blue ribbon round its neck, or sporting at large with its companions on the downs—is a lesson. How much more, then, may we gather instruction from a lamb set before us in a sacred story as this "one little ewe lamb" is.

As we study it, does it not remind us of four things?

I. How tenderly we should treat dumb animals.

II. How tenderly God deals with us.

III. How tenderly we should respect the happiness of others.

IV. How tenderly God loves Jesus.

I. How tenderly we should treat dumb animals.

This one little ewe lamb was "nourished up" by the poor man; "it grew up together with him, and with his children; it did eat of his own meat, and drank of his own cup, and lay in his bosom, and was to him as a daughter." That is not to be taken too literally, or it would justify all the absurd fondling of pet dogs and cats, which so sickens sensible people.—I have seen them helped from the hot joint at table, carried about by pages, put to bed on an eider-down cushion; and that when there were starving, shivering infants by the score within a stone's throw!

But, apart from these extravagances, there undoubtedly is the duty of attending to the reasonable wants of God's creatures, and checking everything approaching to cruelty to them. They are lent us for our use, and not for our abuse. We have to kill them for market, or when (as in the case of flies and snails and mice) they would multiply to our injury; but even this can be done without brutality. And our care for those which serve us, should be in the spirit of this "poor man's" for his lamb. A famous military commander always ordered any trooper whom he saw kicking his horse, to be dismounted for a month, and to trudge on foot; and he said that, if the man was strong enough, he would have the horse ride on his shoulders, instead of his riding on the horse's back. What shall we say of those who have birds in cages, or rabbits in hutches, and neglect to feed them? What shall we say of those who delight in tormenting frogs, or flogging donkeys? God cannot pass by such crimes against those who have no voice to cry, and no court to seek redress in.—He will be their avenger! Life is a sacred thing—it is God's mark of ownership; and if we put it into harness for our gain, we undertake to nourish and cherish it.—God will look to us to do so.

So then, if you buy dumb animals for your amusement, or if you have them in charge for others, be sure that you are faithful in this stewardship. Do to them as you would yourself be done by, if you and they exchanged places. This is a pretty safe rule.—It will allow you to do what is necessary to break them off bad habits, but it will ensure your treating them tenderly. What sight is pleasanter than a pony hurrying across a field to have his nose rubbed by a hand which never struck him, or a Newfoundland joyfully welcoming home his young master, who would not hurt a hair of his skin?

II. We are reminded here how tenderly God deals with us.

How different it might have been with this lamb! It might have been an orphan and an outcast from its birth, doomed to wander in the cold and rain. But it had a friend raised up for it, who "nourished" it, and shared his meals with it, and was as pitiful to it as if it had been his own daughter.

Now, who could have found fault if God had so arranged it as that when we were born sinful of sinful parents, we should have had to suffer a thousand hardships. But how is it? He has provided that we should have every comfort. We are unable to do anything for ourselves in our babyhood, but there is the mother's sweet unfathomable affection waiting for us, and the father's strong arm, the softest cradle and the warmest clothes. As we advance, there are suitable fruits for us, suitable books, suitable plays.—We really enjoy ourselves! God has thus feathered our nest; God has prepared these blue heavens for our eyes, and these warbling robins for our ears, and these roses for our noses; and he has prepared our eyes, and ears, and noses for them. Let us trace these gracious gifts to him and praise him for them! They are his "nourishing us up," they are our "eating of his own meat, and drinking of his own cup, and lying in his bosom!" An old woman was seen saying, "Bless the Lord, O my soul," over her dry loaf.—The tears were running down her cheeks, "Why do you weep?" "Because God is so good to me; I have a meal when thousands haven't a mouthful."

If you should ever be lost, as boys and girls have been, in woods or on mountains, and there have nobody to speak to you, no couch or pillow, no shelter from storms and wild beasts, no refreshment but berries and acorns, then you will understand better than you can now how tenderly God has dealt with you.

We deserve to perish, but he directs that we shall be nursed as if we were princes! Each of us—so to say, is in an ark of bulrushes, exposed to the crocodiles, floating to destruction,—but no! there is a sister set to watch us; there is a royal lady sent to discover and adopt us—I mean God at once surrounds us with kind providences. We are unconscious of it; but when we wake up to it in after years, our song should be, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me?"

III. We are reminded how tenderly we should respect the happiness of others.

This "poor man" had his lamb stolen from him and slain for a stranger's supper.—The rich man, though he had exceeding many flocks and herds, yet envied him that "one little ewe lamb," and could not rest till he had it.

God scatters his favours amongst us.—You have this, I have that, our neighbour has another. This is his plan, that we each may have something to thank him for, and each recollect that we are to a certain extent dependent on each other. But we are silly; we are apt to despise our own and to long for other's things; or we are grasping, and we long to have more; or we are vain, and we long to have others consider us superior to ourselves. We peep over the hedge, and there is the "one little ewe lamb" which we should so like to have—it is the whitest, plumpest, tamest in the world! And then we plot to get it, and then Satan urges us on. But there are two solid gates between us and it, "Thou shalt not covet,"—"Thou shalt not steal." If we burst or leap the first, there is still the second, "Thou shalt not steal." Can we dare to burst or leap that?

Especially, God is jealous of the few possessions of the labourer and the cottager. He will defend them as with his shield. I knew a boy who robbed a widow of the fowls which paid her weekly rent. He confessed that from that night forward he had had nothing but trouble! There was a lad who picked a blind pensioner's pocket, as he hobbled on his stick across Chelsea Bridge; he was pursued, and suddenly tumbled down in a fit which upset his reason! A middle aged person once called on me, and said, "When I was a maid in a lodging-house, I stole a sum of money from my mistress's drawer. She could not afford to lose a farthing, for in the winter she was often obliged to do without breakfast, to let me have a bit. What a wretch I was, and what grief it has cost me! If I could find her out, I would willingly fall on my knees before her: from that hour to this, God has had a controversy with me, and I have been miserable!" Rely upon it that God, who gave the "poor man" his "one little ewe lamb, will punish those who would deprive him of it. We must be grateful for our own "flocks and herds," and rejoice in others' prosperity, and tenderly respect their happiness.

IV. We are reminded how tenderly God loved Jesus.

He was his Lamb—his "one" Lamb. From eternity he had "lain in his bosom!" From eternity he had "eaten of his own meat, and drank of his own cup;" for he was precious to God, and God withheld nothing from him! We can have but a faint idea of this. How far short of it was Abraham's ardent attachment to Isaac, or Hannah's to Samuel, or Mary's to Jesus as her son after the flesh. We have heard wailings over the grave of an only child, and we thought we should never forget those glimpses of the height and depth of human love! There was a touching sketch in an American illustrated paper lately,—a Quaker matron bidding her "Reuben" farewell for the war. He is in his accoutrements; but they are locked in each other's embrace, and amidst her sobbings she is saying,—

"Reuben, thy country asks for thee. Go! And if—! but she can't bring out that "if."

All these are shadows of God's tender love for Jesus. And yet, when we had broken God's law, and were under condemnation, he spared not his one Lamb! He delivered him up for us to the humiliations of Bethlehem, Nazareth, Gethsemane, Calvary! "Go (he said), they need a Saviour, and you have offered, and you can do it; but it must be by obedience and blood-shedding. I must hide my face from you. I must be silent whilst you are scorned and spit upon, mocked, and crucified." When I would measure God's regard for me, and the reality of his desire for my restoration to his smiles, I contemplate his tender love to Jesus, and say to myself,—He laid that divine Lamb on the altar for my redemption!

In conclusion, seek to be God's "little ewe lamb,"—seek to "eat of his meat, and drink of his cup, and lay on his bosom." You may, if you yield yourself to him as "bought" for him by Christ; and if you yield yourself to him to be "nourished up" by his Spirit.

"See Israel's gentle Shepherd stands,
With all engaging charms;
Hark how he calls the tender lambs,
And folds them in his arms.

Permit them to approach, he cries,
Nor scorn their humble name;
For 'twas to save such souls as these,
The Lord of angels came."

BLACK LAKE.

"O FATHER!" cried little Will Brown, suddenly resting from his weary toil over the rough lava. "Do you see those great white clouds rising from the ground? I do believe we are almost there."

"I think you are right," replied his father; "and in another half hour we shall stand by the famous Geysers."

Willie's eyes sparkled. "I have thought about them so much," said he; "but I never dreamed when I was studying Iceland in my old geography last winter, that I should be here so soon. How very kind you are to take me!"

"Oh, you know I couldn't live without you, Will," said Mr. Brown, looking down with sad tenderness upon the fair-haired, motherless boy. "You're a capital little travelling companion."

"Yes, I'll say that for him," exclaimed one of the guides; "I expected the children would be a great trouble, but I haven't heard a whimper. He's a brave traveller."

Will looked up with a proud smile, and continued his conversation with his father.

"But I wouldn't live here for a kingdom, father, though there are so many strange things to see. It seems as if something terrible was always going on under the ground, and as if any time all Iceland might blow right up in the air like a great rocket. I'm sure last night I heard a very strange noise, and the ground shook as if some one had told it a terrible secret, and it was all in a tremble about it."

Mr. Brown smiled. "Oh, I think Iceland is safe for to-day, Will. You know the people say it is the very 'best land the sun shines upon,' and don't you think God is able to preserve it amidst every peril?"

"Yes, father, I do believe God takes care of this country, for," continued he, a look of awe marking his expressive face, "I read in my Bible this morning, 'He toucheth the hills, and they smoke,' and I could not help thinking that he must have touched Iceland very often."

Before his father could reply, a strange, but intelligent-looking boy, three or four years older than Will, stood before them, as suddenly as if he had risen out of the ground. The guides spoke angrily to him, but the boy walked fearlessly up to Mr. Brown, the foremost of the party.

"Mads Jagel," said he, pointing to himself, by way of introduction; and then, in very broken English, he offered his services in showing up the great steam-fountains.

"Don't have anything to do with him, sir," said the guides, impatiently. "He's a bad, ill-tempered boy, and will make mischief if he joins us;" but Mads looked so imploringly, that Will began to plead in his favour with such good success, that at last Mr. Brown said, "Well, let the lad go with us. He certainly needs help, poor fellow, and I will gladly pay him whatever he earns."

With a grateful look at Mr. Brown, and an equally vivid glance of triumph at the discomfited guides, ragged little Mads journeyed on by the side of Willie.

Before long, the whole party stood in wonder and awe before the mysterious Geysers; and as the ground shook and moaned, and suddenly sent forth a column of steam, more than a hundred feet high, Will, trembling, grasped his father's hand, and wondered if it was anything like the strange pillar of cloud that used to go before the children of Israel.

But Mads was particularly lively, when they came to the fountain called Stroke, or the Churn. It was very quiet when they first arrived, and did not seem disposed to offer any salute. But Mads bustled about, with a very knowing look, gathering quantities of moss and stones, which he threw into the tunnel. Immediately there was a loud trembling, as if the old churn were in a great passion at the insult, and soon a grand column rose in the air, throwing out all the rubbish in high indignation.

Will could not help clapping his hands with a shrill "hurrah!" although there was something quite frightful in the demonstration, and Mads fairly rolled on the ground in ecstasies of delight.

The next morning, as the travellers continued their journey, at Will's earnest request Mads and his dog Skal accompanied them. The country was very desolate, with here and there a tree no larger than a lilac bush, but Mads and Will enlivened the way with a conversation helped out by a variety of expressive gestures. Mads was full of the wonders of Iceland, and he told Will many queer stories, not altogether true, how "under the terrible mountain of Hecla, the evil spirits lived, and sometimes when they quarrelled, great streams of fire rushed from their mouths, and rolled over everything, burning up houses and people, and sometimes drinking up a whole river."

Will's eyes grew large as he listened to these wonderful stories, but soon he saw for himself something stranger than he had ever dreamed in his worst nightmares. They were just upon the edge of a precipice, and looking over, they saw at its base five or six great caldrons of some thick black fluid, boiling and steaming away with a terrible noise.

"What is it?" cried Will, clasping his father's hand, and turning quite pale.

"It is boiling mud, sir," said one of the guides; "and if any one falls in there, he will never come out again."

Just then, Skal, who had been gambolling about Will's feet, stepped upon a loose stone, which rolled, and before any one could help him, the poor dog had tumbled over the precipice with a fearful howl of terror. Down, down he fell into one of the horrible pits, and as Will bent over, he could just see the hot, black paste closing over his bushy tail. With a cry of horror, he buried his face in his hands, but a sharp clutch upon his arm made him look up to see Mads, with two eyes burning like fire in the midst of his white face.

"You did it," gasped he, looking fiercely at Will. "You kill my Skal!"

"No, indeed," cried Will; "he put his foot on a stone—so, and rolled over."

"You kick him," said Mads, slowly. "You wish see him die in mud. I forget—never!"

With streaming eyes, and looks of the most profound sympathy, poor Will explained the occurrence again and again, but Mads still walked in sullen silence.

Towards night, however, Mads grew more cheerful, and as the travellers halted earlier than usual, he proposed to Will that they should take a short walk before dark, as he had something very curious to show him. Will felt some reluctance, but not liking to refuse Mads, when he was just returning to good humour, he at length set out with him, promising his father soon to return.

On they went over the desolate country, Mads entertaining Will with wild old legends about the curious island, till, before he was aware, he was all alone with Mads in the wildest, strangest place he ever saw.

"Where are we?" he asked in sudden alarm. "Let us go home, Mads, I don't care to see anything curious to-night."

"Almost there," said Mads. "Hark, it calls you."

"What?" asked Will, with a failing heart, as he heard a dull, steady roar. "Is it a bear?"

"Oh, no!" said Mads with an unpleasant laugh. "Here we are," and dragging him forward, he saw lying, ten or fifteen feet beneath him, another of those terrible pits of mud. He shrank back with a cry of terror, while Mads clutched his arm and dragged him again to the edge.

"See big pond—Black Lake—no bottom;" and Willie saw that it was very large, and boiling furiously; while in the centre rose a black column several feet in height.

"I don't like Black Lake at all, Mads. Do let's go home."

"You never go home," said Mads, with burning eyes.

"What do you mean?" asked Will faintly.

"I love Skal very much. You kill him, I kill you," responded Mads savagely.

"Oh, you cannot mean it! You are in fun, dear, dear Mads. You know I didn't kill poor Skal. It is a joke; isn't it, Mads?"

Mads grimly shook his head.

Poor Will looked over the dreary country, half visible in the twilight. Over all the barren rocks and fields of lava, there was no human being in sight, and he was alone on the brink of this horrible lake with Mads' strong clutch on his arm. It must be a dream. Why couldn't he wake? and he rubbed his eyes and looked around piteously; but alas! it was no dream, and Mads was still watching him with those fiery eyes.

"Mads," cried Will, with a sudden hope, "I will buy five, six, twelve dogs, beautiful dogs, with long ears as soft as silk."

"There is no more Skal," said Mads briefly.

Will took out his little purse and offered the contents. Mads threw it contemptuously into the bubbling lake.

"Then I must surely die?" Mads nodded.

"O Mads! how can you be so wicked? You cannot, cannot mean it;" but Mads rose as if to throw him in.

An agonizing scream burst from Will's lips, while Mads laughed contemptuously.

"Oh, if I must die," cried poor Will, "kill me with your knife, Mads, dear Mads, but do not throw me into that horrible hot mud!"

But Mads replied, "No; Skal die in mud,—you die too."

"Wait a minute, then," said little Will, the cold drops gathering on his forehead. "I must pray first."

"Black spirit won't hear," said Mads.

"But God will."

"What God?" asked Mads quickly, "are you Christian?"

"I hope so," said Will humbly.

"Pray then," said Mads more gently, for he had heard something of religion from the many travellers. "Christian's God is great spirit."

Then little Will fell upon his knees, and began his simple prayer.

"O God, I have been very wicked, but do try and forgive me for Jesus' sake, and, O God," he sobbed, "do try and save me, for I am so afraid of that dreadful mud, and I am such a little boy."

"Enough," said Mads, shaking his shoulder.

"One minute more, dear Mads!"

"One minute," said Mads, walking away.

"And, O God, comfort my dearest father. Don't let him think I ran away. Forgive Mads, dear Saviour, and give him a new heart. Oh!" continued poor Will, a new hope springing up in his heart, "give it to him this moment, just now, if it's possible—"

A wild cry interrupted him, and looking up, he could see nothing of Mads. With shaking limbs he hastened to the edge of the precipice, and there, having made an uncertain step in the dim light, Mads had fallen a few feet, and finding it impossible to clamber up the smooth side, was hanging on desperately to a little twig.

"You are safe," whispered a voice. "Now let the wicked boy fall into the pit himself."

It was but a moment, and from Will's generous heart arose the fervent prayer, "Lead us not into temptation." Then, with eager hands, he unbound his long stout woollen tippet, and fastening one end to a tough little shrub, dropped the other over to Mads. Oh, joy! he could just reach it, and came clambering up like a young squirrel. As his head appeared above the top, poor Will fell fainting upon the ground, while the angels continued the prayer, "But deliver him from evil." Mads stole up to him with a wondering, reverential expression, and lifting him in his arms, carried him tenderly home.

Will was sick for many days, while Mads never left his side. At last, when he was again able to speak, Mads said suddenly one day with downcast eyes,—

"Why save Mads? Why not let Mads die? Is it Christian?"

Will smiled and nodded.

"Tell me," said Mads vehemently, turning to hide his tears. "It is good. I be Christian too." And Will, day after day, as he grew better, told Mads the beautiful story of the Cross, and taught him how to pray.

Before Will left Iceland, poor Mads hoped that he, too, was a Christian, and he always carefully carried in his bosom Will's little Bible, which, although he could not read a word of it, he regarded as his most precious treasure.

Will is now safe at home, but whenever, with a shudder, he thinks of Black Lake, he never forgets to give thanks that God, who is everywhere, walked even upon those desolate shores, and heard his broken prayers for life and poor little Mads' soul. —Congregationalist.

BERTIE LESTER'S TEMPTATION.

ONE bright moonlight night, after little Bertie Lester had folded his hands and repeated his evening prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep," &c., he begged the privilege of sitting upon my lap. As I twined his dark, lustrous hair round my finger, he said thoughtfully, "O auntie, do tell me of my dear papa and mamma!"

I then repeated to him the same old tale, which never diminished in interest, to the little fellow. I told him of his father's noble, generous heart. How he had conquered many difficulties, but was unable to overcome death—that dark-winged spirit who stands ever ready to strike the blow at the Master's bidding. Of her—the devoted bride—who like the broken flower, was insensible to sunlight or storm; how her lip quivered as she gazed upon the helpless one who lay upon her knee; how the tears would then start into her soft, blue eyes, and with a deep sigh, she would clasp the unconscious child to her heart, and exclaim, "For him I must live!"

"But, auntie, she did die, and leave Bertie alone?" said the little motherless boy.

"Yes, dear Bertie, God saw fit to take her to himself, before she had seen one year pass over your head," was my reply.

"Why did God do so, auntie?" repeated the child, with a troubled glance.

"Our heavenly Father does many things which we cannot comprehend. Yet I am certain it was for the best."

"Yet, dear auntie, it does not seem right," continued little Bertie.

"Is it not something, my boy, that he has given you such kind grandparents?"

"And such a kind auntie!" interrupted the dear boy. I smiled at his words of love, and placing him in his little bed I left him.

Bertie's mother was a very dear sister. Her death rendered the orphan very near and dear to us. We daily sought to fill Bertie's mind with incidents in his mother's life, and with her dying words. Bertie Lester was an impulsive boy. He was naturally proud at heart, and head-strong, with a way and will of his own. Love must be his ruler, but sometimes that would have no effect. But there was always one talisman that would never fail to soften his heart in times of rebellion; this was his reverence for his departed mother.

I remember well one bright morning, when Bertie's grandmother fastened his cap under his chin, and bade him start for school. With a loving kiss he left her, determined to obey. But before he reached the school-house, he met several boys of his own age, who urged him to go with them to a neighbouring pond, on a fishing expedition.

"No, Charlie, I am upon my way to school, and I must not loiter; but I will go afterwards, if grandpa will allow me," said Bertie.

"Pshaw! come now, Bertie! for you can't catch fish after school ; we will have lots of fun. Come on !" continued Charlie. Bertie still refused, until the rough voice of Sam Peet exclaimed, "You are a coward ! Before I'd be tied to any one's apron-strings !"

Sarcasm is a bitter draught for any one. But our Bertie was always stung to the quick by ridicule, and instead of avoiding the rude and unkind boys, he yielded out of fear. He was too proud to show his dependence upon his aged grandparents, and off he went with his unprincipled companions. At first they had a merry time, but when noon approached, they grew hungry, and it was proposed by one to climb the fence near by, and take some of the water-melons that lay upon the ground. Lots were cast as to who should commit the depredation ; poor Bertie was doomed to be the unfortunate one. "You are going to play the coward again, I see !" said Sam, in a tantalizing tone ; "you would like to sneak out of it, I presume !" Angry emotions commenced to swell in Bertie's heart. But in his pride he kept them back, and boldly said, "I am no coward !" And hastening to the fence, he sprang upon it. But he hesitated a moment before jumping into the field. He looked back at the boys, "Go on, you baby !" cried Sam. But instead of obeying the rude boy, he leaped from the fence, and came towards his companions, amidst their cries of "Coward !" &c.

Advancing in front of the boys, Bertie assumed a calm countenance, but presently the tears commenced to trickle down his cheeks, and in a choked voice, he said, "Sam, I never stole, and what is more, I never will. I tell you, I won't do it."

"I know you never did, for you didn't dare to ! Afraid of your grandfather, eh ?" replied Sam sneeringly.

"No, Sam, I am not ; but, boys, as sure as I stand here, something dreadful would happen to me, if I stepped into that field."

"Nonsense ! All baby-talk ! If we could go there, you certainly could."

"But, Sam, you have all mothers at home !" inquired Bertie.

"Yes, but what has that got to do about our going into the field ?"

"A good deal," replied the orphan firmly. "My mother lies in the churchyard by the side of the field of water-melons, and I know, if she could speak, she would be too grieved even to chide me. I can almost fancy that I can see her sad looks."

"Nonsense ! How could she know if you took them ?" said Sam.

But Bertie did not answer him, and when the boys started for the field, he fled homeward. He was sadly out of breath when he entered my room. Throwing down his hat, he laid his head upon my lap, and commenced to weep. I spoke not, for I knew that he was excited, and I waited for his words, which I knew would soon come. I was not wrong, for in a few minutes he said, "Auntie, do you think God knows everything that takes place, no matter how little ?"

"Yes, dear child ; not a thing has taken place since the creation of this beautiful world, but he has knowledge of."

"But do you really believe that he notices that which a little boy does ?"

"Yes, I am certain. But why do you ask me, dear Bertie ?"

I saw that the boy was too proud to reveal his secret at that time ; so I laid by my sewing, and took him upon my knee. For a time we conversed upon other subjects. Presently, with a broken voice, he told me of his temptations, and how he overcame that of stealing.

"O auntie dear ! I am so glad that I got away from those boys !"

"So am I ; and you should be very thankful, Bertie dear, that God gave you strength to overcome and resist their cowardly taunts."

"How grieved grandma will be, when she knows that I've been truant again !" exclaimed Bertie, sorrowfully.

"Yes, she will be ; but my dear boy, shall I give you some advice, and show you how you can lessen her pain ?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied the boy, looking bright again.

"If I were in your place, I should go to grandma, and show her that you are sorry, and promise amendment for the future."

"Oh, I hate to tell to any one but you, dear auntie !" said Bertie.

"Why, Bertie ! can you not confide in your dear grandma ? Only think what she does for you, and what she is now doing for her little grandson ! Do you not love her ?" I inquired.

"Love her ! you know I do, and that is the reason that I dislike to tell her of my being so truant," replied Bertie.

Our conversation was interrupted by the jingle of grandma's little tea-bell. After kissing the chubby face of my little nephew, we both started for the dining-room. After tea, Bertie followed his grandma into her room, and related to her the incidents of the day. It is needless to say that Bertie was quickly forgiven.

RICH BOTH WAYS.

My seat in a large assembly one day, was so near to a father and his little girl, that I overheard some of the conversation before the exercises commenced. She was a bright-looking, curly-haired child, and was evidently much interested in all about her. "O papa !" I heard her say, "there's Carrie Morton ;" and as her eyes sparkled with delight, I knew that Carrie must be one of her dearest little friends. "Oh, she's so good !" she continued with much enthusiasm, "she's rich both ways."

What could the child mean ? I felt interested to know, especially when I found her father was in doubt concerning the particular kind of riches she had in mind as belonging to Carrie, and I listened for the answer when he asked, "How is that, Katie; 'rich both ways?'"

"Why, yes, papa. She has real nice clothes, so she's rich one way; and she's real good and kind, so she's rich another way, and isn't that both ways?" Her father smiled, and so did I; but the exercises of the day began and the conversation ended.

I have, among my dear young friends, some who are poor, if their wealth were counted in money; some who are comfortably well off, as we say, having an abundance of the necessities and even many of the luxuries of life; and some who are rich, whose fathers own costly houses, elegantly furnished, who can ride in a carriage when they will, and whose clothes are very fine. And since I overheard Katie's talk about Carrie Morton, I have thought it would be well to remind all these dear children that although none of them may be "rich both ways," except those who have a great deal of money, yet they all may be rich in one way. Can you tell how?

Did you ever hear of any one being rich in faith, hope, and love? Carrie Morton was rich in kind words and acts, else her little friend would not have spoken of her as she did; and I hope she was also rich in that love of Jesus which makes the poorest child richer than a king with millions, if gold is his all.

Would you not much rather be poor in money, and rich in the love of those about you, and most of all in the love of God, than rich in money but poor in all the rest? Dear children, if God has given you a home in which everything is elegant and costly, and where your every wish is gratified, remember that your accountability is great for such a home and with such friends, and ask him to make you rich both ways; and if you are not rich in fine clothes and money, remember that a meek and quiet spirit and a loving Christian heart, are ornaments more precious than diamonds and pearls, for while the diamonds and pearls of this world must be left here at last to perish, these you may wear in heaven. Remember, that with Christ's help you can become a sunbeam, a source of joy in your home, wherever it may be, and you can be all the time laying up treasures in that brighter home, where your heavenly Father will keep them safely till he calls you to enjoy them with him for ever.

DAVID BRAINERD.

DAVID was the name of a little boy born in Haddam, Connecticut, many years ago. He was the third child of a large family of brothers and sisters, whose parents both died before David was fourteen. The family were then scattered. It is a sad thing to be an orphan, and grow up without a father's care or mother's love. But God took care of David, and adopted him into his happy family.

When only eight years old, this little boy began to seek after God. He did not at first find him. He did not quite know the way, and therefore it often looked dark, and he was greatly troubled; but God had sent his Son to be the little boy's Saviour, and the Holy Spirit to make him humble and willing to follow him. How happy was David when he found God! He loved to go out into the woods and praise and pray to him, and sometimes the trees and grass seemed to shine with God's love.

David worked on a farm. As he grew older, he wanted to go to college and become a preacher of the gospel. His friends were willing he should, and he entered Yale College, at New Haven. After staying three years, poor David was expelled. What, did he become bad? you ask. No, no. In his room one day he said some hasty thing about one of the officers of the college, which an ill-natured person reported. It gave great offence, and was the occasion of his leaving college; but it left no serious blot upon his character. Still it was a great trial to David, and drew him closer and closer to his heavenly Friend. "Oh," he said, "one hour with God infinitely exceeds all other delights and pleasures."

There were a great many Indians at that time all around the white settlements. Western New York was all forest and red men. The western part of Pennsylvania also was a wilderness, filled with Indian tribes, for as yet none of the western states were born. The poor Indians were "without God in the world," and David pitied their lost and wretched condition. "Without God!" The young man knew how delightful it was to be with God, and he could conceive how awful it must be to be without him. He longed to go and tell them of the good God who made them, and sent his Son to redeem them from their sins and lead poor sinners into heavenly ways.

This desire in his heart soon found an outlet. A missionary society in England wanted to send the gospel to the savages, for there was no such society in America then, and it sent word to some ministers in New York to choose a young man to go. They immediately chose David Brainerd. "Will you go," they asked, "and tell the poor Indians about Jesus Christ?" When the offer was made, he went away with two or three Christian friends and prayed; "and indeed it was a sweet season to me," he said. Then he answered, "Yes, I will go;" and so he became a missionary, and made his preparations accordingly.

He must have an interpreter, for he could not speak Indian; and an intelligent young Indian was found, named John Wauwaumpequunnant. There were no roads through the immense forests, and they had to make their way as best they could, on horseback, over high mountains, through deep valleys, fording streams, and cutting their way through woods howling with wild beasts. In travelling from village to village, and wigwam to wigwam, sometimes they lost their course, and were overtaken by furious storms. A bundle of straw was the young man's bed; boiled corn and hasty pudding his chief food. And so he went and preached all about the forks of the Delaware and Susquehanna rivers, in danger, in sickness, and in want often. But his labour was not in vain. God wonderfully blessed the preaching of the white man to the poor red man, and many, many turned from their wicked heathen ways to Christ. Sometimes whole companies melted into tears at the sweet story of the Son of God, and would cry out, each one for himself, "Guttummaukalummeh; guttummaukalummeh—Have mercy on me; have mercy on me." "Wechaumeh kmeleh Nolah; wechaumeh kmeleh Nolah—Give me a new heart; give me a new heart." A great many found the dear and precious Saviour. "Me heart glad," they said. "Jesus Christ do what he please with me." "How can me live in dis wicked world? Me 'fraid sin more. Oh, dear Jesus, let me come to you." Numbers professed Christ, and led happy Christian lives.

The young missionary spent two years on this field. When he went to it there was no voice of prayer, no tear of penitence, over all this wild heathen wilderness. When he left, it was dotted with the sweet blossoms of holy hopes, and almost every wigwam was a place of prayer.

At the end of two years David left, and visited the white settlements to recruit his failing health. He visited Boston, and stopped in Northampton, at the house of President Edwards, where he died at the early age of twenty-nine. "My heart is sweetly set on God," he said. "I long to be with him, and see his glory." This was in the autumn of 1747, more than a hundred years ago. Proud men at the time might have said, "What a waste of life! the young man has not lived to do any thing." And I have brought this instance before you to show you what the true gold of life is, that is, what gives lasting worth to any man's character or labours. It is having God in them. Without God, they will both perish; with God, they have a life long and blessed as God himself. And David's short career shines to-day with a brighter light than when it seemed to set in a little chamber in Northampton a century ago. "The poor young missionary is dead," they said. Ah no. He lives still, preaching on earth the blessedness of God's redeeming love, and enjoying it to the full in heaven. I hope you will get his whole history and read it.

THE STOLEN MONEY.

ABOUT a year ago a heavy robbery was committed on the night train between New York and Boston. A safe containing fifty thousand dollars, belonging to Adam's and Company's express, was pitched out of the baggage-car in a by-place on the route, and found the next day rifled of its contents. Who did it? The conductor? No. He was a tried man. The baggage-master? No. He was a tried man. Engineers, firemen, brakemen? No; that was impossible. Everybody on the train was above suspicion. Who then? Who? There was a "who" somewhere, and five thousand dollars' reward was offered to bring him to light. Weeks and months passed away, and no robber or robbers were discovered. Was the plan so skilfully laid as to be beyond detection? Were they enjoying the fruits of their ill-gotten gains with none to molest or make them afraid?

In every large city there is a body of men called "detectives," whose business is to ferret out criminals. Put a detective officer on the track of a crime, and he will trace the prints of guilt where we should least expect to see them, and track the guilty man from haunt to haunt, from city to city, and sometimes even to the other side of the globe.

The railroad company gave the facts of the robbery to a detective officer. The officer conned them over and over, and at last fixed on the baggage-master as likely to have had a hand in it; but he kept his thoughts to himself, and detailed five of his men to go on his track and watch him. Two were sent to Boston, where he lived, two to New York, and one on his train. The instant the baggage-master stepped off the car at Boston, the two detectives had him in their eye, kept him in their eye, following him everywhere, except into his own house, until he left in the train for New York. The detective on the train then took him, and when he reached New York, two met him there, following him to all his haunts, finding out all his associates, and knowing all he did. This part of the business is called "shadowing," and the officers are called "shadows." No honest man has anything to fear from such inspection. You may look him through, and he's all right. But a guilty man, under such circumstances, might well be afraid of his "shadow." The baggage-master once or twice suspected eyes were upon him. A guilty conscience put it into his head. But he did not know until in the course of several months—for it takes time and patience—the detectives unravelled the plot, pointed the baggage-master out to the law as the robber, and told who his accomplices were. He was arrested, found guilty, and sentenced to the state's prison, ruined in character, ruined in prospects, bringing grief and shame to his family and friends.

Ah, how did all this ruin begin? It began in coveting that gold—wishing for other people's money; and it ended in the state's prison.

The Bible says, "Covetousness is idolatry," and idolatry is serving some other god than the Lord. Covetous persons put money in the place of God. They think it more than they think of God, they love it more than they love God, and trust it more than they trust God. So that coveting directly breaks the first commandment, which says, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," as well as the tenth. The tenth, you remember, says "Thou shalt not covet." It leads also to breaking the eighth, "Thou shalt not steal;" and the ninth, "Thou shalt not bear false witness;" for stealing almost invariably leads to lying.

You see that coveting is a sin which has a great many branches to it, and they are covered with rank, bitter fruit. Indeed, a great deal of the crime and misery of the world may be traced to it. You see also why the apostles rank it among the most deadly sins. "Let it not be once named among you as becometh saints," wrote St. Paul in one of his letters or epistles. A covetous spirit as much keeps one out of heaven as a wicked life. "No covetous man hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. v. 5).—Child's Paper.

WILLIE'S VISIT TO THE ANT-HILL.

A few days since my little nephew Willie and I had a pleasant walk along the shores of Loch Katrine. The sun was very hot indeed, and we were glad when the path turned into a shady wood, where we walked for a time under the weeping birch's drooping branches, and listened to the constant patter of the shining round leaves of the quivering aspen.

Presently we observed crossing the path quite a large party of red wood ants, and when we looked a little more closely, we saw that one part of the stream was ascending the wooded bank, whilst another part was hastening in the opposite direction. All seemed so busy, as if they had such a deal to do, and no time to lose in doing it. All those who were proceeding up hill, were carrying some booty with them, whilst the others were empty handed, or rather empty mouthed, and apparently on the look-out for prey. Up hill, therefore, we looked for the ants' nest, and we had no difficulty in finding it. It was, I think, one of the largest I have ever seen, as high as a man's knee, and broad in proportion. When we went near enough to see it well, the whole surface seemed boiling with ants. Oh, how busy they were! Some were dragging up great green caterpillars, five or six times as big as themselves; others had flies, or worms, or beetles, which they seemed to carry with ease up the surface of the hill, and into some of the numerous holes which led into the interior. Others were hastening out, having deposited their burden, and setting off without losing a moment, to find something more, to bring home to the stores of the commonwealth.

I can tell you, I felt pretty much ashamed of myself, when I looked on all these tiny little creatures doing what their hand found to do with all their might, and remembered how often I wasted my time, and dawdled over my work, and did what I did anything but heartily. I thought it was no wonder Solomon sent the sluggard to take a lesson from the ant. Do you remember what he says? Can you repeat it? Willie couldn't, but he was going to learn it. "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways and be wise; which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest;" and again he speaks of them as one of the "four things which are little upon the earth, but they are exceeding wise. The ants are a people not strong, but they prepare their meat in the summer." It is quite true they have no king, no overseer, nor master, and yet each ant is as diligent in its business, and as careful to do its duty, as if it had to give in an account, and be paid or punished for what it had done. And what is more, I can tell you the ants not only work when they do work, but they also play with all their might. It seems that they are very merry little creatures. A gentleman who wrote a history of ants, and took a great interest in them, says, that often when he went to examine the ant-hills at times when he supposed they would be resting, he found them amusing themselves in some warm, cosy part of it. Sometimes they seemed to have wrestling matches, and played with one another as young dogs or kittens often do, tumbling each other over and over, and biting playfully, riding on each other's backs, or (what they are very fond of doing), taking a friend up in their formidable-looking jaws, and carrying it from one place to another. Often, he says, he thought they took peculiar pleasure in tormenting some lazy fellow that seemed inclined to lie and bask in the sun,—they gave such a one no peace till they stirred it up to take part with the rest in their sports.

I am very glad to know that the ants play themselves. I am sure when they do they will enjoy themselves very much, for it is always those who are busiest and most diligent when they ought to work who have most pleasure when it is time to play. What do you think, children? I am quite sure Willie often doesn't enjoy either his lessons or playtime, just because he idles away his time at both. Sometimes he sits with his book before him, not thinking in the very least about the lesson he ought to be learning, but if one could only look into his mind, I think there would be seen the minnows swimming about in the river, or the squirrel with its bushy tail peeping down from the branch of the fir-tree, or even, I am a little ashamed to suspect, the paper of bon-bons in his mamma's drawer. So the consequence is, that he cannot say his lessons, and gets into disgrace, and grieves his mamma, and saddens his own little heart, and when playtime comes he does not care nearly so much to go down to the river side, as he thought he would have done. And then, you know, what is worst in all this, he has been disobeying and displeasing God. God says, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might;" and be "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord;" "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord." God is our overseer, God is our ruler, and to him we must give an account of all we do, and of all the time he gives us. Oh, should we not be diligent and busy as the ants are, and if possible far more so.

There are a great many more lessons we may learn from the ant, but I think I have said nearly enough at present. Just one more I will tell you as shortly as I can. Ants are very kind to one another. They show this in a great many ways. If one ant meets another belonging to the same ant-hill, who is carrying a burden that seems too heavy, immediately it offers its assistance, and even lays down its own load for the time. This is what you should do. Remember the verse which says, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." Indeed, I often think that children like to make each other's burdens heavier. I have seen one little sister laughing at and tormenting another who was in any difficulty or disgrace, instead of trying to help her to get out of it. Look at the considerate and obliging ants, and be ashamed of yourselves. Again, when an ant finds something very good, and too big to be borne off bodily to the hill, it doesn't enjoy it all to itself, but immediately goes away and tells all the ants it meets about it, so that soon every particle of the booty is carried off. A lady had left a pot of preserves, in a place to which a solitary ant had obtained access, and in a very short time there was a double stream of ants busy at work carrying off the jam, nor did they cease till it was all gone. Do you remember the verse which says, "Freely ye have received, freely give;" and "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them?" How unlike those selfish, greedy children, who like to keep all they get to themselves, and sorely grudge when they are called on to part with anything to another.

And what is more, ants are very careful of one another, and watch over each other's welfare. They show this in many ways. I will just tell you one story in illustration. M. Huber, when studying the habits of ants, kept a number in an artificial ant hill, which he called a formicary. It was in glass, so that he could watch all their proceedings. The feet of the stand on which their house was placed, were set in water, to prevent the little creatures from straying. Often, however, they crept down the legs of the stand, till they were stopped by the water, when, being a thirsty race, they began to drink. On one occasion, whilst several individuals were so engaged, M. Huber shook the table, to see what they would do. In great alarm, they retreated back to the formicary, with the exception of one reckless fellow, who seemed determined to have his drink out at all hazards. One of the fugitives ventured back again, and seemed to remonstrate with the drinker. It tapped him, and shook him, and bit him, but with no other effect than to make the thirsty one turn round and make a grimace at his would-be friend. At last the latter, desperate, and unable to leave his brother exposed to danger, snatched him up in its mandibles, and bore him off in spite of his struggles, to a safer place.

Now are not you children sometimes of Cain's mind, who said, "Am I my brother's keeper?" You suffer sin upon him without a word of warning or help. You say, "It is none of my business," when you see him beginning to do wrong things, and yielding to temptation. How little trouble you give yourselves to save another from the danger of sinning! How little sorrow of heart you feel when he has fallen into sin, and is walking in the paths wherein destroyers go! "Of some have compassion, and others save with fear, pulling them out of the fire."—"Thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour, and not suffer sin upon him."—"Rivers of water run down mine eyes, because men keep not thy law."

Now I must stop telling you about the ants, and what they may teach us. There are very many interesting and curious things to learn about them. I think when the Lord formed them, and gave them their nature and peculiar habits and instincts, he meant to shadow forth in them in many respects what he meant his Church to be. At all events, like all his other works, the more we know about them, the more we shall see of his wondrous power and goodness.

"The whole works of the Lord our God
Are great above all measure.
Sought out they are of every one
Who doth therein take pleasure."

"Consider her ways, and be wise."

A. B. C.

THE ACORN.

"WHEN will my training begin?" said the acorn to itself, as it unfolded its delicately-carved cup and sat on the branch of an old oak on the edge of a forest. "I understand I am to be an oak one day, like my father. All the acorns say that is what we are to be, but there certainly seems little chance of it at present. I have been sitting here for no one knows how many days, and I feel no change, except that I look less pretty than I did when I was young and green, and begin to feel rather dry, and shrivelled, and old. At this rate, I do not see much chance of my becoming an oak, or anything else but an old, dry acorn. When will my training begin?"

As it meditated thus, a strong breeze sighed merrily through the autumn woods, and shook down many brown leaves from the old oak, and with them the acorn.

"This will hinder my progress again," thought the acorn, "for it is evident such a downfall as this can have nothing to do with my education. When will my training begin?"

A day or two afterwards a drove of hogs was turned into the forest, and they began grunting and grubbing among the dead leaves for acorns. Many of its brethren did our acorn see ruthlessly hurried into those voracious snouts. It kept very quiet under the dead leaves to avoid a similar fate, but it thought—"This is a sad delay. It is too plain that being trampled on and tossed about in this way can teach no one anything. When will my training begin?"

Meanwhile, the swine rummaged among the dead leaves, and trod them under foot, and tossed the decaying mould hither and thither with their snouts and feet, until one of them by accident rolled our acorn down a little hill, where it lay buried under some stray leaves many yards from the edge of the forest, in the outskirts of a park. There it lay unobserved all the rest of the winter. Even this was a pleasant change after having been tossed about and trodden under foot so long, but in its fall its shrivelled brown skin had cracked, and the acorn thought—"This is a sad disaster. How ever am I to grow into an oak when I am so crushed and cracked that scarcely any one would recognise me for an acorn? When will my training begin?"

All the winter the rain pattered on it, and sank it deeper and deeper under the dead leaves and under the earth-clouds, until all its acorn beauty was marred and crushed out of it, and it fell asleep in the dark, under the cold, damp earth; and the snows came and folded it in under their white, eider-down pillows. At last, the warm touch, that comes to all sleeping nature in the spring, came softly on it, and it awoke.

"What a pity," it said, "I should have lost so much time by falling asleep! I can scarcely make out what I am like, or where I am. What a sad waste of time! It is clear no one can go on with his education in sleep. When will my training begin?"

With these thoughts, it stretched out two little green things on each side of it, which felt like wings; and tried to peep out of its hole, and, to its delight, it succeeded, and, with a few more efforts, even contrived to keep its head steadily above ground, and look around it.

"There is my father, the old oak," it said. "He looks quite green again. But I am a long way off from him, and how very small and close to the ground! When shall I begin to be like him?"

But meantime it was very happy. It felt so full of life, although so small; and the sun shone so graciously on it, and all the showers and dews seemed so full of kindly desires to help and nourish it; and more and more little green leaves expanded from its sides, and more and more little busy roots shot down into the earth, and the leaves breathed and drank in the sunshine, and the roots were great chemists and cooks, and concocted a perpetual feast for it out of the earth and stones. But it thought sometimes, "This is all exceedingly pleasant, and I am very happy; but, of course, this is not education; it is only enjoying myself. When will my training begin?"

The next spring the early frosts had much more power over it in its detached, exposed situation than over the saplings in the shelter of the forest, and it saw the trees in the wood growing green, and tempting the song-birds beneath their leafy tents, whilst the sap still flowed feebly upward through its tiny cells, and its twigs and leaf-buds were still brown and hard.

"This must be a great hindrance to me," it thought—"this, no doubt, will retard my education considerably. What a pity I stand here so detached and unprotected. When will my training begin?"

But in the late spring came some days of black east wind and bitter frost, and it saw the more forward leaves in the wood turn pale and shrivel before they unfolded, and then fall off, nipped and lifeless, to join the old dead leaves of the past autumn, whilst its own little buds lay safe within their hard and glossy casings, protected by one enemy against a worse. And when the east wind and black frosts were gone, the little sapling shot up freely.

In that summer, and the next, and the next, it made great progress; but in the fourth autumn a great disappointment awaited it. The owner of the park in which it grew came by, and stood beside it, and said to his forester—"That sapling is worth preserving, it is vigorous and healthy; and, standing in this detached position, it will break the line of the wood, and look well from my house. We will watch it, and set a fence around it to guard it from the cattle. But it has thrown out a false leader. Take your knife and cut this straggling shoot away, and next year, I have no doubt, it will grow well."

Then the forester applied his knife carefully to the false leader, and cut it off. But the sapling, not having understood the master's words, nor observed with what care and design the knife was applied, felt wounded to the core.

"My best and strongest shoot," it sighed to itself. "It was a cruel cut. It will take me a long time to repair that loss. I am afraid it has lost me at least a year. When will my training begin?"

But the next year the master's words were fulfilled.

Thus years passed on. And slowly, twig by twig, and shoot by shoot, the sapling grew. Sunbeams expanded its leaves; rains nourished its roots; frosts, checking its early buds, hardened its wood; winds swaying it hither and thither, as if they were determined to level it, only rooted it more firmly. And year by year the top grew a little higher, and the wood a little firmer, and the trunk a little thicker, and the roots a little deeper; but so slowly, that summer by summer it said—

"This is very pleasant; but it is only breathing, and being happy. It certainly cannot be the discipline which forms the great oaks. When will my training begin?"

And autumn by autumn, as the sap flowed downward, and the buds ceased to expand, and the branches grew leafless and dry, it thought—

"This is a sad loss of time. Now I am falling into torpor again, and shall make not an inch of progress for six long months. When will my training begin?"

And winter by winter, as the winds bent it to and fro, and made its branches creak, and threatened its very existence, and the heavy snows sometimes broke its boughs—

"These are sore trials. I may be thankful if I barely struggle through them! In days like these existence is an effort, and endurance the utmost one can attain. When will my training begin?"

And in the spring, when the frosts nipped its finest buds—

"These little nips and checks are very annoying; but one must bear them patiently. They are certainly hindrances; and it is disheartening, when one does one's best, to be continually thrown back by these trifling checks. When will my training begin?"

But, one summer day, a little girl and an old man came and seated themselves under its shade. By this time it had seen some generations of men, and had learned something of human language.

The old man said: "I remember, when I was a very little boy, my grandfather telling me how, when he was young, he had marked this tree, then a mere sapling, and pruned it of a false shoot, which would have spoiled its beauty, and had it fenced and preserved. And now my little granddaughter and I sit under its shade! The fence has long since decayed; but it is not needed. The cattle come and lie under its shadow, as we do. It is a noble oak-tree now, and gives shelter instead of needing it."

Then the oak rustled above them; and the old man and the child thought it was a summer breeze stirring the branches. But in reality it was the oak laughing to itself, as it thought—

"Then I am really a tree! and, whilst I was wondering when my training would begin, it has been finished, and I am an oak after all!"

DISOBEDIENCE.

MRS. STEWART was in her garden, one bright Saturday afternoon, picking a bouquet of roses that filled the air with their rich perfume, when the gate was hurriedly opened and shut again, as little Bennie rushed up the walk, exclaiming, "O mother, may I go a fishing this afternoon? Please say yes! All the boys are going."

His mother pushed the damp hair back from his heated brow, and looked into his eager eyes as she said, "No, my dear; your brother is not here to go with you, and you know father thinks it is not safe for you to go to the pond alone."

The glad light died quickly out of Bennie's face, and the hot tears sprang to his eyes, but he knew from experience that when his mother said no, it was of no use to argue the question; so he turned away, and passed slowly around the house, into the orchard that stood beyond, and threw himself down upon the thick, green grass, under an old apple-tree, through whose leafy branches the sunbeams were merrily dancing.

All was calm and peaceful but Bennie's heart, and angry wicked thoughts came rushing through his mind, as he thought how his companions were enjoying themselves that pleasant afternoon. At length he rose from the ground, and making his way through the blossoming clover that waved in the breeze, he climbed up on the fence, and looked where he could see the blue water of the pond flashing in the sunlight through the distant trees.

A tempting spirit was busily whispering into Bennie's ears just then, and he yielded. He sprang lightly over the fence, with a guilty look toward the house, and went slowly down the road, leading to the pond, trying to silence his conscience, by saying to himself that he was not going fishing after all. When he came to the pond, he sat down on the steep bank for a few moments, and watched the boys all busy with their rods and lines, and then he went out a short distance upon a big log that lay in the water. He had been standing there but a short time when John Palmer, a rough village boy, and one whom Bennie knew to be a wicked boy, came along and said, "Get off from that log, Ben Stewart! I want to come there myself."

Had Bennie been in little better humour, he might have done as John wished, but as it was, he only said, "Shan't do it!" and stood still. John grew very angry, and coming to where Bennie stood, he took him by the collar and gave him such a rough jerk, that he fell from the log into the water. It was not deep, and he easily got out, but in what a condition! He was covered with mud and water from head to foot, his new jacket was torn, and his hat had floated so far away that he could not reach it. There was nothing to be done but to go home in that sad plight, and when he reached there, the grieved face of his mother was a still further punishment.

Bennie has concluded, since that day, that disobedience is poor business for a little boy to engage in, and he is very careful to obey his mother's commands in everything, so of course he meets with no more such sad mishaps.

EASY LESSONS.

A LITTLE boy was put into his father's study while his mamma went out. He was only three years old, and must keep very still, lest he worry papa. Papa must not be disturbed—oh no. The little boy must not talk—he must not touch things—he must mind his ps and qs, and be quiet—very quiet indeed, a good little boy.

But children are restless. They can't keep still—can they? The little boy crept about as softly as could be. "Hush!" Creep, creep, creep. Off came a table-cover, over went a footstool, rattle went the newspapers. Of course papa was disturbed. His little boy drove his ideas off, and the busy pen must needs stop. Did papa thunder out, "Be still?" Did he scold? Did he hit the little fellow, "Be off?" No. What did papa say? "Now you be my little dog," he said; "creep into your house there under the table, and lie quite still." That was a command there was no difficulty in obeying; and except an occasional bow-wow, there was perfect quietness. The little boy knew it was necessary to keep still, for a dog in a study, he knew, must keep still; and was not he a little dog?

This was an "easy lesson" in the hard book of self-restraint which a little boy could learn.—Child's Paper.

"SEEK, AND YE SHALL FIND."

THE ETHIOPIAN TREASURER.

(Concluded from p. 291.)

IT remains now that we should enumerate and apply the lessons which the experience of the Ethiopian Treasurer suggests.

1. Although you retire from the Lord's house, or the Lord's table, with the painful desire of one who is seeking, rather than the satisfaction of one who has found, it does not follow that you have come to the ordinances in vain. Even although you have not yet gotten the water that quenches thirst, if you have acquired the thirst that craves for water, you are therein and thereby blessed. Probably if one had met that Ethiopian before his interview with Philip, and asked him how he had sped at Jerusalem, he would have answered with a sigh, that his long journey had been labour lost. He had come all the way from Ethiopia seeking peace for his soul, and he was still seeking the same thing. All the solemnities of the Temple service, and all the discourses of Christ's disciples seemed to have been thrown away upon him. He was still poor and needy. He was still as empty as on the day when he left his home. Ah, that was God's way of blessing him, and he knew it not. The vessel was made utterly empty, that afterwards, when its lip should be inserted into the fulness of Christ, it might more surely and quickly draw its fill. The greater a soul's emptiness, the greater is its supply of divine grace, when at last the lip of faith fastens on Christ. The ordinances of the Lord's house may then be most precious to you, when they send you away sighing, and crying "My leanness."

2. He continued to search the Scriptures after he had departed from the public ordinances of worship at Jerusalem. This was at once a proof that he had already obtained benefit, and a means of obtaining more. Private study of the Scriptures and attendance on public ordinances act reciprocally on each other. Private study will send you with earnest desires to the public worship; and the public worship will send you back to private study. God hath joined those two, and no man should put them asunder. Neither exercise will thrive alone and apart. It is probable that while some faint knowledge of the Scriptures sent the Ethiopian treasurer to Jerusalem, the worship and ministry there sent him back to the word with tenfold intensity. His very complaint, that he had gotten nothing, showed that he had gotten much. We get no glimpse of the man on his northward journey, when he went to Jerusalem to worship; but I think if we had seen him in that Gaza desert going away, he would not have been so deeply immersed in the study of Isaiah as he was when Philip met him on his return.

3. When you search the Scriptures, search them for Christ. So did the Ethiopian, and he did not search in vain. The gospel according to Isaiah was the fullest gospel that ancient Israel knew, and the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah contained the clearest revelation of Christ that was made before his incarnation. To that spot of the Scripture, accordingly, the instincts of the new nature, already astir in his soul, guided the Ethiopian. The dead letter was not enough for him; he came, indeed, to the letter, but he was doing his best to open and lay aside its folds, that he might discover the Christ whom they at once concealed and revealed. Through the word he was feeling for Christ. They who so seek shall find. The Lord delights to make himself known to those who touch him in this way. Those who, like new-born babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, shall live and grow thereby.

Our Lord himself has given express and specific instructions on this very point. "Ye search the Scriptures"—for to take the verb as an imperative, and read the clause as a command, as our translators have done, is to miss more than half of its meaning—"Ye search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me. And ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life" (John v. 39, 40). These Jews did search the Scriptures: they scrupulously read their daily portion, and thought that therefore their eternal life was sure. They expected life from the mere manipulation of the letter,—so many chapters every day, and so many verses printed on their phylacteries, and bound round their bodies. While they thus sought in the dead husks for life, they neglected the true seed, and allowed it to slip unnoticed through their hands. These searchers of the Scriptures rejected Christ—"Ye will not come unto me;" and not finding Christ in the Scriptures, they will never find life there.

4. When you search for Christ in the Scriptures, search for Christ crucified there. The peculiarity of the portion of Scripture which the Ethiopian was reading when Philip joined his company, is the suffering and the sacrifice of the Messiah: "He was led as a lamb to the slaughter." Here is "deep calling unto deep." The deepest need of a human soul, when that soul is quickened by the Spirit, seeks the deepest provision of the Covenant. Conscious guilt in the awakened, seeks the blood of Christ that takes away sin. When the Lord took his disciples aside, and told them that he must give his life a sacrifice for sin, it was the devil in Peter that said, "Far be this from thee, Lord." And the same evil spirit still persuades many men that a kind, compassionate Christ, who will teach them and set a good example before them, will suffice, and that they do not need a crucified Christ. The offence of the cross has not yet ceased. The death of Christ for sin makes sin a fearful thing: those who are disposed to make light of sin, cannot afford to think of such a sacrifice to wash it away.

What is the meaning of those words, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you"? (John vi. 53.) The incarnation is not enough on Christ's part, and faith in his person as God and man is not enough on our part. Without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin. This is the grand central lesson of the Old Testament. Sacrifice for sin is the back-bone of Revelation from its commencement to its close. This awful truth was imprinted into the very being of the Church during its childhood. From Abel's sacrifice down to the passover which Jesus and his disciples celebrated in the upper room at Jerusalem, the blood of sacrifices continually flowed. Daily sacrifice; morning and evening sacrifice;—when the sun rose, warm blood was flowing from the victim; and, when he set in the west, red blood received and reflected his rays. Everything was sprinkled with blood. Expiation by blood was the very mould into which the people's minds were cast from youth to age. If that were a fancy of men, what a waste! but if that is the appointment of God, what a meaning! When Christ came, he set his seal to its truth. He accepted the sacrifices as figures of himself. The true Redeemer gave his life a ransom for many; and true disciples ever come to the blood of Christ. The dying of the Lord Jesus is the meat and drink of all living souls.

5. A man of Ethiopia sought and found Christ as his Saviour; therefore any one may. The place was distant, the people degraded. From certain proverbial phrases in the Scriptures we may gather that Ethiopia was recognised as the type of distance and degradation. Yet beams of light from heaven reached that distant land, and Christ found a temple within the swarthy breasts of its inhabitants. There is no respect of persons with God. No nation is excluded, and no class. Some of the finest specimens of the kind of faith that the Lord held up as a model—the little child faith—have been found among the African negroes of our own day. Those who are in station mean, and in talent obscure, have been often chosen and employed to confound the things that are mighty. Be of good cheer, all ye who, as to station, or talent, or opportunities, are little ones,—be of good cheer, little children, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.

6. In the wilderness this Ethiopian found that peace and joy in believing, which he had sought in vain at Jerusalem. All things are possible with God. Indeed, man's extremity often becomes his opportunity. To show his sovereignty, he frequently bestows his grace at an unlikely time, and in an unlikely place.

Many signal examples of this method occur in modern times. A youth has obtained a situation in India, civil or military, as the case may be. The cause of deepest grief in the hearts of his parents on the day of his departure is, that they know too well their son lives without God in the world. They are sad as they reflect that he has resisted all the opportunities he enjoyed at home; and sadder as they reflect that he is going to a place where evil will surround him, and perhaps even the sound of a Sabbath bell be never heard. A quarter of a century has passed. These parents both, or one of them, may in the interval have been called away from the earth. A gentleman appears in the village, whom none of the villagers have seen before. His hair is silvered, but his frame is vigorous, and his step firm. He has taken up his residence in the neighbourhood. He is not only a worshipper in the Sabbath assembly of the place, but a missionary, making Christ's love known to all whom he meets—young and old, rich and poor. Soon it begins to be whispered in the neighbourhood that this is a native of the parish returned from India with considerable wealth—rich in this world's goods, and richer in the grace of his Saviour. Further the murmur runs, this is the thoughtless, godless son of those Christian parents,—it was over him that they wept on the day of his departure, long, long ago. Bit by bit the whole history comes out. He had gone to India bent on being his own master, and enjoying the pleasures of sin; but there he had been subdued by the love of Christ, and he was now walking with his Redeemer in newness of life. The heathen land was indeed a wilderness; but in that wilderness God met the man, and made his heart new. He who sent Philip to meet the Ethiopian in the desert below Gaza, had a messenger ready to meet the Scottish youth on the distant plains of India. A brother officer who already was a disciple, or the occasional visit of a missionary, or the Bible that his mother packed among his goods;—any one of these may have been the immediate messenger; but the result was, that the youth who remained hardened and worldly in the midst of privileges at home, gave himself to the Lord in a distant and spiritually dark land.

Another young man who had abused similar privileges under his father's roof, was sent in early manhood, not to a distant country, but to a great central city in our own land. There, with none who knew or cared what course he might follow, he felt himself alone in a wilderness. There is no solitude equal to that of a great city. But in that solitude God's eyes watched the youth; and God's message reached his heart. He was lonely and weary. He was home-sick, and could not sit within the four walls of his lodging in the evening. He rushed out to the street. He went—here was his turning-point for time and eternity—he went to a prayer-meeting.

The praise song rising from many young warm hearts; the prayer for the tempt.d, the prodigal, the backslider; the chapter read, and the address that followed—all these together shut him up unto the faith. Similar sounds had formerly fallen upon his ear: but this time his heart was empty and weary; this time the word of truth became cold water to a thirsty soul. He found in the dreary wilderness the peace in believing which he had never attained at home.

7. Two lessons yet remain, but they constitute a pair, and should go together. The Ethiopian, when he found the Saviour, was joyful, and yet he went on his way; he went on his way, but he went on it rejoicing. Guided by the Spirit, he escaped the two snares that are laid for young converts, one on the right side and another on the left. He marched safely on the path between them. On the one hand, he did not think that to be a Christian implied a sad countenance and a sorrowful life; and on the other hand, he did not think that the service of Christ required the renouncing of his lawful calling.

By these two things disciples of Christ in our own day might make the testimony of their life much more telling in favour of the truth. Perhaps the two hardest things that the world says against living and earnest Christians are—that they have a gloomy temper, and neglect their work. The best service that believers can render to their Lord in the present day, is to remove all ground for these twin accusations of the adversary. Let us have a brighter joy, and do, each in his own station, a more faithful work than the accusers. The evidence which we live rather than speak will in due time tell, and its effects will appear. Christ will be honoured, and our neighbours won.

THE CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN.

PART V.

WHOEVER looks into the "Moravian Text-Book" (published from year to year), will find in the first page a list of "Memorial days," to be ever remembered by the Church on account of the events of which they are anniversaries. Most of these have reference to the history of the Renewed Church of the Brethren; and some of them may serve us as landmarks in the hasty glance we must now take over a wide and inviting field of retrospection.

The twelfth of May is marked as a double anniversary. On that day in 1724, the interesting and important services were held to which we have already alluded, in laying the foundation-stone of the Meeting Hall at Herrnhut, when the presence and blessing of the Lord was so deeply realized by the little community and their noble visitors; and the five exiles from Moravia, arriving at the very time, were impressed at once by the feeling that here their own wanderings should terminate. Four of these men afterwards held most important offices in the Church; the fifth was called to "come up higher," —dying, in 1729, in an Austrian prison, where he had been confined for attempting to bring the glad tidings to his benighted countrymen.

The same day, three years later, was again an important one. By this time the little colony had rapidly increased, not only by the arrival of more emigrants from Moravia, but by Christians from other quarters desiring to join them. Their numbers now amounted to several hundreds; and in the spring of 1827 various subjects of religious controversy began to be agitated among them in a distressing manner. Hitherto they had attended the ministry of Mr. Rothe, the Lutheran minister at Bertheldsdorf; but now the Moravians, and Christian David at their head, loudly expressed their dissatisfaction at the errors of doctrine and discipline which were gaining ground in the settlement; while Mr. Rothe, though a truly pious man, appears hardly to have acted with sufficient "meekness of wisdom," and greatly lost their confidence. Count Zinzendorf interposed, and after earnest inquiry and examination into the causes of dissension, succeeded, with the assistance of Mr. Rothe and others, in framing a set of rules, to be called the statutes of the congregation, and to form a code of laws for its members, founded on the old doctrine and discipline of the ancient Moravian Church. It was agreed that all who became inhabitants of Herrnhut should pledge themselves to observe these rules. On May 12th the congregation was called together. Count Zinzendorf addressed them in a discourse of three hours, and then read over the statutes, and requested all present to signify whether or not they were willing to agree to them. A spirit of love and harmony was poured from heaven upon the assembly, all disputes seemed forgotten, and the new agreement was adopted without one dissenting voice. Some days afterwards twelve brethren were chosen by lot to act as elders of the congregation, managing all its affairs; and the Count and Baron de Watteville appointed as wardens or superintendents.

We may remark in passing, as a coincidence, that on this same 12th May, 1749, the British House of Lords unanimously passed a bill in which the Brethren were acknowledged as an "ancient Protestant Episcopal Church," were allowed the right of preaching and forming settlements in all parts of the British empire, and protected from the necessity of taking oaths, or serving as jurors in criminal cases, to which, like the Quakers, they must have expressed conscientious objections.

The next marked day is August 13, of the same year, 1727. On that day the congregation of Herrnhut met at Bertheldsdorf, to celebrate the holy communion. There had been much prayer and "searchings of heart" beforehand, and in the ordinance such a blessed outpouring of the Spirit was experienced, that it was truly "a day to be much remembered." In singing one hymn—

"My soul before thee prostrate lies,
To thee, its source, my spirit flies," we are told that the sound of weeping almost drowned the music. "On the 12th May" (to quote from Crantz) "the dry bones were collected, and, by means of various useful regulations, were in the following days covered with sinews and skin; and on the 13th August, the Spirit of the Lord breathing upon them infused the vital principle, and prepared them for active service in the kingdom of God among Christians and heathens."

As in every time of revival throughout the whole Church of Christ, the duty and privilege of prayer, and its blessed results, was deeply impressed upon the Brethren at this interesting season. Soon after, on August 27, a proposal was made for an arrangement by which, during every hour of the day and night, two or more persons should be engaged in prayer and thanksgiving, with reference to the particular circumstances of the congregation. Seventy individuals came forward immediately to undertake this, and the twenty-four hours were divided among them. The day is still remembered as "the beginning of the hourly intercession."

Although this as an institution has now ceased, its spirit is still maintained. The writer of these pages, not long since, after a communion service in a small Moravian chapel in this country, heard a list read of several names, as being the brethren and sisters appointed "intercessors for the congregation" during the month then just begun. The effect was pleasing and impressive.

But notwithstanding all their experience of the grace of the Spirit during this memorable year (1727), it was still felt by the thoughtful members of the community that something was wanting to give stability to their constitution, in regard to Church government and discipline. Count Zinzendorf and his friends wished them to form a complete union with the Lutheran body; while the Moravian emigrants, and all the elders of the congregation, desired strictly to observe the regulations and customs of the ancient Church of their fathers. The subject was often and warmly discussed, till in 1731 both parties agreed that, in conformity with the old practice of the Brethren in all cases of difficulty, the question should be referred to the disposal of the Lord himself by lot. This was accordingly done in the most solemn manner. Two texts of Scripture were fixed upon, 1 Cor. ix. 21, and 2 Thess. ii. 15; and the latter being drawn, was accepted by all present as an intimation from heaven that they ought to adopt the old Moravian constitution, and consider themselves as the "Renewed Church of the Brethren." The firmness with which the emigrants opposed the wishes of their noble patron and protector, and the Christian spirit in which he finally yielded, are alike worthy of observation in this whole transaction.

Their next determination, agreeable to the course now adopted, was to choose a minister for themselves, and to seek a renewal of their old Episcopal constitution. The Bohemian line of bishops had terminated with Comenius, but in Poland the succession was still continued. To the venerable D. E. Jablousky, Count Zinzendorf now stated the case of the people in Herrnhut. He had been already watching with interest all their proceedings, and joyfully acknowledged them as genuine descendants of the ancient Moravian Church, expressing his willingness to confer ordination on any whom they considered qualified for it. David Nitschman, senior, having been duly elected, was accordingly consecrated at Berlin by the two Polish bishops, on March 13, 1735, as the first bishop of the Renewed Church.

The congregation at Herrnhut now increased in numbers and in grace, although not without some troubles of an external nature, into the details of which we need not enter. Let us look again, however, at the "Memorial days."

We find August 21 marked as the "First Mission of the Brethren to the Heathen in 1732;" and January 19, as "Mission among the Heathen in Greenland, 1733." Well may these days be held in lasting remembrance, for the events they recall, in their results, are now the most honourable distinction of our Moravian friends. In ancient times the Church of the Brethren, as we have seen, was eminently a suffering, witnessing Church; in her renewed state she is no less distinguished as a missionary one. The old devotedness and energy, no longer called for at the stake or the scaffold, has flowed into new channels of missionary enterprise. Nor has the promise failed, "Them that honour me I will honour. He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."

Almost as soon as the poor exiles had formed a peaceful home for themselves, they began to devise plans for serving their Lord, and extending his kingdom in other lands. As early as 1728 we read of their beginning to travel on missionary journeys through various parts of Europe, and considering how it would be possible to reach the far distant heathens. Count Zinzendorf, whose mind had been deeply impressed by the subject in early youth, encouraged these wishes, and expressed his confidence that the way to their fulfilment would soon be opened. Two young men, intimate friends,—Leonard Dober and Thomas Leupold,—felt a strong desire to go to the West Indies, and carry the glad tidings of gospel liberty to the unhappy negro slaves. They prayed and conversed together over the matter in private. One evening, when the labours of the day were ended, as they were walking with some companions, and singing hymns together, according to the pious custom at Herrnhut, they passed by the house of Count Zinzendorf. He came to the door along with a minister who was visiting him, and addressing the latter, said, "Sir, among these young men you see the future missionaries to the heathen in the West Indies, in Greenland, &c., &c." Dober and Leupold, greatly surprised, immediately wrote to the count, and disclosed their secret projects. He gave them every encouragement; and their letter, without names being given, was read in the congregation. They declared their readiness to lay down life itself, or to be sold to slavery, if they might thus gain even one soul for Christ. The reading of this letter determined two other youths, Matthew Stach and Frederick Boenisch, to offer themselves as missionaries in a very different field,—among the Esquimaux of Greenland. In both cases nothing was done rashly; the difficulties of their undertakings were plainly set before them; and considerable delay, and even opposition, intervened, before the “memorial days” on which they really began their journey of devoted, self-sacrificing Christian love.

But we must resist the temptation to continue the deeply-interesting narrative, leaving our readers to seek for it elsewhere. Sixty years before the Reformation by Luther, the ancient Church of the Brethren began its course as a Protestant Church, a faithful witness against the errors of Popery. And just about as many years before Carey and Thomas, the earliest Baptist missionaries, went forth to India, the Moravians of Herrnhut began those noble efforts which soon carried the gospel message alike to those “sitting in darkness” under tropical suns and amidst polar snows. The first Protestant Church may justly claim the honour of being the first missionary Church of modern days.

The Brethren first visited England in 1728, when a deputation was sent to confer with the English divines, and give an account of their own history, doctrine, and discipline. This was soon followed by the formation of congregations and settlements in England and Ireland. In the latter country, the celebrated John Cennick encountered severe opposition and persecution, from the deplorable state of religion and morality, but was enabled to triumph over all.

Most of our readers may have heard how the Wesleys, on their way to Georgia, in 1735, met with some Moravian missionaries, Bishop Nitschman among the number, and what spiritual blessing they derived from intercourse with them. On returning to England, John and Charles Wesley, at Oxford, became acquainted with the Moravian minister, Peter Boehler, and were still further enlightened, by his means, as to true faith and its fruits. A very interesting account of all this is given in the “Wesleyan Centenary, and the Life of Wesley.” Who can calculate the results of the pious German’s influence over these two brothers, in the good work they were permitted to do for their Lord?

But we must hasten forwards. In 1733, Count Zinzendorf, resigning his office at court, and all worldly honours, devoted himself to serve Christ in the ministry of the gospel; and on May 20th, 1737, was consecrated a bishop of the Church of the Brethren. A letter of congratulation was sent to him on the occasion by the Archbishop of Canterbury, addressed to the Right Rev. Count Nicholas Lewis, Bishop of the Moravian Church. We might easily fill many pages, did our limits permit, with the eventful history of this remarkable man. He was accused at the court of Saxony of giving illegal encouragement to emigration from Moravia, and had to suffer an exile of ten years, which he spent in promoting the interests of his beloved Church in distant lands, including visits to the West Indies and America. In 1749 he was recalled home, and full liberty of conscience allowed to the Brethren in Saxony. He continued with unwearied energy his labours of love, till, on May 9th, 1760, in his sixtieth year, he entered into the joy of his Lord. On his deathbed he was able to say, in regard to the subject of missions to the heathen, ever so near his heart, “I did not extend my hopes beyond seeing two or three first-fruits, and now we may number them by thousands of converts.”

We must add a few more facts relating to Christian David, whose history is probably less generally known than that of his noble contemporary. The humble Moravian carpenter, in latter days, was honoured to bear testimony for Christ before learned professors and crowned rulers, and to command the respect of all. We are told that at the court of Copenhagen “he went in and out as a friend,” and when called to appear for examination before the imperial council in Livonia, the commissioners inquired if he were the person spoken of as “the servant of the Lord,” and then ordered a chair to be placed for him as a mark of distinction. But his Christian simplicity and humility remained unaltered, and he was ever as ready to serve his great Master by the labour of his hands as by his preaching talents. He undertook three voyages to Greenland, in order to superintend the building of mission premises at the different stations there. For the same purpose, as well as for preaching, he visited North America. He made eleven journeys to Moravia, at the greatest personal risk, to awaken his countrymen to a sense of spiritual things, and help to bring out the remnant of the ancient Church. He was mortal, and therefore imperfect, and his impulsive zeal at times carried him beyond the limits of prudence; still Count Zinzendorf writes of him, “He laboured for souls beyond what words can tell, and though his uncommon method of proceeding often involved his brethren in difficulties, he followed his convictions faithfully, and of no persecution which arose on his account can it be said that the gain was not greater than the loss.” Another German writer (not one of the Brethren) calls him “an apostolic man, in as high a degree as we can form an idea of one.”

He died, after only a few days’ illness, on February 3, 1751, in his sixty-first year. The stranger who visits the romantic cemetery of Herrnhut reads on the first gravestone which meets his eye, “Christian David, the servant of the Lord.” Who would not wish for such an epitaph?

On the remaining history of the Moravian Church we must not attempt to enter. A few plain statistics, however, as to its present position, may be interesting.

We must distinguish between a Moravian settlement and an ordinary congregation. The former means a kind of colony, consisting entirely of members of their Church. Besides the family houses, there are the following public buildings,—a chapel and minister's dwelling, schools for boys and girls, an inn for travellers, and houses for the "single brethren," "single sisters," and widows, who having no family duties requiring their attention elsewhere, choose to live together in this way, but take no monastic vows of any kind. The inhabitants of the place all follow their various occupations on their own account, without anything like a community of goods, though the spirit of brotherly love and kindness is expected to be manifested by all.

There are several of such settlements in England, —Fulneck, Fairfield, Ockbrook, Tytherton; and that of Gracehill in Ireland.

The total number of stations in Great Britain and Ireland is 36, containing about 6000 members (children included).

On the continent of Europe there are 21 stations, mostly settlements, with between 6000 and 7000 members, and 2000 young people receiving instruction as pupils from other denominations.*

In the "Northern District" of America there are 24 stations, with above 6600 members; in the "Southern District" 9 stations, and about 1800 members.

In the missionary field the Brethren have 38 stations among the negroes in the West Indian islands; 11 in South America, and 4 in Central America, for the negroes or Indians there; 4 in North America for the Indian tribes; 4 for the Esquimaux on the coast of Labrador, and 4 on the coast of Greenland; 1 in Australia; and 1 in Thibet. The number under instruction, if not all real converts, is above 75,000. There are 307 missionaries (wives included), chiefly supplied by the German Churches, who, as we have seen, do not themselves number 7000 members. What other body of Christians have, in the same proportion, come "to the help of the Lord against the mighty?"

And now we must bring these brief sketches to a close. If the Christian reader has received from them any new information, or felt any new interest awakened, we trust it may lead him to active sympathy and more earnest prayer for the Church of the Brethren and her missions. She needs our prayers and our help. It cannot be denied, and her most faithful sons will readily acknowledge, that of late her state and progress have not been satisfactory. Various causes may partly account for this in our own country, but these should not hold good elsewhere. Not long since a Moravian minister said to the writer, "I often wonder what our Lord intends to do with us in the future. We are not going forward as we ought, in proportion with the other Churches of Christ. Has our Saviour no more work for us to do? or is some great and blessed time of revival at hand, when we shall 'renew our days as of old?'"

Let us hope and pray for such a time of refreshing, for our Moravian brethren and for ourselves. Then "all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity" would labour joyfully together in his service, and all the Churches would be "established in the faith, and increased in number daily."

We can hardly conclude better than by taking from the Brethren's Hymn-book a fine confession of faith, composed, we believe, by John Cennick, though it has been claimed for Charles Wesley. In 1744 the Wesleys and Moravians held a love-feast together at the Tabernacle, London, agreeing to differ on some points, but to unite in fighting the good fight of faith against the kingdom of darkness. Would that such evangelical alliances were more often repeated! They sung this hymn before separating:—

"The doctrine of our dying Lord,
The faith he on Mount Calvary sealed,
We sign, asserting every word
Which in the gospel is revealed,
As truth divine, and cursed are they
Who add thereto or take away.

We steadfastly this truth maintain,
That none are righteous,—no, not one;
That in the Lamb, for sinners slain,
We're justified by faith alone;
And all who in his name believe,
Christ and his righteousness receive.

Our works and merits we disclaim,
Opposing all self-righteousness;
Even our best actions we condemn
As ineffectual, and confess
Whoe'er thereon doth place his trust,
And not on Jesus, will be lost.

Christ is our Master, Lord, and God,
The fulness of the Three in One,
His life, death, righteousness, and blood,
Our faith's foundations are alone;
His Godhead and his death shall be
Our theme to all eternity.

On him we'll venture all we have,
Our lives, our all to him we owe,
None else is able us to save,
Nought but the Saviour will we know.
Thus we subscribe with heart and hand,
Resolved, through grace, thereby to stand.

This now with heaven's resplendent host
We echo through the Church of God;
Among the heathen make our boast
Of Christ and his atoning blood,
And loud, like many waters, join
In showing forth his love divine."

THE LIFE BATTLE.

BY REV. THEODORE L. CUYLER.

"So fight I," says Paul, "not as one that beateth the air. But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection." This is a phrase indicative of the sharpest, sternest efforts at self-mortification. As one who should say—I conquer my fleshly appetites by violent and reite-

* In connection with these stations should be mentioned what are called the Diaspora, or scattered flocks, calculated to number from 80,000 to 100,000 persons. These are numerous small congregations, all over Europe, unministered to by Moravian "labourers," but who, "owing to their national or ecclesiastical laws," cannot formally join the Church.

rated blows, and bring them into subjection. I lead my body along as a conquered captive. It is a beaten antagonist. My wicked, lustful nature is thus vanquished, "lest that by any means when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway."

Here is a tremendous warning to every one of us—a warning founded on our double danger—first from evil appetites of the body, and also from evil affections of the heart. Paul, the heroic apostle of Jesus, so felt his actual danger that he tells us that he bruised and beat down his sensual passions, lest having saved others he might himself be finally lost. In the phrase before us he especially refers to the bodily appetites. "I keep the body under."

Paul, like other men of energetic make and ardent temperament, was very probably tried with strong temptations to excesses of the passions, both physical and moral. He has not chosen to let us into all the secrets of his character. He knew nothing of the modern pseudoscience of phrenology; nor would he have been one whit the wiser if he had. He does not tell us how often he fell through the sore stress of his "destructiveness," or his "combativeness." Such jargon he leaves for modern empirics in the mysterious science of the mind.

But methinks I see the wrestlings of a stern and furious struggle between the holier and the baser natures of one of God's heroes in that profound and plaintive seventh chapter of the epistle to his Roman brethren. I seem to see a stout soldier of the cross, with uplifted arm, and swollen sinew, crying out, "Ἰνὸς ἑαυτοῦ στυγία ; I beat down my baser self ; I give no quarter to my lusts ; I strangle my appetites ; I vanquish my inner foes that God may make me stronger to vanquish his foes without me ; lest, having saved others, I, Paul, the converted blasphemer of Damascus, should only prove to be a pitiful wretch and castaway."

For Paul claimed no immunities from danger through his position. That a man is a professed minister of the Lord Jesus is no assurance that he may not be cast into hell. He has "like passions" with his fellow-men. The same ravening lusts that have decimated the bar and the senate-house have left their blood-prints on the pulpit stairs. Along the whole track of ministerial biography, there lie strewed, here and there, the bleaching bones of those unhappy victims who fell a prey to the spoiler. Paul, to be sure, never fell. To the last he kept his faith, and the integrity of a godly life. And the simple secret of this continence and this constancy I read in these brave words, "So fight I, not as one that beateth the air. I keep my body in subjection, lest that by any means when I have preached to others I myself should be a castaway."

Shall we restrict the scope of this life-battle to sensual appetites alone? Paul did not; he extended it to all the wicked propensities of his mental and his moral nature. The war which every Christian has to make must be universal and unsparing on the whole brood of interior passions. The sudden insurrections of anger—the malicious whisperings of green-eyed envy—the acid tongue of censoriousness—the clutchings of greedy covetousness—the restless cravings of unsanctified ambition—the subtle sophistries of deceit—the uprisings of bigotry and spiritual pride,—all these, and every other like them in the great rebel army of the heart, must be met with the same indiscriminate "war to the knife." He who would keep his conscience clean, and his life holy, must wage this life-battle without compromise, and without quarter.

I. Let us offer a few concise rules for the conduct of this spiritual life-battle. Our first counsel is—beware of the silent marches which the flesh will steal upon you. We are fearfully and wonderfully made; the combination of body and spirit is such that each one re-acts upon the other in a manner that is most direct and yet most mysterious. The encroachments of the "flesh" upon the spiritual nature are astonishingly quiet and insidious. The cravings of healthy appetite may gradually lead to the excesses of gluttony. Put a knife to your throat. Tampering with so-called innocent stimulants has sent many a professor of religion to the grave of the inebriate. The glass of wine has led to the glass of brandy; and the glass of brandy to perdition.

With all possibilities of self-indulgence come temptations. Luxury steals silent marches on Christians when prosperity brings within their reach a fine equipage, or high living, or splendid establishments. There is hardly a Christian in New York who lives when worth ten thousand dollars a-year just as he lived when hard toil gave him only one thousand or one hundred. Men change their habits gradually; not suddenly. A man may be converted in a moment. Backsliding is the process of months or of years. By degrees tipping grows into intemperance; by degrees the social evening entertainment prolongs itself into the midnight frivolities of the rout, the ball-room, and the play-house; by degrees a church-member exchanges the prayer-meeting for the opera. Beware of the silent marches of the enemy.

II. If you find that the contact of certain persons and places is dangerous to your weaknesses, then avoid those persons and places, cost what it may. If you feel the temptation of a wine-cup, then keep out of convivial company. If you have tendencies to run mad with over mirthfulness, then stay away from those circles in which you are tempted to turn the Christian into the harlequin. It is not every young Christian who can be trusted even to walk through certain streets in our great cities. A "besetting sin" may lurk in that very street.

A man's besetting sin is the one that jumps with his inclinations. Does he love ease? Then he always interprets those providences in his own favour that allow him to sit still, or to enjoy his rest. Does he love flattery and éclat? Then he imagines that he is working for God, when he is only working for human applause. Here is a dangerous foe; all the more so from its wearing the honest guise of a friend. Look out for selfishness. It is the "old Adam" lurking behind every hedge. Like Southern slavery, it will only keep the peace on condition of having its own way. If not, then its stiletto is unsheathed in a moment. It is a polite and plausible, but a godless spirit. Keep no league with it. A Christian is never safe unless he is continually collaring every evil passion of his nature, and forcing it into unconditional submission.

III. Finally, put on the whole armour of God, the shield of faith, the breast-plate of righteousness, and the sword of the Spirit. Leave no spot exposed. Ahab was wounded through the joints of the harness. In the heat of the conflict, look to Jesus, the Captain of your salvation; and never surrender. Toward the sunset of the long bloody day of Waterloo, when the surviving remnant of the old Imperial Guard were summoned to lay down their arms the scarred veterans of fifty victorious fights cried out, "The Old Guards can die; but they cannot surrender!"

"BE YE ALSO READY." *

MATT. XXIV. 44.

HENRY D— was a servant in a farmhouse on the outskirts of my parish, and as the church of the adjoining parish was nearer to his master's farm than my own, he always attended the services there. For this reason, and because he was a servant living in his master's house, I knew very little of him. He was a fine powerful young man. His life had been steady and regular. He had been an excellent servant, and was a great favourite with his master and mistress. He had excellent health; but inflammation seized him. He was ill six days, and now his soul is before God.

To-day is Monday. It was only on Friday morning that I heard of his illness, and of course before the day closed I visited him. On that day and on Saturday, he seemed to take very little interest in what I said to him. Oh that I had pressed the subject more, that I had been even more importunate with him! On Saturday there was some apprehension of danger, but I was requested not to tell him, as the medical man feared that it might have an unfavourable effect upon the disease. I remonstrated, but to no purpose; and I left a message that I hoped the medical man, who was expected that evening again, would tell him.

On Sunday I walked round to see him after my services, and found him better. There was hope that he would recover. There was a change also in his manner. He wished to know where the verses I had read to him were to be found; he joined heartily in the prayers I offered up; dwelt especially on one verse I had read, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new;" and heartily said "amen" to the petition that he might become such a new creature.

You will not wonder that I now dwell on these things. The end was close at hand, closer than I then thought; for this, of which I am speaking, was only yesterday, and I am writing in the early morning of Monday. I had intended to see him by nine o'clock to-day, but I was to see him before that time. This morning at early dawn I was awoke by a request to go and see poor Henry. I at once feared the worst. I arose, and in a very few moments was on my way to the farm. The village was quiet, its inhabitants for the most part being wrapped in slumber. The busy smith, the stroke of whose hammer early and late has often been a reproach to me, was not astir. The birds were awake and glad in the early March morning. What a walk it was! how solemn, how prayerful! How weak I felt and ignorant! how completely dependent upon God's Spirit!

Arrived at the house, all the usual signs of sickness and watching are apparent at once. Henry, I learn, is much worse; they are applying a blister, and I must wait a few moments. In the interval, I call in the master and the fellow-servant of the dying man, that we may pray for him. As we rise from our knees, Henry's uncle, who had arrived last night, enters the room; he has been trying, he says, to arrange about his temporal affairs, but can get no definite answer. He thinks that Henry will tell me his wishes. Will I try? I refuse. I have other matters, I say, more important to attend to. They have had all night to arrange about the few clothes, the watch, and arrears of wages; I may have only a few minutes to speak about the soul. Then I ask, Has any one told him his danger since the unfavourable change took place? Can it be believed, he has not yet been told? "O God, and he so near thy judgment!" I go up stairs; he knows me, and grasps my hand. Tenderly I tell him that he cannot live. My heart is full. I beseech him to give me all his attention. He takes some ice to cool his mouth, that he may better attend to me; and then he is "ready." Ready! with that poor weak body, with that fevered brain, with that wandering attention. Is this a condition in which to transact the business of eternity! But he is "ready." Every moment is precious. His mind may wander again directly.

"Henry," I remark to him, "I want you just to think of two things—your sin and your Saviour; put all else away except just those two things. Your sin great—in thought, word, and deed. Conscience will tell you. Try to recollect. You have been sinning since you knew right from wrong; you have forgotten God, refused his invitations, often transgressed against him; your sins in his sight cry against you for judgment; they are a fearful load, and will press you down to hell."

* From a Tract under this title just issued by the Religious Tract Society.

Here was a sermon, upon the receiving of which (humanly speaking) depended his soul's salvation; and yet it had to be compressed into two or three minutes, and this great truth of man's sin to be stated in a few broken words!

And then the Saviour ready to save him—dying to save the lost—willing to receive all who come to him—a perfect, all-powerful, loving Saviour, blotting out as a thick cloud transgressions. Oh, what a message is this to take to a dying man! What other message could suit such a one than that, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved?" (Acts xvi. 31).

How thankful we are at such times for the blessed truth of the salvation of the penitent thief—for the type of the brazen serpent—for those words, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool" (Isaiah i. 18). He repeats those words, and seems to grasp at them as suited to his case. He takes hold thankfully of the hymn, "Rock of ages, cleft for me," and repeats it after me. "Do you repent of your sins, Henry?" "I do." "Do you believe that Jesus takes your sins away?" "I do." Oh! how the minister's soul clings to a straw in such a case. My reason and experience confess these expressions at such a time to be but straws; and yet I cling to them. They are all that I have.

Then the poor fevered brain wanders again. He rises up, and then throws himself down upon his pillow, crying, "It is all darkness." Poor soul! What is it that is darkness? Is it that the windows of the body are growing dim and dark? Or is it that the soul is looking out upon the vast ocean of futurity, and can see nothing but thick darkness and a horrible tempest? Oh, how thick and murky dark it must be at such an hour to every soul that has not the eye of faith, to see Jesus, and the pearly gates of the heavenly Jerusalem to which he is conducting it! "It is all darkness," he cried, as he threw himself down on his pillow. He never stirred again.

By his side I sit, holding his hand in mine, speaking to him though he does not answer, pointing out the way to that poor blind soul,—knowing not what the soul is about, or what consciousness there still may be, but still pointing to Christ, the only refuge, seeking to show the way which is so narrow, and to make it plain and easy, if I may, to this poor soul, after whom the avenger of blood is fast pressing. Is the soul hasting? Does it see the way? Is it faintly pressing on? Is it received within the refuge? Is it safe? Is it acting faith on Christ now, while the body is too weak to express it? I cannot tell. He does not answer my questions.

Still I continue. Text after text, slowly, solemnly, prayerfully, crying for help, I repeat; and then, "Do you hear me, Henry?" After an interval faintly comes the answer, "I hear." He hears; I thank God. The word of God is powerful. That is my hope, even against hope. Again the precious words of Scripture—again questions—but no answer. The soul is looking closely at eternity now; no leisure to attend to me—no strength. The senses no longer do their office. Still, for the life's sake, I continue repeating the words of God;—a lucid moment may return.

Then we kneel and commend him to God, and cry aloud for him, pleading the merits of the sinner's Saviour.

We rise, and I bid the uncle take my place. The eyes are fixed; there is no pulse. "It is all over," said the uncle. He has passed away without a struggle.

"All over!" Far from it; rather all begun. New scenes are opening now upon that soul which has just escaped so silently from the body. What scenes they are—whether light or dark, whether full of joy or agony—I cannot tell. What messengers came to take him hence—whether the ministers of God's awful justice, or the angels of mercy—I know not. I only know that the soul which has just escaped from that body lying before me is now gone before God, to render its account of the deeds done in the body. Did it close, by faith, with Christ's offer of mercy before it left the body? That is the question now—a question which cannot be answered till I myself stand before the same great throne.

All is not over; a larger, longer life has begun, which can never end. Is it for this soul truly life, even life eternal? or is it that living death, "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched?" Reader, may these thoughts sink into your heart and mine. We may be nearer death and judgment than we think we are. The veil that separates time from eternity is very thin, and we may break through it when we least expect it. The moment we do so, a wondrous light will be thrown on all the things of time. How different will they seem to us to what they seem now! Even the minister does not truly realize the vast importance of his work, or the worth of the soul. But the moment we break through that thin veil we shall see and know it all. Then, if you be not in Christ, what misery will await you—what remorse! How you will hate yourself for throwing away eternal joys, and for laying up for yourself a treasury of wrath which shall never be exhausted.

Don't put off repentance and turning to God. You are not stronger than Henry D—. Your life is not more secure. Your sickness may be as short as his—nay, your death may come more suddenly. Even if, on your death-bed, you profess repentance and conversion, how untrustworthy these professions are at such a time! What hope will your friends be able to entertain? What reasonable hope have I of my poor parishioner?

But the bodily life is over, and I turn to leave the room. "Be ye also ready," are my words; "for at such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh." Going down stairs, I see in the kitchen the companion of this poor man. I tell him that he is gone, and I beseech him to give his heart to Christ. "I will," he said, sobbing. Will he? It must be my part often to remind him of his promise and of his feelings at that time.

And now I pass out into the open air. It is still early; but what a solemn scene has this day already witnessed! The men are going to their work. The world does not stop though a soul has just departed. How true it is that in the midst of death we are in life, as well as that "in the midst of life we are in death." The activity, the common work, for the moment jars upon my feelings. I speak to the men as I pass. I tell them that the soul is flown; I press upon them the concerns of eternity. And then I come home to pray for myself and for those that remain, and to make this record, that I may be stirred up and reminded in time to come. And may the Holy Spirit impress on every reader the solemn warning of the Saviour's words, "Be ye also ready!"

DOCTRINAL PREACHING.

WHAT can a minister of the gospel preach if he does not preach doctrines? Christianity is nothing else than a system of principles, with their consequent and relevant duties. A state has its bill of rights and statutes, a corporation its constitution and by-laws, astronomy its fixed facts and principles, and arithmetic its rules. Revealed religion, in like manner, has its facts, truths, and doctrines. The relations of men to each other, to God, and to eternity, and the duties growing out of these relations, find a frail foothold and a precarious existence, as pertaining to revelation, till there be a doctrinal body or framework to which they can pertain.

The doctrines of Christianity are as the bones and skeleton of the human body. They determine not only its symmetry and strength, but they predetermine its very existence and continuance. In them are the hidings of power, and around them are the compactness and nobleness of the human structure. The muscles are nothing except as they spring from the bones, and are braced, and strained, and made operative by them. So Christian duties and activities are nothing except as doctrines produce, and invigorate, and perpetuate them.

Physiology teaches us that a good proportion of the nutriment of the child must be adapted to make bones, otherwise there will be in the child imbecility, disease, deformity, and death. And it assures us that something more than a milk diet is needed to furnish this osseous solidity and strength for opening manhood. Theology has suggestions of a like kind, and an old school writer on this topic speaks of those who had used only milk, and could not bear strong meat, and so were feeble and sickly. The duties of the citizen are unfelt, unforced, unknown, except as the principles of the statute-book reveal, suggest, and demand them. The perception of civil justice and the power to administer it, protection in right, a sense of security, and ability to live orderly, useful, and happy lives, spring from and abide in the dry formulas of law. The gospel, in like manner, is a system of doctrines revealing, suggesting, and demanding a certain manner of life. Precepts grow out of those doctrines, practice is the legitimate fruit of them, and exhortation to duty is based on them. What is Christian life but certain principles in practice? Duty is the offspring of doctrine.

What, then, can a man preach, if he does not preach the doctrines? He can no more come to duties without them than to inferences without premises. He can reach a duty logically, and press it powerfully, only as he starts in the assumption or proof of a doctrine. As well teach practical surveying without previous teaching of the first principles of arithmetic and geometry. This ignoring, therefore, of doctrinal preaching, and this clamour for the "practical" as separate from the other, is a stupendous blunder, and a devout folly. It has in it neither philosophy, common sense, nor Scripture.

Suppose one, in the way of exhortation, or "practical preaching," urge his hearers to flee from the wrath to come. The exhortation or sermon is based on the doctrine that there is a coming wrath. If the hearers are not well persuaded on this point, the exhortation is impotent. It is when Lot believes the angel, and sees the heavenly tempest, that he hastens his steps.

A sinful man is urged to accept salvation by Christ, but that cannot be his duty on your dictum. He has a right and a necessity first to know that he is a sinner, and in a lost state, and that the merit of Jesus Christ has been provided for him, and is adequate, and freely offered, and may be had on trust and a sorrow for sin.

The court-room has no peculiarities, no comforts for the good, or terrors for the evil, till its walls are lettered over with the words of the law. And the plea of the lawyer there, and the solemn session of the jury, have no force except as facts in evidence are urged, and there borne home by the creed of the court and the principles of law.

We are not, therefore, surprised that those preachers who discard the Shorter Catechism, and lightly esteem the use of doctrines in the pulpit, are troubled with a scarcity of Biblical and sacred themes. To meet this difficulty, some reduce the number of religious services on the Sabbath and between the Sabbaths. Others abbreviate their sermons as in an economy of topics and material. And yet others make any and all subjects common to the pulpit that can be forced into seeming relations to moral truth and duty. Indeed, it is a fact notorious, that those pulpits, in all denominations, that have disowned doctrinal preaching, have been the least scrupulous on topics, and the most fruitful of extraneous themes. In proportion as they have departed from the old-school policy and practice of abundant and thorough theological discussions, their pulpit has assimilated itself to the rostrum of the lyceum and the platform of politics, and given itself to intermeddling with extremes of all kinds, and guises on social, moral, and civil questions.

We can appreciate the draft and pressure on the resources, and inventive powers, and tact in using daily occurrences, of that man who is under contract to preach the gospel through the year, and for years, to the same community, while he or his people have put under ban and embargo the very staple of a gospel sermon.

Some, yielding to this clamour against doctrinal preaching, or gratifying their own inclinations in refraining from it, seek a refuge in the graces of rhetoric and oratory. They revel among adjectives, and disport themselves among tropes and figures. Forgetting that the words of the true preacher are but messengers, they add duplicate wings and the tail of the bird of paradise to their carrier-pigeon. And even then, instead of being loosed and sped on its errand, they keep it pluming itself in its pulpit cage, and showering its added colours and incumbrances to the praise of its owner. And when such preachers add that "bodily exercise which profiteth little," in the pulpit, their great efforts are wonderfully powerful for six or twelve months.

Others indulge in the natural sciences, as showing the glory of God. They speak of trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; and they speak of beasts, and fowl, and creeping things, and of fishes. And boarding-school misses, and sophomoric youth, pronounce the preaching "beautiful" and "lovely." And for a season such preachers are the wonder and the admiration of the village.

The artifices of all such as attempt to generate a power for the pulpit, after they have banished its only legitimate force, are of brief success and continuance. Soon their sermons become as a series of circulating decimals, the same integers reappearing with ciphers between.

Herein is disclosed the secret of the failure professional, of so many clergymen in the prime of their days. The graces of composition, the artifices, and captivating accomplishments, and novelties of attitude, gesture, intonation, and expression, lose their power over the same hearers after a little time, or they wear away with the early professional years and ardour of the man. Not having learned to work that ever new, and fresh, and inexhaustible mine of doctrinal theology, his power for the pulpit is now gone. His own people and early admirers weary of him, and perhaps through their own fault, when they tempted him to an exclusion of the doctrinal forces of the pulpit.

The evangelical pulpit shows few sadder sights than a preacher just past his meridian, and by whose rhetoric and delivery audiences were once enchanted and enchained, now able to gain but the most ordinary hearing because of his poverty of thought. The cool temper of ripe years, the same audience, and the sameness of all those devices that once captivated, now compel him to abandon the power of manner, and depend on the power of ideas. And the dependence fails him.

* * * * *

It has been a matter of surprise to many, and specially to the older membership in our churches, that in the multitude of conversions in latter years there have been so few cases of deep, pungent, and thorough conviction. Their memories go back to days when men waged war with the leading doctrines of grace, and struggled intensely with God, and finally gave up from very exhaustion. And when truly submissive and regenerate, it was with distinct perceptions of truth, and with a cordial acceptance of doctrines once hated, and with a vigour of young life.

In late revivals we have seen but little of this. Men have not so contended with God. The controversies are milder, and the settlement of them appears more in the nature of a truce, treaty, or compromise. As the conflict was not so sharp, the submission has not been so deep, even if total. The change from foe to friend has not been so obvious and marked. We have missed what the old divines and good biographers speak of as "the law work."

The explanation of this difference between ancient and modern conversions is found mostly in the character of the means used now and then to bring men from the power of Satan unto God. By the law is the knowledge of sin. But the law has not been preached so much. The doctrines of depravity, regeneration by God only, and only in whom he will, the justice of God as vindicated and satisfied in a vicarious atonement, and in the everlasting punishment of those who ultimately despise it, have generally had no such complete and distinct and abundant utterance, as they had thirty and fifty years ago.

A dim outline of truth necessarily furnishes a dim perception of it, a feeble struggle and conviction under it, and a quiet, unmarked conversion. It seems more a conversion of policy than of heart. The pulse of the new life beats feebly, because the generating instrumentality—the Word, was itself but feebly furnished and used. Men skilled to play on the feelings have succeeded in raising them to an unwonted height, and on this flood-tide persons have been carried over into the kingdom.

It is not impossible to conceive of a new creation in the adult heart where the means themselves are so superficial, and the passage from the old to the new is so comparatively easy. But in such case we must not be surprised at feeble and dwarfed results.

The means most abundant, and apparently most successful, in the last great national revival, were prayer-meetings. The services in them were brief, varied, and exciting. The narrow limits of time, and the number of speakers, forbade any great amount of doctrinal instruction. The addresses were hortatory, abrupt, and compact. The meetings were not so much for instructing as for exciting, nor were the feeling and excitement too great, if they had been suitably balanced by doctrinal truths. And moreover, many of these meetings were "Union Meetings," from which, of necessity and courtesy, several of the leading doctrines, and those specially serviceable in the revivals of Edwards's day were excluded.

Had the doctrines been suppressed in the preaching of that Master in Israel, which we consent to exclude in our theory of "Union Prayer Meetings," he would have had scanty material for a "Narrative of Surprising Conversions." The power of his sermons lay much in a cluster of doctrines that a later and "improved" theology does not make very conspicuous in the pulpit or pew.

Feeble doctrines must be followed by feeble conversions, if any follow. The utterances of the children will be faint and stammering, and "half in the speech of Ashdod."

It has also been a matter of surprise, that with the vast additions to the Evangelical Church, as the fruit of the late revival, so little working strength has been added. Probably never in the same space of time, have so many assumed the vows of the Church. Yet, drawing illustration of one point from only one source, the treasuries of our national and state benevolent societies have shown but faint evidence of this great revival, and unusual enlargement of the catalogue of the Church.

Why is this? Our discussion explains it. A conversion through the feelings and emotions is not so radical and so total as a conversion through the doctrines, and one's creed and principles. The emotional conversion works on the surface of the man; the depths remain unmoved. It does not extend thoroughly to his shop, and farm, and office, and profession, to his mortgages and stocks. They are not converted. There is not vitality and compass enough in the work to extend to them. A feeble conviction, and feeble conversion through the feelings, produce a feeble Christian. Not coming into the kingdom through a belief of all the truth, there is not the abundant material of truths with which to constitute a symmetrical and strong new man. He is rather an emotional Christian. The various winds of doctrine sway him. He is wanting in stability, and is a man of moods and tenses. And his donations are affected and reduced by this type of his piety, for the gifts of feeling are but a small per cent of the gifts of principle. As a man with no creed can have no Christian character, so the less the creed the fewer the Christian graces and forces. A minimum creed produces a minimum piety.—Boston Review.

"A PRAYER OF MOSES, THE MAN OF GOD."

PSALM xc.

HAVING thus briefly glanced at this Psalm, as written by Moses for these much-erring, but penitent Israelites, and as probably then often sung by them, let us now for a little think of it in its wider aspect, as intended for all ages, as written for our own admonition and instruction in righteousness; for our condition in this world resembles in many respects what theirs was then, and the prayers which they were in this Psalm instructed to offer, are equally suitable for us. Like them we find our lot assigned to us in a place where there are many things which should lead us to think of God. If the scenery of that wilderness had, as we think it must have had, such an effect on the mind of the Israelites, so in the world in which we find ourselves there is much which ought to raise our thoughts to the eternal and self-existent One.

Some discoveries of these latter ages have given a new and peculiar interest to such words as meet us here, "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting thou art God."

But no such discoveries bring us any nearer the comprehension of God's eternity. However far or high we go there is still an infinite distance between us and him. We know but a small part of his ways. Clouds and darkness are round about him. We cannot by searching find out God, we cannot find out the Almighty to perfection.

Compared with this glorious Being, what is man!—poor, feeble, helpless, dependent, ever liable to vicissitude and change; and to whom can we cling in our need and helplessness, and where can we find a refuge, unless in Him who can at all times and in every possible situation shield and defend us; where can we find a home and resting-place for our hearts but in Him, who, though he is the high and lofty One who inhabiteth eternity, regards with love and favour the humble and the poor—who has been the dwelling-place of his people in all generations, and who will be ours also if we put our trust in him. We too, however, are all naturally under the frown and displeasure of the Almighty. Like the Israelites, we are doomed to fall in the wilderness. The sentence has gone forth against us, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return;" and in every death, and funeral, and open grave, this sentence is fulfilled. This is the voice which sounds everywhere throughout the world, "Return, ye children of men." The flood of death flows ceaselessly, by which the successive generations of our race are carried away. When God first pronounced that sentence, all our race were included in it, just as certainly as if they had all been one day alive together on the earth, and the next day swept away together to the tomb. Time makes a difference in our eyes; the six thousand years during which this sentence has been accomplishing; but it can make none in the view of Him in whose sight a thousand years are but as yesterday when it is past, or as a watch in the night.

Thus we are consumed by God's anger—no sooner born than we begin to die, carrying about with us the seeds of mortality, the sentence of death; our life's journey—a journey to the grave. We are also troubled by his wrath; for what are the numberless calamities of life, continually occurring, but special manifestations of that wrath. It may be true that some of these calamities, some of the wars, for example, which now and again trouble and desolate the earth, are not without counterbalancing advantages. They are just and necessary, men say,—the price which must sometimes be paid for our temporal possessions, and the liberties we prize so much. It may be so; but the question recurs, why should it be necessary to purchase freedom at such a cost? And the only possible answer is, that we are in a fallen world, that by these things God visits us for our sins, and that we are therefore to regard them as tokens of his wrath. How much, then, does our condition in this world resemble that of the Israelites! We receive, indeed, as they did, many proofs of God's goodness. He makes his sun to shine on us, and sustains us in the wilderness as he sustained them. Still, we also are consumed by his anger and troubled by his wrath, and like them we may say, "Who knoweth the power of thine anger?" Its full power we do not see or experience in this present life, for in wrath he remembers mercy. But the Scriptures warn us in many places, that a day is coming when that wrath of God, which is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness shall be poured out, and that they who now refuse to humble themselves under God's mighty hand, who despise his correction in this state of trial and discipline through which they are passing, and who continue impenitent and unbelieving, are treasuring up to themselves wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God.

If these be just views of our condition, nothing can be more appropriate to our case than the prayers with which the Psalm concludes. One of these we have in the twelfth verse, "So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom,"—a prayer naturally suggested by the consideration of the misery, vanity, and shortness of this present life. In which it is implied also that there is a future life beyond, and that miserable, vain, and brief though this present life be, man is accountable to God for the way in which he spends it; and that as he sows in this world, he shall reap in the next. This prayer, therefore, strongly suggests the idea of a future state. "If the dead rise not," argues the apostle, "let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die;" and so, had they not believed in a future life, might the Israelites have reasoned then. But the fact of their using such a prayer as this, implies that while they knew they must die in the wilderness, and could not enter into the promised land, there was yet a land of everlasting rest beyond the grave, at which, by numbering and spending their days aright, they might at last arrive.

This, then, is the full statement of the case—a vain and transitory existence here—a dispensation of judgment, and an endless duration hereafter. The prayer arises out of our mingled hopes and fears—the fear of becoming worse, more miserable; the hope, by a wise employment of our days, that we may redeem them from vanity, and fill them with meaning and significance as they bear upon our future state.

The importance of this prayer appears, especially when we remember that our everlasting condition is determined and fixed at death, and that the error of a misspent life is one which can never be retrieved. Comparing one part of this life with another, it is possible to compensate to some extent for neglect and folly in one period, by more care and diligence in the next. The errors of youth may to some extent, though only very partially—often not at all—be retrieved in maturer years. But between the brief space of this life and the eternal state beyond, there are no intervening spaces—no successive periods of threescore and ten, or fourscore years—in which neglect in one of them may be redeemed in another. This is a very awful truth, but it is as clearly revealed as any other. The Saviour of the world himself tells us that after death there is a great gulph fixed, and that, on the last judgment taking place, the wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal.

The whole tenor of the Scriptures is to the same effect. We might, perhaps, wish it could be otherwise, and that our state of trial and probation did not terminate with the present life. But to such an idea the Bible gives no countenance; and let a man admit it into his mind, and he will find he has given up, not one only, but many articles of his faith. He will feel his sense of God's holiness and justice, and of the awful sanctions of the divine law, to be immediately lowered, and the necessity for Christ's atonement vanishing away; and that, instead of receiving the kingdom of God as a little child, satisfied with this that the Judge of all the earth shall do right, and that what he knows not now he shall know hereafter, he is making his own human reason and his own ungodly inclinations the standard to which these questions are to be referred. It is the belief of the great truths so plainly revealed to us in the word of God that we are now on our trial for eternity—that the present dispensation of grace is to be succeeded by a dispensation of judgment, when the mystery of God shall be finished, and he shall render to every man according to his works,—it is this which gives emphasis and meaning to the prayer, "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom," &c.

The prayers which follow, for the mitigation and removal of affliction, every thoughtful person, who lives for any time in this world, will find too sure and abundant cause to offer up; and He who afflicteth not willingly, nor grieves the children of men, gives us every encouragement to do so, assuring us that if we call on him in the day of trouble he will deliver us.

Especially must we desire that these afflictions should accomplish in us the ends for which they were designed,—that "God's work"—the end he has in view in these afflictions—may "appear" to us,—and that, returning to him, we may be "early satisfied with his mercy"—a prayer in which gleams of immortality again break forth, for the "early" cannot here mean the season of youth as a distinctive portion of our life, but must mean the present time, this present life as a whole, which is but the beginning, the morning of our immortal existence; so that, if now satisfied with God's mercy, we shall rejoice and be glad in him all our days. If we come to Jesus Christ, and in earnest faith avail ourselves of the mercy offered us in him, all will be well. Light will break in on the very darkest of God's dispensations towards us in our journey through the wilderness; we shall look forward to the future with confidence and joy. But if we refuse to do so, if we neglect this great salvation, if we slight God's love in the gift of his Son, we may well expect the darkness of spiritual death, and, at length, of eternal death, to gather more deeply and hopelessly around us.

These are appropriate and interesting prayers also with which the Psalm concludes,—prayers very needful for us, if we could learn how, thoughtfully, to utter them as the expressions of our own desires. "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us." What is the beauty of the Lord? We may say that all beauty is his. His is the beauty of the outward and material world, from which our first impressions of the beautiful are derived. He is the Creator of it all—from the stars which shine in the firmament, to the lowliest flowers, of which Jesus said that "even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." All are his glorious works, and there is a sweetness and purity in them which seems silently to rebuke the ungodliness of man. Even over that wilderness in which the Israelites wandered, a marvellous beauty was poured forth; but as then, so still, how often is it displayed in vain? How many walk abroad amid the fairest scenes of this earth, whose hearts, unloving and unthankful, are anything but in harmony with the objects surrounding them—in whom these objects excite no feelings of gratitude to Him whose overflowing and tender goodness has prepared and furnished for them such a home? How well may we say, as we contemplate these works, "All, except man, is divine." There is beauty in the world without, but none in the heart within. This is what we need—an inward, a moral beauty, the beauty of holiness. This is what we are to understand by "the beauty of the Lord." His holiness was represented to the ancient Church by types and symbols, in the adornings of the tabernacle, the garments of the High Priest, and in various other ways; to us, more gloriously in the person of the Son—in the life on earth of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ—in the example which he left us that we should walk in his steps. When, therefore, we pray that the beauty of the Lord may be upon us, we pray that we may be made like Christ—that his beauty may be taken and put upon us. This was the purpose for which he came. He took our sin upon himself that his holiness and righteousness might be made over to us. Blessed exchange! He wrought out that righteousness by his obedience to God's holy law, in our room and stead; and, when we so receive him, we are covered with the robes of righteousness, and clothed with the garments of salvation. We obtain an interest in that righteousness of God, which is by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all and upon all them that believe. The work of real and internal sanctification then begins to be accomplished in our hearts, by which we are transformed into the likeness of Christ, and made to bear the image of the heavenly. This must be the work referred to in the concluding portions of the Psalm: "Establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it." What must our work needs be, before we can calmly look up to God, and ask him to establish it? Is the attainment of wealth our work—or the pursuit of pleasure—or is the making some provision for ourselves and our family the object on which our heart is set? Or is our work to combine these things as much as possible together—discharging, in some degree, life's duties, but still with our temporal advancement and present gratification mainly in view? Then we may doubt, if, with a calm and serene spirit, we can look up to God and ask him to establish it. It were to ask him to perform an impossibility,—to establish what cannot be established—to establish what has within itself the seeds and elements of dissolution and decay. But if we seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness—if we make it our work to strive against sin and to follow after holiness—if it be our chief care how we may best avail ourselves of God's offered mercy, and best profit by his various dealings towards us as we journey through life—if we make it our work to form a character for heaven, and to prepare ourselves for a higher and holier state of being,—then we may confidently commit this work to God, not only as one which possesses in itself the principles of duration and permanence, but as a work which it is the object of all his dealings with his children to have effected in them.

MISCELLANIES.

"PULLING THEM OUT OF THE FIRE."

A YOUTHFUL pastor sat by the sick-bed of an aged Christian, from whose religious experience he had drawn many instructive and consoling lessons. He had been reading aloud, at her request, the Epistle of Jude. She remarked, "That twenty-third verse has a wonderful significance to me, for it reminds me of an exciting incident of my early life, and its effect upon my religious character.

"I was just recovering from a severe sickness, and was still so weak as to be quite exhausted by the effort of walking across the room, when my father's house took fire and was burned to the ground. The flames burst out at midnight. I was awake, and had been for some time listening to a faint crackling without understanding its terrible import. Suddenly the truth flashed upon me. I sprang from my bed, and, although so weak, succeeded in rousing the different members of the family, and they were soon all assembled, with the exception of one of the servant-girls. Could it be that she had again fallen asleep? I rushed to her room, and found her in a profound slumber, while the glare of light was so intense that I felt sure the roof was blazing over our heads. I shrieked her name; she moved uneasily, and slumbered on. I struck her with all my force, but with little more effect; a slight movement, a few muttered words of impatience, and she was again asleep. With the strength of despair I took hold of her, and, large and heavy though she was, dragged her to the floor. The fall awoke her, and she was saved. Not more than a moment after our escape, the roof fell in, and the room was wrapt in flames.

"Years after, this incident came before my mind as a rebuke for my indifference to the welfare of souls around me. I had made desperate, almost superhuman, efforts to save that poor life which, cherish it as we may, and prolonged to its utmost extent, is but as the fading flower; but what had I done for souls? They were slumbering in false security, while the fire that never shall be quenched was slowly gaining upon them, and would soon envelope them for ever, and I had been at ease, or had only put forth feeble efforts to save them. A deep sense of guilt settled down on my heart. I feared that the blood of souls would be found on my garments. My distress of mind was such as to impair my health, until, in my anguish, I went to the Saviour, confessed my sin, and found how much he can forgive, and how ready he is to give grace and strength for the performance of duty. Through his assistance I endeavoured to put forth as earnest efforts for the precious life of the soul as I had once done for that of the body."

All unconsciously to herself the aged woman had said the word in season which that pastor needed, for he, too, had faltered in his Master's service; the love of souls was fading out of his heart, and things temporal were taking that place in his thoughts which should have been occupied by the Eternal; but He who often speaks through the still, small voice, made this simple story the means of rousing him from his slothfulness. He seemed from this day to have received a new baptism of the Spirit; and, through weariness and exhaustion, through trial and discouragement, he laboured on until he had worn out his mortal frame, and was called to his rest. Often, when his efforts to rouse the attention of the impenitent seemed fruitless, he called to remembrance his friend's story, and would say to himself, "I must be more in earnest; I must take hold of sinners and drag them from eternal burning."

ALL RIGHT AND ALL WRONG.

I ONCE conversed with a middle-aged man, and endeavoured to impress upon his mind the importance of attending to the salvation of his soul. He met me with the reply, that he believed it was "all right" with him. He was habitually a Sabbath-breaker, profane and intemperate, but was kind in his family, and obliging as a neighbour; and repeatedly he assured me that he had always meant to do right, and that he considered this as good as anybody's religion.

Before long, wasting consumption fastened upon that man, and he expressed a willingness to die, if his Creator willed it, because he had found this a hard world, and he was willing to go and be out of trouble. I spoke to him of salvation by Jesus Christ, provided as an inheritance in heaven for every sinner who believes in him, and put the question whether he had got a good title to that inheritance.

"No," he said, "I have not."

"You must get a title," I said to him, kindly. "As you look over these fields around you, they look beautiful, but it makes a great difference with you whether or not you have a good title to them, and can say, 'They are mine.' As a sinner, you have forfeited heaven, and now you can only recover a title through Christ, and be admitted there as a saved sinner."

One day I saw that he appeared differently from what he had before, and on asking him how his past life appeared to him, he replied, with solemn emphasis, "It looks bad, sir; it is wrong, all wrong." I pointed him to the Lamb of God.

What opposite views men take at different times of their own characters! Under the influence of self-flattering and false views and feelings at one time, they think their life all right. At another time, they look upon the same life, and pronounce it all wrong, and find no good thing in it. "All these have I kept from my youth up," said the young ruler to Jesus. Yet, he lacked a title to the "treasure in heaven."

Beware of founding your hope of eternal life on a superficial and partial judgment of your life. Look down deeper into your heart; examine the motives which are the springs of your action; analyze your character by the light of God's law. Then you will see, by the help of the Holy Spirit, that you need a Saviour, and will feel the worth and sufficiency of Christ.

The feelings and interests of sinners warp their judgment, and lead them into disastrous mistakes about themselves and the course of conduct which they are pursuing. The sinner feels reluctant to condemn himself and to see that he is in danger. He takes a partial view of his life; he looks at some fair fruit of his character; and hastily ventures to presume that all is right, and that he is safe for eternity, though other parts of his life are palpably at variance with the law of God, and though all parts of his character are far removed from obedience to God. Rebels against righteous government seek self-justification, and they must soon lose their courage, if they fail to persuade themselves that they have a good cause. But it is a brief and delusive advantage which they gain by falsehood or vaunting self-flattery. So sinners may deceive themselves, and imagine that all is peace and safety, when sudden destruction is impending. Be honest with your own soul. God is not mocked. Seek to know the worst of your own case, and look to Christ, who is able to save.—Tract Journal.

"A MAN OVERBOARD."

I CAN never forget the thrill of horror that went through us when it was announced to our ship's company that there was a man overboard. It was on a bright and beautiful morning in May. For more than two weeks previous we had been tossed hither and thither in the Mediterranean by strong head-winds, or lazily floating on waters unruffled by a breeze. Now, at length, our impatient wishes were gratified. We were exceedingly joyous to find ourselves not only "homeward bound," but homeward borne at a very rapid rate, before a strong wind directly aft. As we stood on deck drinking in the delicious breeze, and gazing with delight upon the charming scenery of the distant coast of Southern Europe, suddenly all was confusion. By some mishap, a sailor had plunged into the surging waters, and was struggling fearfully for his life in the wake of the vessel, while the distance between him and a rescuing arm rapidly increased. Instantly all were aroused to the momentous and imperious urgency of his case. As speedily as possible the vessel's career was checked and boats were sent forth to the rescue, while we stood trembling with solicitude as we awaited the result.

After a few minutes, which seemed to us painfully long, all hearts were lightened, and all eyes glistened with joy as the rescue of the struggling, perhaps almost despairing, man was ascertained. And when he was laid at last on deck, alive and safe, there went up a shout of gladness such as a similar scene alone could awaken.

As, in subsequent years, I have often recalled the scene of that beautiful morning at sea, I have been led to ask how it comes to pass that we are so indifferent to the condition of our fellow-men who are all around us in perils immeasurably more fearful than any ever known to the sea. I gazed the other day on a young soldier. He was in a deplorable condition. In his intoxication, awful oaths poured from his lips at every breath, like a torrent. He had incurred the disgrace of being ejected from the carriages on one of our railways, and was ready to kill any man who should take the part of the conductor against him. As prudently as the circumstances admitted I inquired into his case, his history, and his plans, and I soon learned enough from him to extort from me the sigh, almost in audible words: "Alas! another man overboard, and no one to care about it." I should not say, "no one." There were several, including, I am happy to say, one of his comrades in arms, who were evidently deeply moved and pained, and would have gladly rescued the poor young man, if, in the brief hour of our meeting, it had been possible. But there were others, including, I fear, the great majority, who seemed wholly indifferent. Some even made themselves merry at the scene. And as I, from necessity, turned away from the man, I could not avoid the conviction that, if when he first plunged overboard from the restraints of virtue into the boiling sea of vice, kind friends had interested themselves in his rescue, and had laid hold upon him with the strong arms of Christian love, he might have been saved. When I consider in what a fearful sea he is now to be tossed, far away amid the vices of the camp, I can hardly entertain a hope in this case, though I would not despair.

But the case of this young man is by no means a rare one. All around us in the ocean of busy life, are immortal men, who, some in this way and some in that, are plunging into the perilous deep of temptation only to be drawn, if not rescued, into the vortex of certain destruction. Yet how faintly is it realized! How few are roused to the magnitude of the interests at stake! Where, oh where, are those whose duty it is to man the life-boat and go forth to the rescue? If the cry, "A man overboard!" so thrills a ship's company with anxiety, and so stirs them to effort for the rescue of the sinking mariner, what interest should be felt, and what effort should be put forth, for the salvation of a perishing yet undying soul? And if shouts of joy go up over one rescued from the perils of the deep, what joy should be expressed when a sinner is saved? Surely his salvation is sufficient to explain those words of Jesus, "Likewise, I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth."

A LARGE CONGREGATION.

SAID a good deacon to me: "When we were without a pastor, and the people were scattered, I went at the ringing of the bell to worship God. A few came and went away, supposing there would be no meeting. I had selected the hymns, a chapter to read, and a sermon. I waited, and thought, though none are here besides me, it is the place of my accustomed worship; here my covenant-vows were given; here I will stay, and call the host of heaven to hear. And so I sang, and prayed, and read an excellent sermon, and felt that I had a large congregation."

Was not this the right spirit, the faith "once delivered to the saints?"

Let those members of the Churches who wander from their altars at the impulse of curiosity or prejudice, ponder the question. How often the voice of the Lord, as of old, might be heard by many on the Sabbath day, "To your tents, O Israel!"

And it is a precious thought, that a solitary faithful soul may have "the host of heaven" about him in his humble worship of a present God.—Tract Journal.

TREASURY PULPIT.

INCREASE OF GRACE.

"We beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more."—1 THESS. IV. 10.

BY THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

CREATION, so far at least as concerns this world, has been compared to a pyramid. Beginning with the mineral, passing upward into the vegetable, and rising into the animal kingdom, we find man standing on its apex, the crowning work of God. In defining the limits of these kingdoms, Linnaeus, the father of botany, says, that "minerals grow; that vegetables grow and live; that animals grow, live, and feel." He makes growth common to them all; and in older days than his, some held that even stones and metals, as well as plants and animals, spring from seed. But though certain metals, in their native state, assume the arborescent form, and crystals increase in size, and coral forests, throwing out arms like trees, spring from the bottom of the sea, yet no mineral substance can, properly speaking, be said to grow. Growth, that active power by which the ox converts the grass of the meadow into red flesh, and foul manures into the sweetest odours, and by which all plants and animals appropriate to themselves such materials as are fitted to preserve their being and increase their bulk, is a property that belongs to life. It is only living things that grow; and all living things do grow. Be it the lichen that clings to the rock, or the eagle that has her nest on its craggy shelf, or man that rends its heart with powder and draws the gold from its bowels,—from the germ out of which they spring they grow onwards to maturity; in the words of my text, they "increase more and more."

These words are as true of spiritual as of natural life. According to heathen fables, Minerva, the goddess of wisdom and daughter of Jupiter, sprung full-grown and full-armed from her father's head. No man thus comes from the hand of the Holy Spirit, in sudden, mature, perfect saintship. There is nothing in the spiritual world resembles this; no, nor even what the natural world presents in the development of the insect tribes. During their last and perfect stage, in the condition, as it is called, of the imago, be their life long or short, they undergo no increase. So soon as the green worm that once crawled on the ground, and fed on garbage, bursting its coffin-shell, comes forth a creature with silken wings, to roam in the sunny air, to sleep by night on a bed of flowers, and by day banquet on their nectar, it grows no more, neither larger nor wiser; its flight and its faculties being as perfect on the day of what may be called its new birth, as when, touched by early frosts or drowned in rain, it dies. Here, indeed, we have a symbol of the resurrection body as it shall step from the tomb,—in beauty perfect, in growth mature; henceforth to undergo through eternal ages neither change nor decay. It is otherwise with the renewed soul. Before it, in righteousness, and knowledge, and true holiness, stretches a field of illimitable progress,—upwards, onwards,—even to what it shall be for ever approaching, yet never reach, the throne of God.

Meanwhile, to confine our views only to this world, —who knows his short-comings and laments them; who feels with Paul that he has not yet attained, or is already perfect, that he is far from perfect; that he is not what he ought to be, and might have been, but will feel how appropriate to all, even to the best of us, are these words of exhortation, "We beseech you, brethren"—by the mercies of God, by the cross of Christ, by your hopes of heaven,—for the glory of Jesus' name, and the good of his Church,—for your own sakes, your purity, your peace, your joy, your fitness for heaven, and growth in grace,—"we beseech you that ye increase more and more!"

I. In what are we to increase?

"Thou hast multiplied the nation," says the prophet, "and not increased the joy." There is little or no advantage in the increase of some things; these may but increase our danger; add to our cares, and lay weightier burdens on the back of life. Hear the wise man, "He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase." More riches will certainly not make us happier; they may not even make us richer. The expenditure grows in proportion to the increase of income; and so again the wise man says, "When goods increase, they increase that eat them; and what good is there to the owner thereof?" Good! On the contrary, "The sleep of a labouring man is sweet," says Solomon, "but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep. There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun; riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt." We have seen that, as well as Solomon.

Nor is the increase even of wisdom—though a higher and nobler pursuit—without its own drawbacks. It is harder to work with the brain than with the hands; to hammer out thoughts than iron. Not to be acquired but by toil and self-denial, at the expense often of health, always of labour, and sometimes, as where the pale student feeds his midnight lamp with the oil of life, at the expense of life itself, we may say, to quote again the words of Solomon, "In much wisdom is much grief, and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow"—"Of making many books there is no end, and much study is a weariness to the flesh."

It is not increase of these things at which my text calls us to aim. It is increase of such riches as do not make it more difficult, but more easy, to get to heaven; of the wisdom that humbles rather than puffs up its possessor; of a beauty, unlike woman's, which is rather the shield than the snare of virtue; of graces which, unlike a fair form or lovely countenance, defy the ravages of time, and grow more beautiful with age. It is increase of those spiritual endowments which are thus catalogued by Paul as fruits of the Holy Spirit—"Love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance;" it is more humility, more docility, more acts of self-denial and works of eternity; more prayer and watchfulness; a more tender conscience, and a closer walk with God; a more heavenly temper and a holier life. In all these, and especially in the love that is the spring of all, "I beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more."

II. How we are to increase in these.

1. We are to increase equally.

All our graces are to be cultivated; none of them are to be neglected. If one side of a tree grows, and the other does not, the tree acquires a crooked form—is a misshapen thing. And monsters among mankind are made, not only by want of parts, as when the body wants a limb, or the face an eye, or the leg a foot, or the arm a hand, but also by some one part growing in excess of others. Analogous in its results to these things is the unequal growth of Christian graces. Let fear, for example, godly fear, that safeguard of the soul, grow out of due proportion to faith, and the result is a dull, gloomy, despondent, unhappy Christian. Or, let zeal, that grace which makes us like a flaming fire in the service of our God, grow more than knowledge, prudence, wisdom, and like a machine without director, or balance-wheel, generating steam faster than it can use it, zeal bursts into extravagance, and carries a man away into the regions of wild fanaticism. There are differences, springing from constitutional peculiarities, or early education, among Christians, which grace will modify, but never altogether eradicate on this side the grave. No doubt all Bunyan's pictures were painted from life—as well Mr. Great-heart the giant-killer and hero of a hundred battles, as Mr. Feeble-mind, who started at his own shadow and trembled at the falling of a leaf. There are also differences among Christians which imply no defect, just as there are in countenances which are very different, and yet, be the complexions dark or fair, the hair of golden colour or like the raven's wing, are very beautiful. We do not expect or even wish all to be alike, any more than I would have all flowers alike—none but roses in the garden, or daisies in the field; the Church as well as the meadows below, or the star-spangled heavens above, owing its beauty in part to that variety in unity which marks all the works of God, and mars none of them.

Some saints are remarkable for having one grace in peculiar prominence—faith, for instance, or resignation, or courage, or zeal, or benevolence. Yet though this may draw most eyes upon them, and go most to secure their praise, if not "in all the churches" in their neighbourhood, or even in their nation, these are not the most perfect specimens of Christianity. It is with men as with trees; the more perfect the form of the tree, the more perfect the proportion between its trunk and branches, between its height and width, it strikes the eye the less; and it is only on a near approach and closer scrutiny that we take in its size, and gaze with wonder on its towering form, and enormous girth.

The most perfect Christian is he who has all his graces, like the strings of an angel's harp, in the most perfect harmony. Such being the case, we are to beware of cultivating one grace, or attending to any one duty at the expense of others. That is possible, and never more likely to happen than in these days of active Christian benevolence. Treading in our Master's steps, we are to go about doing good; yet we may undertake so many works of Christian benevolence as to trench on the hours that should be sacred to devotion. In seeking to do good to others, we may so neglect the cultivation of our own hearts, the duties we owe to our own families, as to have to cry with the man of old, "They made me keeper of vineyards, and mine own vineyard I have not kept." On the other hand, like a lark that goes up soaring and singing in heaven, while below the hawk is rifling her nest, we may spend our hours in devotional exercises, in communion with saints and with God, when we should be down here; fighting with the devil; alleviating human misery; righting the wrongs of the oppressed; raising the fallen; reforming the vicious; helping humanity, and by God's help plucking the prey from the lion's jaws. The head, the heart, the hand—doctrine, devotion, work, are each of them to have their due share of our time and attention; we working on our life like the ancient sculptor on the dead marble, when he produced forms where each feature was not only beautiful in itself, but also in perfect proportion to every other. On this account these statues of his divinities, the admiration of all ages, are the perfect models of men and women. Even so it is by growing equally in the knowledge, and the love, and the life of Christ, that we reach the true model of a Christian, and, to use Paul's words, "grow into a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

2. We are to increase constantly.

This idea is embodied in all the figures under which our spiritual life is set forth in the word of God. Is it a seed? So soon as the seed is quickened where it lies buried in the soil, it grows; grows night and day; grows beneath the foot that tramples on it; piercing the rugged clod, turning and twining to round the corner of a stone, and shooting its way upward, till it see the blessed light, and drink the dews of heaven—on and ever on it grows, rising and ripening, till sickles flash, and reapers sing where winter howled over fields of snow. Is it the day? From the first faint streak of light that our eye catches on the eastern horizon, how steadily it grows! hill and dale, shore and sea below becoming more and more distinct; one star disappearing after another in the grey sky; the fleecy clouds changing into opal, and amber, and purple, and burning gold, until the sun springs up flaming from his ocean bed; and the flowers open their eyes, and the birds sing for joy, and the waves flash and dance in light, and the earth rejoices in perfect day. Is it human life? Hanging on a mother's bosom, first sleeping, then smiling in her arms; on little feet balancing itself so beautifully; trying its first tottering steps; speaking its first stammering words; its affections and faculties opening like the petals of a flower, how does the infant grow with each successive year—infancy growing into prattling childhood; childhood into blooming youth; youth into ripened manhood, till the hand that was once pleased with a toy, yonder amid royal pageant, and the blare of trumpets, and the boom of cannon, waves the sceptre of empire over an acclaiming throng—or till the voice that was once but a feeble wail, commands on the reeling deck, or amid the roar of battle; here stirs the deepest passions, or there stills the tumults of the people.

Such is the way that we should grow—should pray, should labour, should strive to grow. Growth is slow and silent—you neither see nor hear it; yet see in these cases what steady, constant growth achieves in the natural world. Should it do less in the spiritual? Is God less omnipotent in grace than nature? By no means. "My grace," he says, "is sufficient for thee,"—sufficient for that. Would we rise every morning both to get and to do some good; to cultivate some grace and mortify some sin; to live more holily than yesterday—not to say its bad words, nor indulge its bad wishes, nor repeat its bad deeds; from the experience of the past to learn where we should watch, which is our weak side, what are our besetting sins, taking such measures against these as a man who strengthens the dyke where the last flood broke through, or doubles his sentries where the enemy last surprised him,—what progress we should make! every day we should be a stage nearer heaven. If not every day, every year at least, would present a palpable, sensible progress: it were as easy to tell how long it is since a man was born the second time, as the first; his spiritual as his natural age; the years of his new life as the years of a tree by the rings that every season adds to its circumference.

The nearer we reach the summit of a hill, the climb is harder; and the higher the eagle soars, ever mounting into thinner air, its flight grows more arduous. Now, both in the case of the foot that stands on the snowy peak of the highest Alp, and of the wing that cleaves the sky above it, there is a point where progress ceases—this foot can climb, that wing can fly no higher. It is quite otherwise with spiritual progress. The higher a believer rises in grace, his ascent becomes the easier, and he never reaches a point where progress ceases. Begun on earth, it is continued in heaven; the field that lies before us is illimitable—stretching beyond the grave and above the stars.

Man, as to his body, grows into maturity, and then returns on his course. He goes down as he went up—the hair drops from his head; the teeth fall from his jaws; the light fades in his eye; he enters on the stage of a second childhood; and at length, naked as he came from his mother's womb, naked he returns hither. The emblem of his life is the day: first the grey dawn; then sunrise; then the sun flaming in the zenith; then sinking lower and lower, he wheels his course down the western sky; then he sets; then fading twilight; and then the depth of night. How unlike this to the progress of the spirit! Its course ever onwards, upwards, Godward, it presents a case somewhat analogous to the mathematical paradox of two bodies that are ever approaching, and yet, though moving through infinite space and for eternal ages, never meet, and never can meet. Even so, though they shall never reach the infinite height and perfection of divinity, the saints in glory, constantly ascending, shall be ever approaching it. And thus death, though in a sense we shall be made perfect then, and enter on a state of rest, shall not arrest our onward, upward progress. Our life is like a ship working its way down a river, where the water grows deeper, and the banks grow wider, and the view is more expanded as we advance, till at death, as there, where the waves roar upon the bar, we shall pass out on a great, broad, shoreless ocean, on which, with no limits bounding our progress, we shall advance evermore—growing in the knowledge, and love, and likeness of Christ with the ages of eternity, increasing yet "more and more."

3. We are to make efforts to grow.

Some men have mooted the absurd notion that that peculiar adaptation of the bodies of certain animals to their habits, in which we see the wisdom of their Maker, has resulted from the efforts which they made to adapt themselves to their circumstances—that the heron, for instance, by stretching itself to stand out of the water got its limbs lengthened into stilts, and had its neck also lengthened by its constant efforts to strike the fish at the bottom of the pool. Anything more absurd, as applied to natural objects, cannot be imagined. Yet the effort, even the very wish to be good has, with God's blessing and the co-operation of the Holy Spirit, a tendency to improve us—in the attempt to be better we grow better, even as the flapping of a nestling's wing, impotent though it be, fits its pinions for future flight, or as the creeping of an infant is both a prelude and preparation for its walking. It is to efforts, not to idleness, to supineness, to sleep, that God promises the blessings—those heavenly aids, without which a giant's arm, to say nothing of an infant's, shall never snap the feeblest cord that binds us to earth and sin. God works, and we are to be fellow-workers with him, that we may "increase more and more."

Cast a sponge into water, and, the fluid filling its empty cells, it swells out before our eyes; increases more and more. There is no effort here, and could be none; for though once a living animal, the sponge is now both dead and dry. But it is not as sponges fill with water, nor, to use a Scripture figure often employed and sometimes misapplied, as Gideon's fleece was filled with dews, that God's people are replenished with his grace. More is needed than simply to bring ourselves in contact with ordinances,—to read the Bible—to repair on Sabbath to the church—to sit down in communion seasons at the Lord's table. The babe is brought in contact with a mother's breast; but is laid there only to die, unless, with slumbering instincts awakened, it fasten and suck; drawing out by efforts of its own a nourishment provided for it independent of itself; and there, drawing life from a mother's bosom, it lies in her arms, the symbol of him who hangs by faith on Christ, and fed on the sincere milk of the word is nourished up in grace and into the likeness and image of God. And after all, this picture of a babe lying in a mother's arms, and by instinctive efforts drawing nourishment from her bosom, conveys but an adequate idea of what is required of us, in order that we may increase more and more. It is by other and greater efforts we are to grow in grace and get to heaven. Christ's children, no more than ours, are not always to be babes at the breast. When the mother rocks her infant's cradle, she is looking forward to a time when her boy shall have grown a man; to stand up for a mother's cause; to defend a mother's head; to go forth to his daily labour; to win prizes in the race-course; if called on, to fight the battles of his king and country. To such occupations Christ calls the candidate for a heavenly crown,—He that hath ears to hear, let him hear,—Search the Scriptures,—Watch unto prayer,—Pray without ceasing,—Fight the good fight,—Labour for the bread that never perisheth,—Give all diligence to make your calling and election sure,—Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling,—See that no man take your crown.

While all our hopes of salvation centre in the cross of Christ, and all our hopes of progress hang on the promised aids of the Holy Spirit, let us exert ourselves to the utmost, reaching forth to higher attainments, and aiming at increase in every holy and Christian habit. What was suitable to us once, should not satisfy us now. The dress of childhood does not fit the man. Down among the rocks of the sea, there are creatures that cast their shell year by year; and up among the storm-beaten cliffs of the mountain, year by year, the moulting eagle casts her feathers—these that they may walk in larger, stronger mail—the other, that she may soar on broader pinions, and to higher flights. At such increase should we aim—to grow more busy in God's work; to spend more time and money in his service; to perform greater acts of self-denial; to increase both in the heavenliness of our temper, and in the generosity of our gifts. Not content with being only what once we were, and doing only what once we did, let us covet the best gifts; attempt the loftiest heights; say with the holy ambition of an apostle, "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man I put away childish things." From the fulness of the Godhead bodily that is in Jesus Christ, may the Holy Spirit fill us day by day with grace, till, the moorings strained that bind us to earth, we are ready, so soon as they are severed by the stroke of death, to shoot up to heaven—our Saviour's also our parting words, "I leave the world, and go to the Father." For such increase of grace, and perseverance therein unto the end, Wait on the Lord; wait, I say, on the Lord,—He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength,—The youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall; but they that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength: they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint.

WANDERINGS OVER BIBLE LANDS AND SEAS.

DAMASCUS, BAALBEK, AND THE COAST OF ASIA MINOR.

DAMASCUS, Friday, July 11.

Coming from the Holy Land to Damascus is like stepping straight out of the Bible into the Arabian Nights. The heat is intense to-day, the thermometer 57° in the shade and 130° in the sun; but in our rooms we are quite cool. Our hotel is a palace built by a great man among the Turks one hundred and twenty years ago. The saloon in which I am writing is 40 or 50 feet high, with an arched roof. Through the open door I look on a court containing a large tank filled with running water, and shaded by a fine orange tree. In another corner of the court is a tall oleander in full bloom. The court is paved with inlaid marbles, and so is the saloon. In the room where I am sitting is a fountain or bath, octagonal in form, and made of rich marbles inlaid with mother-of-pearl, into which water is constantly flowing from two spouts,—water not cool merely, but cold. On each of the three sides of this marble hall a high step leads into an arched alcove, the walls and arches of which are exquisitely painted in frescoes of Moorish design. One of these alcoves, the one opposite the door, has a divan, and niches with carved marble slabs, and cupboards with doors of richly carved and gilded wood. In this I am sitting. The other two alcoves are equally decorated, and curtained off with muslin drapery; they contain French beds.

The charm of Damascus is the abundant, fresh, cold water in contrast with the intense heat. How such streams can spring out of the dry burnt-up hills where they rise seems a mystery. Three fresh, cold, abundant rivers flow through the city. Water meets you everywhere in every form; in streams by the roadside; in conduits and drinking-basins in the streets; in tanks, and baths, and flowing fountains in the houses. No wonder Naaman thought his rivers of Damascus better than all the waters of Israel!

On Friday we visited the bazaars and several palaces on the same model as our hotel, some of them very magnificent, with mosaics and frescoes of colours most exquisitely blended. The mosques we were not allowed to enter. It struck us that we had nowhere encountered such fierce and fanatical scowls from the Moslems as here.

On Saturday we rode to the junction of the Baradas and Banias—two of the rivers of Damascus—and visited some Roman ruins. The magnificence of the houses is all internal. Within, many of the palaces are the perfection of oriental beauty and luxury. Outside, they present nothing but dull windowless walls, often cased with mud, with only one narrow dark entrance.

On Sunday we had the English service in the saloon.

On Monday, July 14th, at half-past six, we left Damascus on our way across the Cœle-Syrian plain and Lebanon to Beyrout. The scenery through which we rode on that and the following day was very varied and fine. At first we wound in and out among the hills by the side of the Baradas, one of the rivers of Damascus, an abounding vigorous mountain-river, like our Devonshire rivers, but as abundant in this burning Syrian July as these are after the continuance of rain. It was a most delicious sight and sound. The road, as it wound up the hillside, was constantly returning to the banks of the river as it foamed and dashed along in a series of cascades and rapids, now and then plunging over a precipice into a deep, dark pool below. By its side was a strip of the deepest green vegetation; poplars rising among rich groves of various trees, or from meadows green as alpine mountain pastures just unveiled from their winter snows. Above, in stern contrast, rose the unwatered hills, brown, bare, and lifeless. Our mid-day rest was under a tree by another stream, where we bought goat's milk from a friendly herd-boy who was watering his flocks.

In the evening, after turning aside to see a fine waterfall, we encamped at Zebdani, in a beautiful, rich, broad valley, dotted with many flourishing villages. On the height above us was perched the village of Blendan. Our tents were pitched on a green meadow, watered by two or three springs of cold pure water.

On Tuesday our path lay again by streams and fountains, until, crossing the watershed of the Anti-Libanus, we came to another river flowing in an opposite direction, towards the Mediterranean; a pleasant sight for us westward-bound travellers. When we left this river, we and our guide lost our way among the hills, until, after wandering many weary hours (we scarcely knew in what direction), quite by surprise, across a reach of the Cœle-Syrian plain, burst on our sight six enormous columns on a lofty pedestal of ruined masonry; the six characteristic columns of Baalbec. We entered the village, and were allowed to encamp within the ruins.

Palestine is not a land of ruins, but of ruinous heaps; and the extent of these magnificent remains, with their perfect preservation in parts, amazed us. In the Holy Land the most interesting and sacred places are scarcely marked by a few poor scattered stones; and here were ruined temples and dwellings worthy of the metropolis of an empire or the sanctuary of a religion. But the story was lacking! With all this grandeur no human associations are linked; no great name of man or nation is bound up with these wonderful walls. What the eye saw was grand beyond anything we had seen; but what the eye saw was all. It is useless to describe what drawing and description have made so familiar to us, and yet what neither drawing nor description can give any adequate idea of. It seemed to us more like a city of temples than one temple; and very solemn it was to sit still and see the gigantic shadows of the one almost perfect temple, and of the six grand columns remaining of another thrown across the great moonlit spaces of the courts, broken only here and there by enormous sculptured blocks, the remains of capital and fallen shaft.

On the next morning (Wednesday) we walked round the ruins, inside and outside, wondering at the size of the stones, and admiring the beauty of the proportions, and especially the broken doorway of the most perfect temple. The enormous mass of masonry on which these temples stand rises more like a hill than a building from the great Cœle-Syrian plain; and the vaults which lead through it are more like tunnels excavated through a mountain than blocks laboriously piled (as they must have been) one on another by human hands. We measured some stones 50 feet long. We lingered some time longer in the courts of the temple, and particularly by that beautiful broken porch, with its deeply sculptured roof, and the staircase beside it winding up through the wall. There was so much delicate work, such an extent and number of buildings to examine, that we found it difficult to leave; and yet before nightfall we must reach those hills whose outline lay so blue and faint against the sky, across the great plain.

We started a little after mid-day, and reached the mountains by sunset, after a ride of five hours, much of it at a gallop across the level. On our way we passed the quarry out of which Baalbec was hewn, and observed one gigantic block like those we had measured in the temple. Why was it, we asked ourselves, that this fragment of unfinished work impressed us more, and seemed to bring the past nearer than all the marvellous finished structures we had been surveying in the morning? Was it not because in such interrupted work you seem to read the past, not in the perfect but the present tense; in the active, not in the passive voice; not in its stately monumental repose, but in its actual everyday toil? How was that block brought so far? Why was it brought no further? What silenced that noisy work-place and scattered the workmen? That one stone in the quarry of Baalbec seemed to bring us more into the presence of the living men of its past generations, and stir our minds with more speculation as to their history than all its magnificent temples.

After this I remember no incident for the day, but only a swift galloping or a steady toiling across the burning plain, and noticing from time to time the lizards creep in and out under the shadow of the stones, brown as their hiding-places, taking literally (as we all do more or less, figuratively), the colour of their homes.

We encamped for the night by a stream near the Christian (Maronite) village of Zabdi. It was strangely familiar to hear once more the sound of a church bell, from the village church.

Our ride on Thursday, July the 17th, was through very fine mountain scenery, and along most perilous roads, or rather no roads. The paths seemed to us steeper, more slippery, and rougher than any we had yet traversed. Besides the fact of no roads ever being made or repaired, common to all Syria, the mountaineers of Lebanon have a perplexing custom of throwing all the large stones which they clear out of their vineyards on the pathway outside. We had become habituated to regarding the dry beds of torrents in the light of high roads; but on this part of the Lebanon, in several places, our path lay along actual flowing torrents, and up and down cascades. How the horses ascended and descended safely over those great slabs of rock, polished and actually covered by flowing water, is beyond explanation. But, if you trust them, these little Syrian horses will scramble successfully over anything; the only danger is, lest in a nervous apprehension you attempt to guide them, and so check the freedom of their movements, on which your safety depends. It is a greater wonder, still, how the heavily laden pack mules accomplish the journey; for this is the trading highway between Damascus and Beyrout, and yet, we were told, accidents are very rare.

Our rest in the hotel at Beyrout was very welcome to us, but we could not part without regret from the little patient horses which had carried us so bravely through many a toilsome mile. One consideration, however, helped to reconcile us. We were glad to have the prospect of travelling by means of machines, steamboats and trains, which the reckless carelessness and lazy indifference of Syrian muleteers could not hurt or distress. All our horses had sores, from the rubbing of saddles or packs when we started, which a little care soon healed; but one mare—a willing, faithful creature—died at Damascus, in consequence of bad shoeing and the over-driving of the obstinate Mukris. I shall never forget the mute appealing look of that poor brown mare, as they drove her with her wounded feet over the stones towards me; nor how forcibly it brought to my heart the words, "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, waiting for the adoption, to wit the redemption of the body."

We had rooms in the "Hotel de Bellevue," outside Beyrout, the provisional master of which, at the time, (under its widowed mistress) was Dmitri Karas, formerly dragoman to the author of "Eothen."

Friday and Saturday were spent in rest, leff, bathing, and sketching. From the broad roofed corridor of the hotel, at each end, we had most exquisite views; at one end, of the sea and hills; at the other of the beautiful blue expanse of the harbour of Beyrout, with the flat-roofed white houses relieved against the great mass of the Lebanon, which rose behind them in a grand sweep, from the sea to the clouds and the eternal snows.

Below us were two cottages, half hidden among orchards and gardens, with open wooden balconies. They were inhabited, the American consul told us, by two widows, a mother-in-law, and a daughter-in-law, both bereaved not long before by the cholera, and in great poverty, which it was a pleasure to all in the hotel to contribute a little to relieve. The consul told us how terrible it was, during the time of the cholera, to hear from that corridor the dreadful hopeless death-wails bursting from house after house.

We had to wait some days in the hotel for the French steamer. The views from our corridor during that time, of the sunsets over the Mediterranean, have left a deep impression on our minds. The after-glow, when the sun had set, was so beautiful; and then we seemed to see Night like a visible Presence slowly advancing and spreading her wings over the waters.

On Tuesday, July 22d, we embarked in the French steamer, for our coasting voyage by Asia Minor to Constantinople.

We were not allowed to land anywhere until we came to Rhodes, on account of the fever then prevailing on the coast. But we had ample opportunities for observing the coast during the many hours the vessel lay off the various ports. Those little white towns on the narrow levels near the sea, at the base of the great mountain ranges, are the natural homes of fever, in such a climate.

On Wednesday, we lay some hours off Latakia, of tobacco celebrity, and Tripoli, the last place the Crusaders held on the Asiatic shores, which looked very picturesque with its white houses, and ruined towers, relieved against a background of wooded mountains.

On Friday, we spent some hours in sight of Mersina, once the port of Tarsus. Beyond that range of volcanic conical hills, with truncated summits, cleft by rugged chasms, and broken into fantastic crags, lay the home of our own apostle, the Apostle of the Gentiles. Through that ravine which cleft the mountains, just behind the town of Mersina, he had doubtless journeyed again and again. And by these shores he had coasted, with his heart full of the infant Churches he had founded in those sea-port towns, or among the mountains.

Much of the coast, especially near Cape Khelidoni, struck us as extremely fine in outline; the forms of the hills were so bold and varied.

At Rhodes, we landed and spent some hours in exploring the fortifications and the city. It was interesting, after seeing the final seat of the Knights of St. John at Malta, and the ruinous building opposite the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem which gave them their title of the Knights Hospitallers, to visit the fertile island where they reigned so proudly as the Knights of Rhodes.

On the whole, the Turks are satisfactory keepers of ruins, when only the picturesque is regarded; because, if they have not energy to repair, neither have they enterprise to alter. Thus, in the streets of Rhodes you can recall the old inhabitants with little effort of imagination. Their dwellings and fortifications are too strongly built for time, in this pure, dry air, to have had much power over them. The city is full of relics of the knights. The street architecture strongly resembles that of Malta. Projecting balconies, roofed in with lattices, as at Valetta; beautiful carved mouldings and coats of arms, cut in imperishable stone, each line as sharp, and each edge as white and fresh, as when the sculptor's chisel left it four centuries ago. We went up the silent street of the knights, and into the houses of the different "languages," still marked by their characteristic armorial bearings—the fleur de lys, the lion, or the papal keys; and unforbidden we rambled around the ancient fortifications, saw the cannons of the knights, left there after the siege; the three moats, the three walls, the drawbridges,—medieval Christian work, all now in Moslem hands. The arches and walls were very solid, and the mouldings beautifully delicate. The favourite device seemed to be a twisted rope. We were permitted, without difficulty, to enter the old cathedral, now transformed into a mosque by the simple process of adding to the altar-steps, so as to make them front towards Mecca, in a line diagonal to the walls, and covering them with prayer-mats and Persian rugs. The fine granite columns are plastered over, and the Mohammedan's abhorrence against idolatry has been appeased by mutilating or removing the faces of the knightly effigies, which still lie headless by the walls. The Mohammedanism which is so fanatical and fierce in Damascus and other cities of the East, seems merely to lie like a dull, dead weight on Rhodes, shrouding it with that peculiar silence characteristic of Moslem cities; the silence of cities in which there are no homes and no churches, and in which the women creep about in black or white veils, like shrouded ghosts, afraid of daylight.

The two harbours are fine, but too shallow for modern ships of war. Long after we had re-embarked, and had passed Rhodes, the white towers of the old Christian fortifications gleamed across the deep blue of the sea.

Early at break of day on the morning after leaving Rhodes, we were called on deck to see the shores of Patmos. The sun was rising behind the island, and strongly relieving against the golden sky the long, bare, hard outline of its crags, crowned by the line of the monastery, in a cave beneath which (tradition says) St. John lived during his banishment. It was most interesting to stand silently on the deck, and watch the sun rise behind the rocks on which the last vision of heavenly glory was vouchsafed to mortal eyes; where the Apocalypse was beheld, and the whole Book of Revelation solemnly closed.

Several small islands, or isolated rocks, stand near Patmos, which looked very beautiful in the morning light.

These Greek islands were a fairy-land of beauty at sunrise and sunset, reminding me of that story of our childhood, of the child's journey into the fairy country, where one palace was of topaz, another of porphyry, another of ruby, another of gold or pearl. As we passed in and out among them, one island rose behind another from the deep blue sea with the most exquisite variety of tints and forms; the warm glow of sunset on some of the peaks, and on others the loveliest delicate greys, fading into pearl in the distance. All hues were there,—glowing, blushing, golden violet, opal, grey; and all varieties of beautiful outline,—soft, curved, bold, angular,—blended as in the curves and angles of Greek carving; whilst between them glided in and out the white sails of the Greek fishing-boats, with their picturesque curves, like the spread wings of birds. We felt we were entering the home of the race to whom it was given to interpret the beauty of God's world to other men.

The shores of these islands, when you come close to them, are for the most part mere barren crags; but the forms and colours, especially at evening and morning, are most enchanting. It is as if the sea had inundated a magnificent mountain chain, the peaks of which are converted into islands, and its rich plains and valleys into a plain of blue heaving waters.

In the interior, they say, some of these islands are fertile; but the war of the Greek revolution has depopulated them sadly; and nothing can ever revive under Turkish rule. Scio has many green spots on it, and houses are visible here and there from the sea; but, we were told, the Turkish massacres had reduced the population from 110,000 to 6000.

On July the 19th our way lay still on and on among the Greek islands, and by the mountainous shores of Asia Minor, until we rounded a headland and found ourselves in the Bay of Smyrna. As we approached the bay the coasts of Asia became more green. Little villages appeared nestling in the clefts of the rocks, their white roofs contrasting with the cypress groves in which they were embosomed, while beneath stretched green terraces and slopes.

The Bay of Smyrna is very fine in its deep, broad expanse, with the varied outline of its mountain shores here and there clothed with wood (which looked luxuriant after the craggy Greek islands), and dotted with villages either level with the shores among the cypresses, or guarding the terraced vineyards on the hills. The town of Smyrna at the head of the bay is very picturesque from the sea, with its large groves of fine cypresses, breaking the white clusters of houses which climb the hill, crowned by the old Genoese castle.

We were glad to land; and on Wednesday we rode on donkeys to the summit of the hill, where the Genoese castle commands the town and bay. Below us lay a fertile valley, watered by a river whose windings we could trace for many miles. It was twice crossed by the arches of a ruined Roman aqueduct. How characteristic the ruins left by the Greeks and Romans are! The exquisitely proportioned temple or the amphitheatre of the Greek cities; the massive aqueduct and bridge, or, the imperishable road of the Romans, how expressive they are of the races whose several dominant ideas seem to have been beauty and power.

In coasting among these shores and islands one is also continually impressed with the energetic life which must have stirred in the Italian mercantile republics of the middle ages. In every good trading station on the Levant, you find the solid masonry which indicates the presence of these enterprising little communities. The ruins of Genoese or Venetian fortresses command the seaports, whilst Italian is still the commercial language of all the Mediterranean shores.

But a memory far more distant in time came nearer to our hearts—To the Church, the living, believing Church of this city of Smyrna, the Divine Epistle was addressed, not from apostle or evangelist, but direct from Him who liveth, was dead, and behold he is alive for evermore.

"And unto the angel of the Church of Smyrna write; These things saith the First and the Last, which was dead, and is alive; I know thy works, and tribulation, and poverty (but thou art rich), and I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan. Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer: behold the devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation ten days: be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.

"He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the Churches. He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death."

And here, in the next century, Polycarp was faithful unto death, and has received (although, indeed, not here) the crown of life.

Smyrna was the last place we visited, which is distinctly and definitely mentioned in the Bible. On account of the unsettled state of Greece at that time we did not land at Athens or Corinth. But even in Smyrna, Athens, and Corinth the associations are interesting to us, not on account of their dissimilarity from our ordinary life, but of their resemblance to it. We are entering the region, not of visible divine manifestations, but of Church history, although of Church history written by divinely inspired men. Here, therefore, the narrative of our Wanderings over Bible Lands and Seas may naturally end.

HOURS WITH LIVING PREACHERS.

"THEY SHALL WALK WITH ME IN WHITE."

REV. III. 4.

WHAT is the exact import of this wonderful promise? It is worth our while to study it; for it is the character of God's promises, the closer they are looked at, the more they are accurately examined, by so much the more rich and the more glorious do they appear. White, I would first call you to observe, is everywhere the colour, so to speak; the livery of heaven; and more noticeably in this book than in any other; for we read here of the "white stone," the "white horses," the "white robes," the "white cloud," the "white linen," the "white throne;" Rev. ii. 17; vi. 2; xix. 14; vi. 11; xiv. 14; xix. 14; xx. 21). But not in this book alone. It is the same, though not to the same extent, everywhere else. Do angels appear to men, and are we told anything of their outward appearance, they are clothed in white: so the angel at the sepulchre, he is clothed, according to St. Mark, "in a long white garment" (xvi. 5); and in St. Matthew, his raiment is "white as snow" (xxviii. 3). And these last words lead me to observe, that the white of heaven is not that dull dead hue, rather the absence of colour than anything else, which, on this poor earth of ours, sometimes goes by this name; but the heavenly white is a shining white. The angel whom St. Matthew and St. Mark describe as clothed in white, is said in St. Luke to have been "in shining garments" (xxiv. 4), as that angel who appeared to Cornelius was clothed "in bright clothing" (Acts x. 30). Compare with these notices the several records of our Lord's transfiguration. Take, for instance, St. Mark's: "His raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow, so as no fuller on earth can white them" (ix. 3).

What shall we understand by these shining garments of Christ and of the angels, and the promise of the same to the perfected saints in glory? The language recurs too often to allow us to explain it away, or resolve it into a mere figure, while yet we cannot ascribe a literal fulfilment to such words; for, as we all must feel sure, there can be properly no garments in heaven. These pertain only to the necessities, the humiliation, the pride, of our present existence. The Scriptures which speak of the white raiment of the saints or of the angels may best be understood by such an utterance as that of the Psalmist, where of God he says, "Thou deckest thyself with light, as it were with a garment," (Ps. civ. 2, Pr.-B.) Light, then, is itself a garment; and the spiritual, or glorified body—that, no doubt, and nothing else—shall be the garment of light, the white raiment of the saints, to which such frequent allusion is made. Nothing outside of them, nothing now to be taken up and now laid down, but the very bodies which they wear,—bodies in which mortality shall have been for ever swallowed up in life,—shall contain in themselves the fulfilment of this promise of the Lord. They too, like him, shall then be light, and in them, as in him, there shall be then no darkness at all; and, in sign and token of this,—of sin overcome, of the very dregs of sin for ever cast out,—they, as he, shall clothe themselves, or rather shall have been clothed by him, with light as with a garment.

Friends and brethren! do these promises move us? have they any attraction for us? would we fain have these bodies of weakness and dishonour, of sin and death, which we bear about with us now, these bodies of our humiliation, transformed and transfigured into the likeness of Christ's body of glory? And if we would, how may this be, and how shall this be attained? I will endeavour to give a reply.

And, first, while those garments of light, that vesture of life, is only put on in the day of the Lord Jesus, it is not for all this something wholly disconnected from that body, that investiture of the soul, which now we wear; and we must above all things beware of regarding it so. This body rather is the germ and seed of that; and, as the butterfly from the worm, that must unfold itself from this. But these present garments of our souls, what spots, what stains, what defilements are upon them! How little is there in them which gives pledge of such an issue! how much that seems to give pledge of a very different issue from this! One thing, then, is sure—only those garments which have been made white in the blood of the Lamb will show white upon that day. If, then, we would walk with Christ in white then and for evermore, the first condition for this is, that we come with a heart-felt "Woe is me!" with the confession, "Unclean, unclean!" to that Rock which was cleft for us; to that sacred Side which was pierced for us; and in the water and the blood which flowed out from thence, in the one fountain open for uncleanness, wash away all our guilty stains. And this not once, but continually; drawing near again and again, that we may be partakers of that precious blood of sprinkling; again and again crying, as those who need an ever-repeated cleansing, "Purge me with hyssop,"—the hyssop, that is, which has been dipped in the blood (Lev. xiv. 6, 7),—"and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." Know you anything, O my friends, of such a coming as this to Christ; of such a washing of your garments now in the blood of the immaculate Lamb? Unless you do, be sure of this, you will never know what it is to have those glorious garments of which Christ speaks in my text given you, and to walk with him in his heavenly kingdom. They who have not purified themselves on the third day, on the seventh they shall not be clean; that third day being this time that now is, the seventh the eternal Sabbath that shall be (Numbers xix. 12).

But this is not all. This is the first condition, but it is by no means the only one. The garments which have been made white in the blood of the Lamb, we must subsequently keep them, to the best of our ability, from all after spots and stains; for Christ is not a minister of unrighteousness, but a minister of righteousness and of holiness; he came to bless us in turning us away from our iniquities,—to save us from our sins, and not to save us in our sins, which surpasses even his power. When I say, "to the best of our ability," you must not misunderstand me. I do not mean to the best of our natural ability; for in spiritual things, in the things of God, natural ability is no ability at all. I refer to the ability which comes directly from him, which is his immediate gift and grace; and I say that to the best of this our ability, that is, by stirring up his gift which is in us, we must endeavour to keep our garments—in other words, to keep ourselves—unspotted from the world. See what is said in the verse immediately preceding my text, "Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments;" and then follow the words, "and they shall walk with me in white; for they are worthy." Note who they are that shall walk with him in white. Such as "have not defiled their garments," such as have hated the garments spotted by the flesh. And why these? "For they are worthy." Scripture does not shrink from this language, "they are worthy," and therefore neither should we. There is a worthiness in God's saints, a meetness or fitness for the inheritance of the saints in light;—though that worthiness is itself of God's free giving, would never have been at all unless he had implanted it; and not merely of his giving, but also of his most gracious allowing, in that, for Christ's sake, and having respect to his perfect obedience, God allows that which of itself would not for an instant have endured his searching gaze. I am afraid we sometimes shrink from this language, from dwelling on words like these, "They shall walk with me in white, for they are worthy," not, as perhaps we fancy, out of any jealousy for God's honour, not out of any fear lest the entire freeness of the salvation which is by Christ Jesus should be called into question, and some other merits mingled with his; but because declarations like these imply that there must be an earnest watching against sin on our part, a striving to cleanse ourselves from all impurities of flesh and spirit, that without holiness no man shall see God. But so it is. There are some that will walk with Christ in white, and it is those who are worthy. Are you candidates for these garments of light? You hear, not from my lips, but from the lips of the Lord, the sole conditions on which they may be yours.

And this holiness,—seek it, I would beseech you, not at its outward circumference, but in its central point, in Christ; let him dwell in your hearts; let Christ be in you, the hope of glory. What a phrase of inexhaustible wonder is that of the apostle, “Christ in you, the hope of glory” (Col. i. 27); and how directly does it bear on this very matter which has occupied us to-day! If these white garments indicate the future glorification of the bodies of God’s saints, how can those bodies pass through this transcendent change, how can they be transmuted and glorified, except through the mighty power of Christ, of Christ dwelling in them, subduing all things to himself, and himself effecting this marvellous transformation? Not else assuredly. Thus Christ in us is our “hope of glory.” He is the pledge of a glory that shall be; a glory that is hidden now, but shall be manifest hereafter; according to that other word of St. Paul in the same epistle, “When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory” (Col. iii. 4). The faith, the love, the truth, the purity, which were in God’s saints, which Christ by his Spirit had wrought in them, but which were all more or less concealed from the eyes of others, yea, and from their own, by the covering of the flesh, the earthen vessel in which this treasure was contained, shall then burst through the covering which concealed them; shall then flash forth, as Gideon’s lamps flashed forth when the pitchers which had hid them hitherto were broken (Judges vii. 19). That which was before inward shall in that day of manifestation become also outward, visible, seen of all men. “Then shall the righteous shine forth;—observe that “shine forth,” for it is exactly that which I would press upon you;—they, many of them God’s hidden ones till that day, shall “then shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father,” living epistles of Christ, shut once, but opened now, and to be read of all men. Christ in you, Christ in you now, he is the one hope, the one pledge, of such a glory to be revealed in you hereafter; so, and so only, will you ever walk with him in white.

And if not in white, how else? and if not with Him, with whom? Ah, brethren, there is a sadder, a sterner side of this truth of my text, and I must not, I dare not, wholly overlook or omit it. Those who have not overcome the world, those who have defiled their garments, and never sought to cleanse them again, in what shall they be clothed?

They also shall be clothed with their bodies, for there is a resurrection of condemnation no less than a resurrection of life; but those bodies, dark and not luminous, ugly and not beautiful, shameful and not glorious, food for the undying worm, and fuel for the unquenchable fire; for they are bodies which shall have stamped and written upon them, to be read of men, to be read of angels, the hideous records of all the evil which was done in them, which was done by them. Would you willingly be clothed with such bodies as these? Would you rise, as the prophet Daniel declares to us some will rise, to shame and everlasting contempt; not one evil thing which you have ever thought, or spoken, or done, but, having left its mark, its stamp, its scar, its cicatrice behind, then visible to every eye? I know you would not. Would you be content to have the polluted garment of sinful flesh cleaving to you for evermore, making you one pollution? I know you would not. And yet I say to you (would that one might leave it unsaid, would that it were not to say!), that if you, if any of you here, is a lover of pleasures rather than a lover of God, choosing friendship with the world and enmity with God, walking after the flesh and not after the Spirit; much more, if you are allowing yourself in any open, in any secret sin, which plainly separates you from Christ and the benefits of his salvation,—you are in fact choosing all this, choosing this shame, this dishonour, this contempt, this scorn, this tribulation, this anguish; when you might have chosen glory, honour, immortality, to stand before the throne, to see his face who sits upon it, to have his name written in your forehead, to walk with Christ in those white and shining garments which saints and angels wear.—R. C. Trench, D.D.

MATERIALS FOR INTERCESSORY PRAYER.

MANY of our readers must be acquainted with the Memorials issued nearly twenty years ago by the late Mr. Robert Wodrow of Glasgow, with the view of engaging believers extensively throughout the world in united prayer, during a certain fixed period, for the kingdom of God. Long after the specified period had passed away, it seemed to some that the Memorials possessed much more than a passing value; and at their instance one of the papers, embracing also some portions of the other, has recently been issued under the title of “Materials for Daily Intercessory Prayer.”* In a preface to the little book, written by the Rev. C. J. Brown, Edinburgh (the interest taken by whom in the “Memorials” must be regarded as an ample guarantee of their high merit), we find the following:—

“The Christian world has of late become happily familiar with invitations to united prayer for a fixed and specified period, such as were those Memorials, in their original form and design. And there can be no reasonable doubt that the Hearer of prayer has condescended to own them, to acknowledge such concerts for prayer, not only by inclining very large numbers of his people, in different parts of the world, to take part in them, but by pouring his Spirit forth, and reviving his work in the midst of the years, in answer to the prayers offered. Without at all questioning this, however, or questioning the desirableness of renewing such invitations still from time to time, is it not clear that one leading, though indirect, benefit resulting from them—apart from which, indeed, it might well be doubted if they had answered any very important end at all—is the stirring up of the children of God to increased intercessory prayer from day to day, and without reference to limited periods? There would still remain ample room for invitations and agreements for more special prayer during special periods, over and above. But how desirable and how blessed, if the spirit of large-hearted intercessory prayer evoked during the more limited periods were, to some considerable extent at least, to abide, and become the spirit of the Christian's devotional exercises every day!

"The writer is deeply persuaded, however, that in order to so desirable an end, some such outlines, or hints, or materials of prayer, as the following pages offer, would be found of essential and manifold service, in the hand of 'the Spirit of grace and of supplications.' Without approaching anything like a form of prayer (which it is presumed that even those attached to the use of a liturgy in public worship would perceive to be quite inapplicable here), there is more than room, surely, in connection with the wide field of intercessory prayer, for such aids as would be afforded, equally to the memory and to the affections, in the fixing of the eye daily, in the course of secret devotion, on some judicious outline of matters, interspersed with carefully selected Scripture references.

"Of course, the measure of attention that could be bestowed on such an outline would vary much, according to different circumstances. But, in the first place, the use of it at all would secure the bringing up before the mind, day by day, of great matters of prayer too apt to be overlooked without such an aid to memory; and, further, the hints offered in connection with the different subjects, and the passages of the word of God noted under each, could scarce fail to be helpful towards some intelligent and lively earnestness of desire, in pleading with the Lord in reference to them. No doubt believers are very variously circumstanced in respect of leisure, some being able, with no less desire, to occupy much less time in secret prayer than others. It is hard to say, however, which class would profit most by availing themselves, more or less, of such materials as are offered in these pages. Those who have greater leisure would be able to make more prolonged and deliberate use of them. But they would essentially save and economize the more limited time of others, by the more speedy calling up of the various great subjects before the mind."

The "Materials" are arranged in seven sections, namely,—1. The Second Coming of Christ (The Lord's Day). 2. Glory of the Latter day—Conversion of Israel (Monday). 3. Present State of the World (Tuesday). 4. The Children of God everywhere (Wednesday). 5. The Family—The Young—Sabbath Schools (Thursday). 6. The Nation (Friday). 7. Means of Grace—The Ministry—Effusion of the Spirit—Revival (Saturday). A section being thus provided for every day of the week, should any desire to use it thus definitely and regularly.

It is also interleaved, with a view to private pencil jottings regarding any of the subjects of prayer embraced in the different sections. We have special pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to the little book. It is "a solid ingot, small in bulk, but with valid mint mark, and precious in every grain of it." The Memorial concludes:—

"If, when the primitive Church assembled with one accord in one place at Jerusalem, the Holy Spirit was remarkably poured out in answer to their united prayers, what might we not expect if all Christians throughout the world were agreed together as concerning what they should ask, every day, and not for some specified days merely, from time to time? If, in answer to the prayers of the one hundred and twenty disciples, the Pentecostal first-fruits were given, might we not hope that the full harvest would be reaped, when myriads came in one body, daily, to the throne of grace—all guided by the same Spirit of adoption—all pleading the finished work of Immanuel—and praying that he, the adorable Redeemer, might see of the travail of his soul, and be fully satisfied.

"God be merciful unto us, and bless us; and cause his face to shine upon us: that thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations. Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee. O let the nations be glad, and sing for joy; for thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth. Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee. Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, even our own God, shall bless us. God shall bless us; and all the ends of the earth shall fear him" (Ps. lxvii).

THE MEANING OF THE WORD APOSTASY.

APOSTASY is a word frequent in the language and literature of the Church. It began to be used in the early days, when Roman proconsuls besought Christian confessors to "have pity on their grey hairs," and not suffer themselves to be torn by rack and fire for the sake of an unseen King. It brands the haughty intellectual forehead of that emperor, who after the Roman world had outwardly submitted itself to Christ, cast off allegiance to the Galilean, and sought to make the shadow move backwards on the world's dial-plate. But the original meaning of the word is not generally known, and it is interesting and instructive.

It seems to be derived, as so many important New Testament phrases are, from the great system of ancient slavery. A Greek slave was the absolute chattel of his master; he was, as Aristotle tells us, a "living working-tool and possession." And he was a slave for life, and his children after him. There was only one way of escape—his master might set him free. When this happened, he no longer owed service to his master; but that he owed him the highest respect and gratitude, was enforced not only by public sentiment but by the law. His former master became now his "patron," and he was known as his "freedman;" and the ancient mind looked with peculiar abhorrence at any failure in due attachment on his part to his emancipator. When anything of this sort happened it was technically called apostasy; and any flagrant instance of it (especially, we are told, the offence of choosing another patron) was punished in an action called apostasíou díktē. By this action the freedman who had seceded from his emancipator was condemned to return to his original state, and was publicly sold into slavery.

How graphically these stern public laws of Greece illustrate the nature of apostasy! Whom the Son of God sets free are free indeed: the only yoke he imposes on them is a yoke of love. And this yoke the true-hearted freedman of Christ delights to wear; even as that apostle, who so often boasts of his liberty, delights to commence his epistle as "Paul, the slave of Jesus Christ." Our Lord, who has absolute power over us by creation, and a double title by redemption, has yet said to such as we are, "Henceforth I call you not servants (slaves), but friends;" but the response of the emancipated heart to him is, "O Lord, truly I am thy servant, thy servant and the son of thy handmaid; thou hast loosed my bonds." I am thy servant, though thou hast loosed my bonds; thy servant, because thou hast loosed my bonds. So Christ's freedmen on earth, the whole clientela of his Church, gratefully crowd his courts here, and wait for his glory to be revealed.

"Then said Apollyon, Thou hast done in this according to the proverb, changed a bad for a worse; but it is ordinary for those that have professed themselves his servants, after awhile to give him the slip, and return again to me." The father of lies spoke a bitter truth. John Bunyan can hardly have known the Greek law of the Libertus, but his conception of apostasy is as true as if he had. There are those who weary of that service which is perfect freedom,—there are those who go from the service of Christ to the service of Corruption; and the last state of those men is worse than the first. Not that our Redeemer-Lord will count every unworthy backsliding and sin of his people a reason for casting them away into deserved perdition; nor yet that he will permit those who are truly his people to fall into such backsliding and sin as would separate them from him. Apollyon makes it an argument in his warfare with them, "Thou hast already been unfaithful in thy service to him;" and enumerates the "fainting," the "sinful sleep," the "terror at sight of the lions," the "wrong ways" to get rid of the burden, and the "inward desire of vain glory" which have deformed the pilgrim's course, as reasons why he should despair of acceptance at the hands of a holy lord. But he whom Christ loves is made wise to reply, "All this is true, and much more which thou hast left out; but the Prince whom I serve and honour is merciful and ready to forgive." It is still his Prince whom he serves and honours, though he has failed to serve him as he ought. There has been no turning away, no choosing of another patron, no apostasy. But there are some who do turn away. There are those who with full purpose of heart do turn away from Christ to another master, or to other masters. When this is done in the heart, it is apostasy before God; when it is evidenced by some act before men, that is apostasy among men. No change of creed, no separation from the Church, no inconsistencies of conduct, can properly be branded as apostasy, unless in the judgment of charity they amount to this—a public breaking with the Lord Jesus Christ as master and Lord, and taking up a position over against him among the ranks of darkness. But there are those who do thus even publicly break away from Christ, and become liable even among men, like those Greek freedmen, to the indictment of apostasy. And there are those who are in the same position whom no one accuses, except their own heart and God who is greater. No indictment is filed against them on earth, but their judgment now of a long time lingereth not. "The avenging deities," as the Greek proverb assures us, "are shod with wool." "The mills of God grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small."

And how truly does this Greek metaphor of "apostasy" represent not only the nature of the crime but the nature of the punishment! "While they promise them liberty," says the apostle Peter, "they themselves are the servants of corruption; for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought into bondage. For if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning. For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them." It had been better for them:—for now, aiming at liberty from Christ's easy yoke, they become the bond-slaves of evil. In their own eyes, and in those of some around them, they may seem to be freer than before, having cut Christ's bands asunder, and cast his cords from them. But in God's eyes, and in the eyes of all spirits, good and evil, who see through the untroubled atmosphere of eternity, they have solemnly and publicly, before the gaze of the invisible universe, sold themselves into slavery, and have fallen back into the realm of corruption, and under the power of its ghastly king.

LITTLE SHOES AND STOCKINGS.

LITTLE shoes and stockings!

What a tale ye speak,
Of the swollen eyelid,
And the tear-wet cheek!
Of the nightly vigil,
And the daily prayer;
Of the buried darling,
Present everywhere.

Brightly plaided stockings,
Of the finest wool ;
Rounded feet and dainty,
Each, a stocking full ;
Tiny shoes of crimson,
Shoes that nevermore
Will awaken echoes,
From the toy-strewn floor.

Not the wealth of Indies,
Could your worth eclipse,
Priceless little treasures,
Pressed to whitened lips ;
As the mother nurses,
From the world apart,
Leaning on the arrow
That has pierced her heart.

Head of flaxen ringlets ;
Eyes of heaven's blue,
Parted mouth—a rosebud—
Pearls, just peeping through ;
Soft arms, softly twining
Round her neck at eve,
Little shoes and stockings,
These the dreams ye weave.

Weave her yet another
Of the world of bliss,
Let the stricken mother
Turn away from this ;
Bid her dream believing
Little feet await,
Watching for her passing,
Through the pearly gate.

THE YOUNG ROMANIST.

SEVEN years ago last autumn, James Gordon and his young son left Ireland for America. They were Romanists, and the young Jamie, who was a very bright lad of fifteen years, had been intended by his mother for the priesthood. Through the exertions of her brother, who was himself a Romish priest, the boy had been kept for about four years at the Irish national school, where he had made respectable proficiency. But Jamie's father had a serious "falling out" with the priestly uncle, and, in a moment of revenge, resolved to disappoint his plans for the boy by taking him to America. In vain the mother protested against this sudden scheme. The father insisted that he had never liked the plan of giving up his only son to the Church, and appealed to the boy himself, whose secret wishes for a more active life he had long suspected, to second his resolution. Jamie cordially consented, and they sailed in the first ship which they could reach.

The vessel proved to be one of the poorest of her class. She leaked badly, and their passage across the ocean was long, uncomfortable, and perilous. To add to the hardships of the voyage, their fellow-travellers had learned the reason of their hasty adieu to old Ireland, and regarded them as renegades. Some of the more superstitious even upbraided them as the cause of their delay and danger, and hinted that these despisers of the Church and priesthood must be cast out if they were ever to reach the land in safety. It was not, then, strange when at last the miserable ship was wrecked within sight of its destination, and the boats were already overlaiden with struggling masses, that Gordon and his son were loudly declared to be Jonahs, and refused admission. The father could not swim, and found a watery grave. Jamie was not an expert swimmer, but he clung to a bit of board, and was picked up by a fishing-smack, which brought him into Boston.

He was in a strange country, penniless, ragged, and nearly starved. But the Father of the fatherless was watching over him. It had been the purpose of the elder Gordon to seek at the Irish Employment Office a situation for himself and Jamie. The boy tried to follow his father's plan. But his inquiry for a clerkship, though made of one of his own nation and faith, was answered by such an unmistakable look of scorn and derision, that he desisted at once from his purpose. He was leaving the office, when a kind-hearted farmer, who had been seeking help there, accosted him : "What's the matter, lad? You look as if the world went hard with you." "I am fatherless, friendless, and starving," was the boy's abrupt reply. "Well, the last trouble can be quickly cured. Come with me." Jamie followed to an eating-house, where the farmer's purse provided him with the first plentiful meal which he had eaten for many days. Then his story was kindly listened to, and he was offered a temporary refuge in the country with his new friend. "If you are a good boy, and try to do well, you shall not want a home," said farmer Brown. Tears of gratitude chased from Jamie's cheeks the look of despair they had worn ; and when that evening he knelt beside his protector at the household altar, and heard himself fervently commended to the orphan's God, he felt that there was true religion even among Protestants.

The farmer's wife was tenderly interested in the fatherless boy ; and when he frankly told her that "he had no idea Protestants would show such kindness to a Catholic," she affectionately entreated him to lay aside his prejudices, read the Bible for himself, and judge what is truth by its divine and infallible tests. He could not refuse so reasonable a request from one who had fed and clothed him as if he had been a child of her own. So when she gave him a new and handsome copy of the holy book, he applied himself diligently to its perusal. Jamie was a good reader, and Mrs. Brown frequently asked him to read aloud to her while she plied the needle in making or mending for him. He was a boy of quick perceptions, and the shrewdness with which he often made a practical application of what he read, astonished his new friends. "Indade, ma'am," said the lad one day, after reading the Saviour's parable of the good Samaritan, "sure and this story is like my own. And did not my own people leave me to die, both in the water and on the land? And don't I know who it was that did bind up my poor bleeding heart, and gave not only the twopence from their purse, but the labour of their hands to relieve me? And doesn't the blessed Jesus say, 'Ye shall know them by their fruits?' Sure and it's myself can see which has best fulfilled the command, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.'" More eagerly still did Jamie treasure up the sacred word; and soon he expressed a wish to attend Protestant worship, and hear its truths explained and enforced. He was a most attentive hearer in the sanctuary; and when he became connected with the Sabbath school, his interest in the instructions of his teacher was earnest and constant. Availing himself of its excellent library, he read the history of the Reformation, and other kindred works. Diligently comparing them with the Bible, and faithfully contrasting both with what he knew of his own faith and its fruits, he was soon led intelligently, and upon full conviction, to renounce his errors, and embrace the Protestant faith.

In the fervour of his zeal he immediately commenced an earnest effort for the conversion of his mother. But his affectionate letter of explanation and entreaty was answered by a torrent of indignation, abuse, and anathemas. She called him a renegade from his Church and his home, charged him with the responsibility of having caused his father's death, and thus reduced her to widowhood and penury; and while she upbraided him for desertion and neglect, solemnly disowned him as her child, and forbade all further communication from him. This was a sore and bitter trial to Jamie, but it did not shake his convictions of truth, or move him from his trust in God; neither did it extinguish his affection for his mother, and his desire both for her temporal and spiritual welfare. For the latter, indeed, he could only pray, but to promote the former he conscientiously devoted every penny of his small earnings which his necessities would allow him to spare. Regularly he sent her thus the fruits of his toil during several successive years.

At length a malignant fever carried her off. And then the duteous son was cheered with a message from her dying lips; a message of grateful acknowledgment for his faithful and loving ministry to her wants, a retraction of all her harsh words and bitter accusations, and a hope expressed that Jamie's God was her God, and they should worship in heaven together. Jamie Gordon is not known by the name which the writer has given him. But in his earnest and useful labours as a colporteur among his own countrymen in a western city, he is greatly blessed and truly honoured.—American Messenger.

MISSIONARY FRAGMENTS.

I.—SACRIFICES OF HEATHEN CONVERTS.

CAVILLERS sometimes assert that the proselytes made by missionaries are influenced by hopes of social advancement or pecuniary gain. The following incident, told by one of the Orissa missionaries, will show how a convert enlightened a British officer, who had that opinion:—

I was in the tent of a British officer, who said to me, "I believe your coming to India is a regular forlorn hope."

"I should believe the same," was my reply, "only God has promised to accompany all I do in his name."

"But," he added, "the Hindoos won't make Christians; they are so cunning, they are downright liars. I would not believe a Hindoo was a Christian, if I saw him."

I told him I had some good native converts that I should like him to see.

"Well," he replied, "I should like to see them, and I would show them up to you."

Just then our missionary, Gongga, who had been a Brahmin, was coming up the walk to the tent, and I said to the officer, "Here is one of our native preachers coming; perhaps you would like to show him up."

"Well," he said, "I should like to ask him a few questions."

I said to Gongga, in the native tongue, "This gentleman don't believe in your Christianity."

"Well, I can't help that," said Gongga, the lordliness of his Brahminical character breaking out.

"He wants to ask you a few questions."

"What is it he wants to ask me questions for? Does he want to know the reason of the hope there is in me, or to find fault?" Softening, he added, "Let the gentleman ask me any questions, and I am prepared to answer them."

The first question the officer put, was, "How did you get your living before you were a Christian?"

Gongga did not quite understand this, and he said, "Sir, I was an officiating Brahmin."

"But how did you get your living? Tell me that."

Now just suppose that somebody were to stop the carriage of a gentleman with lawn sleeves, as it was passing along the streets of London, and say to him, "How do you get your living?" It might be a very awkward question for him to answer, but it would be known very well that he did have a good living. And the officer ought to have understood the case of the Brahmin in the same way. When he did understand that brother Gongga had had the temple revenues and the offerings of the people, and that he had given them up to become a Christian, he said—

"Well, I did not expect that, anyhow."

He wanted to show that this man had become a Christian, just to get a living.

Old Gongga then related the history of his conversion.

He was first impressed with the statements he had found in a religious tract, which led him to put Jugger-naut to the test whether he were a god or not. First he spent a whole day and night in praying to him, and then he spent the same length of time in cursing him. "Nothing came of it," said Gongga, "and I did not believe he was a god ; but to make it more certain still, I went and poked him with a spear, and my arm was not withered."

Then he told of the happy change which had come over his own feelings, and how by faith in Christ he had a good hope through grace.

The tears stood in the officer's eyes, and he seized Gongga's black hand, saying, "God bless you ! I am glad to have met with you !"

Then it was Gongga's turn. "You have claimed the right," said he to the officer, "to examine me ; and now, perhaps, you will allow me to examine you a little. You came from a Christian country,—you call yourself a Christian ; now I want to ask if you are really a Christian ?"

The officer got up and walked into an inner room. Gongga followed him, saying in a gentle voice, "I did not mean to offend you, and I would only ask you as a Christian, to pray to God that I may be found faithful unto death."

I am happy to tell you that officer dated his conversion to God from that time.

II.—THE MINE LAID.

SOME time ago, I happened to be in a slate quarry, and saw a man there suspended by a rope tied to a tree or a pole sunk at the summit of the mountain. He descended by the rope till he came to an abutting crag of the quarry, and there, with his feet upon a ledge of rock, he remained for some time, boring a hole in the rock. He spent a large portion of the day in this manner, boring a hole perhaps two inches or thereabouts, in circumference. After giving much toil and many hours of hard labour to boring this hole, I saw him afterwards fill it up with black dust. Now, if I had not known what that black dust was, I should have said, "What a simpleton this man is to spend his strength, and energy, and time, in boring a hole and then filling it up with black dust !" But I knew that that black dust was powder. And by-and-by he strikes a light and applies it to the fusee, and whilst it is burning downwards in the direction of the powder, he seizes hold of the rope and seeks safety in distance ; for by the time he has reached his place of safety, the fire has burned down to the powder, and then there is a mighty blast, and tons of stone are brought down.

What was done in that quarry, the missionaries have to a great extent done in India ! They have been boring at the rock of heathenism, and have deposited in the hole they have made, the powder of God's truth until the mighty rock is all underlaid with that divine powder.

We want now the fire from heaven ; for when the spirit of fire descends, there will be a mighty rending of that rock, and stones will be gathered to adorn the temple of our God.—Rev. R. Roberts.

ALPHA AND OMEGA.

ALPHA and Omega !

Be thou my first and last :

The source whence I descend,

The joy to which I tend,

When earth is past.

Open my waking eyes,

And fill them with thy light ;

For thee each plan begun,

In thee each duty done,

Close them at night.

Enfold me when asleep,

Let soft dews from above

Refresh the long day's toil,

Wash off the worldly soil,

And strengthen love.

Men speak of four last things ;

Death, and the judgment hall,

Hell, and the heaven so fair :

But thou, O Lord, art there,

Beyond them all.

There is no "last" with thee,

But only our last sins,

Last sorrows, and last tears,

Last sicknesses, last fears,

Then joy begins :

Joy without bound or end,

Concentric circles bright,

Spreading from round thy throne,

Flowing from thee alone,

O Love ! O Light !

Lay thy right hand of power

In blessings on my brow ;

Heaven's keys are in thy hand,

Its portals open stand,

I fear not now.

Lead thou me gently in,

Thou who through death hast passed ;

Then bring me to thy throne,

For thee I seek alone,

My first, and last.

"FOR ME TO LIVE IS CHRIST."

1. This is the language of the highest estimate.—When I can intelligently say, that I deliberately and steadily live for an object, that object is to me of the highest value; in my sober judgment, I prize it above all others. Thus Paul "determined to know nothing but Christ and him crucified." In this sense he "counted all things but loss for Christ." It is also the language of

2. Supreme affection.—As we say of the widowed mother, whose affections are bound up in her only child, and whose thoughts, and cares, and toils are all given to it, that "she lives for that child," so does the faithful Christian "live for Christ." He is the object of his supreme affection and devoted love. To him he is the chief among ten thousand, and the one altogether lovely.

3. It is the language too of earnest desire.—The apostle desired to live for Christ, and every one who can adopt his language is animated by the same desire: that he may live in Christ, for Christ, to Christ, and for ever with Christ. It is the language also of

4. Fixed determination and purpose.—When we say of a man that he lives for wealth, ambition, or pleasure, we mean that he is bent on attaining his end—determined to secure it. And so for one to adopt the sentiment of Paul, is to have the fixed, determined, unwavering purpose to live for Christ. This will be the motto, the maxim of his life, ever recurring to his memory, guiding his judgment, controlling his life. It is also the language of

5. Enlightened action.—For one to be able to say, "I live for Christ," is not merely to think of living for him, but actually to do it. The first inquiry of such a one is, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" His eye is ever on Jesus, his heart absorbed in his love, his aim directed by his will, all his energies subservient to his commands. The law of Christ is his rule, the love of Christ his motive, the service of Christ his pursuit, the honour and glory of Christ his grand absorbing object. It is the language of

6. Habitual performance.—Living is not a single act. The expression points to a habit. When Paul could say, "For me to live is Christ," the language implied a persevering, permanent habit of the life. His piety was not one of times and seasons—now blazing with bright but fitful flame, and now so indifferent and stupid and cold as to chill the soul with the apathy of death—but ever ardent, elevated, steady. "The calmness of an intensity kept uniform by a sort of moral necessity,—the nature of the human mind," says Foster, "forbidding it to be more, the character of the individual forbidding it to be less." All his thoughts, desires, affections, purposes, actions, found their centre in Jesus, and the fulness of their joy in him.

Christian reader, can you from the heart adopt the apostle's language? In the sincerity of your soul can you say, "For me to live is Christ?" This is the great end of your being. For this you were redeemed. This is the highest and best object of pursuit, and the true path of usefulness and holiness. This is the way to think of Christ, to enjoy Christ, to serve Christ, to lead others to Christ, and to be yourself preparing ever to dwell with Christ. Let this be your constant, earnest, prayerful aim; and then as for you to "live is Christ," so for you "to die shall be gain"—everlasting and glorious gain.

"MY STRENGTH AND MY HEART FAILETH."

In weakness at thy feet I lie,
Thine eye each pang hath seen,
Scarce can I lift my heart on high,
Yet, Lord, on thee I lean:

Lean on thy sure, unfailing word,
Thy gentle "It is I;"
For thou, my ever-living Lord,
Know'st what it is to die.

Thou wilt be with me when I go,—
Thy life my life in death;
For, in the lowest depths, I know
Thine arms are underneath.

'Tis not the infant's feeble grasp
Which holds the mother fast;
It is the mother's gentle clasp
Around her darling cast.

Just so thy child would cling to thee,
Knowing thy pity long;
For feeble as my faith may be,
The hand I clasp is strong.

"ALL THINGS WORK TOGETHER FOR GOOD TO THEM THAT LOVE GOD."

ROM. viii. 28.

Oh! what a load of struggle and distress
Falls off before the Cross! The feverish care;
The wish that we were other than we are;
The sick regrets; the yearnings numberless;
The thought, "This might have been," so apt to press
On the reluctant soul; even past despair,
Past sin itself—all—all is turned to fair,
Ay, to a scheme of ordered happiness,
So soon as we love God, or rather know
That God loves us! . . . Accepting the great pledge
Of his concern for all our wants and woe,
We cease to tremble upon danger's edge;
While varying troubles form and burst anew,
Safe in a Father's arms we smile as infants do!

CHILDREN'S TREASURY.

"THERE WAS NO ROOM FOR THEM IN THE INN."

LUKE II. 7

BY THE REV. JAMES BOLTON, KILBURN.

A MERRY Christmas to you!" will soon be in everybody's mouth, and Christmas day ought to be a happy day to us. The more we think of the great event which it commemorates the more we should rejoice. The birth of Christ was the Son of God descending to us, and his arriving amongst us, and his uniting himself to us,—and all in order to save us! So each of us is interested in it. The news of the discovery of the gunpowder plot, or of the victory of Waterloo, was glad tidings to those who were then living; but though this was thousands of years before either of them it is glad tidings to you and to me. All our hopes for eternity spring out of what happened in the manger at Bethlehem. Let us visit it, then, with the shepherds and the Magi, and be sure we take our harps and our best offerings with us, for certainly we shall want them there.

I recollect a grand building in the country, half palace half castle. It was surrounded with walls and ramparts, and porter's lodges and dog kennels, but there was one little word cut in huge stone letters on the porch,—the word WELCOME. It faced you as you approached it, and you could read it a long way off. That little word encouraged the youngest and poorest to draw near to it. Is not this story of Jesus's nativity, as it meets our eye on the first page of the holy gospel, like that comforting little word? Does it not say, let not the youngest and the poorest be afraid of this glorious revelation!

A slave boy had offended his master, and run into the woods and hidden himself. His master got over his anger, and was anxious to have the lad back. He really felt kindly towards him; so he went out and tried to allure him to return. But in vain he coaxed him, and promised him, and held up presents, and laid food and fruit and water on the ground for him. At last he bethought him of taking in his arms his own lovely daughter, whom "Joe" was employed to carry in the garden. No sooner did he hear her prattling voice than "Joe" rushed forth from his covert, and flung himself at his master's feet! Oh that we may be drawn to believe in the Lord's "kindness" towards us, by what he shows us in this consecrated manger.

That we may judge rightly of it, let us notice—

What was lofty about it.

What was lowly about it.

What was lofty about it.—It was the subject of prophecy ages ago. Isaiah and Micah had foretold it. Isaiah had said, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel" (Isa. vii. 14). And again, "Unto us a child is born, and the government shall be upon his shoulder" (Isa. ix. 6). And Micah had pointed to the very spot which was to be so highly favoured, "And thou, Bethlehem, in the land of Judah, art not the least amongst the princes of Judah, for out of thee shall come a governor that shall rule my people Israel" (Micah v. 2). It was announced by a special messenger from God.—Gabriel himself, "who stands in the presence of God," prepared Mary for it by quite a long and tender conversation (Luke i. 26–38). It was altogether a miraculous thing.—He had a mother, but no father. God made him, as he made Adam and Eve, differently to the rest of us. It was proclaimed by a multitude of the heavenly host.—They hovered around and above the shepherds as they watched their flocks by moon night, and having told them the fact, and how they might verify it, they burst into such a rapturous song as rung in the shepherd's ears till they died! It was celebrated by the appearance of a star in the east.—This may have been a meteor or comet; it may still be in the sky, fixed, or flying through space. Evidently it was brilliant and wonderful. It moved; and it was doing duty at the manger! It was honoured by the mysterious pilgrimage of the Magi.—These learned astronomers travelled tedious miles seeking for the babe. And when, guided by God, they found him, they bowed before him, and laid gold, and frankincense, and myrrh in his lap as if he were a king. No other infant, however royal, had anything of this sort. What if he had not a velvet cradle, or a robe of purple! what if no jewels were bound upon his tiny brow! what if cannon did not thunder salutes, nor the whole nation shout hosannas! could any of these compare with his celestial heraldry?

But now, recollecting this shining halo round his head, let us notice—

What was lowly about it.

His parents were humble.—Joseph was a carpenter at Nazareth; his affianced bride, though she was a descendant of David, and had a monarch's blood in her veins, was of the same rank as himself, and was ready to work hard at home—in the washing, and cooking, and sewing—as he was in the shop.

He entered the world as we do,—a naked, helpless, crying babe. To mortal sight he was a common child; “she wrapped him in swaddling clothes,”—she fed him at her bosom. He was born under a strange roof, far from their house. The emperor had commanded that the inhabitants of Palestine should assemble to be taxed at their respective cities. So Joseph and Mary had to start for Bethlehem, which was theirs.

*The town was so crowded that they could not be accommodated in the inn, and had to be content with a bed in the stable amongst the mules and camels. And there he was given to them. Who has not seen the pictures of the rough walls,—the stones for a carpet,—the wooden benches for chairs,—the gentle animals munching the hay or provender,—the precious group in the midst! Ah! let us not be shocked at this; rather let us admire, and adore, and imitate. There was beauty in this plainness, there was majesty in this humility; for it was for us men, and for our salvation. He stooped to the dust to lift us to a crown; he became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich.*

Therefore always recollect—

That it was his free and deliberate choice. There was no mistake about it. It was no accident—it was arranged and settled. It was his “mind” and his will. He could, if he pleased, have been a queen’s son. He could have been born in unrivalled splendour and wealth. But he would taste the cup we drank of,—he would drink of it with us; and the cup was of iron, not of silver—it was filled with muddy water, not with sparkling wine.

That it was necessary for him as our representative. How could he feel for the lambs of his flock unless he had himself been a lamb? How could he sympathize with them in their feebleness, and pains, and privations, unless he had himself trodden the path which begins so narrowly, and is so strewn with flints and thorns.

That it has blossomed in blessedness to us. If it shames us that he should have had such a despised commencement, let us consider that it has answered its end for us. God was so delighted at his “obedience” for us in this, as in the rest of his mediation for us, that now for his sake he smiles upon us, and forgives us, and restores us to his family, and exalts us to everlasting life. What is it to me if I dress as a collier, and am lowered into a dismal coal-mine, if by so doing I fetch up my darling children, who had fallen into it, and were perishing! What is it to the bulb, if it is set deep in the earth, and decays there, if by so doing it adds a cluster of fragrant hyacinths or gorgeous tulips to the emperor’s parterre or green-house!

That it is now his own crown of glory. It was because he did not spare himself from this that God has now seated him at his right hand, with principalities and powers subject unto him. God marked the manger scene. It is fresh in his memory now. He never gazes at Jesus but it rises before him; and he bids saints and seraphs tune their lyres and tongues to another and still another halleluiah. “This is he,” he says, “who did all that for me and for you.” Yes, there is he “of whom it is written, And she brought forth her first-born son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inn.”

But now, in conclusion,—

Whilst we praise him for this, let us attend to it that we ourselves treat him better. How will it be on Christmas day? Shall we have no room for him in our hearts? Will he have to say then, There is room there for pleasures and vanities—for everything but me? Will he have to turn from your heart to the hearts of beggars or heathens? Will you worship him outwardly, and yet not let him in to your affections? Will you be warbling Christmas carols with friends, and yet not direct a single note of them to Him whose grace and goodness is their theme.

A curious Christmas that! a Christmas without the “Christ,” which is its charm and soul.

“Nay, rather let our Christmas be
A feast, dear Christ, of nought but thee
At which thou art the only guest,
Whose chamber is our inmost breast.”

“IN HONOUR PREFERRING ONE ANOTHER”

LOIS VANDERBERG, with her shawl over her head, had been standing at the gate more than half an hour, in the chill evening air, looking vainly for her little brother, Pierre, when suddenly the boy appeared through the thick mist as if he had risen out of the earth.

“Ah, here you are,” cried Lois, “how slowly you must have walked! Father has been waiting an hour for his paper. But come now, do hurry in out of the rain. We’ve got a splendid roaring fire for this dreary night, and we’re going to have hot cakes for tea!”

But to this cheery intelligence little Pierre only responded, “I’m sure I don’t care if we are,” in such a dismal tone, that, as they entered the bright fire-lighted kitchen, Lois turned upon him a look of great anxiety.

“I’m afraid you’re sick, Pierre,” said she, seeing very clearly that something had gone wrong.

“No; don’t trouble me; I’m only tired.”

Nevertheless, Lois noticed that when he had hung away his damp coat and tippet, he seated himself by the window as far as possible from the bright, cheerful fire, and hid his head behind the curtain.

“Now, Pierre,” she whispered, following him, “you must tell me what has happened.”

“Don’t ask me, sister,” said Pierre, melting a little. “I’m ashamed to tell.”

But Lois persisted, and she had such kind, “taking” ways, that as Pierre would have told you, she never let down her little bucket of sympathy into Pierre’s heart without drawing up nearly all of his troubles.

"Well, Lois," said he slowly, "in the first place, you know how anxious father has been that I should be 'head boy' at school this year, and you know how I've studied early and late, and haven't missed a single lesson!"

"Yes, indeed," cried Lois.

"Then you know that Herbert Bell is the only other boy who has been studying so hard, and I'm sure I can remember at least three times he has missed this quarter."

"Yes, well?"

"Well, to-day, Mr. Simmons asked me to stay a few minutes after school, and when the scholars were all gone, he said—

"I've been very much pleased with some of my scholars lately, and I've been thinking I should like to give the one who has the most good marks at the end of the quarter some reward for his industry and good behaviour. Now what should you think a boy, about your age, would like best for a present this winter?" O Lois, you can't think how my heart beat! I thought right away, 'I'm sure he means me,' and I'm afraid he knew that I thought so, for it seemed to burn right through my cheeks. But in a minute I said, just as carelessly as I could, 'Why, I should think, sir, a boy couldn't like anything better than a nice little sled, with iron shoes, and painted bright red,' for you know, Lois, I've wanted one three winters, and father never could afford it, and now 'times' are harder than ever. Well, he smiled, and said he should think that would please a boy, and then he looked right in my face, and said, 'What do you think of Herbert Bell? Isn't he about as good a scholar as we have in the school?' I declare, Lois, if my cheeks burned before, I felt this time as if my whole head had tumbled off into the stove, and I was choking with the smoke besides. I couldn't speak for a moment, but just pretended I had a terrible cough, and by and by I just managed to say—

"Yes, sir, I don't believe there's a better fellow in all the world."

"That's all right," said Mr. Simmons very kindly, "and now I've one more favour to ask of you. As you and Herbert are such very good friends, your tastes must be something alike, and I should like some pleasant Saturday to take you with me to the city, to help me to pick out just the right kind of sled, for it's a good while since I was a boy, and I'm afraid I don't know so much about some things as I did then."

"I hardly remember what I said, sister, but pretty soon I was out on the road, thinking I knew just how that wicked old Haman felt, for you see I thought I was the boy Mr. Simmons delighted to honour, instead of that I must go to B—and pick out a pretty sled for my Mordecai." Pierre's voice shook, and leaning his hand against the window, he stared out into the dark rainy night.

"But, Pierre," said Lois, "I'm sure you're not at all like that bad Haman. You certainly don't hate your Mordecai."

"No indeed, sister; there's all the comfort there is in the matter."

"Not at all," cried Lois; "there's something more. I think it was a very great honour for Mr. Simmons to consult you about the present. It showed that he thought you had a noble, generous heart, and were above all feelings of envy and jealousy."

"I never thought of that," said Pierre, brightening; "but then, sister," he added more sadly, "I'm pretty sure he saw what I was thinking about, and knew just how mean I was."

"Not so very mean after all," said Lois, smiling. "It was kind in you to praise Herbert—"

"Why, sister?" interrupted Pierre, with a look of surprise. "What else could I do? Didn't I have to tell the truth?"

"To be sure," said Lois, smiling still more; "but I do not believe Mr. Simmons has such a very poor opinion of you. He knows very well how hard it is for a boy who has studied as you have, to stand aside, and let some one else take the first place. Ah, yes, little Pierre, we all have to struggle very hard and pray a great deal before we can very cheerfully 'in honour prefer one another.'"

"But you can do it at last, sister?"

"Oh, yes; we can so far conquer our selfishness for Christ's sake, that at last we shall very much prefer other people's happiness to our own."

Pierre looked thoughtful, but was much comforted, and so far reconciled to life, that the call to supper and nice hot cakes was by no means disregarded.

* * * * *

One pleasant Saturday, a few weeks after, Pierre rushed in with a bright face.

"Well, sister, it's done at last. I and Mr. Simmons have bought the sled, and it's a regular beauty. Its name is 'Rocket,' and it's the brightest red. Oh, won't Herbert's eyes snap! But now, sister, do you think it was wrong for me to wish for one too? There were plenty more beauties in the store, but they cost money," and little Pierre sighed. "Never mind," he continued bravely, "Herbert is just the best fellow,—and I really do think at last, that if only one of us could have it, I would rather it should be he, and I think I'll give him my little flag, too, so everything will be complete. And oh, sister, I almost forgot,—examination will end on Wednesday, and I'm to have the honour of presenting the sled. But, do you know, I'm afraid Herbert half suspects, for he is in the greatest spirits, and says he knows something splendid that's going to happen before long. Some of the boys have got hold of it, too, I am sure, for one of them said to-day, 'There's some thing going on right under your nose, Pierre, but Quich people never get their eyes open till four o'clock.' I was so happy I didn't mind it a bit, and only laughed to think how much wiser I was than any of them."

* * * * *

The great Wednesday came. Herbert and Pierre passed very fine examinations, and at the close Pierre arose to deliver the speech which had been carefully prepared for the occasion.

"Herbert Bell," began Pierre, but (how awkward!) there was Herbert coming forward, too, and beginning,—

"Pierre Vanderberg—"

"Keep still, Herbert," whispered Pierre, "I am to make a speech and present you with a sled."

"Just exactly what I am to do for you," whispered back Herbert, with a merry laugh.

Poor bewildered Pierre looked imploringly at Mr. Simmons, who, rising, said,—

"I believe I shall have to decide this matter, and say that the sled belongs to Pierre Vanderberg, who has ten more good marks than Herbert."

"Oh, Mr. Simmons," cried poor Pierre, but entirely broke down, while Herbert shook his hand as if it were a pump-handle. Lois wiped her eyes in a corner, and the boys, who were all in the secret, made the old school-room shake with a perfect tempest of applause.—Youth's Penny Gazette.

DREAMING SUSY.

SOME little friends, when they read the words, "Dreaming Susy," will be sure to imagine, all in a minute, a pretty little girl—blue eyes, dimples and roses mixed in just the right proportions—who has been playing all day, and, very tired, has at last fallen asleep out in the hay-field, or under the apple tree.

But no; you are not quite right, Tom and Kitty, for the little girl I am going to tell you about used to dream with her eyes wide open. All day long, from sunrise to sunset, little Susy dreamed and dreamed, till you hardly knew whether to say she was ever awake or not.

Perhaps you will understand me better if I give an account of one of the days of Susy's life.

In the morning would come a loud call, "Susy! Susy! it is time to get up!" and Susy, rubbing her eyes, would answer, "Yes, mother," and would sit up in bed. Then she would think, "What a trouble to put on my stockings and shoes, and comb my hair. How nice it would be"—and here Susy would begin to dream—"if I had a little black slave to come in and wait on me. She would wash me with sweet perfumed soap, and curl my hair in long ringlets, and dress me in a blue silk dress, and put a little thin handkerchief, all embroidery, in my hand, and then, if I felt lazy, I would say, 'You may bring my breakfast upstairs this morning, Jette,—a little broiled chicken, and some toast; and—let me see—yes, some preserves and cake, and—'"

"Susy, Susy!" her mother's voice would break in, "breakfast is all ready;" and Susy, with a great start, would find she had been dreaming half an hour, and the end of it all would be that she would either lose her breakfast altogether, or come down very ill-naturedly, with her hair hastily twisted in a little knot, and make a meal of cold cakes and potatoes, in such very different plight from what she had imagined in that pleasant dream, that tears of vexation were continually coming in her eyes.

Then after breakfast her brother would say: "Susy, do you know your Arithmetic lesson? It's all fractions, and I've been up studying for more than an hour."

"O Joe, please let me take the book!" cried Susy; "I don't know one word," and sitting down in the door-way, she opens at the place. Oh dear, how could she ever understand it? What a regiment of figures—4-7 of 5-6 of $3\frac{1}{2}$ —how could she ever bring them into line, and find out just what they were worth? Susy scowled and fretted, and then staring up into the big tree before the door—a vacant, absent look came in her eyes, and in a minute she was off dreaming.

"How nice it would be," thought Susy, "if I lived in a palace, and had a fairy godmother. There was once a princess whose cruel step-mother put her in a room where there was a great heap of feathers. 'These,' said she, 'are the feathers of a hundred different birds, and you must pick them all out by night, and have each kind by itself in a hundred different heaps, or I'll kill you.' So the poor princess cried and cried."

"Susy, Susy," cried Joe, "you're away off in the clouds. You're not studying at all."

"I will in a minute," cried Susy, emphatically; and then she went on.

"So the poor princess cried, and cried, till at last her fairy godmother came, and waved her wand three times, and every little blue and red feather flew into its place in a minute." Now," thought Susy, "if a fairy could only come and wave over this lesson, and make every figure fly just where it ought, and make all the sense of it run into my brain, how splendid it would be. Then, when I recited, Miss Brown would say, 'You have an admirable lesson, Miss Susan, go to the head of the class;' and—"

Ding-dong, ding-dong. "Why, that can't be the school bell," cried Susy, jumping up hastily.

"It is, though," said Joe, "and your wits have been on a goose-chase for most three quarters of an hour. I took your arithmetic away ten minutes ago, and you never knew it at all."

Susy rose with flushed cheeks and tearful eyes, and held out her hand for the book. All the way to school she studied, with the help of her good-natured brother; but all in vain. The time was too short, and at the close of her recitation, instead of hearing any praises, she caught a very sad look upon the teacher's face, and heard that "hateful Patty Porter" titter, as she was sent to take her place at the foot of the class.

But all these mortifications and privations seemed to have very little effect upon Susy. That very night, as she sat with a little piece of sewing her mother had given her, the needle fell from her fingers, and her eyes again fixed upon vacancy.

"What are you after now, Susy?" cried Joe.

"Well, I'm thinking what if I had three pairs of hands, and while one pair did the hemming, another could sew on these strings, and another could stitch down that seam, and we'd have it all done in no time at all."

"Well, I never!" exclaimed Joe. "Seems to me I'd learn to use one pair of hands before I was fretting for more. Now I believe I'll dream a little, too. Suppose people came into the world with the ends of their arms all smooth, without any hands at all, and suppose every time they were very good, or accomplished any great thing, a finger would grow out. I suspect they'd be pretty thankful if they ever got ten of them. I wonder how many you'd have by this time! I know you'd dream you had two or three hundred, but I shouldn't be a bit surprised if you hadn't the first joint of a forefinger."

Susy coloured, and bit her lips, but had not a word to say.

But more serious consequences than these resulted from Susy's habit of dreaming. She was very fond of taking long walks, and, as she lived only a mile from the sea-shore, she would often, on a Saturday, ramble there with her work, and, sitting on the rocks, dream away hours at a time.

Now it happened one day that Susy had an examination composition to write, and taking her pencil and paper with her, she came down to the rocks, so, as she said, "that no one should interrupt her." She played awhile with the sand and shells, and then settling herself comfortably, she spread her paper upon her lap, and began to—dream.

"How nice it would be," began Susy in usual fashion, "if some great big hand would take hold of my pencil, and without my having to think at all, would just guide it along over the paper, writing the funniest and nicest things in the world; then how neatly I would copy it off, and have it all off my mind. And when examination came, I should read it very slowly and distinctly, and when I finished, old Mr. Mason would pat me on the head and say, 'I didn't know Miss Susan had so much talent. I shouldn't wonder if she'd write a book some day,' and Patty Porter would just die of envy, and almost cry when she got up to read—'Lions. The lion is a very useful animal.'" And then ran on Susy—"What should I wear? I wish father was rich; or, how nice it would be, if I could wake in the morning, and find by my bed a lovely pink silk, and a wreath of white roses, such as the ladies at the grand hotel wore this summer. How sweet I should look! I wouldn't be a bit proud, either, but would walk by Kitty Bell's brown de-laine, just the same as ever."

Thus ran on Susy's nimble thoughts, and she entirely forgot how late it was growing, till suddenly the sea, which had been slowly creeping nearer and nearer, sent a little dash of spray up in her face. Susy started, and looked quickly around. Oh, how careless she had been! She had been dreaming, dreaming, till the cold, cruel sea had come crawling all around the little rock where she was sitting, and there seemed no way of escape. Poor Susy! she was wide awake now, and she remembered that at high tide her rock was perfectly covered. What should she do? She called wildly, and looked out over the rough gray water, and back on the dreary gray shore. There was no one in sight, and, dropping down again, poor Susy dreamed no more of silk dresses and rose wreaths, but sobbed till she could cry no more. But the sea came creeping up, surely, surely, and suddenly she felt its cold touch through the toes of her stout leather boots, and, with a little sharp cry, drew them up, with her knees close under her chin. O how dreadful to wake up from such a lovely dream to such a terrible reality! The water crept nearer. She could not draw her feet up any further, and it rose over her little round ankles. Susy covered her face with her hands, and thought of home. She knew just how pleasant the old kitchen was looking. She shouldn't wonder if mother had made gingerbread, and was cooking apples for tea, and pussy was washing herself by the fire. But oh, when they all sat down to tea, and were laughing and telling stories, she would be lying upon the cold gray sand, like that poor lady who was wrecked a year ago—lying all cold and still, with sea-weed in her hair. "Yes, I must die," thought Susy, "and I haven't been good at all; but perhaps if I get down on my knees, the angels will think I'm one of God's children, and carry me to heaven by mistake." But the water came higher still, and poor, sobbing Susy concluded she would rather die standing up. Oh, how cold it was, and how she trembled. She couldn't stand much longer, and—what then!

"Father! mother! Joe!" screamed Susy frantically, covering her eyes as she felt herself swaying dizzily forward.

"I declare, if there isn't our Susy," cried Joe's astonished voice, and his boat swept rapidly around the corner of a rock.

"My little daughter!" cried father, and Susy knew no more till she found herself, wrapped in a great coat, held safe in her father's arms.

"Well, what were you about this time?" cried Joe, with pretended roughness, as he wound up his fishing line. "I suppose you were dreaming you were a mermaid, and were going to sail off in an oyster shell."

You would have thought this adventure would cure Susy of dreaming, and that she would set diligently to work, knowing that the best kind of fairies to separate birds' feathers, or do sums, and write compositions are Patience and Industry, and they are always ready to come if any little girl or boy really wants them.

But Susy had indulged in this sad habit so long, that the very next Sunday, as she sat in the church, thinking of her narrow escape, she said to herself,—

"God was very good to me, and I ought to be a Christian. How nice it would be if I were just like an angel, and couldn't do wrong. Then wherever I went every one would love me, and would say, 'what a sweet expression Miss Susan has !' and at last, when I died, I should go straight to heaven."

So she never heard what the minister said, "I love them that love me, and they that seek me early shall find me." "My son," "my daughter, give me thine heart." She only dreamed that some time she would be very good, and as, on the way home, she spoke very sharply to Joe, for daring to interrupt her thoughts, I am quite sure that none of the angels would have made such a mistake, as to think she was one of God's children.

Little children, are any of you dreaming like Susy?—Congregationalist.

"REACHING FORTH."

BABY sat in her basket-chair, playing with the toys which a loving little brother had piled upon the stand. She was delighted with these until she chanced to espy a stray bit of white paper lying on a chair near her. At once the charm of the playthings was gone, and baby stretched eagerly after the fancied treasure, growing red in the face in her vain efforts to obtain it! "Silly little baby!" you will all exclaim. But do we not often see older ones, who should be wiser, acting quite as foolishly? Let us think of this!

Charlie has a happy home. Kind parents and teachers are earnest in their efforts for his welfare. His every reasonable want is supplied. But one thing greatly troubles Charlie. His parents think it proper to know where he is, and what he is doing, and therefore they do not allow him to go from home without permission. Now Charlie knows some boys who can go in and out as they please, and stay half the time in the streets without being questioned. This he calls liberty, and for this he pines! Overlooking all the enjoyments so freely provided for him, his young heart rebels continually because God has blessed his childhood with wise and faithful guides;—because he cannot have his own way! Poor foolish Charlie!

May Waters is another discontented one. What is the matter with May? Is she poor, and deprived of the comforts of life? Is she sick and suffering? Is it that she has no friends to care for her? No, none of these. May wishes she were beautiful. She thinks if she were only like her cousin Sarah, whose lovely features every one admires, she would be quite happy. In wishing for this, May often renders herself miserable, forgetting that a lovely spirit within has power to make the plainest features pleasing.

And so May, as well as Charlie, is very much like our baby, losing the enjoyment of the many good things within our reach, in useless strivings and murmurings for some fancied good which has been denied her!

And there are many such grown people as well as children. Some spend their lives in eager seeking for fame and glory. Others are dissatisfied unless their houses and dress are in the height of the fashion; and there are others who give up the best and sweetest joys of earth to pursue objects still more sinful, and pleasures more unreal than these.

In fact there are few persons in this wide world, who are not secretly reaching after, and striving for some object of desire! Does it not seem as if it were our very nature to be longing for something better? And so it is. And there is something better in store for us all!

The word of truth says of all those earthly objects of which we have been speaking, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity!" But the same word tells us of joys which cannot die, a treasure which shall not pass away. And those who, forgetting things behind, are reaching forth after these heavenly joys, shall be for ever blessed! Are you one of them?

A CONQUEROR.

SARD a mother of her son, "I know he will distinguish himself wherever he is, for he has already proved himself a great conqueror."

"So young as he is!" I exclaimed; "how?"

"He has conquered himself," replied the mother, "and you know what the Bible says about that."

"O yes, indeed," said I, "but I thought your Merwin was one of those who find it very easy to be good. There is a great difference in children. Some are so amiable and gentle, that when they become Christians you see but little change in their outward conduct, and some—"

"But my son was not one of those," said she, interrupting me. "He was born with a hot, fiery, temper. It used to frighten me almost, when he was nothing but a baby, and I hardly dared to think what would become of him when he grew older. I prayed a great deal about it, and talked and laboured to help him to overcome his naughty, passionate spirit. And he began very early to try to govern himself. I recollect when he was not more than four years old, he had been very much provoked about something, and I could see the fire kindling in his eye, and the colour rising in his cheek. But he kept very still until his anger had subsided, and then he came running to me, threw his arms around my neck, and bursting into tears, he cried, 'Kiss me, mamma, kiss me, I've overcome.'"

"That's beautiful!" I exclaimed.

"Many a time," the mother continued, "have I seen him struggle with his hasty, angry feelings, until by degrees it grew easier for him to control his temper, and now I can truly say, I believe, by the grace of God, he has conquered himself. And among the qualifications for good soldiership, that is one of the very best I think."

I thought so too, as I repeated to myself the words of the Bible, to which Merwin B——'s mother had alluded. You will find them, little reader, in Prov. xvi. 32. "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city."

And I felt as if I wanted all the little boys to become conquerors in this same sense. No matter if you are not called to be soldiers to march at the call of your country to the battle-field and fight. You may be called of God to conquer enemies elsewhere. You may be called to govern and direct others. Whatever may be your duty in life, the best preparation you can make is to learn to govern yourself.

An angry spirit is a terrible enemy. It comes upon you so suddenly that it takes you unawares, throws you off your guard, and has vanquished you before you have time to think. Then if you are on the watch, it is so strong, so furious, so unwilling to listen to the voice of reason, that if you are not well armed, and if you have not helpers close by, you are most likely to be beaten. So, dear boys, it becomes you to be on the look out all the while for it. As Jesus said, "Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation." You must have your armour on too, always. Never venture to lay it aside for a moment. If you do, you will, I am sure, be overcome. And more than all, do not live very far away from God, who alone is able to make you conqueror over this dreadful enemy. If you live near to him, he will protect you. He will teach your hands to war, and your fingers to fight; will encourage you in the heat of the conflict with his smile and whispers of comfort and love, and will give you the victory. Better than all, he will bring you at last up to his own home, put a crown upon your head, and seat you upon a throne of glorious triumph in the heavenly kingdom of Jesus Christ; for hear what Jesus has said: "To him that overcometh, will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."

GOD'S SCHOLAR.

JEMMY liked a great many things, but he did not like learning to read. He wanted to read, but the trouble of learning—putting words together to make a syllable, and syllables together to make words—came hard to him; and shirk his lessons he would if he could. His sister Emma was sent to teach him, and, as you may suppose, he sometimes vexed her.

"Mother," said Jemmy one day, "I don't want to be Emma's scholar any longer."

"You want to be God's scholar," said his mother.

The little boy opened his eyes wide. "Does God want me to be his scholar?" asked he. "I should have to behave, should I not?"

"God does want you to be," answered his mother seriously; "and he has two books for you to study."

"What?" asked Jemmy in surprise.

"One is called the book of nature," said she. "It is full of lessons. It tells about trees and flowers; about animals,—lions and horses, dogs and birds; about the moon and stars; about the earth, air, and water. God made all these things. He is a great master builder, and he teaches you his wisdom, and skill, and knowledge by the study of them. Whenever, therefore, you study about any of these things, you are God's scholar."

"Then I must pay attention," said the little boy.

"The other book is the Bible—the book of mercy"—continued his mother, "and it is full of precious lessons: you know it gives us the history of God's dear Son, who came into this world to be our Saviour and friend, and to set a heavenly pattern for us to copy. It teaches us how to become holy children, loving good and hating wickedness. It tells us where good men go, and where bad men go."

"That I must mind," said Jemmy.

"Indeed you must," said his mother.

"God's scholar must be a good scholar," said Jemmy thoughtfully.

"Yes," said his mother; "not careless or idle."

"I do not know that a little boy like me can always be good," said Jemmy.

"His Teacher will help him," answered his mother.

"God helps his scholars when they ask him; carry all your little difficulties to him, and he will give you his Holy Spirit, to make you patient, and gentle, and diligent, and to comfort your little heart, and guide your feet in the way you should go."

"That's what I want," said the little boy, with a tear in his eye. "Mother," he added, after thinking a little while, "I will try to be God's scholar."

"THERE is Henry," said a bright-eyed little boy of about six years of age, "there is Henry Sanders; let us go where he will not see us, for I don't want to play with him."

"Why not?" asked his playmate.

"Because he says wicked words."

"What words does he say?"

"Oh, they are very bad words, and my mother says we should not mention them after him, or even think them over, if we can think of something else."

I thought, surely this child has a good mother; the little boy's answer gave me this opinion of her. He honoured her, that is, he made her appear good. If you should see a person's picture, you would judge at once whether the person was handsome or not. So this child, by his conduct, showed me a picture of his mother's character.

"HE COULDN'T LOOK ME IN THE EYE."

"I don't want your boy, sir," said an eccentric merchant to a father who was seeking employment for his son. "He hung his head all the time I was talking to him; and I never want to do business with anybody who can't look me in the eye."

Children, if you stand beside a singing brook when the sun shines upon it, how clearly you can see the pure little pebbles and the silver sand on the bottom; every ripple of the water looks like a string of diamonds, and all around is made glad by its freshness and purity.

But go to the frog pond. Does that look up to the sun's eye and reflect his rays like the dancing waters of the little brook? Oh no. The dull, green veil it wears is itself a part of the pollution it hides below. Let your heart be pure like the waters of the brook; then you will have nothing to hide, and may look parent, teacher, or employer straight in the eye.

Although some good boys may drop their heads when spoken to, through bashfulness, it is usually done from a less innocent cause. He who takes money from his mother's purse, or apples from his neighbour's tree; or smokes a cigar unknown to his friends, will not be very likely to look them honestly in the face when he comes home. This may seem a very little thing to write about; but you may depend upon it, dear children, it is not little. The eyes have been called "the windows of the soul;" keep all pure and true within, and then you may allow any one to glance through. If you should close these windows so that no man can discover the thoughts of the heart, remember there is One who knoweth what is in us. You cannot avoid the gaze of that all-seeing eye; see to it, therefore, that you keep a conscience void of offence toward God and man. Then may you look any man in the eye, nor fear detection.

WHICH WILL YOU IMITATE?

LITTLE Jennie could not take her books and run to school, nor play like other children, nor even go out of doors at all, but was obliged to sit quite still in a large chair which her kind father had bought for her comfort. It had velvet cushions, and a beautiful, soft pillow on which to rest her poor, crippled feet. Jennie also had a great number of playthings, and beautiful books, and pictures. But how could these compensate for her lameness? I think there is not one of our little readers who would not rather have the free use of their limbs than all the wealth of India.

It was a warm, pleasant day in summer, when most little girls were playing under some beautiful shade-tree, or by some singing brook. Jennie's sister Anna, and her little Cousin Clara, were going out to roll their hoops. Jennie looked down very sadly at her poor, crippled feet, and wished she too could go.

"Sister Anna," she said, "please stay in the house and play with me. You know I cannot go out of doors."

"Oh, no, I shan't!" said Anna impatiently. "You've got my wax-doll, and you should be contented. I can't stay in the house these lovely days, just for your whims! Come along, Clara!"

But Clara could not go when she saw Jennie's earnest face and pleading eyes.

"No, Anna," said Clara, "I will stay with Jennie, and I think you would be much happier if you would do the same. Think how hard it must be to have to stay in the house, these sweet summer days. If you—"

But Anna ran from the room, slamming the door behind her very rudely.

Little reader, whose example would you rather imitate, that of Anna or Clara? Anna would have been much astonished had any one told her that she was selfish. She always shared her sweetmeats and toys with Jennie. But it required no self-denial. When she was asked to relinquish her inclinations and wishes, it was then that her selfishness exhibited itself. Even Jesus "pleased not himself;" and who does not wish to be like him?—Child's Paper.

MISSIONARY CANOES.

THE children in England and the children in the United States have built missionary vessels, and children on missionary fields have purchased boats. At many of the South Sea Islands, the missionaries and teachers go from place to place by water more than by land, and so each one wants a boat or canoe. But how should all the teachers get them? The English missionaries at the Samoa Islands, where very good canoes are made, thought the young people of the islands would willingly do their best to follow the example of the children of England; and they ventured to propose that the children of each district should subscribe a canoe for the use of the native teachers at the different islands of Western Polynesia. At once, with heart and hand, the young folks set to work to do their part. When the collections had been made, a meeting was held under a grove of bread-fruit trees. "I do not know," writes Mr. Mills, "that I have enjoyed a more interesting meeting since I have been in Samoa. The children came from the furthest village of my district. Mr. Pritchard was present, and gave them an interesting address. The children of each district then came forth in succession, with their offerings. There were upwards of four hundred yards of English cloth; eight axes; twelve pairs of scissors; three razors; five knives; eighty-seven fine mats, many of them such as it would take three or four months to make; three hundred and sixty-nine pieces of native cloth; and fifty-seven dollars in money. The value of the contributions, for this one object, in the different districts, could not have been less than from £300 to £400. Twenty-nine canoes were bought with these contributions, and what remained of the property was sent down to the westward."—Macedonian.

FAITHFUL IN FEW THINGS.

HARRY went to his uncle's blacksmith shop. He was sorry to leave his books; but his uncle thought book-made blockheads of boys, and was not satisfied till he got Harry out of school and into his shop. "Mother," said he, "then there will be no chance of my getting an education." His mother thought the chance was small; but the poor widow did not dare to interfere with her brother-in-law, who promised Harry's father on his death-bed to look after his son. Harry had no taste for the smithy, and that the boys knew; so one of them gave him this bit of advice:—

"Show your uncle you don't care. I wouldn't learn. Be as bungling and make all the mistakes you can; make believe you can't learn. Then he'll be glad to ship you off."

"Never!" cried Harry, indignantly. "I shall try to be as faithful as I can. I should dishonour God, dishonour my mother, dishonour my father's memory by such conduct."

The boy turned on his heel, and Harry went to his work. He found many a spare moment, and these he thought he might improve by reading or study. But the head workman did not like that. He did not like any boys very well, and a reading boy he heartily despised. "Pity the mare that is shod by a stickler to his books," he said. Very likely he complained to Henry's uncle, for his uncle presently made it very plain that books got into the wrong place when they got into the smithy. "You can't do two things at a time," said the old blacksmith, "no how." Harry pleaded the spare moments, but uncle did not allow there should be any spare moments in business; so poor Harry was quite cut off. It was a disappointment, a great one. But he cheerfully gave up his taste and his ardent wishes, and tried to be a first-class smith.

Harry lived at home, between two and three miles off, and he used to bring his dinner in a tin-box. The dinner-hour then was his own time, and as an algebra or Latin grammar was usually a part of the contents of the box, he used to go out under an old elm, not far from the shop, and there feed his hungry mind as well as body. His uncle observed it, and saw too how careful he was not to steal business hours.

"That's a good boy," said the old man many times to himself. He found also how intelligent and observing he was. That did not touch his heart, however. "Plenty of bright boys," he used to say to himself; "but faithfulness is a scarce article—a scarce article."

To make a long story short, in the end Harry won the day. Uncle loved Harry. "And, Harry," he said at the close of his second year at the smithy, "I've been two years weighing you, and haven't found you wanting. You may get an education, and I'll help you along. You'll do good with it, I'll be bound."

What a happy, thankful day was that. Before honour is humility. Harry went through a full course of education, and he now fills a high and responsible post. There is no stain on his integrity. Every duty he discharges he accepts as from God's hand, feeling that to him one day he must render his account. That sets all right. To honour God by a faithful and godly life is stamped upon every day he lives; and everybody who knows him, feels that him who honours God, God will honour.—Ibid.

THE TWO MITES.

"And Jesus sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into the treasury; and many that were rich cast in much. And there came a certain poor widow, and she threw in two mites, which make a farthing. And he called unto him his disciples, and saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That this poor widow hath cast more in than all they which have cast into the treasury: for all they did cast in of their abundance; but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living."—MARK xii. 41–44.

I AM glad this poor woman came in just as she did. I am glad she did not stop, look at her mites, and say, "There is no use in my giving only these." I am glad she did not look at her little family, and say, "I must not rob my children." I am glad she did not look at her rich neighbours, and say, "They will not expect me to give." Because, if she had, St. Mark could not have told us how the Lord loves little. He does not love stingy littles, or careless littles, or grudging littles. If we give him such littles, we cannot expect his favour or approval, "for God loves a cheerful giver." This poor woman gave him her little all; and it was the "all" that pleased the Lord, whether little or much, because God loves to be trusted, not half way, but wholly.

Did you ever hear of the poor woman who gave her tea-kettle? Perhaps not. Well, she did. She was poor and old, and lived with her son, who never gave her a farthing. She had not much comfort in anybody but God; he comforted her; and she took great delight in praising him and praying. She was never tired of saying, "Thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." And it pleased her to hear the minister tell about preaching Christ to the heathen, and getting the little black children into Jesus' fold; and she wished she could do something. The minister asked her one day if she had not her widow's mite to give. "Come in two weeks," said she, "and see."

Well, she thought and thought where she should get it, and quite likely wondered how the poor widow in the Bible got hers. She was past earning it, and besides, she lived on the edge of the pine woods, where money was scarce. One night as she lay praying and thinking, she thought of an old brass tea-kettle there was up in the garret, under the eaves of the house, and the next morning she went and found it among the dust and rubbish of years. It was her tea-kettle. She took it under her shawl to the blacksmith's shop, and there sold it for—how much do you think? Two shillings! When the minister came back she put them into the Lord's treasury, and how happy and thankful she was. It was one of those "little alls" very dear to the heart of God.

Then you know how the "two mites" gained, according to God's arithmetic. "This poor widow," said Jesus, "cast in more than they all;" for "two mites" added to love, and multiplied by faith, and that multiplied again and again by prayer, will run up very fast; I expect, faster than we can count, or see to count. Nor can we see the answer; but God can. It is in a rich revenue of blessing—a treasure laid up on high.

Is it not comforting, children, to think God will take our "little alls?" What are you going to do with your "two mites?" Do not spend them foolishly; do not spend them carelessly. I will tell you what to do. Put "For Christ's sake" on them, and cast them into God's treasury. Let him use them for carrying on his great and blessed kingdom, and you will never be sorry for that—never, never.

GRIEVING THE HOLY SPIRIT OF GOD.*

1. We grieve the Spirit when we harbour his enemies; by that I mean when we indulge in sinful thoughts, and words, and actions. There are certain people who hate your father very much, and do all they can to vex and annoy him,—who, if they could, would by some means or other get him out of the way altogether. Well, one day, coming home unexpectedly, he finds you with these in the house, entertaining them, giving them his own best room, making friends of them—joining them in mocking and speaking ill of him. What would he think? how would he feel? would he not be grieved? would it not pierce him to the heart? Could you do that? Or you have been left alone, friendless and uncared for. Some neighbour, on whom you had no claim, came in to cheer and comfort you when you were mourning your loss; promising to act the part of a father to you, to help you on in the world; telling you to come to him in every difficulty, and he would show you what to do; giving you proof that he was both able and willing. If you knew that there was something that he disliked very much, that he would not come near, that he could not bear the sight of—how do you think he would feel, if you were to take that hated thing, to carry it about with you, and put it in his way, so that he could have no dealing with you without coming in contact with it—would it not wound him and grieve him most bitterly? Could you do that? There is a little plant called the sensitive plant, beautiful in form, and of a pretty green colour; whenever you touch it, the leaf falls down, as if it were a living thing, shrinking back from, unable to endure your touch; hence its name. It cannot bear to be meddled with.

Now, children, when you tamper with sin, you do all I have been describing. Your thinking sin, or speaking sin, or acting sin, is like entertaining your father's hateful foes, or rewarding your friend's kindness by doing what most annoys him—pressing upon him what his very nature revolts from. You are grieving the Holy Spirit—beginning a course that may end in his leaving you.

You lost your temper, and, in the heat of the moment, said some sharp, bitter thing to a friend or companion. You saw it had "told,"—your friend's countenance fell, his mouth was shut, and you came off conqueror. When your better feelings returned, it pained you as you thought you had grieved him. Ah! it did more than that,—it grieved the Holy Spirit. You spoke some unhallowed word, and just as you spoke it, your mother came in sight, and you almost fancied you saw it go like a dagger to her heart. That word, unintended for her—it was a mercy she heard it, for it told her of her boy's danger—how you wished it recalled! how you wept as you thought you had grieved your mother! Ah! it did more than that; though she had never heard it, it grieved the Holy Spirit, who sees and hears all. You were tempted to commit some sin, and fell before the temptation; and now that it is discovered, you can scarcely hold up your head,—it seems as if everybody were pointing his finger at you, and crying, "Shame!"—or without it being known to others, your own conscience condemns you, and you think how foolish you were to make yourself so unhappy for a moment's pleasure; it grieves you to have done it. Ay, but more than that, it has grieved the Holy Spirit. Of such things as these was Paul speaking when he wrote our text. Never, then, think lightly of them.

2. We grieve the Spirit when we neglect prayer and the reading of God's word. A son is leaving his home for the first time. His godly mother makes him promise that he will never retire to rest at night without reading a portion of God's word, which she has learned to prize above all things else. He is now lodging at some distance from town or village. It is late at night, and his candle is burnt out, and he has not read his chapter. There is not another candle in the house; there is no gas-light or lamp—none to be had without going miles for it. The night is dark; everything seems to say, "Wait for your chapter till morning—light enough then!" But that youth knows how it would grieve his mother's heart to think he had begun to neglect his Bible;—rather than that, he would do anything. The long road, and the dark night, and the late hour are disregarded; he gets his candle, and reads his Bible as perhaps never before. Ah! I wonder how many among us are as much afraid to omit their morning or evening prayer, or their morning or evening chapter, lest they should grieve the Holy Spirit. Perhaps you ask, "But how should that grieve the Spirit?"

There is a prisoner confined for some serious offence. Others would leave him to his fate, and say he richly deserved the worst he could get. But there is a kind-hearted advocate who goes down to his cell, offers to help him in drawing up a statement of his case,—leaves with him a schedule to be filled up, and a paper of instructions telling him both how to proceed now, and, in the event of his being pardoned, how to conduct himself afterwards. And as he comes down day after day, he finds things just as he left them—the schedule unfilled up, the memorial not sent off, the paper of instructions unlooked at, and the whole matter treated with neglect; the man sometimes saying he had forgot, and sometimes he had not had time, and sometimes he had been so tired and sleepy. What would you think of him? Might not his generous-hearted friend well be grieved? Children! you are that poor prisoner, and you need one to help you in your application for pardon—to tell you from whom you are to get it, how you are to ask for it, and how you are to live after you are pardoned; and that one is the Holy Spirit,—and prayer and the Bible are the only way in which you and God can converse with each other; and while the Spirit would help you both to speak to him and to understand what he says to you, he finds you careless about both. And, in so doing, how can you but grieve him? Oh, think of this, prayerless, Bible-neglecting children! If nothing else has any weight with you, surely this might move you.

3. We grieve the Holy Spirit when we are careless about our souls, and about Christ. When I was in Switzerland I saw many of the people—little children as well as men and women—suffering from a terrible disease, called goitre; great lumps growing from their neck, sometimes almost as large as their head. It is very sad, as you pass through the villages and along the roads, to see this, and nothing seems to be done to cure it. Suppose I were to make earnest inquiry everywhere, going to all quarters of the globe in search of a remedy—of some one who could effect a cure; were I to hurry back, my heart bounding with joy at having made the discovery, expecting them all to be as glad and thankful as myself, when I offered to show them the way to be cured—to guide them to one who could make them healthy and well—would it not be strange if I found them all unconcerned about it, preferring to live a miserable life, and to die a miserable death, rather than take advantage of my help? Would it not—must it not grieve me? and would I not come back from my thankless, fruitless task, miserably disappointed?

Beloved young people! the Holy Spirit was promised, and has been given to make you acquainted with your disease—the disease of which your soul is ill, and, unless cured of which, you must die eternally—and to make known to you the great Physician, the grand gospel remedy. He came to show us ourselves, and to show us Jesus. It is his work and his delight to commend Christ, and to guide men to him. He rejoices to hold up Christ to the view of poor sinners, as Moses did to lift up the serpent to the dying Israelites. He rejoices to bring glory to Christ in the salvation of souls. And when we have no care about all this, or think we can do better ourselves, and find out some way of our own, then we do not honour Christ, and we forsake our own mercies, and the good and loving Spirit is grieved. Dear children! let us at the outset, before the evil go any further, hear the voice that says to us, “Grieve not the Holy Spirit.”

“Come, Holy Spirit, from above,
With all thy quick’ning powers,
Kindle a flame of sacred love
In these cold hearts of ours.”

THE IRON BOOT.

“THERE’S poor Johnie Truman with his iron boot. I think it is real cruel in his mother making him wear it when he hates it.”

An iron boot! A boot with no give to it must be terribly cramping. How hard to the soft flesh; how rigid to the flexible muscles! Can the joints turn on their sockets? With an iron boot on, can a boy play? Can he run? It must be dragging work even to walk. Poor Johnie! Did his mother put it on for a punishment? Did she do it to fetter him, as Mr. Day does his horse to hinder him from running away?

“O mother,” cries Johnie, “do take this iron boot off. It almost kills me. I don’t care if I am lame. I don’t care if my legs are crooked. I don’t care if my ankle is out of joint. I don’t care how I am when I grow up. All I want is this off now,” and Johnie worried and fretted until almost the whole house was out of patience. He behaved as if his mother made him wear it on purpose to trouble him. Did she? Oh, no, no.

The bones in the little boy’s right foot and ankle were soft. The bones bent and were growing out of their proper proportions, when his mother consulted a physician, who put his foot into an iron boot. It was done to support the bones, and keep them in place, until they should grow strong and healthy as bones in general. But Johnie had no faith. He did not believe it would do any good. He was sure, he said, it was no use; and therefore, instead of trusting his mother and doctor, and trying to be patient, he kept complaining. “Why don’t you pull it off, and let him take the consequences!” said a woman, quite worn out by Johnie’s unreasonable conduct; “I would.”

His mother looked grieved; but with eyes of pitying affection she stroked her little boy’s hair, and said, “I must act for the future good of my child. Johnie will one day thank me for it. If he would not dwell on it so, it would not be so hard to bear. Johnie has a great deal to make him good and happy in spite of his iron boot, and that won’t last long.”

Johnie hung down his head. He felt a little ashamed, for he well knew in how many thousand ways his mother tried to soothe and make him happy; and as for the boot it was only for his good.

This year of sorrow and discipline at length passed away, and Johnie grew up to be a tall, handsome man, with strong limbs and a firm tread. And what do you think he oftenest said to his mother? “Mother, I can’t be too thankful that you persisted in making me wear that iron boot. I should have been a poor cripple to-day but for you, mother, who bore so patiently with my complaining.”

Have you an iron boot on, my dear child? Every little trial which you have—and children have their trials—is the iron boot which your Father in heaven puts on you. Many a time you feel it pinching, and are ready to cry. Do you fret and worry, and try to kick it off? Such conduct grieves God. He wants you to trust him and be patient. And as in numberless other ways he tries to make you happy, he desires you to dwell on the mercies which crown your days. That will cause you to exclaim, "Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me bless his holy name," and make you happy, very happy in spite of trial. By-and-by you will know why he tries you, and see and acknowledge how good and gracious were his purposes in every iron boot he caused you to wear.—Child at Home.

"NOT THANKFUL ENOUGH."

I ENTERED the train at N—— one morning, to go to S——, and sat down beside a little fellow whom, from his appearance, I took for a boy of perhaps nine or ten years. There was something in his countenance which immediately arrested my attention. While an expression of content, and even of peace and joy rested on his pale face, I could see also the evidences of suffering; and I noticed at the same time, as additional proof that he was subject to some infirmity, a pair of crutches standing by the carriage window.

I commenced conversation with him, and found him very intelligent, and quite willing to talk with me. Thus I learned that, instead of being only nine years old, he was fourteen; that at the age of three years he had been injured by a fall, and from that time, now eleven years, he had been a hopeless, suffering cripple. I felt much interested in his case, and greatly benefited by his words, they were so full of meekness and submission; for this dear boy, cut off by his misfortune from all the sports and the out-door amusements in which boys so much delight, expressed, with beaming eyes, his happiness in the love of that Saviour who had seen fit to make his path through so much trial.

When I reminded him that he had no doubt been kept by his lameness from many temptations to wicked ways which he would have met in the street, "Oh yes!" he said, "I know that. And then I have a great many blessings,—a great many things to make me happy. I often feel that I am not thankful enough for them."

As I looked down upon that little form, checked in its growth by suffering, and into that white, patient face; and as I heard the expressions of trust in and love for Him who "doth not afflict willingly," my heart smote me for my own ingratitude to my heavenly Father.

Dear children, when the day appointed for "Thanksgiving" comes, do you ever find it hard to tell what you have to thank God for? Does it ever seem to you that the day may be a very good one for grown-up people—for men who have gathered great harvests, or done a large business, or had richly-freighted ships come in—while you find it hard to see what little boys and girls have to do with being thankful?

Sit down a moment and think of your blessings. Remember this little lame boy. Remember the deaf and dumb, the blind, and multitudes of other children who are suffering in various ways, and see if you have not something to make you thankful; and it may be that you too will be ready to say, "I have many blessings, and I feel that I am not thankful enough for them."—Ibid.

"BE CONTENT WITH SUCH THINGS AS YOU HAVE."

A TEACHER once overheard the following conversation between two little girls in a female seminary. Sarah had just returned after vacation, and Sophy was looking on with eager interest as she was unpacking her trunk.

Sophy.—"Why, Sallie W——, I should not think you would be willing to wear such plain things as these. Do step into my room, and let me show you mine. The work is so deep, and French embroidery almost all of it."

Sarah.—"Oh, it is no matter for me to see them now. I suppose that your father is wealthy; isn't he?"

Sophy.—"Yes, indeed. He is one of the richest men in the city. Our house is splendid. I wish you could see it."

Little Sarah then gave this sweet answer to the proud girl: "Well, I know my clothes are plain, but my father is dead, and mother is not wealthy. She gets me such things as she can afford, and I am satisfied."

"WAS IT OUR JESUS?"

A LITTLE three year old girl stood at the window one pleasant Sabbath-day, "watching for papa," who was at church. Soon she spied him coming; and as he entered the door, she raised her dark eyes to him, and said,—

"Papa, what did Mr. R—— preach about this morning?"

Her father replied, "He preached about Jesus."

"Papa, was it our Jesus?" she asked.

"Yes," said her father, "it was our Jesus."

The dark eyes brightened at the thought that papa's minister knew her Jesus, and spoke about him to his congregation.

Do you, my dear child, claim this Jesus as yours? I hope so, for it is a most blessed thought that every little girl and boy may have him for their own Saviour. No matter how much he loves other children, there is room, ever room in his affection for you, and as many others as will ask him to care for them. "They brought young children to him, . . . and he took them up in his arms, and blessed them." (Mark x. 13, 16.)
